Article 212, starts with a non-obstante clause and has three parts: (i) clause (1) empowers the appropriate legislature to establish Administrative Tribunals with exclusive jurisdiction over specific subject matters provided in clauses (a), (b) and (c); (ii) clause (2) does two things, it provides for an ouster clause , excluding the jurisdiction of other courts in matters falling under the jurisdiction of the Administrative Tribunals under clause (1), and an abatement clause , abating any proceedings in respect of any such matter pending before any other court except the Supreme Court. The proviso to clause (2) extends the ouster clause in clause (2) to the Provincial Administrative Tribunals established under clause (1) only if on the request of the Provincial Assembly through a resolution, clause (2) is extended to a Provincial Tribunal through an Act of Parliament; and (iii) under clause (3) an appeal by leave is provided to the Supreme Court against the decisions of these Administrative Tribunals, if they involve a substantial question of law of public importance.

9. Article 212(1) has a non-obstante clause, i.e., Notwithstanding hereinbefore contained , that overrides other provisions of the Constitution, in particular, Article 142,[10] which vests exclusive power in the federal legislature to make laws with respect to any matter in the Federal Legislative List and concurrent power in the federal and provincial legislatures to make laws only with respect to criminal law, criminal procedure and evidence. Article 212(1) authorizes and allows the appropriate legislatures, both federal and provincial, to establish Administrative Tribunals with exclusive jurisdiction for dealing with specific subject matters as provided in clauses (a), (b) and (c) thereof. Federal legislature might not otherwise possess legislative competence under the Federal Legislative List, or under the concurrent power mentioned in Article 142, to establish these Administrative Tribunals regarding subject matters enumerated under clauses (a), (b) and (c) of Article 212(1); however, Article 212(1) of the Constitution empowers both the federal and provincial legislatures to establish such Administrative Tribunals over and above the permissible legislative competence under Article 142 and the Federal Legislative List. This unique legislative power of the provincial and federal legislatures to establish Administrative Tribunals under Article 212 with specialized subject matter and a dedicated forum of appeal, i.e., the Supreme Court, is the significance of the non-obstante clause that enables Article 212 to override the regular constitutional regime.

10. Clause (2) of Article 212 also contains a non-obstante clause, which does two things: first, it ousts the jurisdiction of all other courts vested in them in terms of Article 175 to deal with matters covered under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Administrative Tribunals established under Article 212(1); and second, it provides that any such matter pending before any other court shall abate, excluding matters pending before the Supreme Court. The proviso to clause (2) further provides that the said ouster clause will come into effect for the Provincial Tribunals only if on the resolution of the Provincial Assembly the Parliament passes an Act, which extends the provisions of clause (2) to such a Tribunal. Such a Federal Law was once enacted in 1974 titled, the Provincial Service Tribunals (Extension of Provisions of the Constitution) Act, 1974 and admittedly there is no such law that extends to the Provincial Tribunal in question.

11. Clause (2) of Article 212 is, in our opinion, merely an ouster clause and not a jurisdiction clause. In case of Federal Tribunals, it provides that no other court can take jurisdiction over any matter which falls under the subject matter of the Administrative Tribunal established under Article 212(1). If clause (2) has not been made applicable to a Provincial Tribunal, it at best means that there are other forums also available to redress the grievance of the officers, e.g., the High Court under Article 199 or the Civil Courts under Section 9 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908. In the absence of clause (2), all the judicial forums in a Province have concurrent jurisdiction along with the Provincial Administrative Tribunal. Once a civil servant invokes the jurisdiction of the Provincial Tribunal, the remedy of an appeal by leave against any decision of the Provincial Tribunal before this Court becomes alive. Remedy of appeal under clause (3) will not be available if the civil servant approaches the High Court or the Civil Court for the redressal of his grievance. Applicability of clause (2) to a Provincial Tribunal is totally insignificant as it has no effect on the remedy of appeal against the decision of the Provincial Tribunal before this Court which is ensured under clause (3).

12. Gomal repeatedly lays stress on clause (2) and its proviso to say that unless the provision of clause (2) is made applicable to a Provincial Tribunal, the remedy of appeal under clause (3) before this Court is not available against any decision of a Provincial Tribunal. This line of reasoning is based on the central principle formulated in Gomal; that only federal legislature can vest jurisdiction in the Supreme Court under the Constitution (entry 55 of the Federal Legislative List) and therefore unless there is an Act of Parliament extending clause (2) to a Provincial Tribunal, right to appeal is not available to this Court under clause (3). This line of reasoning is, with respect, flawed as Gomal fails to appreciate the clear and direct provision of the Constitution, i.e. clause (3) of Article 212, and instead places reliance on the legislative competence to enact a sub-constitutional law under the Constitution. While Gomal is right when it reasons that the appellate jurisdiction can only be conferred upon the Supreme Court by federal legislature under entry 55 of the Federal Legislative List and not by the provincial legislature, it utterly fails to appreciate that it is the non-obstante provision of Article 212 of the Constitution itself that is allowing appeal by leave from a Provincial Administrative Tribunal to the Supreme Court. The principle enunciated in Gomal, that it is only the Parliament that can (if at all) enact legislation that acts upon or affects the jurisdiction of this Court[;] [t]he provincial assemblies cannot do so , has little significance once the Constitution itself has conferred appellate jurisdiction on the Supreme Court against matters arising from a Tribunal constituted under Article 212(1)(a). Even otherwise, the foundational premise of Gomal that only federal legislature can vest jurisdiction in this Court seems to have no nexus or co-relation with clause (2) which is simply an ouster clause. It is not as if the act of the Parliament under the proviso to clause (2) converts the Provincial Tribunal into a Federal Tribunal, or the provincial legislation into federal legislation, it simply ousts other courts from exercising jurisdiction in matters covered by a Provincial Tribunal.

13. Clause (3) is the third part of Article 212, which provides than an appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court from a judgment, decree order or sentence of the Administrative Tribunal, and the Supreme Court shall grant leave if the Supreme Court is satisfied that a substantial question of law of public importance arises in the case. Clause (3) has no co- relation whatsoever with the ouster clause of clause (2). Whether a Provincial Tribunal enjoys the ouster clause or not, does not affect the appellate jurisdiction of this Court. Clause (3) is independently connected with all the administrative Tribunals, including Provincial Tribunals, established under Article 212(1). It is once again reiterated that the appeal to the Supreme Court is available against orders of both the Federal and Provincial Administrative Tribunals by a special constitutional scheme provided under Article 212, which due to the non-obstante clause is over and above any sub-constitutional legislation under the regular constitutional scheme. Gomal, with respect, overlooks this important distinction and proceeds to assess the maintainability of appeal before the Supreme Court under Article 212(3) through a sub- constitutional lens. If there were no Article 212(3), Gomal would have been right in holding that only federal legislature can confer jurisdiction on the Supreme Court and not the provincial legislature, but the provincial legislature (or for that matter even the federal legislature) has not conferred the right of appeal on this Court; it is the Constitution itself that has done so under Article 212(3). It is therefore difficult for us to understand how Gomal holds that clause (2) is the gateway to clause (3), when we find no such co-relation between the two clauses. The view in Gomal that unless there is an Act of the Parliament in terms of the proviso to clause (2), the Supreme Court cannot sit over the decisions of the Provincial Tribunal in appeal, in our view and with due respect, is erroneous and deconstructs the unique constitutional scheme of establishing Administrative Tribunals under Article 212, which grants an appellate remedy to the Supreme Court from the decisions of the all Administrative Tribunals federal and provincial.

14. For the above reasons, the law declared in Gomal that unless and until the proviso to Article 212(2) of the Constitution is activated, appeal against an order of a Provincial Tribunal is not available before this Court under Article 212(3) of the Constitution, and that in the absence of such a law passed by the Parliament, the decision of a Tribunal established under the Provincial law is to be challenged under Article 199 of the Constitution, is not correct and is therefore overruled.

Merits of the present case

15. Coming to the merits of the present case, briefly the facts are that vide letter dated 6th November 2000 issued by the Services and General Administration Department, Government of NWFP (as it then was), the provincial government wrote to the Registrar, Peshawar High Court for creation of 10 additional posts of Additional District and Sessions Judges to be filled on the recommendation of the Peshawar High Court under the erstwhile NWFP Senior Judicial Officers (Terms and Conditions of Service) Rules, 1979 ( Rules, 1979 ). Names were solicited for the above posts by the Peshawar High Court from the District and Sessions Judges of KPK. One such letter addressed to District and Sessions Judge, D.I. Khan, is dated 09.12.2000. And in response, vide letter dated 21.02.2001 issued by the District and Sessions Judge, Dera Ismail Khan, name of respondent No.1, namely, Kaleem Arshad Khan, advocate along with one other was proposed from District D.I. Khan for the post of Additional District and Sessions Judge ( ADJ ) in the selection process initiated by the High Court in the year 2001. Respondent No.1 sat through the written examination and stood first in the said examination.[11] He was called for an interview and appeared before the Selection Committee and stood at the top of the merit list.[12] In pursuance to delegation notification dated 29.08.2001 issued under section 5 of the N.W.F.P Civil Servants Act, 1973, the Chief Justice of Peshawar High Court appointed four Additional and Sessions Judges vide Notification dated 19th September 2001; however, respondent No.1 who stood first in the said selection process was denied appointment. It is also pointed out that Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Judicial Service Rules, 2001 ( Rules, 2001 ) were introduced repealing Rules, 1979.

16. The respondent No.1 challenged this non-selection before the Peshawar High Court, through a writ petition which was allowed vide judgment dated 09.4.2004 [reported as Kaleem Arshad Khan v. Secretary to Government of NWFP (2004 PLC (C.S.) 1558)] with the direction to appoint respondent No.1 as Additional and District Sessions Judge on the available seat. Thereafter, the petitioner was appointed vide Notification dated 22.02.2005. Thereafter, respondent No.1 was granted seniority w.e.f. the date of his Notification and not from the date of Notification of the rest of his batchmates, i.e., 19.09.2001, who were appointed from the same selection process held in the year 2001. The issue of seniority became more important because through selection process in the year 2002 and 2003, several other ADJs were appointed, who were placed higher in seniority than the said respondent. After the denial of the seniority by the Administration Committee of the Peshawar High Court vide letter dated 13.03.2021, the respondent No. 1 challenged the same before the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Subordinate Judiciary Service Tribunal ( Tribunal ), which through the impugned judgment dated 18.12.2021, allowed his appeal and granted him seniority along with his batchmates who were appointed from the same selection process held in 2001. The contention of the petitioners, who are admittedly appointed from the selection process of the years 2002 and 2003, is that they are senior to respondent No.1 because the date of appointment of respondent No.1 is 22.02.2005.

17. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties and have examined the case record. Section 8(3) of the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Civil Servants Act, 1973 provides that the seniority shall be determined in accordance with the Rules prescribed under the said Act and Rule 10(a) of the Rules, 2001 provides that persons selected for the service in the earlier selection shall rank senior to the persons selected in a later selection. The date or year of selection process determines the seniority of an officer as per Rule 10(a). Implied in the selection process is a group or batch of candidates who go through the selection process together and are subsequently selected and appointed together. Admittedly, respondent No.1 was a part and parcel the selection process of the year 2001 but he was denied appointment which he challenged before the High Court and was successfully appointed on the direction of the High Court. His seniority under Rule 10(a) will be considered from the date of his selection process along with his group and batchmates who were a part of the same selection process. It is also admitted that the petitioners were appointed through the subsequent selection process of the years 2002 and 2003. Hence, the petitioners cannot claim seniority over respondent No.1.

18. We have gone through a well-reasoned judgment of the Tribunal, which has elaborately attended to the issue of seniority and other ancillary questions relating to limitation and res judicata, which were not specifically raised before us. We see no reason to take a view different from the view taken by the Tribunal and also find that there is no substantial question of law of public importance in this case that qualifies grant of leave to appeal. Hence, these petitions are dismissed, and the seniority of respondent No.1 settled by the Tribunal is upheld.

AYESHA A. MALIK, J.---I have read the opinion of the majority as authored by Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J. and while I agree with the conclusion on the issue of maintainability, being that these Petitions are maintainable, I do not agree with the reasons given therein. So far as the reasons and conclusions drawn on the merit of the case, I have no disagreement.

2. On the question of maintainability, the Gomal case[1] has been relied upon for its interpretation of Article 212 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 (Constitution). In the instant Petitions, the dispute emanates out of service appeals decided by the service tribunal for the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa against which Petitions under Article 212(3) of the Constitution have been filed before this Court. The relevant Provincial law is the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Subordinate Judiciary Service Tribunal Act, 1991 (SJST Act) read with the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Judicial Service Rules, 2001 (JS Rules), and the issue is whether leave to appeal can be filed before this Court in terms of Article 212(3) of the Constitution given the decision rendered in the Gomal case.

3. The Gomal judgment finds that where a Provincial law establishes Administrative Tribunals or Courts (herein after referred to as the Tribunal) under Article 212(1) of the Constitution, it must first, by way of a resolution followed by an Act of Parliament, oust the jurisdiction of all other courts to grant exclusive jurisdiction to the Provincial Tribunal, and only then can the remedy of appeal before this Court, as contained in Article 212(3) of the Constitution, be availed. The relevant law under consideration in the Gomal judgment was the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Medical Teaching Institutions Reforms Act, 2015 (Act) which provided for a medical tribunal which heard appeals in service matters under the Act. The decision of the medical tribunal was challenged before this Court under Article 212(3) of the Constitution by way of a leave petition wherein the question of maintainability arose being whether a leave petition under Article 212(3) of the Constitution is maintainable. The Gomal judgment finds that where a Province establishes the Tribunal under Article 212(1) of the Constitution, then an appeal to the Supreme Court from a judgment, decree, order or sentence of the Tribunal shall lie to the Supreme Court, subject to the fulfilment of the requirements contained in the proviso to Article 212(2) of the Constitution. The said judgment explains that the proviso must be activated for the remedy under Article 212(3) of the Constitution to be made available because the Provincial Legislature, on its own, cannot affect or act upon the jurisdiction of this Court without intervening Federal legislation. The Gomal judgment refers to the proviso to Article 212(2) as the bridge between Sub-Articles (1) and (3) of Article 212 for the purposes of availing the constitutional remedy of an appeal before this Court. It further explains that if the Provincial Assembly does not activate the proviso then the remedy of appeal before this Court is not available to such Provincial Tribunal.

4. Consequently, the question before us is whether these Leave to Appeal Petitions (Petitions) under Article 212(3) of the Constitution are maintainable given that these Petitions arise out of a judgment from a Provincial Tribunal, admittedly for which the requirements contained in the proviso to Article 212(2) have not been fulfilled.

5. The relevant Article of the Constitution (Article 212) provides that the appropriate legislature may by an Act establish the Tribunal having exclusive jurisdiction in respect of the subject-matters described in Sub-Articles (a), (b) and (c) of Article 212(1) of the Constitution. So, Article 212(1) allows the competent legislature, be it Federal or Provincial, as the case may be, to establish the Tribunal with exclusive jurisdiction for the given subject-matters. Article 212(1) starts with a non-obstante clause notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained which addresses the constitutional authority with respect to legislative competence set out in Article 142 of the Constitution. It may be noted that Article 212(1) of the Constitution has an overriding effect on Article 142 of the Constitution which provides that it is subject to the Constitution. Therefore, the constitutional command is that while legislative competence is derived from Article 142 of the Constitution, the Constitution itself grants competence to the relevant legislature to establish the Tribunal on the given subject-matters under Article 212. Effectively, Article 212(1) of the Constitution gives competence to the Federal and Provincial Legislatures to establish the Tribunal on the given subject-matters such that the Tribunal has exclusive jurisdiction and Article 212(3) further provides that an appeal to the Supreme Court from the judgment, decree, order or sentence of the Tribunal shall lie to the Supreme Court. This appeal under Article 212(3) is not as of right but is subject to the satisfaction that a substantial question of law of public importance arises in the case.

6. Article 212(2), on the other hand, provides that notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, no other court can grant an injunction, or make any order, or entertain any proceeding in respect of any matter for which the Tribunal established under Article 212(1) has exclusive jurisdiction, and any pending matter before such other court shall abate. For the purposes of the Provincial Legislature, by way of a proviso, it states that the ouster of jurisdiction as explained in Article 212(2) of the Constitution shall not apply unless the Provincial Assembly, in the form of a resolution, requests for an Act of Parliament to extend the provisions of Article 212(2) to the Tribunal. Accordingly, Article 212(2) ousts the jurisdiction of all other courts for the purposes of the Tribunal under Article 212(1) established by Parliament and where the Provincial Assembly is concerned, it must by way of a resolution request for an Act of Parliament which will oust the jurisdiction of all other Provincial courts or tribunals. An example of this proviso being activated is the Provincial Service Tribunals (Extension of Provisions of the Constitution) Act, 1974 being a Federal law which extended the provisions of Article 212(2) of the Constitution to the Provincial Service Tribunals of Balochistan, Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab and Sindh resulting thereby in a direct leave to appeal petition before this Court under Article 212(3) of the Constitution.

7. Hence, the question is what is the effect of this ouster of jurisdiction under Article 212(2) and whether it is mandatory for the proviso contained therein to be activated in order for the leave to appeal to be filed before this Court. To my mind, Article 212(3) of the Constitution is the constitutional mandate which prescribes that leave to appeal before the Supreme Court for the Tribunal established under Article 212(1) of the Constitution can be filed directly, meaning thereby, the Constitution itself provides for the remedy of appeal before the Supreme Court. Both Sub-Articles (1) and (3) of Article 212 of the Constitution are exceptions to the legislative authority contained in Article 142 of the Constitution as the Constitution itself authorizes and permits the Federal and Provincial Legislature, irrespective of the authority given in Article 142 of the Constitution read with the Federal Legislative List (FLL), to establish the Tribunal and to allow its leave to appeal directly before this Court. Article 212(2) merely ousts the jurisdiction of other courts or fora. Resultantly, even though the Tribunal is established under Article 212(1), the ouster of jurisdiction of other courts is automatically triggered by Article 212(2) of the Constitution and with respect to federal courts but for the provincial courts it is necessary that the Provincial Assembly activate the proviso to Article 212(2) of the Constitution. In such case, the Tribunal will be an exclusive forum, which totally and completely ousts the jurisdiction of all other courts or fora with respect to the special subject-matters contained in Sub-Articles (a), (b) and (c) of Article 212(1) of the Constitution. However, if the proviso is not activated, meaning there is no resolution by the Provincial Legislature (followed by an Act of Parliament) the ouster of jurisdiction will not be triggered. Consequently, a litigant will have the option to avail its remedy before any other forum including the remedy before the Supreme Court.

8. Gomal appears to read exclusivity and ouster as synonymous, because it relies on the principle that the Provincial Legislature cannot act upon the jurisdiction of this Court without intervening Federal legislation, hence, in order for the Tribunal to have exclusive jurisdiction, the proviso must be activated. This in turn means that if the proviso is activated, then the exclusivity of the Tribunal will mean ouster of the jurisdiction as well. However, to my understanding, exclusivity will not per se oust the jurisdiction of other courts without an express provision stating so as exclusivity of jurisdiction does not imply the ouster of jurisdiction.

9. For ouster of jurisdiction to take effect an express provision is required which is precisely what Article 212(2) of the Constitution does. In other words, the proviso does not act as a bridge between Sub-Articles (1) and (3) of Article 212, rather it allows and empowers the Provincial Legislature to decide whether, for the purposes of the establishment of the Provincial Tribunal, remedy should lie exclusively to the Supreme Court or, in the alternate, giving more options to the litigant.

10. As far as the discussion of the majority opinion in the instant matter on Entry 55 of the FLL[2], to my mind, and with great respect, is not relevant to the dispute at hand. The issue before us in this matter is simply whether the remedy of appeal as provided in Article 212(3) of the Constitution is available to the Petitioners. The answer to this question is in the affirmative as this remedy has been provided, specifically and categorically, by the Constitution itself, and not by way of any ordinary legislation. In my opinion, therefore, there is no issue pertaining to legislative competence under Entry 55 of the FLL. Consequently, the entire discussion as to Entry 55 of the FLL in the instant case, has no bearing or impact on the outcome of the issue of maintainability.

11. Furthermore, as to my understanding, even Gomal discusses Entry 55 of the FLL in its Paragraph No. 14 in a specific and limited context with reference to the Interim Constitution, 1972 (1972 Constitution) as an explanation to the point that competence to make law conferring additional jurisdiction on the Supreme Court lies only with Parliament, if at all, that too, to the extent and manner specified therein and further that the Provinces do not have legislative competence with regard to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Thus with reference to this discussion, Gomal highlights that the 1972 Constitution did not have a provision equivalent to Article 212(3) of the existing Constitution and linked the legislative entry to Article 188 thereof. This provision of the 1972 Constitution has no equivalent in the present Constitution and it is for this reason that Gomal has expressed its reservations as to Entry 55 of the FLL by using the words if at all in parentheses, the import of which may have escaped the attention of the majority s opinion. While discussing the present Constitution in Paragraph No. 15, Gomal stresses on the fact that the Provinces have no legislative competence to enact legislation that affects or acts upon the jurisdiction of this Court, and hence, in this context, Gomal considers the proviso to Article 212(2) as a bridge between Article 212(1) and (3) of the Constitution, meaning thereby Article 212(3) cannot be regarded as an independent standalone provision as it needs the proviso to activate the exclusivity and ouster of jurisdiction. So the focus of Gomal in fact is the issue of legislative competence of the Provincial legislature with respect to the jurisdiction of this Court.

12. Accordingly, as Article 212(1) of the Constitution itself confers jurisdiction on the Provincial Legislature to establish the Provincial Tribunal under Article 212(1), the Constitution also confers appellate jurisdiction to the Supreme Court from a judgment, decree, order or sentence of the said Provincial Tribunal, the remedy of leave to appeal before the Supreme Court is available against the decision of the KPK Service Tribunal established under Article 212(1) since these Petitions are with reference to the appeal under section 5 of the SJST Act from an order of the said Service Tribunal.

13. Accordingly, these Petitions under Article 212(3) of the Constitution are maintainable.

(a) Arbitration Act (X of 1940)---

----Preamble---Arbitration, concept of---Minimal interference by courts in international commercial arbitration---Minimal interference and support for the arbitration by the courts as an alternate mode of dispute resolution, explained.

The idea of arbitration is that of binding resolution of disputes accepted with serenity by those who bear its consequences because of their special trust in chosen decision makers. It is difficult for courts to achieve this kind of acceptance; public justice tends to be distant and impersonal. Arbitration is a private initiative. The idea of Arbitration is freedom reconciled with law. The philosophical premise is that people are free to arrange their private affairs as they see fit, provided that they do not offend public policy or mandatory law. Arbitration thus embodies the principles of autonomy and voluntariness, respecting the parties' freedom to design a process that best suits their needs. It reflects a philosophical shift towards self-governance in dispute resolution, allowing parties to choose their arbitrators and the applicable law, thereby creating a more tailored and potentially equitable outcome. The role of courts in the context of arbitration has therefore evolved with a trend towards minimal interference.

Jan Paulsson, Idea of Arbitration, Oxford University Press (2013) ref.

More significant is the minimal interference in international commercial arbitration that stands as a cornerstone in the resolution of cross-border commercial disputes, offering a preferred alternative to litigation in national courts for businesses worldwide. One of the foundational aspects of international commercial arbitration is its emphasis on neutrality, expeditiousness, efficiency and the ability to provide solutions tailored to the needs of international business transactions. International commercial arbitration plays a crucial role in resolving disputes arising from cross-border trade and commerce, expeditiously and efficiently. The global view on international commercial arbitration is therefore overwhelmingly positive, with businesses and legal professionals alike recognizing its benefits over traditional litigation.

----Art. I---International commercial arbitration---Pro-enforcement bias of the New York Convention for enforcing foreign awards, explained.

The New York Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards of 1958 plays a pivotal role, underpinning the global enforcement regime for foreign awards that has made arbitration a linchpin in international commerce. The Convention facilitates the recognition and enforcement of arbitration agreements and awards across its member States, significantly reducing the uncertainty and complexity associated with cross-border dispute resolution. The role of courts in the context of international commercial arbitration has thus evolved to support and complement the arbitration process. Courts are no longer seen as competitors to arbitration but as essential partners in ensuring the effectiveness and integrity of the process. Their duty is to support, not to supplant, the arbitral process.

This approach of minimal interference and support for the arbitral process is enshrined in the concept of "pro-enforcement bias", which refers to the inclination of legal frameworks, such as the New York Convention and national laws, to facilitate the enforcement of arbitral awards. This bias underscores the commitment to uphold the integrity of arbitration as a means of settling international disputes by limiting the grounds on which enforcement can be refused and placing the burden of proof on the party resisting enforcement. The courts' role is to interpret these provisions narrowly to promote certainty and predictability in international transactions. This bias is not about unjustly favoring one party over another but is aimed at promoting the effectiveness and efficiency of arbitration as a dispute resolution mechanism. The pro-enforcement bias underscores the commitment of the legal system, embodied in international conventions, like the New York Convention, to respect and uphold the parties' agreement to arbitrate and to ensure that the outcome of such arbitrations (the arbitral awards) are recognized and enforced with minimal interference. This bias is critical in providing parties with the confidence that their decisions to arbitrate disputes will be supported by courts around the world, thus enhancing the attractiveness of arbitration as a method of resolving international commercial disputes. This enforceability is crucial for the fluidity of international trade, providing businesses with the certainty and security needed to engage in cross-border transactions.

(c) Recognition and Enforcement (Arbitration Agreements and Foreign Arbitral Awards) Act (XVII of 2011)---

----Ss. 2(b), 2(c) & 2(e) ---International commercial arbitration---Foreign arbitral award---Scope---Whether an award made in a Contracting State, in pursuance to an arbitration agreement governed by the law of Pakistan, is a foreign arbitral award for applicability of the Recognition and Enforcement of Arbitration Agreement and Foreign Award Act 2011?---Held, that as per the definitions provided in sections 2(b), 2(c) & 2(e) of the Recognition and Enforcement (Arbitration Agreements and Foreign Arbitral Awards) Act, 2011 (‘the 2011 Act’), an arbitral award made in a State which is a party to the United Nations Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards 1958 or in such other State as may be notified by the Federal Government in the official Gazette, is a “foreign arbitral award” for applicability of the 2011 Act---Nothing more is required to make an award the “foreign arbitral award” for applicability of the provisions of the 2011 Act---Law governing the main contract between the parties, the law governing the arbitration agreement, and the law governing the arbitration proceedings are all irrelevant and extraneous in determining the status of an arbitral award under the 2011 Act---In defining a “foreign arbitral award” for applicability of the 2011 Act, the legislature has adopted a pure “territorial approach” and has made in this regard the “seat of arbitration” the sole criterion---Not only the governing laws but also the nationality of the parties to the award are irrelevant in determining the status of an arbitral award under the 2011 Act---In the present case the Award had been made in a Contracting State, i.e., Singapore---Nothing more was required to make it a foreign arbitral award, for applicability of the 2011 Act---In this regard, the facts that the main contract between the parties and the arbitration agreement were governed by the law of Pakistan, did not have any effect.

----Repealed law---Scope---Court cannot administer a repealed law, except to the extent specified by the legislature itself in the repealing law or some other general law providing the effect of the repeal of laws.

----Expression 'means' used in a statute to define any word, term or expression---When the legislature employs the verb “means” in defining any word, term or expression, the definition provided is restrictive and exhaustive, and nothing else can be added to the same---Such definition being itself the most authentic expression of the legislature’s intent as to the meaning of a particular word used in the law enacted by the legislature is binding on the courts and leaves no room for them to discover by way of interpretation some other intent of the legislature.

Commissioner of Income Tax v. Khurshid Ahmad PLD 2016 SC 545 ref.

----Prospective and retrospective effect of a law---Principles stated.

A new law that only deals with the procedure and does not in any way affect the substantive rights of the parties applies both prospectively to future proceedings as well as retrospectively to pending proceedings. However, a law that takes away or abridges the substantive rights of the parties only applies prospectively unless either by express enactment or by necessary intendment the legislature gives to it the retrospective effect. The notable point is that even a procedural law that affects, though indirectly, the substantive rights of the parties is to be applied only prospectively, in the absence of any contrary provision therein, such as the right to institute an action for the enforcement of a substantive right or the right to appeal arising from that action as an appeal is considered a continuation of the original action. Denial of the remedy, it is said, is destruction of the right. Without remedy, there is no right; it is the remedy that makes the right real. The proper approach, therefore, to the construction of a statute as to its prospective or retrospective applicability, in the absence of legislature’s express enactment or necessary intendment, is not to decide what label to apply to it, procedural or otherwise, but to see whether the statute if applied retrospectively to a particular type of case would impair existing rights and obligations. Such an examination, however, is needed only where the legislature has not, by express enactment or necessary intendment, provided for retrospective effect; as the legislature can by express enactment or necessary intendment also affect the existing rights and obligations. The legislature which is competent to make a law also has the power to legislate it retrospectively and can by legislative fiat take away even the vested rights.

(g) Recognition and Enforcement (Arbitration Agreements and Foreign Arbitral Awards) Act (XVII of 2011)---

----Ss. 1(3) & 4---Arbitration Act (X of 1940), S. 34---International commercial arbitration---Scope of section 1(3) as to the retrospective effect of the Recognition and Enforcement (Arbitration Agreements and Foreign Arbitral Awards) Act, 2011 ('the 2011 Act') on arbitration agreements---As for subsection (3) of Section 1 of the 2011 Act, which states that the Act shall apply to arbitration agreements made before the date of commencement of the Act, it only applies for the purpose of Section 4 of the 2011 Act to stay the legal proceedings in respect of a matter which is covered by the arbitration agreement and to refer the parties to arbitration---Notable point, however, is that because of the retrospective effect given by Section 1(3) of the 2011 Act, all courts in Pakistan are to recognize and enforce arbitration agreements, wherein the parties have agreed to have the arbitration held in a Contracting State, within the scope of the provisions of Section 4 of the 2011 Act, not of Section 34 of the Arbitration Act, 1940 ('the 1940 Act'), despite that such agreements have been made before the commencement of the 2011 Act.

(h) Recognition and Enforcement (Arbitration Agreements and Foreign Arbitral Awards) Act (XVII of 2011)---

----Ss. 1(4) & 10(2)---Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act (VI of 1937) [since repealed], S. 2---International commercial arbitration---Foreign arbitral award---Scope of Section 1(4) as to the retrospective effect of the Recognition and Enforcement (Arbitration Agreements and Foreign Arbitral Awards) Act, 2011 on foreign arbitral awards expounded.

Subsection (4) of Section 1 of the Recognition and Enforcement (Arbitration Agreements and Foreign Arbitral Awards) Act, 2011 ('the 2011 Act') states that the Act shall not apply to foreign arbitral awards made before 14 July 2005 and thus by necessary intendment gives the Act retrospective effect on foreign arbitral awards that have been made on or after the said date.

As per subsection (2) of Section 10 of the 2011 Act, notwithstanding its repeal the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, 1937 ('the 1937 Act') is to continue to have effect in relation to foreign arbitral awards made before the date of commencement of this Act and within the meaning of section 2 of the 1937 Act, which are not foreign arbitral awards within the meaning of section 2 of the 2011 Act.To come within the compass of the saving provisions of Section 10(2) of the 2011 Act, a foreign arbitral award must therefore fulfill both the conditions mentioned in clauses (a) and (b), i.e., (a) it must have been made before the date of commencement of the 2011 Act, and (b) it must fall within the meaning of "foreign award" as defined in Section 2 of the 1937 Act.

In section 10(2)(b) of the 2011 Act the phrase "which are not foreign arbitral awards within the meaning of section 2 of this Act" is like a proviso to the saving provisions and has qualified them in their scope and applicability. This phrase has exempted from the purview of the saving provisions those foreign awards which though fulfill both the conditions mentioned in clauses (a) and (b) of section 10(2) but they are also foreign arbitral awards within the meaning of Section 2 of the 2011 Act. It means that an award which is a foreign arbitral award within the meaning of Section 2 of the 2011 Act shall not come within the scope of the saving provisions and shall therefore be dealt with in accordance with the provisions of the 2011 Act, not of the 1937 Act.

The object of the saving provisions of Section 10(2) of the 2011 Act, is to save certain foreign arbitral awards, after the repeal of the 1937 Act, from falling within the scope of the Arbitration Act, 1940.

(i) Arbitration Act (X of 1940)---

----Preamble---Recognition and Enforcement (Arbitration Agreements and Foreign Arbitral Awards) Act (XVII of 2011), Preamble---International commercial arbitration---Foreign arbitral award---Non-applicability of the Arbitration Act, 1940 ('the 1940 Act')---Since, the 1940 Act relates, in pith and substance, to domestic arbitration, its status after the 18th amendment to the Constitution is that of a provincial law---The 1940 Act, a provincial law after the 18th amendment that came into force on 19 April 2010, cannot deal with international arbitration and any award made therein---So, in no way the remedies available to a party, before the 18th amendment, under the 1940 Act in relation to the Award made in an international arbitration would continue to be so after the 18th amendment, and more so, after the enactment of the Recognition and Enforcement (Arbitration Agreements and Foreign Arbitral Awards) Act, 2011 by the Federal Legislature.

----S. 2(c)---Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards, 1958 (the "New York Convention"), Arts. III & V---International commercial arbitration---Foreign arbitral award---Non-interference by domestic courts in Pakistan---Exceptions --The New York Convention implemented in Pakistan by the Recognition and Enforcement (Arbitration Agreements and Foreign Arbitral Awards) Act, 2011 ('the 2011 Act'), contains no ground as to the invalidity of a foreign award or its being against the law of the Contracting States, to refuse its recognition and enforcement and thus leaves no room for the courts of a Contracting State to enter into the exercise of examining the merits of a foreign award on the points of facts or law---In accordance with its objective, the New York Convention grants the Courts of the Contracting States the discretion to refuse to recognize and enforce a foreign arbitral award only on the grounds listed in Article V of the Convention and places the burden to prove those grounds on the party opposing the recognition and enforcement of the award---Article V(1) provides five grounds whereby the recognition and enforcement of an award may be refused at the request of the party against whom it in invoked, and Article V(2) lists two further grounds on which the Court may refuse enforcement on its own motion---Ultimate burden of proof, however, remains on the party opposing recognition and enforcement---It is, therefore, only when the party against whom the award is invoked discharges this burden that a challenge may be sustained against the recognition and enforcement of an award---Language of Article V for refusing recognition and enforcement of foreign arbitral awards is permissive and not mandatory, and the exceptions stated therein are exhaustive and construed narrowly in view of the public policy favouring the enforcement of such foreign arbitral awards---Courts may nonetheless recognize and enforce the award even if some of the exceptions exist.

----S. 2(c)---Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards, 1958 (the "New York Convention"), Art. V---International commercial arbitration---Foreign arbitral award---Non-interference by domestic courts in Pakistan---Exceptions---Public policy---Objectives sought to be achieved by the New York Convention underscore the "pro-enforcement bias" informing the Convention, guiding the Courts towards a "narrow reading" of the grounds of defence listed in the Convention, particularly, the public policy ground---Ground of defence that the arbitrator's decision is erroneous in law or fact is, therefore, not provided in the Convention; it cannot be read into in any ground of defence provided in the Convention, particularly, the public policy ground, by a "liberal reading" instead of a "narrow reading" thereof---An expansive construction of the public policy ground "would vitiate the Convention's basic effort to remove preexisting obstacles to enforcement---Recognition and enforcement of a foreign arbitral award may be refused by the courts of Pakistan on the public policy ground only where it would violate the most basic notions of morality and justice prevailing in Pakistan---Public policy ground cannot be used to examine the merits of a foreign arbitral award or to create more grounds of defence that are not provided for in the Convention, such as misapplication of the law of Pakistan by the arbitrator in making the award or the arbitrator's decision being contrary to the law of Pakistan.

----Prospective and retrospective effect of a law---Principles---While interpreting a provision of law or construing its effect, a constitutional court only declares what the law is and does not make or amend it---Law so declared by the court, therefore, as a general principle applies both prospectively to future cases and as well as retrospectively to pending cases, including the one in which it is declared---It is only as an exception to this general principle that while considering the possibility of some grave injustice or inconvenience due to the retrospective effect, the courts sometimes provide for the prospective effect of their judgments from such date as they think just and proper in the peculiar facts and circumstances of the case---But this exception cannot be invoked in a case where its effect would be tantamount to negation of the legislature's intent.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.

Preface

'The idea of arbitration', writes Jan Paulsson,[1] 'is that of binding resolution of disputes accepted with serenity by those who bear its consequences because of their special trust in chosen decision makers. It is difficult for courts to achieve this kind of acceptance; public justice tends to be distant and impersonal. Arbitration is a private initiative. The idea of Arbitration is freedom reconciled with law... [T]he philosophical premise is that people are free to arrange their private affairs as they see fit, provided that they do not offend public policy or mandatory law.' Arbitration thus embodies the principles of autonomy and voluntariness, respecting the parties' freedom to design a process that best suits their needs. It reflects a philosophical shift towards self-governance in dispute resolution, allowing parties to choose their arbitrators and the applicable law, thereby creating a more tailored and potentially equitable outcome. The role of courts in the context of arbitration has therefore evolved with a trend towards minimal interference.

2. More significant is the minimal interference in international commercial arbitration that stands as a cornerstone in the resolution of cross-border commercial disputes, offering a preferred alternative to litigation in national courts for businesses worldwide. One of the foundational aspects of international commercial arbitration is its emphasis on neutrality, expeditiousness, efficiency and the ability to provide solutions tailored to the needs of international business transactions. International commercial arbitration plays a crucial role in resolving disputes arising from cross-border trade and commerce, expeditiously and efficiently. The global view on international commercial arbitration is therefore overwhelmingly positive, with businesses and legal professionals alike recognizing its benefits over traditional litigation.

3. In this regard, the New York Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards of 1958 plays a pivotal role, underpinning the global enforcement regime for foreign awards that has made arbitration a linchpin in international commerce. The Convention facilitates the recognition and enforcement of arbitration agreements and awards across its member States, significantly reducing the uncertainty and complexity associated with cross-border dispute resolution. The role of courts in the context of international commercial arbitration has thus evolved to support and complement the arbitration process. Courts are no longer seen as competitors to arbitration but as essential partners in ensuring the effectiveness and integrity of the process. Their duty is to support, not to supplant, the arbitral process.

4. This approach of minimal interference and support for the arbitral process is enshrined in the concept of "pro-enforcement bias", which refers to the inclination of legal frameworks, such as the New York Convention and national laws, to facilitate the enforcement of arbitral awards. This bias underscores the commitment to uphold the integrity of arbitration as a means of settling international disputes by limiting the grounds on which enforcement can be refused and placing the burden of proof on the party resisting enforcement. The courts' role is to interpret these provisions narrowly to promote certainty and predictability in international transactions. This bias is not about unjustly favoring one party over another but is aimed at promoting the effectiveness and efficiency of arbitration as a dispute resolution mechanism. The pro-enforcement bias underscores the commitment of the legal system, embodied in international conventions, like the New York Convention, to respect and uphold the parties' agreement to arbitrate and to ensure that the outcome of such arbitrations (the arbitral awards) are recognized and enforced with minimal interference. This bias is critical in providing parties with the confidence that their decisions to arbitrate disputes will be supported by courts around the world, thus enhancing the attractiveness of arbitration as a method of resolving international commercial disputes. This enforceability is crucial for the fluidity of international trade, providing businesses with the certainty and security needed to engage in cross-border transactions.

5. With this understanding of arbitration, particularly international arbitration in commercial disputes, and pro-enforcement bias in enforcing foreign awards, we approach the instant case which addresses the questions: (i) whether an award made in a Contracting State, in pursuance to an arbitration agreement governed by the law of Pakistan, is a foreign arbitral award for applicability of the Recognition and Enforcement of Arbitration Agreement and Foreign Award Act 2011; and (ii) whether the retrospective application of this Act extends to an award made in arbitral proceedings commenced before its enactment.

Facts

6. The facts of the case that have given rise to these questions are quite straightforward. The appellant ("Taisei"), a Japanese company, was awarded a contract by the National Highway Authority of Pakistan, on 4 October 2006, for carrying out certain works on the Karar-Wadh Section of the Highway (N-25) in the Province of Baluchistan, Pakistan ("Project"). On 19 May 2007, Taisei entered into a subcontract with the respondent ("AMC"), a Pakistani company, for doing some part of the Project. It was agreed in the subcontract that the governing law of the subcontract shall be the law in force at the time in Pakistan, and that any dispute arising between the parties would be settled through arbitration under the Rules of Conciliation and Arbitration of the International Chamber of Commerce ("ICC"), to be held at Singapore. In the course of performing their respective obligations under the subcontract, some disputes arose between the parties. On 17 December 2008, AMC referred the matter to ICC for arbitration as per the arbitration agreement incorporated in the subcontract, and after holding the arbitration proceedings in Singapore, the arbitrator delivered the award on 9 September 2011 ("Award").

7. In order to challenge the Award, AMC filed an application under Section 14 of the Arbitration Act 1940 ("1940 Act") in the Civil Court, Lahore, on 21 September 2011, praying for a direction to the arbitrator to file the Award and the record of the arbitration proceedings. Taisei appeared before the Civil Court, Lahore, and filed an application under Order VII, Rule 10 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 ("C.P.C."), to return the application of AMC made under the 1940 Act. In its application, Taisei pleaded that the Civil Court, Lahore lacked territorial as well as subject matter jurisdiction. Taisei's plea of lack of territorial jurisdiction was based on the assertion that neither it resided or carried on business in Lahore nor the cause of action had arisen at Lahore; whereas on the plea of lack of subject matter jurisdiction, Taisei maintained that the Award was a 'foreign award' regarding which the jurisdiction exclusively vested in the High Courts under the Recognition and Enforcement of Arbitration Agreement and Foreign Award Act 2011 ("2011 Act"). The Civil Court dismissed the application of Taisei by its order dated 28 January 2012, holding that the cause of action partly arose at Lahore and that the Award was not a foreign award. Taisei preferred a revision petition in the Lahore High Court, against the order of the Civil Court. The Lahore High Court upheld the order of the Civil Court and dismissed the revision petition of Taisei by its judgment dated 14 May 2012. Taisie then sought leave from this Court to appeal the judgment of the Lahore High Court, which was granted on 8 August 2012 to examine, inter alia, the question of whether the Award was a foreign award or a domestic award. This appeal, by leave of the Court, is Civil Appeal No. 722 of 2012.

8. In addition to the filing of the application under Order VII, Rule 10, C.P.C., in the Civil Court, Lahore, Taisei filed a petition under Section 6 of the 2011 Act in the High Court of Sindh at Karachi, on 1 November 2011, for recognition and enforcement of the Award. For the rejection of this petition of Taisei, AMC filed an application under Section 11 and Order VII, Rule 11, C.P.C. The ground pleaded by AMC for rejection of Taisei's petition was that the issues of jurisdiction and non-applicability of the 2011 Act had become res judicata by virtue of the order dated 28 January 2012 passed by the Civil Court, Lahore. A Single Bench of the Sindh High Court allowed AMC's application and dismissed Taisei's petition, by its order dated 13 February 2015. It held that not the Lahore Civil Court's order but the Lahore High Court's judgment passed in revision, whether right or wrong, operated inter partes as res judicata on the issue of the nature of the Award. Taisei preferred an intra-court appeal, which was allowed by a Division Bench of the Sindh High Court by its judgment dated 7 October 2016. The Division Bench remanded the matter to the Single Bench to proceed with Taisei's petition in accordance with the 2011 Act, by holding that since an appeal against the Lahore High Court's judgment was pending before the Supreme Court, that judgment did not operate as res judicata. This decision of the Division Bench has been challenged by AMC in Civil Appeal No. 2649 of 2016.

Competing contentions of the parties

9. Before us, Taisei contends that the Award is a foreign arbitral award and is therefore to be dealt with under the 2011 Act, not under the 1940 Act. AMC controverts this contention and maintains that the Award is not a foreign arbitral award as defined in the 2011 Act and that even if it falls within that definition, the 2011 Act does not apply retrospectively to the Award made under the arbitration agreement of May 2007 and in the arbitration proceedings commenced in December 2008. Alternatively, AMC submits that if the Award is held to be a foreign arbitral award and the 2011 Act applicable to it, such construction of the 2011 Act may be declared to operate prospectively, not applicable to the present case. The learned counsel for the parties, especially the learned counsel for AMC, have advanced extensive arguments and cited several cases to support these contentions, which we shall deal with in the course of our discussion on the questions formulated on the basis of these contentions and stated at the outset of this judgment.

(i) Whether the Award is a foreign arbitral award.

10. This is the primary question involved in the case. The Lahore High Court has answered it in the negative in the impugned judgment, mainly relying upon the judgment of this Court delivered in Hitachi[2]. The learned counsel for AMC has also relied, before us, upon this case. Therefore, before we go on to the relevant provisions of the 2011 Act, on the basis of which this question is to be answered, we find it appropriate to first discuss the relevancy of Hitachi to this question.

Relevancy of Hitachi

11. In Hitachi, this Court considered the question of the nationality of two awards with reference to the relevant provisions of the law that was then in force in Pakistan on the subject of enforcement of foreign awards, i.e., the Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act 1937 ("1937 Act"). Those provisions are cited here for ease of reference:

> b) apply to any award made on an arbitration agreement governed by the law of Pakistan.

Section 9(b) of the 1937 Act, since repealed, had clearly stated that nothing in the said Act was to apply to any award made on an arbitration agreement governed by the law of Pakistan. In view of these provisions of Section 9(b) of the 1937 Act, this Court decided in Hitachi that "the two awards in question cannot be treated as foreign awards as the same are made on an arbitration agreement governed by the laws of Pakistan". That decision was thus not based on some principle of general application, enunciated by the Court in the exercise of its judicial power, but on the specific provision of a statutory law then in force in Pakistan. The 1937 Act has been repealed and replaced by the 2011 Act. There is no provision in the 2011 Act similar to the provisions of Section 9(b) of the 1937 Act. With the change of law, the statement made by this Court in Hitachi, that an award made on an arbitration agreement governed by the law of Pakistan is not a foreign award, has lost its efficacy. The Lahore High Court has failed to appreciate this point and wrongly relied upon Hitachi in the impugned judgment. For the same reason, the reliance of the learned counsel for AMC upon this case is also misplaced.

Definition of "foreign arbitral award" in the 2011 Act

12. For the purpose of determining its applicability to an award, Section 2(e) of the 2011 Act has defined the term "foreign arbitral award" and has not left the definition thereof to judicial articulation. Section 2(e) of the 2011 Act provides:

"foreign arbitral award" means a foreign arbitral award made in a Contracting State and such other State as may be notified by the Federal Government, in the official Gazette.

Section 2(b) of the 2011 Act defines a "Contracting State" thus:

"Contracting State" means a State which is a Party to the Convention;

The term "Convention" is defined in Section 2(c) of the 2011 Act:

"Convention" means the United Nations Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards, done at New York on 10th June, 1958, set forth in the Schedule to this Act;

A combined reading of the above three definitions leaves little room to speculate or argue as to what the term "foreign arbitral award" means for determining the applicability of the 2011 Act to an award. As per these definitions, an arbitral award made in a State which is a party to the United Nations Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards 1958 or in such other State as may be notified by the Federal Government in the official Gazette, is a "foreign arbitral award" for applicability of the 2011 Act. Nothing more is required to make an award the "foreign arbitral award" for applicability of the provisions of the 2011 Act. The law governing the main contract between the parties, the law governing the arbitration agreement, and the law governing the arbitration proceedings are all irrelevant and extraneous in determining the status of an arbitral award under the 2011 Act. In defining a "foreign arbitral award" for applicability of the 2011 Act, the legislature has adopted a pure "territorial approach" and has made in this regard the "seat of arbitration" the sole criterion. Not only the governing laws but also the nationality of the parties to the award are irrelevant in determining the status of an arbitral award under the 2011 Act.

Effect of word "foreign" in definition clause and option of reciprocity in the Convention

13. The learned counsel for AMC stressed much on the word "foreign" used with the words "arbitral award" in the definition of the term "foreign arbitral award" as provided in Section 2(e) of the 2011 Act and some of the Ordinances that preceded it as well as on the absence of this word in some of those Ordinances, to argue that its addition or omission makes a significant impact on the scope of the definition. Elaborating his argument, he submitted that where the word "foreign" is used as it has been in the 2011 Act, it means that the status of the award is to be first determined as being a foreign award under the 1937 Act; if the award is a foreign award within the scope of the 1937 Act and is also made in a Contracting State, only then does it fall within the definition of a "foreign arbitral award" provided in Section 2(e) of the 2011 Act.

14. With respect, we find no logic in the argument of the learned counsel for AMC. He, in fact, wants us to determine the status of an arbitral award simultaneously both under the 1937 Act and the 2011 Act. If an arbitral award passes the test of being a foreign arbitral award under both these Acts, only then as per his argument it can be treated as a foreign arbitral award for applicability of the 2011 Act. In making this argument, the learned counsel failed to note that the 1937 Act has been repealed by the 2011 Act; it is no longer the law of the land.[3] A court cannot administer a repealed law, except to the extent specified by the legislature itself in the repealing law or some other general law providing the effect of the repeal of laws.

15. The addition or omission of the word "foreign" with "arbitral award" in the definition of the term "foreign arbitral award" given in Section 2(e) of the 2011 Act does not make any difference in the scope of the definition. As an award made in a foreign country is generally called a foreign award, this word has been used only for emphasis and clarity that not all foreign awards but only those foreign awards that are made in a Contracting State or such other State as may be notified by the Federal Government in the official Gazette, shall be dealt with as "foreign arbitral awards" under the 2011 Act. In this regard, it may be underlined that the definition of the "foreign arbitral award" given in the 2011 Act is actually the manifestation of the adoption of the option of the reciprocity-principle provided for in clause 3 of Article I of the United Nations Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards 1958 ("Convention" and "New York Convention").[4] Though clause 1 of Article I of the Convention generally makes the Convention applicable to arbitral awards made in the territory or a State other than the State where the recognition and enforcement of such awards are sought, clause 3 of the same Article gives an option of adopting the reciprocity-principle by providing that when signing, ratifying or acceding to the Convention, any State may on the basis of reciprocity declare that it will apply the Convention to the recognition and enforcement of awards made only in the territory of another Contracting State.

The definition in Section 2(e) of the 2011 Act is restrictive and exhaustive 16. We all know that when the legislature employs the verb "means" in defining any word, term or expression, the definition provided is restrictive and exhaustive, and nothing else can be added to the same. Such definition being itself the most authentic expression of the legislature's intent as to the meaning of a particular word used in the law enacted by the legislature is binding on the courts and leaves no room for them to discover by way of interpretation some other intent of the legislature.[5] We cannot, therefore, read anything further into the definition of "foreign arbitral award" given by the legislature in Section 2(e) of the 2011 Act.

The Award is a foreign arbitral award

17. Thus, when we apply the definition of a "foreign arbitral award" as it is in Section 2(e) of the 2011 Act, without reading anything else into it, we find the Award to be a foreign arbitral award for the applicability of the 2011 Act. It has been made in a Contacting State, i.e., Singapore. Nothing more is required to make it a foreign arbitral award, for applicability of the 2011 Act. In this regard, the facts that the main contract between the parties and the arbitration agreement were governed by the law of Pakistan, do not have any effect.

18. The matter, however, does not end with this answer to question (i). The learned counsel for AMC made extensive arguments to establish that the 2011 Act does not apply retrospectively to the Award, which need to be addressed also.

(ii) Whether the 2011 Act applies retrospectively to the Award made in arbitration proceedings commenced before its enforcement.

19. Regarding the retrospective applicability of the 2011 Act, subsections (3) and (4) of Section 1 thereof contain the following provisions:

(3) It shall apply to arbitration agreements made before, on or after the date of commencement of this Act.

(4) It shall not apply to foreign arbitral awards made before the 14th day of July, 2005.

A bare reading of these provisions shows that the 2011 Act has prescribed no cut-off date for its retrospective applicability to arbitration agreements and has brought into the scope of its applicability all arbitration agreements made at any time before the date of its commencement. However, it has restricted its retrospective applicability to only those foreign arbitral awards that have been made on or after 14 July 2005, not before that date. This date of 14 July 2005 is actually the date when the first Ordinance[6] for recognition and enforcement of foreign arbitral awards was promulgated in Pakistan, to implement the Convention through domestic legislation. After that, eight more Ordinances[7] were promulgated before the enactment of the 2011 Act, and in all those Ordinances as well as in the 2011 Act, the date for retrospective applicability of the new law to foreign arbitral awards was kept the same, i.e., 14 July 2005.

Principles for construing a law as to its prospective and retrospective effect

20. The well-settled principle in our jurisdiction is that a new law that only deals with the procedure and does not in any way affect the substantive rights of the parties applies both prospectively to future proceedings as well as retrospectively to pending proceedings. However, a law that takes away or abridges the substantive rights of the parties only applies prospectively unless either by express enactment or by necessary intendment the legislature gives to it the retrospective effect.[8] The notable point is that even a procedural law that affects, though indirectly, the substantive rights of the parties is to be applied only prospectively, in the absence of any contrary provision therein, such as the right to institute an action for the enforcement of a substantive right[9] or the right to appeal arising from that action[10] as an appeal is considered a continuation of the original action.[11] Denial of the remedy, it is said, is destruction of the right.[12] Without remedy, there is no right; it is the remedy that makes the right real.[13] The proper approach, therefore, to the construction of a statute as to its prospective or retrospective applicability, in the absence of legislature's express enactment or necessary intendment, 'is not to decide what label to apply to it, procedural or otherwise, but to see whether the statute if applied retrospectively to a particular type of case would impair existing rights and obligations.'[14] Such an examination, however, is needed only where the legislature has not, by express enactment or necessary intendment, provided for retrospective effect; as the legislature can by express enactment or necessary intendment also affect the existing rights and obligations. The legislature which is competent to make a law also has the power to legislate it retrospectively and can by legislative fiat take away even the vested rights.[15] Our Constitution only bars retrospective legislation on criminal liabilities,[16] not on civil rights and obligations.

21. These are the principles in the light of which we are to examine the provisions of subsections (3) and (4) of Section 1 of the 2011 Act and address the arguments of the learned counsel for AMC against the retrospective effect of the 2011 Act.

Scope of Section 1(3) as to the retrospective effect of the 2011 Act on arbitration agreements

22. As for subsection (3) of Section 1 of the 2011 Act, which states that the Act shall apply to arbitration agreements made before the date of commencement of the Act, the learned counsel for AMC argued that it only applies for the purpose of Section 4[17] of the 2011 Act to stay the legal proceedings in respect of a matter which is covered by the arbitration agreement and to refer the parties to arbitration. We find the argument convincing as there is no mention of the expression "arbitration agreement" in any other part of the 2011 Act. Likewise, Article II of the Convention also mentions the same purpose of recognition and enforcement of the arbitration agreements. Section 1(3) of the 2011 Act has implemented clause 3 of Article II of the Convention, which states that the court of a Contracting State, when seized of an action in a matter in respect of which the parties have made an agreement within the meaning of this Article shall, at the request of one of the parties, refer the parties to arbitration, unless it finds that the said agreement is null and void, inoperative or incapable of being performed. The notable point, however, is that because of the retrospective effect given by Section 1(3) of the 2011 Act, all courts in Pakistan are to recognize and enforce arbitration agreements, wherein the parties have agreed to have the arbitration held in a Contracting State, within the scope of the provisions of Section 4 of the 2011 Act, not of Section 34 of the 1940 Act, despite that such agreements have been made before the commencement of the 2011 Act.

J

Scope of Section 1(4) as to the retrospective effect of the 2011 Act on foreign arbitral awards

23. Subsection (4) of Section 1 of the 2011 Act states that the Act shall not apply to foreign arbitral awards made before 14 July 2005 and thus by necessary intendment gives the Act retrospective effect on foreign arbitral awards that have been made on or after the said date. As to this provision, the learned counsel for AMC argued that it is to be read in the light of Section 10 of the Act, and when so read the Award does not, as per his stance, fall within the scope of the retrospective effect given by Section 1(4) of the Act but rather is saved from that effect. The provisions of Section 10 of the 2011 Act referred to by the learned counsel are cited here for ready reference and better appreciation of his argument:

10. Repeal and saving. (1) The Arbitration (Protocol and Convention) Act, 1937 (VI of 1937) (hereinafter in this section referred to as "the Act") is hereby repealed.

(2) Notwithstanding the repeal of the Act, it shall continue to have effect in relation to foreign arbitral awards made--

(a) before the date of commencement of this Act; and

(b) within the meaning of section 2 of the Act which are not foreign arbitral awards within the meaning of section 2 of this Act.

A plain reading of Section 10 shows that its subsection (1) simply repeals the 1937 Act, while its subsection (2) contains the saving provisions. So it is only subsection (2) that requires some elaboration to appreciate the sustainability of the argument of the learned counsel for AMC.

24. As per subsection (2) of Section 10 of the 2011 Act, notwithstanding its repeal the 1937 Act is to continue to have effect in relation to foreign arbitral awards made before the date of commencement of this Act and within the meaning of section 2 of the 1937 Act, which are not foreign arbitral awards within the meaning of section 2 of the 2011 Act. We have added emphasis in the above cited provisions of Section 10(2) on the word "and" and the phrase "which are not foreign arbitral awards within the meaning of section 2 of this Act" to signify their importance in determining the true meaning and scope of the provisions of Section 10(2) of the 2011 Act. The word "and", coordinating conjunction, has been used therein in its usual meaning conjunctively, not disjunctively, to connect the two clauses (a) and (b). To come within the compass of the saving provisions of Section 10(2), a foreign arbitral award must therefore fulfill both the conditions mentioned in clauses (a) and (b), i.e., (a) it must have been made before the date of commencement of the 2011 Act, and (b) it must fall within the meaning of "foreign award" as defined in Section 2 of the 1937 Act.

25. The phrase "which are not foreign arbitral awards within the meaning of section 2 of this Act" is like a proviso to the saving provisions and has qualified them in their scope and applicability. This phrase has exempted from the purview of the saving provisions those foreign awards which though fulfill both the conditions mentioned in clauses (a) and (b) but they are also foreign arbitral awards within the meaning of Section 2 of the 2011 Act. It means that an award which is a foreign arbitral award within the meaning of Section 2 of the 2011 Act shall not come within the scope of the saving provisions and shall therefore be dealt with in accordance with the provisions of the 2011 Act, not of the 1937 Act.

26. The object of the saving provisions of Section 10(2) of the 2011 Act, in our opinion, is to save certain foreign arbitral awards, after the repeal of the 1937 Act, from falling within the scope of the 1940 Act. The Award involved in the present case, as afore-held, is a foreign arbitral award within the meaning of Section 2 of the 2011 Act; therefore, the provisions of Section 10(2) of the 2011 Act do not apply to it. Even otherwise, the learned counsel for AMC argued that since the governing law of the arbitration agreement between the parties was Pakistani law, the Award was not a foreign award within the scope of the 1937 Act. Also for this reason, the saving provisions of Section 10(2) of the 2011 Act have nothing to do with the Award involved in the present case.

Effect of the 2011 Act on remedy under Sections 30 and 33 of the 1940 Act

27. The learned counsel for AMC argued that when the arbitration proceedings commenced in the present case neither the 2011 Act nor any of its predecessor Ordinances was in force, AMC has therefore acquired a vested right to challenge the validity of the Award under Sections 30 and 33 of the 1940 Act, which right is akin to the substantive right of appeal. In support of his argument, he relied upon Rupali[18]. He further argued that since the arbitration proceedings were commenced in the present case before the coming into force of the 2011 Act, the Award is to be dealt with for its enforcement as well as for its challenge under the 1940 Act. He, in this regard, placed reliance upon Thyssen[19].

28. We have no cavil to the general statement made by the Lahore High Court in Rupali that the right to challenge the validity of an award under the 1940 Act is akin to the right of appeal as well as to the statement made by the Indian Supreme Court in Thyssen that the right to have an award enforced or to challenge the same accrues on the commencement of the arbitration proceedings. However, the ultimate decisions made in those cases cannot be cited as a relevant precedent to have the same result in the present case. Those cases were decided on the basis of particular provisions applicable to peculiar facts of those cases. In the present case, both the applicable provisions and the facts involved are different. Rupali is the same case of Hitachi decided by this Court in appeal against the judgment of the Lahore High Court. We have already explained that it has no relevance to the present case as it was decided as per the provisions of Section 9(b) of the 1937 Act, a law that was then in force in Pakistan. Similarly, Thyssen was decided by the Indian Supreme Court in view of the provisions of Section 85(2)(a) of the Indian Arbitration and Conciliation Act 1996 which provides inter alia that notwithstanding the repeal of the 1940 Act the provisions thereof shall apply in relation to arbitral proceedings which commenced before the 1996 Act came into force unless otherwise agreed by the parties. There is no provision in the 2011 Act similar to that of Section 85(2)(a) of the Indian Arbitration and Conciliation Act 1996. Both the cases referred to by the learned counsel, therefore, do not help AMC's stance.

29. AMC's right to challenge the validity of the Award under Sections 30 and 33 of the 1940 Act accrued with the commencement of the arbitration proceedings has been taken away by the legislature in the exercise of its legislative power by giving effect to the 2011 Act on all foreign arbitral awards irrespective of the fact, whether they have been made in arbitration proceedings commenced either before or after the 2011 Act came into force. What the legislature intended to save from the operation of the 2011 Act, it provided in Section 10(2) of the 2011 Act. The Award involved in the present case, we have found above, does not come within the purview of Section 10(2) of the 2011 Act.

Effect of the change of legislative power on the subject of arbitration by the 18th Amendment to the Constitution

30. The learned counsel for AMS also argued that the 1940 Act has not been repealed by the 2011 Act, nor could it have been repealed by the Federal Legislature after the 18th amendment in the Constitution as after that amendment the subject of arbitration has fallen in the domain of the Provincial Legislatures. Since the 1940 Act has not been repealed, the remedies available to AMC under that Act, he submitted, would continue to be so even after the enactment of the 2011 Act by the Federal Legislature.

31. At first blush, the argument appears attractive but it does not survive closer scrutiny. No doubt, after the 18th amendment, the subject of "arbitration" other than "international arbitration" has fallen into the domain of the Provincial Legislatures. The question is whether the arbitration made in a foreign country, of a dispute that is governed by the domestic law, as it is in the present case, comes within the compass of "international arbitration". In this regard, the most authentic and reliable definition of "international arbitration", in our opinion, is that which is given in the UNCITRAL Model Law on International Commercial Arbitration; as this Model law is approved by the United Nations General Assembly and has so far been adopted by 121 jurisdictions of 88 States,[20] and thus reflects a worldwide consensus on that definition. Article 1(3) of the Model law has defined the international arbitration, thus:

(3) An arbitration is international if:

(a) the parties to an arbitration agreement have, at the time of the conclusion of that agreement, their places of business in different States; or

(b) one of the following places is situated outside the State in which the parties have their places of business:

(i) the place of arbitration if determined in, or pursuant to, the arbitration agreement;

(ii) any place where a substantial part of the obligations of the commercial relationship is to be performed or the place with which the subject-matter of the dispute is most closely connected; or

(c) the parties have expressly agreed that the subject matter of the arbitration agreement relates to more than one country.

A perusal of the above definition shows that it is mainly the place outside the State in relation to certain matters that makes the arbitration an international arbitration. The law that governs the contract between the parties, their arbitration agreement or the arbitration proceedings, does not have any bearing in determining the status of an arbitration as the international arbitration. Though the Federal Legislature of Pakistan, i.e., Parliament, could have covered in the 2011 Act the awards made in all types of international arbitration as provided in the UNCITRAL Model Law, it chose to exercise its legislative power only in respect of the awards made in one of the several types of international arbitration, i.e., an arbitration made outside the State.

32. Since, the 1940 Act relates, in pith and substance, to domestic arbitration, its status after the 18th amendment is that of a provincial law.[21] The argument of the learned counsel brings forth a canvas converse to that portrayed by him. It is: Can a provincial law deal with a matter that falls within the scope of the subject of "international arbitration" allocated exclusively to the Federal Legislature[22] after the 18th amendment? Certainly not. The 1940 Act, a provincial law after the 18th amendment that came into force on 19 April 2010, cannot deal with international arbitration and any award made therein. So, in no way the remedies available to AMC, before the 18th amendment, under the 1940 Act in relation to the Award made in an international arbitration would continue to be so after the 18th amendment, and more so, after the enactment of the 2011 Act by the Federal Legislature.

No remedy in the 2011 Act against the misapplication of the law of Pakistan in making an award

33. The main thrust of the arguments of the learned counsel for AMC, as we understand, was on the point that by availing remedy under Sections 30 and 33 of the 1940 Act, AMC can challenge the validity of the Award on the ground of it being the result of the misapplication of the law of Pakistan, the governing law of the contract; but under the 2011

Act, AMC may not do so. Therefore, according to him, it would be unjust and inconvenient for AMC if it is deprived of that remedy, and would put AMC into a situation that was not visualized by AMC when it entered into the arbitration agreement with Taisei on 19 May 2007.

34. We think that what the learned counsel for AMC has presented as an unjust and inconvenient situation is perhaps one of those very situations to change them the Convention came into being and the 2011 Act was enacted. Through an arbitration agreement, the parties undertake to submit to arbitration their disputes, present or future, for resolution. By doing so, they make a choice to have their disputes resolved through a medium that is alternate to the traditional mode of dispute resolution through litigation in courts. Over the years, the courts however expanded the scope of their jurisdiction to examine the validity of an award, under the 1940 Act, to such an extent that arbitration which was an alternate mode of dispute resolution became an additional process before the regular litigation in courts, and thus almost lost its efficacy. Without appreciating the objective of the parties in adopting the alternate mode of arbitration, the courts started examining the merits of the decision made by the arbitrators, as a first appellate court, treating it just a decision of a trial court open to full scrutiny in first appeal on all points of facts and law. Similarly, in the 1937 Act there was a scope for the courts to enter into the merits of the award; for it provided that the enforcement of a foreign award would be refused if its enforcement was contrary to the law of Pakistan, in addition to the ground of its being contrary to the public policy.[23] The New York Convention implemented in Pakistan by the 2011 Act, contains no ground as to the invalidity of a foreign award or its being against the law of the Contracting States, to refuse its recognition and enforcement and thus leaves no room for the courts of a Contracting State to enter into the exercise of examining the merits of a foreign award on the points of facts or law.

Pro-enforcement bias of the New York Convention

35. In the context of recognition and enforcement of foreign arbitral awards, there has been a global shift from a standard enforcement of awards towards a more "pro-enforcement" approach.[24] The New York Convention, implemented in Pakistan by the 2011 Act, replaced the Geneva Convention on the Execution of Foreign Arbitral Awards, 1927 ("Geneva Convention") incorporated in Pakistan under the 1937 Act, and sought to overcome the hurdles that an award-creditor had to meet under the previous regime for the recognition and enforcement of a foreign arbitral award. Its main objective is to facilitate the recognition and enforcement of foreign arbitral awards to the greatest extent possible and to set out a maximum level of control that the Contracting States may exert over such awards.[25] This shift and the underlying objective become evident in the comparison of the New York Convention with the preceding Geneva Convention.

36. The change in the structure adopted in the New York Convention reflects that the world consensus was towards further liberalizing the recognition and enforcement of foreign arbitral awards in their respective States. Firstly, the Geneva Convention, though a pivotal step for the standardization of enforcement procedures with regards to foreign arbitral awards, had placed the burden on the party relying on the arbitral award to prove five cumulative conditions in order to obtain recognition and enforcement, as required under Article 1 of the Geneva Convention. Conversely, in accordance with its objective, the New York Convention grants the Courts of the Contracting States the discretion to refuse to recognize and enforce a foreign arbitral award only on the grounds listed in Article V of the Convention and places the burden to prove those grounds on the party opposing the recognition and enforcement of the award. Article V(1) provides five grounds whereby the recognition and enforcement of an award may be refused at the request of the party against whom it in invoked, and Article V(2) lists two further grounds on which the Court may refuse enforcement on its own motion. The ultimate burden of proof, however, remains on the party opposing recognition and enforcement. It is, therefore, only when the party against whom the award is invoked discharges this burden that a challenge may be sustained against the recognition and enforcement of an award.[26]

37. Further, Article 2 of the Geneva Convention had provided that even if the conditions laid down in Article 1 are fulfilled, the recognition and enforcement of the award "shall" be refused if the Court is satisfied that any of the grounds provided under this provision, including if the award has been annulled in the country in which it was made[27], are fulfilled. Whereas, the New York Convention imposes no such positive obligation to deny the recognition or enforcement of international arbitral awards. Instead, Articles V(1) and (2) provide exceptions to an affirmative obligation of recognizing and enforcing a foreign arbitral award indicating that this "may" be refused provided the grounds enumerated therein are proved, therefore, not being affirmative obligations in their own right. This interpretation is also premised in the cumulative reading of Article III of the Convention, which provides that each Contracting State "shall" recognize arbitral awards as binding and enforce awards in accordance with the Convention, and Article V, which provides that recognition and enforcement of awards may be refused "only" if one of the specified exceptions apply.[28] Therefore, the language of Article V for refusing recognition and enforcement of foreign arbitral awards is permissive and not mandatory[29], and the exceptions stated therein are exhaustive and construed narrowly in view of the public policy favouring the enforcement of such foreign arbitral awards.[30] The Courts may nonetheless recognize and enforce the award even if some of the exceptions exist.[31]

38. Another notable difference is with regards to the grounds available to refuse the recognition and enforcement of foreign arbitral awards in the New York Convention and the Geneva Convention. In addition to the cumulative requirements under Article 1 and the grounds available to refuse recognition and enforcement under Article 2, Article 3 of the Geneva Convention went further and provided that if the party against whom the award has been made, proves that under the law governing the arbitration procedure there is a ground, other than the grounds in Articles 1 and 2, entitling him to contest the validity of the award in the Court, the Court may, if it thinks fit, either refuse recognition or enforcement of the award or adjourn the consideration thereof, giving the party reasonable time within which to have the award annulled by the competent tribunal. The New York Convention, however, restricts the grounds for refusing recognition and enforcement to only those specifically mentioned in Article V.[32] These grounds set out a "maximum level of control" that the Contracting States may exert over foreign arbitral awards.[33]

39. The intent to restrict grounds for the refusal of recognition and enforcement of foreign arbitral awards can also be gauged from the omissions made in the New York Convention. Article 1(e) of the Geneva Convention required that it had to be positively demonstrated that recognition and enforcement of the award was not contrary to public policy or the "principles of law" of the country in which it is sought to be relied upon. The New York

Convention omits any reference to an award being contrary to "principles of law", a notable omission highlighting the pro-enforcement bias of the New York Convention.[34] Another pro-enforcement change in the New York Convention was the elimination of the requirement of "double exequatur". To obtain recognition and enforcement, the Geneva Convention required proof that the award had become final in the country in which it was made.[35] This essentially required two decisions leading up to the enforcement of the award; one for confirmation of the award in the country where the award was issued (the first "exequatur"), and one at the place of enforcement recognizing the award (the second "exequatur"). If either Court denied exequatur, the award could not be recognized and enforced.[36] This was done away in the New York Convention as a means to restrict the grounds for refusal of recognition and enforcement as much as possible and to place the burden of proving such grounds on the party opposing such recognition and enforcement of the award.[37] No such requirement was included in Article V of the New York Convention, and a reference to "final" award, contained in the Geneva Convention[38], was replaced with a requirement for a "binding" award in Article V(1) (e) of the New York Convention.[39]

40. Additionally and importantly, the New York Convention provides that a Contracting State may, by its domestic law, reduce the grounds for refusal to recognize and enforce a foreign arbitral award and make the provisions more favourable for a party relying upon such award, but cannot add further grounds. As is apparent from Article III of the New York Convention, any Contracting State imposing more onerous conditions on the recognition and enforcement of foreign arbitral awards will be in breach of its obligations under the New York Convention. On the other hand, Article VII(1) of the New York Convention declares inter alia that the provisions of the Convention shall not deprive any interested party of any right he may have to avail himself of an arbitral award in the manner and to the extent allowed by the law of the country where such award is sought to be relied upon. This Article, thus, refers to a "more-favourable-right" provision in the domestic law of the Contracting State, where a foreign arbitral award is sought to be relied upon, and confirms the objective of the Convention to establish a "ceiling" or "maximum level of control" for the enforcement of foreign arbitral awards, leaving each Contracting State free to act less restrictively by applying more liberal rules than what those stipulated in the New York Convention.[40] Catering to the progressive liberalization of the law of international arbitration, the New York Convention foresaw the application of more than one regime in a Contracting State, and sought to ensure that the more favourable to recognition and enforcement is to be applied, essentially leading to the application of the principle of maximum effectiveness.[41]

41. These objectives sought to be achieved by the New York Convention underscore the "pro-enforcement bias" informing the Convention, guiding the Courts towards a "narrow reading" of the grounds of defence listed in the Convention, particularly, the public policy ground.[42] The ground of defence that the arbitrator's decision is erroneous in law or fact is, therefore, not provided in the Convention; it cannot be read into in any ground of defence provided in the Convention, particularly, the public policy ground, by a "liberal reading" instead of a "narrow reading" thereof. An expansive construction of the public policy ground "would vitiate the Convention's basic effort to remove preexisting obstacles to enforcement".[43] The recognition and enforcement of a foreign arbitral award may be refused by the courts of Pakistan on the public policy ground only where it would violate the "most basic notions of morality and justice"[44] prevailing in Pakistan. The public policy ground cannot be used to examine the merits of a foreign arbitral award or to create more grounds of defence that are not provided for in the Convention,[45] such as misapplication of the law of Pakistan by the arbitrator in making the award or the arbitrator's decision being contrary to the law of Pakistan.

The 2011 Act applies retrospectively to the Award made in arbitration proceedings commenced before its enforcement.

42. Thus, we find that all the relevant arguments of learned counsel for AMC against the retrospective effect of the 2011 Act on the Award are not legally sustainable. The 2011 Act applies retrospectively to the Award made in arbitration proceedings commenced before its enforcement and has taken away the right accrued in favour of AMC, as well as of Taisei if it had been aggrieved of the Award, with the commencement of the arbitration proceedings on 17 December 2008, to challenge the validity of the Award under the then applicable law, i.e, Sections 30 and 33 of the 1940 Act.

Prospective or retrospective applicability of the construction of the 2011 Act

43. So far as the alternative prayer for declaring the construction of the 2011 Act against the AMC's stance to be not applicable to the present case is concerned, the learned counsel for AMC in his arguments relied upon Bharat Aluminium,[46] a case from a neighbouring jurisdiction.

44. We all know that while interpreting a provision of law or construing its effect, a constitutional court only declares what the law is and does not make or amend it. The law so declared by the court, therefore, as a general principle applies both prospectively to future cases and as well as retrospectively to pending cases, including the one in which it is declared. It is only as an exception to this general principle that while considering the possibility of some grave injustice or inconvenience due to the retrospective effect, the courts sometimes provide for the prospective effect of their judgments from such date as they think just and proper in the peculiar facts and circumstances of the case.[47] But this exception cannot be invoked in a case where its effect would be tantamount to negation of the legislature's intent. As afore-held, the legislature has applied the 2011 Act retrospective to all arbitration agreements made at any time before the commencement of the 2011 Act and to all foreign arbitral awards made on or after 14 May 2005. The legislature consisting of the chosen representatives of the people of Pakistan did not consider it fit to do what AMC wants us to do. We are, in no way, better positioned than the representatives of the people to judge what is or what is not unjust and inconvenient for the people. Where the intent of the legislature is clear in its enactment, the courts cannot second judge the wisdom of the legislature and refuse to give effect thereto by declaring it unjust or inconvenient.[48] The case relied upon by the learned counsel also has the distinguished facts and circumstances as in that case, the Indian Supreme Court held that its earlier two judgments had not declared the correct law and that the law earlier declared by it was being followed by it as well as by all the High Courts in the country on numerous occasions. The present case does not involve any such situation, as no earlier law declared by this Court has been said to be wrong. In fact, there is no other judgment of this Court that has earlier interpreted the provisions of the 2011 Act examined in the present case.

45. As afore-said, we have found that the Award is a "foreign arbitral award" within the meaning and scope of this expression as defined in the 2011 Act, notwithstanding what law governed the main contract between the parties and their arbitration agreement, and the Act applies to all foreign arbitral awards, including the Award, made on or after 14 May 2005, notwithstanding what law governs the arbitration agreement when the arbitration proceedings commenced in which they are made. In view thereof, the order of the Civil Court, Lahore, made on Taisei's objection as to lack of subject matter jurisdiction is held to be erroneous. As the present case can be decided only on this ground, we find it unnecessary to go on to Taisei's objection as to lack of territorial jurisdiction of the courts at Lahore. In the exercise of its revisional jurisdiction, the Lahore High Court failed to correct the legal error committed by the Civil Court and went wrong on a point of law in upholding the Civil Court's order. Therefore, while allowing Civil Appeal No.722, we set aside both the judgment of the Lahore High Court and the order of the Civil Court, Lahore. Consequently, Taisei's application made under Order VII, Rule 10, C.P.C., stands accepted on the ground of lack of subject matter jurisdiction and AMC's application filed in the Civil Court, Lahore under Section 14 of the 1940 Act is rejected under Order VII, Rule 11, C.P.C.

46. We may clarify here that since no other civil court anywhere in Pakistan can assume and exercise its jurisdiction under the 1940 Act regarding the Award, we have rejected AMC's application under Order VII, Rule 11, C.P.C. instead of returning it under Order VII, Rule 10, C.P.C., as prayed for by Taisei in its application. The lack of subject matter jurisdiction means that the suit or for applicability of the principle, any other proceeding is barred by law and thus comes within the scope of clause (d) of Rule 11 of Order VII, C.P.C.[49] Rule 10 of Order VII, C.P.C. mainly relates to lack of territorial or pecuniary jurisdiction, where after the return of the plaint the same may be presented to the court in which the suit should have been instituted. Further, it may be underlined that it is the duty of the courts to apply the correct law to the admitted or established facts of the case before them, whether or not it has been relied upon by a party.[50]

Decision in Civil Appeal No. 2649 of 2016

47. In this appeal, we find that the impugned judgment of the Division Bench of the Sindh High Court is completely correct in holding that since an appeal against the Lahore High Court's judgment was pending before this Court, that judgment did not operate as res judicata. The appeal pending before this Court could at most attract the applicability of the principle of res sub judice[51] and the Single Bench of the Sindh High Court could have stayed under Section 10, C.P.C., the proceeding on Taisei's petition filed under the 2011 Act, till decision of the pending appeal by this Court. But as this Court itself had asked the Single Bench to decide Taisei's petition,[52] the bar of the principle of res sub judice also stood eclipsed. We find no merits in this appeal; it is therefore dismissed.

MWA/T-2/SC Order accordingly.

(Against the judgment/order(s) of Lahore High Court, Lahore dated 09.06.2022, passed in ITR No.59534 of 2021, etc. and dated 12.01.2023 passed in ITR No. 79913 of 2022 and ITR No. 1420 of 2023).

----Ss. 111 & 122 (as it existed prior to amendment by the Finance Act, 2020)---Unexplained income or assets---Amendment of an assessment---Notices issued under Sections 111 & 122(9) of the Income Tax Ordinance, 2001 ("Ordinance")---Whether a separate notice is required under Section 111 of the Ordinance or whether a notice under Section 122(9) is enough to initiate proceedings for amendment of the assessment on the grounds mentioned in Section 111 of the Ordinance---Held, that the proceedings under Sections 111 & 122 of the Income Tax Ordinance, 2001 ("Ordinance") are different and distinguishable in nature and cannot be subsumed---Before an assessment can be amended under Section 122 on the basis of Section 111, the proceedings under Section 111(1) are to be initiated, the taxpayer is to be confronted with the information and the grounds applicable under Section 111(1) through a separate notice under the said provision, and then the proceedings are to be culminated through an appropriate order in the shape of an opinion of the Commissioner---This then becomes definite information for the purposes of Section 122(5), provided the grounds mentioned in Section 122(5) are applicable---The taxpayer is then to be confronted with these grounds through a notice under Section 122(9) and only then can an assessment be amended under Section 122.

The initiation and culmination of proceedings under Section 111 of the Income Tax Ordinance, 2001 ('Ordinance') becomes necessary before action can be taken under Section 122 to amend assessments on the basis of proceedings undertaken under Section 111. The information available with the department under Section 111(1) is mere information. It is only after the taxpayer is confronted with this information through a separate notice by calling for an explanation, and when no explanation is offered or the explanation is not satisfactory in the opinion of the Commissioner under Section 111(1), that it transforms or crystallizes into "definite information" for the purposes of action under Section 122(5) for amendment of assessment under Section 122. The taxpayer will then be confronted with the grounds applicable under Section 122(5) through a notice under Section 122(9) of the Ordinance. As such, where the Commissioner has formed an opinion against the taxpayer as to the fulfilment of one of the grounds mentioned in Section 111(1)(a) to (d) of the Ordinance, and is of the view that any of the grounds in Section 122(5) is applicable, the process under Section 122 is to be initiated to amend assessments through a notice under Section 122(9). Thus, unless the proceedings under Section 111(1) are initiated and completed, Section 122(5) cannot be given effect to and no notice under Section 122(9) can be issued for the purposes of amending an assessment through an addition contemplated under Section 111. After the amendment introduced in Section 122(5) of the Ordinance through the Finance Act, 2020, the words "definite information acquired from an audit or otherwise" have been substituted with "audit or on the basis of definite information". Therefore, the interpretation rendered above as to the applicability of Section 122(5) may not be applicable to cases post 2020 and the effect of the substituted expression will have to be determined in an appropriate case in the future.

Commissioner Inland Revenue v. Bashir Ahmed 2021 SCMR 1290; Commissioner Inland Revenue v. Faqir Hussain 2019 PTD 1282; Commissioner Inland Revenue v. Ranipur CNG Station 2017 PTD 1839 and Commissioner Inland Revenue v. Muhammad Shafique 2015 PTD 1823 ref.

Before an assessment can be amended under Section 122 on the basis of Section 111, the proceedings under Section 111(1) are to be initiated, the taxpayer is to be confronted with the information and the grounds applicable under Section 111(1) through a separate notice under the said provision, and then the proceedings are to be culminated through an appropriate order in the shape of an opinion of the Commissioner. This then becomes definite information for the purposes of Section 122(5), provided the grounds mentioned in Section 122(5) are applicable. The taxpayer is then to be confronted with these grounds through a notice under Section 122(9) and only then can an assessment be amended under Section 122. A notice under Section 111 can be simultaneously issued with a notice under Section 122(9), however, proceedings under Section 111 have to be finalized first in terms of an opinion of the Commissioner so as to constitute definite information, as is required under Section 122(5) of the Ordinance.

Commissioner Inland Revenue v. Falah 2021 PTD 192; Commissioner Inland Revenue v. Faqir Hussain 2019 PTD 1828; Commissioner Inland Revenue v. Ranipur CNG Station 2017 PTD 1839 and Commissioner Inland Revenue v. Bashir Ahmed 2021 SCMR 1290 ref.

Even where a notice under Section 111 is issued simultaneously with a notice to amend an assessment under Section 122(9) of the Ordinance, no proceedings can be undertaken under the latter until the proceedings under Section 111 are finalized and result in an opinion against the taxpayer. This is because, even if some basis for action under Section 111 is mentioned in a notice under Section 122(9), it cannot constitute definite information for the purposes of Section 122(5). The proceedings under the notice issued under Section 122(9) can only be formally initiated when the requirement of definite information is satisfied under Section 122(5) after finalization of the proceedings under Section 111 through an opinion of the Commissioner. Therefore, where no opinion is formed against the taxpayer under Section 111, the proceedings under both provisions i.e., Sections 111 and 122 would lapse, and the notice under Section 122(9) would be of no legal effect. Where, however, there is an opinion formed against the taxpayer as definite information for the purposes of Section 122(5), the proceedings on the notice issued under Section 122(9) can formally proceed and shall be deemed to have commenced. It must also be noted that where the opinion formed against the taxpayer under Section 111 is materially different from what has been confronted to the taxpayer through the notice already issued under Section 122(9), and the Commissioner is of the view that another or different ground under Section 122(5) is applicable, a fresh or supplementary show cause notice under Section 122(9) must be issued to the taxpayer by confronting such ground(s) to the taxpayer. This is in view of the right to be treated in accordance with the law, and the principles of fair trial and due process enshrined in Articles 4 and 10A of the Constitution, respectively, and in terms of settled law that once a show cause notice is issued, the original adjudication on the said show cause notice can only be based on the grounds and allegations levelled therein.

Commissioner Inland Revenue v. RYK Mills 2023 SCMR 1856; Collector Central Excise v. Rahm Din 1987 SCMR 1840 and Commissioner Inland Revenue v. Rose Food Industries 2023 SCMR 2070 ref.

Two provisos have been added after Section 122(9) through the Finance Act, 2021 and further amended through the Finance Act, 2022, which provide for a time period from the date of issuance a show cause notice for making an order under Section 122. The said time period is to be considered as commencing on the day that the taxpayer is confronted with the opinion formed by the Commissioner under Section 111(1), as it is only then that the proceedings under Section 122 are to be formally taken up. This reconciliation harmonizes Section 111, its Explanation and Section 122(5) of the Ordinance.

(b) Income Tax Ordinance (XLIX of 2001)---

----Ss. 111, Explanation & 122---Explanation introduced in Section 111 of the Income Tax Ordinance, 2001 ('Ordinance') pursuant to the Finance Act, 2021---Effect---On a plain reading of the said Explanation, it appears that it is couched in clarificatory and declaratory terms for "removal of doubt"---However, the intention behind the Explanation and the effect of adding the Explanation is to take away the right to a separate notice and proceedings under Section 111 if the grounds under Section 111(1)(a) to (d) are confronted to the taxpayer through a notice under Section 122(9) of the Ordinance---Therefore, in essence, it abridges the right to a separate notice and proceedings under Section 111 of the Ordinance, which was the requirement of the law---As a consequence, the Explanation takes away a substantive right of separate proceedings of the taxpayer, which otherwise existed prior to the introduction of the Explanation in Section 111---Explanation added in Section 111 of the Ordinance divests and affects a substantive right of the taxpayer to a separate notice and proceedings under Section 111, thus, the same would not have retrospective effect and would apply prospectively---Effect of the Explanation, therefore, is only to dispense with the requirement of a separate notice under Section 111, however, it cannot subsume two different and distinguishable proceedings under Sections 111 & 122---As such, while the Explanation dispenses with the requirement of a separate notice under Section 111, it does not dispense with the requirement that in case proceedings are initiated under Section 122(5) on the basis of definite information to be provided through Section 111, the proceedings under Section 111 are to be concluded first in the manner provided under the law and till such time, the proceedings under Section 122(9) cannot be given effect to---Therefore, as far as the cases prior to the Explanation are concerned, a separate notice is required to be issued under Section 111 before proceedings can be initiated under Section 122---Simultaneity of notices issued under Sections 111 & 122(9) is not of much consequence and the proceedings under Section 111 have to proceed first and be finalized before proceedings under Section 122 are formally taken up---After the introduction of the Explanation in Section 111 in the year 2021, a notice encompassing both the grounds under Section 111(1) and Section 122(5) can be issued under Section 122(9), however, the proceedings under Section 111 still have to be concluded first and thereafter the remaining part of the notice under Section 122(9) can be given effect to.

----Explanation to an enactment---Rationale and scope---Purpose of an Explanation is ordinarily to explain some concept or expression or phrase occurring in the main provision---It is not uncommon for the legislature to accord either an extended or restricted meaning to such concept or expression by inserting an appropriate Explanation---Such a clarificatory provision is to be interpreted according to its own terms having regard to its context and not as to widen the ambit of the provision---As a general rule, an explanation added to a statutory provision is not a substantive provision in any sense of the term but as the plain meaning of the word itself shows, it is merely meant to explain or clarify certain ambiguities which may have crept in the statutory provision---Object of adding an Explanation to a statutory provision is only to facilitate its proper interpretation and to remove confusion and misunderstanding as to its true nature---It is relied upon only as a useful guide or in aid to the construction of the main provision---It is in this view of its effect that courts have normally given retrospective effect to such clarificatory or declaratory provisions in the shape of an Explanation---However, where the effect of the Explanation warps out of its normal purpose explained above, and acts as a substantive enactment or deeming provision, or enlarges substantive provisions of law or creates new liabilities, such an Explanation cannot be given retrospective effect unless the express language of the Explanation warrants such an interpretation.

----Retrospective and prospective application of law---Principles---A change in substantive law which divests and adversely affects vested rights of the parties shall always have prospective application unless by express word of the legislation and/or by necessary intendment/ implication such law has been made applicable retrospectively---As a cardinal principle of interpretation of statutes, tax statutes operate prospectively and not retrospectively unless clearly indicated by the legislature, therefore, retrospectivity cannot be presumed---Where an insertion or deletion of any provision in the rules or the law is merely procedural in nature, the same would apply retrospectively but not if it affects substantive rights which already stood accrued at the time when the un-amended rule or provision was in vogue---A provision curtailing substantive rights does not have retroactive operation unless the legislature elects to give it retrospective effect---Thus, where existing rights are affected or giving retroactive operation causes inconvenience or injustice, the Court will not favour an interpretation giving retrospective effect even where the provision is procedural.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---These civil petitions for leave to appeal have been filed against a consolidated judgment of the Lahore High Court dated 09.06.2022 and two other orders dated 12.01.2023[1] (collectively referred to as the "impugned judgment"), whereby the Tax References filed by the petitioner department and Intra Court Appeals ("ICAs") filed by the taxpayers were decided against the petitioner department. The matters pertained to different tax years[2] with the latest being 2020[3]. In the ICAs, the matters involved the question as to whether a notice under Section 111 of the Income Tax Ordinance, 2001 ("Ordinance") is to be issued prior or subsequent to a notice issued under Section 122(9) of the Ordinance. Similarly, in the Tax References, the following questions of law, substantially involving the same legal question, were raised before the High Court:

1. Whether the learned Appellate Tribunal has erred in law by deleting the additions made under Section 111 of the Ordinance while holding that a separate and specific notice is required for addition under Section 111 when there is no specific provision in the Ordinance requiring separate notice under Section 111 of the Ordinance?

2. Whether the learned Appellate Tribunal IR has overlooked the scheme of law that Section 111 of the Ordinance cannot be read in isolation without making reference to Sections 122(1), 122(5)(ii) and 122(9) of the Ordinance?

3. Whether the learned Appellate Tribunal IR fell in error by failing to appreciate that in view of the insertion of the 'Explanation' in section 111 of the Income Tax Ordinance, 2001 vide Finance Act, 2021 the issuance of a separate notice under section 111 was not required for amendment of an assessment under section 120 of the Ordinance?

To examine these questions, leave to appeal is granted in these petitions. The office is directed to assign numbers to the appeals arising out of these petitions. The appeals are being taken up today and being decided on the basis of available record.

2. The first two questions appear to be interconnected and were decided by the High Court against the appellant department by holding that a separate notice under Section 111 of the Ordinance was required before proceedings can be initiated through a notice under Section 122 for the purposes of amending the assessment. As to the third question, the High Court held that the Explanation added to Section 111 of the Ordinance through the Finance Act, 2021 to the effect that a separate notice under the said provision was not required, was to apply prospectively as it adversely affected vested rights of the parties. Consequently, this question was also decided against the appellant department.

3. The learned counsel for the appellant department argued that there is no requirement of a separate notice under Section 111 because a notice under Section 122(9) is sufficient and covers the matters that ought to be taken up under Section 111 of the Ordinance. However, referring to the jurisprudence evolved over the years on the subject, he candidly submitted that such jurisprudence does point out that a separate notice under Section 111 is required, nonetheless, he clarified that such jurisprudence does not discuss whether the said notice is subsumed in Section 122(9) and there is no point in having two separate proceedings when one notice under Section 122(9) itself can suffice. In support of this contention, the learned counsel placed reliance on Commissioner Inland Revenue, T.R.O. Faisalabad v. Faqir Hussain and another (2019 PTD 1828), Commissioner Inland Revenue, Multan Zone v. Falah ud Din Qureshi (2021 PTD 192), Commissioner Inland Revenue, Zone-I, Regional Tax Office, Sukkur v. Messrs Ranipur CNG Station, Ranipur (2017 PTD 1839) and Commissioner Inland Revenue Zone Bahawalpur, Regional Tax Office, Bahawalpur v. Messrs Bashir Ahmed (deceased) through LRs (2021 SCMR 1290). He further relied on the Explanation introduced in Section 111 in the year 2021, as further amended in the year 2022, which provides that a notice under Section 122(9) would be sufficient and no separate notice is required for the purposes of proceedings under Section 111.

4. On the other hand, the learned counsel for the respondent taxpayers submitted that the proceedings under Section 122(5) can only be initiated if there is "definite information". The information provided under Section 111 is not definite information but mere information, and unless it solidifies into definite information, Section 122(5) cannot be attracted. He referred to Section 111 to state that once the tax department takes action on any of the grounds mentioned in Section 111(1)(a) to (d), an explanation is called from the taxpayer and then an opinion is formed by the Commissioner. In case the taxpayer is unable to explain the said income, the same becomes taxable income of the taxpayer, but in case there is sufficient explanation rendered by the taxpayer, the said proceedings can be dropped. Therefore, till such time these proceedings are given effect to, it cannot be said that the grounds mentioned in Section 111 amount to "definite information" and Section 122(5) cannot be attracted. As to the effect of the Explanation added in Section 111, he contended that the jurisprudence so far has settled that an Explanation has prospective effect and will not affect the cases for the tax years prior to the year 2021. He then submitted that since the Explanation is not applicable to the matters at hand, therefore, its effect is best to be discussed in an appropriate case.

5. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties and have gone through the record of the cases. The questions requiring determination in the instant matters are two-fold and connected: (i) whether a separate notice is required under Section 111 of the Ordinance or whether a notice under Section 122(9) is enough to initiate proceedings for amendment of the assessment on the grounds mentioned in Section 111 of the Ordinance; and (ii) the effect of the Explanation introduced in Section 111 of the Ordinance to the matters at hand.

6. In order to answer the above questions, it is important to understand the scheme behind Section 111 and its effect on amendment of assessments under Section 122 of the Ordinance. Section 111(1) provides that where any of the grounds in Section 111(1)(a) to (d) are applicable, and the taxpayer offers no explanation or the explanation provided, in the opinion of the Commissioner, is not satisfactory, this unexplained income or value of asset(s) shall be included in the income of the person chargeable to tax. For ease of reference, Section 111 (1) of the Ordinance is reproduced below[4]:

> 111. Unexplained income or assets.---(1) Where -
> (a) any amount is credited in a person's books of account;

(b) a person has made any investment or is the owner of any money or valuable article;

(c) a person has incurred any expenditure; or

(d) any person has concealed income or furnished inaccurate particulars of income including -

(i) the suppression of any production, sales or any amount chargeable to tax; or

(ii) the suppression of any item of receipt liable to tax in whole or in part, and the person offers no explanation about the nature and source of the amount credited or the investment, money, valuable article, or funds from which the expenditure was made suppression of any production, sales, any amount chargeable to tax and of any item of receipt liable to tax or the explanation offered by the person is not, [in the Commissioner's opinion, satisfactory, the amount credited, value of the investment, money, value of the article, or amount of expenditure suppressed amount of production, sales or any amount chargeable to tax or of any item of receipt liable to tax shall be included in the person's income chargeable to tax under head "Income from Other Sources" to the extent it is not adequately explained][5]:

Provided that where a taxpayer explains the nature and source of the amount credited or the investment made, money or valuable article owned or funds from which the expenditure was made, by way of agricultural income, such explanation shall be accepted to the extent of agricultural income worked back on the basis of agricultural income tax paid under the relevant provincial law.

Therefore, once the department has information resulting in an impression or understanding that the grounds in Section 111(1)(a) to (d) relating to unexplained income or asset are attracted, an explanation is called from the taxpayer. At this stage, the information available with the department is mere information. If, however, the taxpayer fails to render any explanation, or the explanation offered by the taxpayer is not satisfactory in the opinion of the Commissioner, the said liability becomes unexplained income and is to be added to the income of the taxpayer chargeable to tax. If the explanation offered is satisfactory, the said proceedings can be dropped and no action is then required. Therefore, through the opportunity of an explanation, the taxpayer can contest the allegations put to the taxpayer with regards to any of the grounds mentioned in Section 111(1) (a) to (d), whereafter, an opinion is to be formed by the Commissioner based on the said explanation, if any. As such, the said provision is essentially of an inquisitorial nature where the taxpayer is confronted with the information available with the department and an explanation is sought, and the resulting opinion of the Commissioner is not an adverse order per se but can be used to pass an adverse order against the taxpayer by adding the unexplained income to the income of the taxpayer chargeable to tax. The other provisions of Section 111 also do not empower the Commissioner to pass an adverse order and only provide statutory instructions as to how the unexplained income or asset, provided an opinion under Section 111(1) is given by the Commissioner to this effect, is to be added to the income of the taxpayer chargeable to tax. Therefore, the essence of the proceedings under Section 111 lies within Section 111(1) of the Ordinance, wherein the taxpayer is confronted with the information available with the department, and the Commissioner forms an opinion as to the unexplained income or assets of the taxpayer or otherwise.

7. It is settled law that within the contemplation of Section 111(1), an explanation is to be called from a taxpayer by issuing a specific notice under Section 111 of the Ordinance, confronting the taxpayer with the information gathered by the department and specifying which of the grounds in Section 111(1) is applicable.[6] It is only after this that an appropriate order can be passed under this provision in the form of an opinion of the Commissioner, thus concluding the proceedings under Section 111.

8. On the other hand, Section 122 of the Ordinance provides for amendment of assessments. The provisions of Section 122 relevant to the matters at hand are reproduced below for reference[7]:

S. 122. Amendment of assessments.---

(1) Subject to this section, the Commissioner may amend an assessment order treated as issued under section 120 or issued under section 121, or, by making such alterations or additions as the Commissioner considers necessary.

(5) An assessment order in respect of a tax year, or an assessment year, shall only be amended under subsection (1) and an amended assessment for that year shall only be further amended under subsection (4) where, on the basis of [definite information acquired from an audit or otherwise][8], the Commissioner is satisfied that -

(i) any income chargeable to tax has escaped assessment; or

(ii) total income has been under-assessed, or assessed at too low a rate, or has been the subject of excessive relief or refund; or

(iii) any amount under a head of income has been mis-classified.

(8) For the purposes of this section, "definite information" includes information on sales or purchases of any goods made by the taxpayer, receipts of the taxpayer from services rendered or any other receipts that may be chargeable to tax under this Ordinance, and on the acquisition, possession or disposal of any money, asset, valuable article or investment made or expenditure incurred by the taxpayer.

(9) No assessment shall be amended, or further amended, under this section unless the taxpayer has been provided with an opportunity of being heard.

In view of the above, under Section 122(1) of the Ordinance, the Commissioner has been empowered to amend an assessment order treated as issued under Sections 120 or 121 by making such alterations or additions as the Commissioner considers necessary. However, under Section 122(5), an assessment order shall only be amended under Section 122(1) or an amended assessment can only be further amended under Section 122(4) where, on the basis of definite information acquired from an audit or otherwise, the Commissioner is satisfied that any of the grounds in the said provision are satisfied. Section 122(8) provides what constitutes definite information for the purposes of this provision. Finally, Section 122(9) stipulates that no assessment shall be amended, or further amended, under Section 122 unless the taxpayer has been provided with the opportunity of being heard.

9. Therefore, pursuant to Section 122(5) of the Ordinance, the terminus a quo for initiation of proceedings under Section 122 is when the Commissioner, on the basis of definite information acquired from an audit or otherwise, is of the opinion that any of the grounds mentioned in Section 122(5)(i), (ii) or (iii) is applicable. Thereafter, a notice under Section 122(9) of the Ordinance, specifying the above ground(s), is sent to the taxpayer. If the taxpayer satisfactorily responds to the notice sent under Section 122(9), the proceedings can be dropped. Where, however, the response is not satisfactory, and the Commissioner is satisfied that any of the grounds in Section 122(5) are applicable, the Commissioner can amend the assessment order under Section 122(1) or further amend an amended assessment under Section 122(4) read with Section 122(5). As such, for initiation of proceedings under Section 122, the Commissioner must assess if any of the grounds under Section 122(5) are applicable, and such an assessment is to be based on definite information acquired from an audit or otherwise, which is the prerequisite to attract the provisions of Section 122(5) of the Ordinance.

10. It is in this sequence of proceedings that the initiation and culmination of proceedings under Section 111 of the Ordinance becomes necessary before action can be taken under Section 122 to amend assessments on the basis of proceedings undertaken under Section 111. As noted above, the information available with the department under Section 111(1) is mere information. It is only after the taxpayer is confronted with this information through a separate notice by calling for an explanation, and when no explanation is offered or the explanation is not satisfactory in the opinion of the Commissioner under Section 111(1), that it transforms or crystallizes into "definite information" for the purposes of action under Section 122(5) for amendment of assessment under Section 122. The taxpayer will then be confronted with the grounds applicable under Section 122(5) through a notice under Section 122(9) of the Ordinance. As such, where the Commissioner has formed an opinion against the taxpayer as to the fulfilment of one of the grounds mentioned in Section 111(1)(a) to (d) of the Ordinance, and is of the view that any of the grounds in Section 122(5) is applicable, the process under Section 122 is to be initiated to amend assessments through a notice under Section 122(9). Thus, unless the proceedings under Section 111(1) are initiated and completed, Section 122(5) cannot be given effect to and no notice under Section 122(9) can be issued for the purposes of amending an assessment through an addition contemplated under Section 111. It is to be noted that the present cases are related to tax years up till 2020. After the amendment introduced in Section 122(5) of the Ordinance through the Finance Act, 2020, the words "definite information acquired from an audit or otherwise" have been substituted with "audit or on the basis of definite information". Therefore, the interpretation rendered above as to the applicability of Section 122(5) may not be applicable to cases post 2020 and the effect of the substituted expression will have to be determined in an appropriate case in the future.

11. Therefore, to answer the first question, and as applicable to the matters at hand, before an assessment can be amended under Section 122 on the basis of Section 111, the proceedings under Section 111(1) are to be initiated, the taxpayer is to be confronted with the information and the grounds applicable under Section 111(1) through a separate notice under the said provision, and then the proceedings are to be culminated through an appropriate order in the shape of an opinion of the Commissioner. This then becomes definite information for the purposes of Section 122(5), provided the grounds mentioned in Section 122(5) are applicable. The taxpayer is then to be confronted with these grounds through a notice under Section 122(9) and only then can an assessment be amended under Section 122.[9] This view has also been recently taken by this Court in Bashir Ahmed[10] wherein it has also been held that a notice under Section 111 can be simultaneously issued with a notice under Section 122(9), however, proceedings under Section 111 have to be finalized first in terms of an opinion of the Commissioner so as to constitute definite information, as is required under Section 122(5) of the Ordinance.

12. We, however, underline and clarify that even where a notice under Section 111 is issued simultaneously with a notice to amend an assessment under Section 122(9) of the Ordinance, no proceedings can be undertaken under the latter until the proceedings under Section 111 are finalized and result in an opinion against the taxpayer. This is because, even if some basis for action under Section 111 is mentioned in a notice under Section 122(9), it cannot constitute definite information for the purposes of Section 122(5). The proceedings under the notice issued under Section 122(9) can only be formally initiated when the requirement of definite information is satisfied under Section 122(5) after finalization of the proceedings under Section 111 through an opinion of the Commissioner. Therefore, where no opinion is formed against the taxpayer under Section 111, the proceedings under both provisions i.e., Sections 111 and 122 would lapse, and the notice under Section 122(9) would be of no legal effect. Where, however, there is an opinion formed against the taxpayer as definite information for the purposes of Section 122(5), the proceedings on the notice issued under Section 122(9) can formally proceed and shall be deemed to have commenced. It must also be noted that where the opinion formed against the taxpayer under Section 111 is materially different from what has been confronted to the taxpayer through the notice already issued under Section 122(9), and the Commissioner is of the view that another or different ground under Section 122(5) is applicable, a fresh or supplementary show cause notice under Section 122(9) must be issued to the taxpayer by confronting such ground(s) to the taxpayer. This is in view of the right to be treated in accordance with the law, and the principles of fair trial and due process enshrined in Articles 4 and 10A of the Constitution[11], respectively, and in terms of settled law that once a show cause notice is issued, the original adjudication on the said show cause notice can only be based on the grounds and allegations levelled therein.[12]

13. Adverting to the second issue at hand as to the effect of the Explanation introduced in Section 111 of the Ordinance to the instant cases, the Explanation was added in Section 111 pursuant to the Finance Act, 2021 and is reproduced below for reference:

Explanation.---For the removal of doubt, a separate notice under this section is not required to be issued if the explanation regarding nature and sources of amount credited or the investment of money, valuable article, or the funds from which expenditure was made has been confronted to the taxpayer through a notice under subsection (9) of section 122 of this Ordinance.

The Explanation was further substituted through the Finance Act, 2022 as under:

Explanation.---For the removal of doubt, it is clarified that a separate notice under this section is not required to be issued if the explanation regarding nature and sources of;

(i) any amount credited in a person's books of account; or

(ii) any investment made or ownership of money or valuable article; or

(iii) funds from which expenditure was made; or

(iv) suppression of any production, sales, or any amount chargeable to tax; or

(v) suppression of any item of receipt liable to tax in whole or in part has been confronted to the taxpayer through a notice under subsection (9) of section 122 of the Ordinance.

On a plain reading of the aforesaid Explanation, it appears that it is couched in clarificatory and declaratory terms for "removal of doubt". However, we note that the intention behind the Explanation and the effect of adding the Explanation is to take away the right to a separate notice and proceedings under Section 111 if the grounds under Section 111(1)(a) to (d) are confronted to the taxpayer through a notice under Section 122(9) of the Ordinance. Therefore, in essence, it abridges the right to a separate notice and proceedings under Section 111 of the Ordinance, which was the requirement of the law as noted above. As a consequence, the Explanation takes away a substantive right of separate proceedings of the taxpayer, which otherwise existed prior to the introduction of the Explanation in Section 111.

14. Before dilating upon the applicability of the Explanation to the matters at hand, it would be appropriate to understand the rationale behind introducing an Explanation in an enactment. The purpose of an Explanation is ordinarily to explain some concept or expression or phrase occurring in the main provision. It is not uncommon for the legislature to accord either an extended or restricted meaning to such concept or expression by inserting an appropriate Explanation.[13] Such a clarificatory provision is to be interpreted according to its own terms having regard to its context and not as to widen the ambit of the provision.[14] As a general rule, an explanation added to a statutory provision is not a substantive provision in any sense of the term but as the plain meaning of the word itself shows, it is merely meant to explain or clarify certain ambiguities which may have crept in the statutory provision.[15] The object of adding an Explanation to a statutory provision is only to facilitate its proper interpretation and to remove confusion and misunderstanding as to its true nature. It is relied upon only as a useful guide or in aid to the construction of the main provision.[16] It is in this view of its effect that courts have normally given retrospective effect to such clarificatory or declaratory provisions in the shape of an Explanation.[17]

15. However, where the effect of the Explanation warps out of its normal purpose explained above, and acts as a substantive enactment or deeming provision, or enlarges substantive provisions of law or creates new liabilities, such an Explanation cannot be given retrospective effect unless the express language of the Explanation warrants such an interpretation.[18] It is settled law that a change in substantive law which divests and adversely affects vested rights of the parties shall always have prospective application unless by express word of the legislation and/or by necessary intendment/implication such law has been made applicable retrospectively.[19] As a cardinal principle of interpretation of statutes, tax statutes operate prospectively and not retrospectively unless clearly indicated by the legislature, therefore, retrospectivity cannot be presumed.[20] Where an insertion or deletion of any provision in the rules or the law is merely procedural in nature, the same would apply retrospectively but not if it affects substantive rights which already stood accrued at the time when the un-amended rule or provision was in vogue.[21] A provision curtailing substantive rights does not have retroactive operation unless the legislature elects to give it retrospective effect.[22] Thus, where existing rights are affected or giving retroactive operation causes inconvenience or injustice, the Court will not favour an interpretation giving retrospective effect even where the provision is procedural.[23] Applying this to the instant case, and having established that the Explanation added in Section 111 of the Ordinance divests and affects a substantive right of the taxpayer to a separate notice and proceedings under Section 111, the same would not have retrospective effect and would apply prospectively. Therefore, the Explanation would Gnot be applicable to the matters at hand as they pertain to tax years before the Explanation was introduced in Section 111.

16. However, in order to clarify, even if the Explanation was applicable to the instant matters, the proceedings under Section 111 would still require to be taken up first and finalized before the proceedings under Section 122(5) can formally proceed. This is in line with the scheme of Section 111 and its effect on Section 122, as explained above. The effect of the Explanation, therefore, is only to dispense with the requirement of a separate notice under Section 111, however, it cannot subsume two different and distinguishable proceedings under Sections 111 and 122. As such, while the Explanation dispenses with the requirement of a separate notice under Section 111, it does not dispense with the requirement that in case proceedings are initiated under Section 122(5) on the basis of definite information to be provided through Section 111, the proceedings under Section 111 are to be concluded first in the manner provided under the law and till such time, the proceedings under Section 122(9) cannot be given effect to.

17. Therefore, where one notice is issued under Section 122(9) which encompasses both the grounds of Section 111(1) and Section 122(5), the proceedings under Section 111 will be taken up first. The taxpayer, in response, is to provide an explanation, as envisaged under Section 111(1). If the response to the grounds under Section 111 is satisfactory, then the proceedings can be dropped. However, where the response is not satisfactory, the Commissioner will then form an opinion, as is required under Section 111, which can only be taken as definite information for the purposes of Section 122(5) for amendment of the assessment. In view of the scheme of Section 111 and its effect on Section 122, it is imperative that the taxpayer is confronted with this opinion, providing the taxpayer with an opportunity to fully and finally understand and respond to the allegations against the taxpayer with respect to the grounds the Commissioner understands are applicable under Section 122(5) based on this opinion. As held above, it is only after the opinion is given by the Commissioner under Section 111 (1) that the proceedings under Section 122 can be formally taken up and proceeded with. The taxpayer can then file a response to the grounds alleged under Section 122(5) under the same show cause notice issued under Section 122(9), by filing a supplementary response to the show cause notice. It is after considering this response that an assessment can be amended under Section 122, provided the Commissioner is still satisfied that any of the grounds under Section 122(5) are still applicable. We are also cognizant of the fact that two provisos[24] have been added after Section 122(9) which provide for a time period from the date of issuance a show cause notice for making an order under Section 122. In view of what has been held above, the said time period is to be considered as commencing on the day that the taxpayer is confronted with the opinion formed by the Commissioner under Section 111(1), as it is only then that the proceedings under Section 122 are to be formally taken up. In our view, this reconciliation harmonizes Section 111, its Explanation and Section 122(5) of the Ordinance.

18. Our view that the process could only be lawfully undertaken in two steps is further fortified from Section 114(6A) of the Ordinance, which extends a right to the taxpayer that the taxpayer can voluntarily file a revised return and deposit the tax before the issuance of a notice under Section 122(9) of the Ordinance, and consequently avoid the penalty stipulated in Section 182[25] of the Ordinance vis-à-vis the provisions of Section 111 of the Ordinance. If it is held that both the proceedings under Sections 111 and 122 are now subsumed, the taxpayer would be deprived of this right which can neither be the legislative intent and nor legally justified. Accordingly, this right, which the legislature has thoughtfully extended to the taxpayers, could only be protected and preserved if the proceedings under Section 111 of the Ordinance are initiated first and the taxpayer could opt to either revise his return with voluntary payment of tax without penalty or contest the proceedings and forego the said right.

19. Therefore, as far as the cases prior to the Explanation are concerned, a separate notice is required to be issued under Section 111 before proceedings can be initiated under Section 122. The simultaneity of notices issued under Sections 111 and 122(9) is not of much consequence and the proceedings under Section 111 have to proceed first and be finalized before proceedings under Section 122 are formally taken up. After the introduction of the Explanation in Section 111 in the year 2021, a notice encompassing both the grounds under Section 111(1) and Section 122(5) can be issued under Section 122(9), however, the proceedings under Section 111 still have to be concluded first and thereafter the remaining part of the notice under Section 122(9) can be given effect to.

20. For the reasons given above, these appeals are hereby dismissed.

----S. 107---Convention between the Islamic Republic of Pakistan and the Kingdom of Denmark for the Avoidance of Double Taxation and the Prevention of Fiscal Evasion with respect to Taxes on Income, Art. 8---Convention between the Kingdom of Belgium and the Islamic Republic of Pakistan for the Avoidance of Double Taxation and the Prevention of Fiscal Evasion with respect to Taxes on Income, Art. 8---Income arising from container detention charges ("CDC"), container service charges ("CSC") and terminal handling charges ("THC")---Such income falls within the category of "profits from the operation of ships in international traffic" in the context of double taxation conventions concluded between Pakistan and Denmark, as well as between Pakistan and Belgium.

The Commentary on Article 8 of the OECD Model Convention ("OECD MC") provides guidance about qualifying activities and related profits with respect to income falling under the head of "profits from the operation of ships in international traffic". The expression "profits from the operation of ships in international traffic" also covers profits from activities directly connected with such operations as well as profits from activities which are not directly connected with the operation of the enterprise's ship in international traffic as long as they are ancillary to such operation – activities that the enterprise does not need to carry on for the purposes of its own operation of ships in international traffic but which make a minor contribution relative to such operation and are so closely related to such operation that they should not be regarded as a separate business or source of income of the enterprise should be considered to be ancillary to the operation of ships in international traffic.

The objective scope of Article 8 of the OECD MC and the UN Model Convention ("UN MC") with its reference to "profits from the operation of ships in international traffic" covers not only profits directly obtained by the enterprise from the transportation of passengers or cargo by ships that it operates in international traffic, but also, profits from activities directly connected with such operations as well as profits from activities which are not directly connected with the operation of the enterprise's ships in international traffic as long as they are ancillary to such operation. Activities are to be considered ancillary to the operation of ships in international traffic if (i) the enterprise does not need to undertake them for the purposes of its own operation of ships in international traffic but which otherwise (ii) make a minor contribution relative to such operation and (iii) are so closely related to such operation that they should not be regarded as a separate business or source of income. Article 8 OECD and UN MC therefore applies not only to profits directly obtained in international traffic e.g. transport of passengers or cargo, sales of tickets of the enterprise, leasing of ships, but also to profits directly connected with international traffic and to profits ancillary to international traffic e.g. inland transport, interest, code sharing and slot chartering, haulage services and catering services, provision of goods and services to other enterprises, sales of tickets on behalf of other enterprises, advertising on behalf of other enterprises, letting of immovable property, rental of containers.

Georg Kofler, in Reimer and Rust (eds), Klaus Vogel on Double Taxation Conventions (5th edn 2021) vol 1, art 8, paras 33, 35 ref.

Profits arising from short-term storage of containers or from detention charges for the late return of containers, are covered within the purview of “profits from the operation of ships in international traffic”. Further, special remuneration for services ancillary to container operations are covered within the ambit of shipping income from international traffic. Income derived from services provided for cargo handling is also considered part of shipping income from international traffic when directly connected or ancillary to the operation of ships in international traffic.Thus, profits arising from container detention charges (“CDC”), container service charges (“CSC”) and terminal handling charges (“THC”) are connected with and ancillary to the operation of ships in international traffic. Consequently, these profits squarely fall within the purview of the expression “profits from the operation of ships in international traffic”. Therefore, CDC, CSC, and THC collected by the respondents (non-resident cargo shipping companies incorporated in Denmark and Belgium) are part of the revenue earned in shipping in international traffic and are to be dealt with in accordance with the provisions of the Pakistan-Denmark Double Taxation Convention and the Pakistan-Belgium Double Taxation Convention, as the case may be.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---The question before us is whether income arising from container detention charges ("CDC"), container service charges ("CSC") and terminal handling charges ("THC") falls within the category of "profits from the operation of ships in international traffic" in the context of double taxation conventions concluded between Pakistan and Denmark, as well as between Pakistan and Belgium.

2. The respondents are non-resident companies, one incorporated in Denmark and the other in Belgium. They are involved in cargo shipping activities, conducting their business operations within Pakistan through the authorized agent, M/s Maersk Pakistan (Private) Limited. The respondents filed income tax returns, accounting for income derived from freight charges, CDC, CSC and THC. They claimed entitlement to tax benefits under Article 8 of the Convention between the Islamic Republic of Pakistan and the Kingdom of Denmark for the Avoidance of Double Taxation and the Prevention of Fiscal Evasion with respect to Taxes on Income ("Pakistan-Denmark Convention"), and similarly, under Article 8 of the Convention between the Kingdom of Belgium and the Islamic Republic of Pakistan for the Avoidance of Double Taxation and the Prevention of Fiscal Evasion with respect to Taxes on Income ("Pakistan-Belgium Convention"), as the case may be.

3. The Deputy Commissioner Inland Revenue disagreed with the aforementioned assessment, asserting that CDC, CSC, and THC were not eligible under the beneficial provisions of the Pakistan-Denmark Convention and the Pakistan-Belgium Convention. The Deputy Commissioner reasoned that these charges were not explicitly covered under Article 8 of either Convention, which addresses beneficial taxation in relation to "profits from the operation of ships in international traffic". The respondents remained unsuccessful both in the appeal before the Commissioner Inland Revenue (Appeals) and in the subsequent appeal before the Appellate Tribunal Inland Revenue. Nevertheless, the High Court, in its decision given in Income Tax References filed by the respondents, concluded that profits arising from CDC, CSC, and THC fell within the scope of the term "profits from the operation of ships in international traffic" as stipulated in Article 8 of the two Conventions. Consequently, such profits were deemed eligible for the benefit of favourable taxation. The Department is now seeking leave to appeal the High Court's determination, challenging the inclusion of CDC, CSC, and THC under the umbrella of "profits from the operation of ships in international traffic" and their eligibility for beneficial taxation envisaged in Article 8 of the two Conventions.

4. We have heard the arguments of the learned counsel for the parties and have carefully gone through the record.

5. The respondents, being tax residents of Denmark and Belgium, are entitled to the benefits and concessions under the Pakistan-Denmark Convention and the Pakistan-Belgium Convention, as the case may be, in line with the provisions of Section 107 of the Income Tax Ordinance 2001 ("Ordinance"). Under subsection 2(c) of Section 107 of the Ordinance, the taxability of the respondents' income is to be determined under the provisions contained in the two Conventions which override the Ordinance. These Conventions provide for allocation of taxing jurisdiction to the contracting States in respect of different heads of income. With respect to the income falling under the head of "profits from the operation of ships in international traffic" which is dealt with under Article 8 in both the Conventions, the allocation of jurisdiction to the contracting States is not identical. The Pakistan-Belgium Convention assigns the sole right to tax profits from operating ships in international traffic to the residence State. In contrast, the Pakistan-Denmark Convention permits the source State to tax these profits, but only to the extent derived from sources within that State, in accordance with its domestic law. However, this difference is not relevant for the purposes of the dispute before us. The issue before us, common to both the Conventions, relates to the nature of profits arising from CDC, CSC, and THC: whether these profits fall within the scope of the term "profits from the operation of ships in international traffic" or not. If this question is decided in the affirmative, the respondents' profits resulting from CDC, CSC, and THC will be subjected to taxing provisions contained in Article 8 of the respective Conventions. Otherwise, profits resulting from CDC, CSC, and THC will not be considered as shipping income eligible to be dealt with under Article 8 of the two Conventions.

6. Notably, the matter at hand involves the interpretation of international tax conventions. Recently, this Court in Snamprogetti[1] emphasized the distinctiveness of international tax treaties, their specific interpretive framework, and the importance of equitable outcomes in cross-border taxation. International tax treaties, conventions or agreements, given their unique nature, as held in Snamprogetti, require a distinct interpretive approach compared to the one used while interpreting domestic legislation. These agreements being international treaties are governed by the rules of interpretation outlined in the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. Tax treaties differ from domestic tax laws in language, application, and purpose. These treaties are relieving in nature and seek to avoid double taxation, while domestic tax law imposes tax in specific situations. Tax treaties require a broad purposive interpretation, and their interpretation may be more liberal than domestic law. Treaty interpretation is a separate subject from statutory interpretation, accentuating the need to interpret tax treaties independently of domestic law. The role of a State in a bilateral agreement is more of implementing the terms of such agreement rather than that of interpreting the same and that too in a unilateral manner. Given that the primary purpose of tax treaties is to avoid and relieve double taxation through equitable and acceptable distribution of tax claims between the countries, it is important that the provisions of these treaties are interpreted in a common and workable manner, taking into account international tax language, legal decisions of other countries, model treaties[2], along with their commentaries, developed by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development ("OECD")[3] and the United Nations ("UN")[4], and scholarly academic works where appropriate.

7. We see that the operation of ships in international traffic has been given special tax treatment in Pakistan-Denmark Convention and the Pakistan-Belgium Convention in accord with the OECD Model Convention ("OECD MC") and the UN Model Convention ("UN MC"). The general policy underlying the special rule for international shipping and the deviation from the allocation of taxing rights based on the permanent establishment principle has its roots at the very beginning of tax treaty law. Maritime shipping was viewed as an activity that warrants a special rule. Having regard to the distinct nature of activities carried on by shipping (air transport was also added to this category later) entities which operate across different routes spread across several countries and the complexity of apportioning profits arising from such business across numerous countries, it was felt that general provisions dealing with business profits would result in taxation of fragmented profits in numerous countries, thereby possibly leading to double taxation. Accordingly, it was considered necessary to introduce a separate provision in the OECD MC, and also in the UN MC, to specifically deal with profits from operations of shipping and air transport business in international traffic. The provision relating to shipping and air transport takes precedence over the general rule relating to business profits and the permanent establishment principle is not applied to profits falling within its scope of application i.e. profits arising from the operation of ships and aircraft in international traffic. More importantly, this provision also takes into account the fact that shipping and air transport enterprises invariably carry on a large variety of activities to permit, facilitate or support their international traffic operations.[5]

8. The issue before us pertains to the characterization of income arising from CDC, CSC, and THC. Let us have a look at the meaning of CDC, CSC, and THC in order to understand the nature of these incomes. The High Court has observed, and there exists no contention between the parties on this point, that CDC is the amount collected on account of rent of container, which is charged if a customer holds the said container beyond the stipulated time required to discharge the goods at the intended port of disembarkation; CSC is collected by shipping lines on account of services in respect of containers which may be required due to discharge of goods at the destination; and THC is collected by shipping lines on account of terminal charges incurred at the port of disembarkation. With this understanding of the aforementioned sources of income viz. CDC, CSC and THC, we proceed to examine whether such income aligns with the expression "profits from the operation of ships in international traffic".

9. The Commentary on Article 8 of the OECD MC provides guidance about qualifying activities and related profits with respect to income falling under the head of "profits from the operation of ships in international traffic". It provides that the profits covered consist in the first place of the profits directly obtained by the enterprise from the transportation of passengers or cargo by ships that it operates in international traffic such as any activity carried on primarily in connection with the transportation, by the enterprise, of passengers or cargo by ships that it operates in international traffic. It is then recognized that with the evolution of international transport, shipping enterprises invariably carry on a large variety of activities to permit, facilitate or support their international traffic operations. The expression "profits from the operation of ships in international traffic" therefore also covers profits from activities directly connected with such operations as well as profits from activities which are not directly connected with the operation of the enterprise's ship in international traffic as long as they are ancillary to such operation - activities that the enterprise does not need to carry on for the purposes of its own operation of ships in international traffic but which make a minor contribution relative to such operation and are so closely related to such operation that they should not be regarded as a separate business or source of income of the enterprise should be considered to be ancillary to the operation of ships in international traffic.[6] We also note that since 2017, the UN MC Commentary fully reproduces the OECD guidance.

10. The objective scope of Article 8 of the OECD MC and the UN MC with its reference to "profits from the operation of ships in international traffic" covers not only profits directly obtained by the enterprise from the transportation of passengers or cargo by ships that it operates in international traffic, but also, profits from activities directly connected with such operations as well as profits from activities which are not directly connected with the operation of the enterprise's ships in international traffic as long as they are ancillary to such operation. Activities are to be considered ancillary to the operation of ships in international traffic if (i) the enterprise does not need to undertake them for the purposes of its own operation of ships in international traffic but which otherwise (ii) make a minor contribution relative to such operation and (iii) are so closely related to such operation that they should not be regarded as a separate business or source of income. Article 8 OECD and UN MC therefore applies not only to profits directly obtained in international traffic e.g. transport of passengers or cargo, sales of tickets of the enterprise, leasing of ships, but also to profits directly connected with international traffic and to profits ancillary to international traffic e.g. inland transport, interest, code sharing and slot chartering, haulage services and catering services, provision of goods and services to other enterprises, sales of tickets on behalf of other enterprises, advertising on behalf of other enterprises, letting of immovable property, rental of containers.[7]

11. The issue in question concerns income arising from three sources: CDC, CSC, and THC. Notably, two of these sources involve charges imposed for services related to containers, whereas the third pertains to charges associated with terminal services for cargo handling. In the context of such income sources, Vogel, a recognized authority, emphasizes the widespread use of containers in international transport. Profits arising from short-term storage of containers or from detention charges for the late return of containers, according to Vogel, are covered within the purview of "profits from the operation of ships in international traffic". Further, special remuneration for services ancillary to container operations are covered within the ambit of shipping income from international traffic. Income derived from services provided for cargo handling is also considered part of shipping income from international traffic when directly connected or ancillary to the operation of ships in international traffic.[8]

12. We thus reach the conclusion that profits arising from CDC, CSC and THC are connected with and ancillary to the operation of ships in international traffic. Consequently, these profits squarely fall within the purview of the expression "profits from the operation of ships in international traffic". Therefore, CDC, CSC, and THC collected by the respondents are part of the revenue earned in shipping in international traffic and are to be dealt with in accordance with the provisions of the Pakistan-Denmark Double Taxation Convention and the Pakistan-Belgium Double Taxation Convention, as the case may be. As a result, we do not feel inclined to interfere with the judgment of the High Court. These petitions are therefore dismissed.

The courts, in their role as guardians of democracy and fundamental rights, should approach electoral matters with circumspection, ensuring that their interventions uphold the democratic principles upon which the nation thrives and the fundamental rights of citizens to contest elections and vote for the candidates of their choice. The right to vote freely for the candidate of one's choice is the essence of a democratic society, and any restrictions on that right strike at the heart of representative government. The working of democracy depends on whether the people can decide the fate of the elected form of government. It depends on the choices that people make in different ways. This choice of people cannot be compromised, as their mandate in elections changes the destinies of government. Through the electoral process and voting, citizens participate in democracy. By voting, citizens take part in the public affairs of the country. Thus, citizens by voting enjoy their right to choose the composition of their government by exercising their choice and ability to participate.

Reynolds v. Sims (1964) 377 U.S. 533 and Anoop Baranwal v. Union of India (2023) 6 SCC 161 ref.

The right to form or be a member of a political party under Article 17(2) of the Constitution includes not only the right to contest elections but also the right to vote for the candidate of one's choice. When viewed against the backdrop of the constitutional value of 'political justice', Article 17(2) remains hollow unless it also recognizes the right of citizens to choose their representatives fairly and freely from amongst the candidates. The right of citizens to participate in national elections as voters is the core of the democratic form of government. This right is also an expression of the choice of the citizens, which finds further support under Article 19 of the Constitution. In exercise of these fundamental rights, citizens shape their destiny by forming the government they want.

It is in this context of both the right of the candidates to contest the election and the right of the voters to vote for the candidate of their choice that the qualification and disqualification of a candidate become material. The aim of prescribing qualifications and disqualifications for candidacies to contest elections is to maintain the integrity and effectiveness of the political process. They are designed to ensure that individuals holding public office meet certain standards. In a well functioning democracy, the criteria for qualifications and disqualifications are clearly defined, publicly known and uniformly applied. Qualifications and disqualifications of a candidate for the electoral process must therefore be clearly spelled out in the Constitution or the law. Otherwise, electoral laws must be interpreted in favour of enfranchisement rather than disenfranchisement so that maximum choice remains with the voters to elect their future leadership. With this approach rooted in the high constitutional rights and values, the courts are to deal with the matters of acceptance or rejection of the nomination papers filed for contesting elections.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---Elections stand as a manifestation of the collective will of a nation, reflecting the diverse voices and choices of its citizens. In this democratic process, individuals exercise their right to vote, contributing to the formation of a representative government. The rights involved are not only of those participating in the elections but also of the public. The courts, in their role as guardians of democracy and fundamental rights, should approach electoral matters with circumspection, ensuring that their interventions uphold the democratic principles upon which the nation thrives and the fundamental rights of citizens to contest elections and vote for the candidates of their choice. 'The right to vote freely for the candidate of one's choice is the essence of a democratic society, and any restrictions on that right strike at the heart of representative government.'[1] The working of democracy depends on whether the people can decide the fate of the elected form of government. It depends on the choices that people make in different ways. This choice of people cannot be compromised, as their mandate in elections changes the destinies of government. Through the electoral process and voting, citizens participate in democracy. By voting, citizens take part in the public affairs of the country. Thus, citizens by voting enjoy their right to choose the composition of their government by exercising their choice and ability to participate.[2]

2. 'No right is more precious in a free country than that of having a voice in the election of those who make the laws under which, as good citizens, we must live. Other rights, even the most basic, are illusory if the right to vote is undermined.'[3] The right to form or be a member of a political party under Article 17(2) of our Constitution[4] includes not only the right to contest elections[5] but also the right to vote[6] for the candidate of one's choice. When viewed against the backdrop of the constitutional value of 'political justice', Article 17(2) remains hollow unless it also recognizes the right of citizens to choose their representatives fairly and freely from amongst the candidates. The right of citizens to participate in national elections as voters is the core of the democratic form of government. This right is also an expression of the choice of the citizens, which finds further support under Article 19 of the Constitution.[7] In exercise of these fundamental rights, citizens shape their destiny by forming the government they want.

3. It is in this context of both the right of the candidates to contest the election and the right of the voters to vote for the candidate of their choice that the qualification and disqualification of a candidate become material. The aim of prescribing qualifications and disqualifications for candidacies to contest elections is to maintain the integrity and effectiveness of the political process. They are designed to ensure that individuals holding public office meet certain standards. In a well-functioning democracy, the criteria for qualifications and disqualifications are clearly defined, publicly known and uniformly applied. Qualifications and disqualifications of a candidate for the electoral process must therefore be clearly spelled out in the Constitution or the law. Otherwise, electoral laws must be interpreted in favour of enfranchisement rather than disenfranchisement so that maximum choice remains with the voters to elect their future leadership.[8] With this approach rooted in the high constitutional rights and values, the courts are to deal with the matters of acceptance or rejection of the nomination papers filed for contesting elections.

4. Briefly, the facts of the case are that the nomination paper of the petitioner for the seat of a Member of the National Assembly from NA-49, Attock-I, was rejected by the Returning Officer on 30 December 2023, mainly on the ground that the petitioner was a 'proclaimed offender'. However, on appeals of the petitioner, the Appellate Tribunal accepted his nomination paper, on 6 January 2024. Thereafter, the respondent filed writ petitions before the Lahore High Court, which were decided vide the impugned orders dated 16 January 2023, and the nomination paper of the petitioner was once again rejected on the ground that the petitioner was a proclaimed offender. Hence, these petitions.

5. We have heard the learned counsel for the petitioner and the Election Commission of Pakistan ("ECP") as well as the objector who appeared in person and examined the record of the case.

6. Since the petitioner's nomination paper has been rejected on the ground of his being a proclaimed offender, we in the course of the hearing asked the learned counsel for the ECP to show the order made and the proclamation issued against the petitioner under Section 87 of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1898 ("Cr.P.C.") but he was unable to refer to any such order and proclamation. We then called upon the objector, who was present in court, to tell us the source of his objection. He frankly submitted that some of his friends had mentioned it to him, but he has no document to establish that the petitioner is a proclaimed offender. Hence, there is nothing on the record that the petitioner is a proclaimed offender. Needless to say, in the absence of proceedings taken under Section 87, Cr.P.C, an accused cannot be said or treated to be a proclaimed offender.[9] Further, as the rule of declining discretionary reliefs to a proclaimed offender is one of propriety when the same is confronted with a right, it is the right, not the rule of propriety, that prevails.[10] It is also important to note that the disadvantage, if any, for being a proclaimed offender ordinarily relates only to the case in which a person has been so proclaimed, and not to the other cases or matters which have no nexus to that case. For instance, a proclaimed offender is not disentitled to institute or defend a civil suit, or an appeal arising therefrom, regarding his civil rights and obligations. The same is the position with the civil right of a person to contest an election; in the absence of any contrary provision in the Constitution or the Elections Act 2017 ("Act"), his status of being a proclaimed offender in a criminal case does not affect his said right.[11]

7. The learned counsel for the ECP could not point out any provision either in the Constitution or in the Act that empowers the Returning Officers to reject the nomination papers of the candidates on the ground of their being proclaimed offenders. Since there is no law that makes a proclaimed offender disqualified from contesting election, the Returning Officers, the Appellate Tribunals or the Courts cannot on their own create such additional disqualification, without the backing of law.[12] As per the constitutional command of Article 4 of the Constitution, they all are bound to treat every citizen in accordance with law and cannot prevent or hinder a person from doing that which is not prohibited by law.

8. Articles 62 and 63 of the Constitution read with Sections 231 and 232 of the Act provide for qualification and disqualification of a candidate, which does not mention that a "proclaimed offender" is disqualified from being elected or from being a member of Parliament. The grounds provided for rejection of a nomination paper in Section 62(9) of the Act also do not empower the Returning Officers to reject the nomination paper of a candidate on the ground of his being a proclaimed offender. Although no provision of the Act has been pointed out to us that requires the necessary presence of the candidate during the electoral process, we may observe that if there is any such provision, the absence of the candidate may have its own consequences under that provision, but his nomination paper cannot be rejected on such ground unless the legislature so provides in Section 62(9) of the Act. Therefore, the High Court is found to have made a legal error in rejecting the petitioner's nomination paper on the ground of his being allegedly a proclaimed offender. Because of the current stage in the electoral process, we allowed interim relief to the petitioner on 26 January 2024. ECP shall be free to recover the expenses incurred in this case, if any, from the objector.

9. In view of the above legal position, these petitions are converted into appeals and the same are allowed. The impugned orders of the High Court are set aside and the nomination paper of the petitioner for the seat of a Member of the National Assembly from NA-49, Attock-I, stands accepted. The ECP shall ensure that all the necessary steps to be taken in the electoral process are completed forthwith so that the petitioner can contest the election on the scheduled date for the said seat, without fail.

MWA/T-1/SC Appeals allowed.

----S. 22 & Preamble---Employees' Old-Age Benefits Act, 1976---Liberal interpretation---Employees' Old-Age Benefits Act, 1976 is a beneficial statute intended to provide security and old-age benefits to employees of industrial, commercial or other organizations covered by it and, therefore, its provisions have to be construed liberally in order to advance its objective.

(b) Employees' Old-Age Benefits Act (XIV of 1976)---

----S. 22(2)---Old age pension---Exception under Section 22(2) of the Employees' Old-Age Benefits Act, 1976 ("the EOB Act, 1976)---Applicability---Stage when the exception under Section 22(2) of the EOB Act, 1976 becomes applicable---To avail the exception under Section 22(2) of the the EOB Act, 1976, the insured person must satisfy that he was in employment in the industry or establishment on the first day of July 1976 or on the day the Act became applicable to such an industry or establishment and was of the age mentioned in Section 22(2)(i) and (ii) of the Act.

Section 22(1) of the Employees' Old-Age Benefits Act, 1976 ("the Act") provides that an insured person is entitled to monthly old-age pension if (i) he is over sixty years of age, or over fifty-five years of age in the case of a woman, and (ii) the contribution in respect of such insured person was paid by the employer for not less than fifteen years. It is only when both these conditions are fulfilled that an insured person is entitled to monthly old-age pension under the said provision. An exception is provided under Section 22(2) of the Act whereby the number of years of contribution paid by the employer on behalf of the insured person is reduced to seven and five years, respectively instead of fifteen years under section 22(2) if on the first day of July, 1976 or on any day thereafter on which the Act becomes applicable to an industry or establishment; (i) the insured person is over forty years of age, or over thirty-five years of age in the case of a woman or (ii) the insured person is over forty-five years of age, or over forty years in the case of a woman.

The first cut-off date i.e., first day of July 1976 is the date when the Act was implemented. As per section 9 of the Act, the first contribution was paid by the employer on the said date. The second cut-off date is when the Act becomes applicable to an industry or establishment. Section 1(4) of the Act provides three different modes through which the Act becomes applicable to an industry or establishment. It is at these two points in time when the age of the insured person in terms of Section 22(2)(i) and (ii) becomes relevant for invoking the exception of reduced years of contribution under the said provision. The age of the insured person alone is not the determining factor for the case to fall within the exception under Section 22(2) but it is also that the age must be so at the relevant cut-off dates mentioned above. As such, an insured person cannot avail the exception under Section 22(2) if he was employed after the cut-off date, i.e., first day of July 1976 or after the date when the Act became applicable to the industry or establishment under Section1(4) of the Act. Therefore, to avail the exception under Section 22(2) of the Act, the insured person must satisfy that he was in employment in the industry or establishment on the first day of July 1976 or on the day the Act became applicable to such an industry or establishment and was of the age mentioned in Section 22(2)(i) and (ii) of the Act.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---Under Section 22(1) of the Employees' Old-Age Benefits Act, 1976[1] ("Act") an insured person[2] is entitled to monthly old-age pension at the rate specified in the Schedule to the Act; (i) if he is sixty years of age or fifty five years in case of a woman and (ii) contribution[3] in respect of him were paid for not less than fifteen years. Section 22(2) of the Act provides an exception to the above to the effect that an insured person will also be entitled to an old-age pension if he on 1st July 1976 or on any day thereafter on which this Act becomes applicable to the industry or establishment was (i) over forty years of age or thirty five years in case of a woman, and contribution in respect of him was paid for not less than seven years or (ii) over forty five years of age or forty years in case of a woman, and contribution in respect of him was paid for not less than five years.

2. What requires determination by us is the stage when the exception under Section 22(2) of the Act becomes applicable. Whether the exception is based on the age of the insured person, as given under Section 22(2)(i) and (ii), whenever he enters insurable employment in an industry or establishment or whether the exception applies when the age of the insured person is as per Section 22(2)(i) and (ii) on the cut off dates i.e., first day of July 1976, or when the Act becomes applicable to the said industry or establishment.

3. This question arises before us out of two sets of judgments from different High Courts. Through judgments dated 27.04.2021[4] and 19.06.2023[5] passed by the Islamabad High Court and the Peshawar High Court, Peshawar, respectively, the matter was decided in favour of the Employees' Old-Age Benefits Institution ("EOBI") and against the insured persons ("respondents"). Through judgments dated 03.04.2023[6] and 30.11.2022[7] passed by the Islamabad High Court and the Sindh High Court, Karachi, respectively, the matter was decided against the EOBI and in favour of the respondents. Hence there have been conflicting opinions of the respective High Courts on the interpretation of Section 22(2) of the Act.

4. The learned counsel for EOBI submits that the exception in Section 22(2) of the Act has limited application and can only be availed by an insured person, who is of the age as mentioned in Section 22(2)(i) and (ii) at two cut off dates; (i) on the first day of July, 1976 or (ii) when thereafter the Act becomes applicable to an industry or establishment. As such, he submits that the exception is only a one-time concession granted on the above two cut- off dates.

5. On the other hand, the learned counsel for the respondents submit that exception under Section 22(2) of the Act is automatically attracted when a person enters insurable employment in an industry or establishment at the age mentioned in Section 22(2)(i) or (ii) irrespective of the cut-off dates mentioned above.

6. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties, have gone through the relevant provisions of the Act and have perused the record with their able assistance.

7. Under Article 38 of the Constitution[8], it is the duty of the State to promote social and economic well-being of the people by, inter alia, providing for all persons employed in the service of Pakistan or otherwise, social security by compulsory social insurance or other means. It was in discharge of this responsibility that the Act was enacted by the Federal Legislature under entry 26 of the erstwhile Concurrent List of the Constitution and implemented on 1st July, 1976[9] to provide old-age benefits to persons employed in industrial, commercial and other organizations.[10] The Act is a beneficial statute intended to provide security and old-age benefits to employees of industrial, commercial or other organizations covered by it and, therefore, its provisions have to be construed liberally in order to advance its objective.[11] With this understanding, we move to decide the present case.

8. The Act applies to every industry or establishment as described in Section 1(4) of the Act. Further, as the matter relates to the applicability of Section 22(1) and (2) of the Act, these provisions are being reproduced hereunder for ready reference:

1. Short title, extent, commencement and application.---(1) This Act may be called the Employees' Old-Age Benefits Act, 1976.

(2) It extends to the whole of Pakistan.

(3) It shall come into force at once.

(4) It applies to every industry or establishment-

(i) wherein ten or more persons are employed by the employer, directly or through any other person, whether on behalf of himself or any other person, or were so employed on any day during the preceding twelve months, and shall continue to apply to every such industry or establishment even if the number of persons employed therein is, at any time after this Act becomes applicable to it, reduced to less than ten; or

(ia) wherein less than ten persons are employed if such industry or establishment voluntarily applies for application of this Act and this Act shall apply to such industry or establishment from the date of submission of an application by such industry or establishment; or

(ii) which the Federal Government may, by notification in the official Gazette, specify in this behalf.

22. Old-age pension.- (1) An insured person shall be entitled to a monthly old-age pension at the rate specified in the Schedule:

Provided that-

(a) he is over sixty years of age, or fifty-five years in the case of a women; and

(b) contribution in respect of him were paid for not less than fifteen years.

(2) If an insured person was on the first day of July, 1976 or is on any day thereafter on which this Act becomes applicable to an industry or establishment,-

(i) over forty years of age, or thirty-five years in the case of a woman, clause (b) of subsection (1) shall have effect as if for the word "fifteen" therein the word "seven" were substituted; or

(ii) over forty-five years of age, or forty years in the case of a woman, clause (b) of subsection (1) shall have effect as if for the word "fifteen" therein the word "five" were substituted.

9. Section 22(1) provides that an insured person is entitled to monthly old-age pension if (a) he is over sixty years of age, or over fifty-five years of age in the case of a woman, and (b) the contribution in respect of such insured person was paid by the employer for not less than fifteen years. It is only when both these conditions are fulfilled that an insured person is entitled to monthly old-age pension under the said provision. An exception is provided under Section 22(2) of the Act whereby the number of years of contribution paid by the employer on behalf of the insured person is reduced to seven and five years, respectively instead of fifteen years under section 22(2) if on the first day of July, 1976 or on any day thereafter on which the Act becomes applicable to an industry or establishment; (i) the insured person is over forty years of age, or over thirty-five years of age in the case of a woman or (ii) the insured person is over forty-five years of age, or over forty years in the case of a woman.

10. The first cut-off date i.e., first day of July 1976 is the date when the Act was implemented. As per section 9 of the Act, the first contribution was paid by the employer on the said date. The second cut-off date is when the Act becomes applicable to an industry or establishment. Section 1(4) of the Act provides three different modes through which the Act becomes applicable to an industry or establishment. It is at these two points in time when the age of the insured person in terms of Section 22(2)(i) and (ii) becomes relevant for invoking the exception of reduced years of contribution under the said provision. The age of the insured person alone is not the determining factor for the case to fall within the exception under Section 22(2) but it is also that the age must be so at the relevant cut-off dates mentioned above. As such, an insured person cannot avail the exception under Section 22(2) if he was employed after the cut-off date, i.e., first day of July 1976 or after the date when the Act became applicable to the industry or establishment under Section 1(4) of the Act. Therefore, to avail the exception under Section 22 (2) of the Act, the insured person must satisfy that he was in employment in the industry or establishment on the first day of July 1976 or on the day the Act became applicable to such an industry or establishment and was of the age mentioned in Section 22(2)(i) and (ii) of the Act.

11. For the above reasons, the petitions filed by the EOBI are converted into appeals and allowed, whereas the petitions filed by the respondents (insured persons) are dismissed and leave to appeal therein refused. However, if any of the respondents can establish that they were entitled to the exception provided in Section 22(2) of the Act in view of what has been held above, he or she may move an appropriate application before the EOBI seeking such an exception, and the EOBI shall decide the said application in terms of this judgment through a speaking order.

MWA/A-8/SC Order accordingly.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---Through the present petitions, the petitioner seeks leave to appeal against the order of the Islamabad High Court, dated 08.08.2023, whereby it has, as interim relief, restrained the petitioner from recovering the supertax under Section 4C of the Income Tax Ordinance, 2001 as amended by the Finance Act, 2023.

2. Arguing against the legality of the impugned orders, the learned counsel for the petitioner made two main contentions: (i) that the High Court did not adhere to the mandatory procedure prescribed in Article 199(4) of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan ("Constitution") for making interim orders in matters relating to assessment and collection of public revenue; (ii) that by making the impugned orders, the High Court virtually suspended the operation of the legislation, i.e., Section 4C of the Income Tax Ordinance, 2001 ("Ordinance"), which could not have been legally done. In support of her contentions, she placed reliance on Federation of Pakistan v. Aitzaz Ahsan (PLD 1989 SC 61), Aijaz Jatoi v. Liaquat Jatoi (1993 SCMR 2350) and Asstt. Collector v. Dunlop India Ltd. (AIR 1985 SC 330). On the other hand, the learned counsel for the respondents submitted that the respondents challenged the amendment[1] to Section 4C of the Ordinance through Finance Act, 2023 only to the extent of its retrospective applicability. He submits that a similar challenge to the extent of retrospectivity of the unamended Section 4C of the Ordinance was read down by the Islamabad High Court in its judgment dated 20.07.2023 passed in Fauji Fertilizer[2].

3. We have considered the respective contentions of the learned counsel for the parties and have examined the record.

4. At the outset, it is important to note that the present petitions challenge the interim orders of the High Court, and we are fully cognizant of the established practice and policy of this Court, whereby it does not ordinarily intervene in the interim orders of the High Courts.[3] Such intervention is warranted only in exceptional circumstances, such as cases involving a flagrant violation of law, a clear wrongful exercise of jurisdiction or a manifest grave injustice.[4] In the present case, the exceptional circumstance is the alleged violation of the constitutional requirement of granting interim relief under Article 199(4) of the Constitution. Hence we proceed to examine the impugned order on merit.

5. To appreciate the contention of the learned counsel for the petitioner it would be expedient to reproduce Article 199(4) of the Constitution for ready reference:

(4) Where-

(a) an application is made to a High Court for an order under paragraph (a) or paragraph (c) of clause (1), and

(b) the making of an interim order would have the effect of prejudicing or interfering with the carrying out of a public work or of otherwise being harmful to public interest or State property or of impeding the assessment or collection of public revenues, the Court shall not make an interim order unless the prescribed law officer has been given notice of the application and he or any person authorized by him in that behalf has had an opportunity of being heard and the Court, for reasons to be recorded in writing, is satisfied that the interim order-

(i) would not have such effect as aforesaid; or

(ii) would have the effect of suspending an order or proceeding which on the face of the record is without jurisdiction.

A plain reading of the above provisions shows that where the making of an interim order would have the effect of impeding the assessment or collection of public revenues, the High Court shall not make an interim order unless: (i) the prescribed law officer has been given notice of the application for interim relief and he or any person authorized has had an opportunity of being heard; and (ii) the High Court, for reasons to be recorded in writing, is satisfied that the interim order would have the effect of suspending an order or proceeding which on the face of the record is without jurisdiction.

6. It is a well-established principle that where any provision couched in a negative language requires an act to be done in a particular manner then it should be done in the manner as required by the statute otherwise such act will be illegal and without jurisdiction.[5] The use of the negative language, i.e., "shall not", in Article 199(4) leaves no doubt that its provisions are mandatory and an interim order passed without adhering to the procedure provided therein will be illegal and without jurisdiction. In the present case, it is an admitted fact that the High Court did not give notice of the application for interim relief and provide an opportunity of hearing to the prescribed law officer, i.e., the Attorney-General,[6] nor did the High Court record its finding, and the reasons therefor, that the interim order would have the effect of suspending an order or proceeding which on the face of the record is without jurisdiction. Both the mandatory requirements of Article 199(4) were not complied with by the High Court in making the impugned orders, which failure makes these orders illegal and without jurisdiction. The present case, thus, involves a flagrant violation of law and a clear wrongful exercise of jurisdiction, which warrants interference by this Court in the impugned interim order. We observe, with respect, that the High Court acted with undue haste in making the impugned interim orders without giving notice and without providing an opportunity of hearing to the prescribed law officer. The impugned interim orders suffer from this inherent vice and deserve to be set aside on this account alone.

7. For the above reasons, we convert these petitions into appeals and allow them. The impugned orders are set aside. The respondents' applications for interim relief shall be decided by the High Court after affording a fair and reasonable opportunity of hearing as envisaged under Article 199(4) of the Constitution. The High Court shall also identify the order or proceedings under challenge in terms of Article 199 (4) (b) (ii) of the Constitution. The High Court will also attend to the other contention of the learned counsel for the petitioner regarding suspension of legislation through an interim order in the light of the law cited by her. Given that the matter pertains to the assessment and collection of public revenue, we expect that the High Court will decide not only the applications for interim relief but also the writ petitions as expeditiously as possible.

----Rr.27 & 56---Tenders for construction works---Bidding documents---Additional performance security imposed by procuring agency---Legality---Bidding documents should comply with the Punjab Procurement Rules, 2014 (Rules) especially Rules 27 and 56---Procuring agency cannot introduce additional security in violation of the Rules---Procuring agency cannot require the bidder to pay additional performance security over and above the bid security and performance guarantee provided under Rules 27 and 56 of the Rules.

The imposition of additional security not only disincentivizes the contractors trying to submit competitively low bids, but it also defies logic as the successful bidder has to give lesser security than the lowest bidder, who might not be a successful bidder, eventually. Where the lowest bidder becomes the successful bidder, he will have to furnish two securities while any other bidder who is not the lowest bidder, but has been declared successful bidder, must only furnish one security. This incongruence in the bidding documents leads to discrimination and offends the principles of public procurement. Therefore, compliance to the regulator framework becomes mandatory in public procurement to uphold the foundational principles of public procurement. Therefore, in the present case the insertion of additional performance security in the Bid Document and the follow up clauses dealing with the consequence of non-payment of additional performance security in the bidding document are beyond the scope of the Punjab Procurement Rules, 2014 (Rules) being inconsistent with Rules 27 and 56 of the Rules. Consequently, the Supreme Court set aside the demand raised for the payment of additional performance security by the procurement agencies as being unlawful and violative of the Rules, and directed that any additional security to be imposed on a contractor can only be introduced through Rules to be framed by the Government so that the principles of procurement are met and there is transparency, level playing-field and non-discrimination in public procurement.

---R.68---Procurement---Bidding documents, dispute over---Mediation---Significance of mediation and pro mediation bias of courts explained.

Courts must encourage out of court settlements through Alternate Dispute Resolution (“ADR”), in particular mediation. The essence of mediation lies in its voluntary and confidential process, where a neutral third party, the mediator, assists disputants in reaching a consensus. Unlike in litigation, where the outcome is often a zero-sum game, mediation thrives on the principle of win-win solutions, preserving relationships and allowing for creative resolutions that legal parameters might not accommodate.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, Speech at the Minnesota Conference for Women in the Law, April 1985 ref.

Mediation, as a form of alternative dispute resolution (ADR), has garnered widespread acclaim for its efficiency, cost-effectiveness, and ability to facilitate amicable settlements. In contrast to the adversarial nature of litigation, mediation embodies a collaborative approach, encouraging parties to find mutually beneficial solutions. The courts should not only encourage mediation but also exhibit a pro-settlement bias and a pro-mediation bias. Pro-mediation bias or pro-settlement bias means a predisposition or preference within the legal system for resolving disputes through mediation rather than through litigation or other forms of dispute resolution. This bias is not about favoring one party over another but rather about favoring the process of mediation itself as a preferred method of dispute resolution. This bias is grounded in the belief that settlements are generally more efficient and satisfactory for all parties involved compared to outcomes determined by a court. Courts may exhibit a pro-settlement bias by encouraging parties to settle even before the case goes to trial or during the litigation process.

By fostering a pro-settlement bias, courts can contribute to a more harmonious and efficient dispute resolution landscape, where parties are empowered to resolve conflicts collaboratively and constructively. Encouraging mediation aligns with the broader goals of justice systems worldwide: to resolve disputes in a manner that is fair, efficient, and conducive to the long-term well-being of all involved parties.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---Brief facts of the case are that through public advertisement made by different procuring agencies[1] i.e., Communication and Works Department and Irrigation Department of the Government of the Punjab and Punjab Local Government, tenders were sought for various construction works. In pursuance thereof, the contractors submitted their bids. Clause 26(A) of the General Directions for the Guidance of the Tenderers (Bid Document) provided that if there is a difference between the total tendered amount and the approved estimated amount, the lowest bidder shall deposit additional performance security ranging from 5% to 10% of the difference. Through impugned letters dated 29.12.2020 and 18.01.2021 issued by the Executive Engineer, Highway Division, Gujranwala and Narowal, respectively, demand was raised against the contractors for the payment of additional performance security. The contractors challenged the said demand before the High Court, where the claim of the contractors was dismissed vide impugned judgment while interpreting Rule 56 of the Punjab Procurement Rules, 2014 ("Rules"). The private contractors, the Provincial Government and the procuring agencies are all aggrieved of the impugned judgement for different reasons but primarily regarding the interpretation of Rule 56 of the Rules, hence these petitions.

2. The central question before us is whether the procuring agency could require the bidder to pay additional performance security over and above the bid security and performance guarantee provided under Rules 27 and 56 of the Rules. In other words, can the bidding documents include terms and conditions of the tender which are over and above or inconsistent with the Rules.

3. Learned Additional Advocate General representing the Provincial Government and the procuring agencies submits that the Punjab Procurement Regulatory Authority Act 2009 ("Act") and the Rules do not bar the procuring agency from including additional performance security in the bidding documents and therefore there is no violation of the Rules. Clauses 26(A), 26(B) and 15 of the bidding documents provide for the additional performance security, its rates and the consequence of on non-payment of the said security.

4. On the other hand, learned counsel for the private contractors submit that the bidding documents are to be regulated by the Act, as well as, the Rules and in the presence of Rules 27 and 56 the bidding documents cannot provide for additional security by violating the upper limit on securities provided under the Rules. He submits that Rule 27 provides that bid security shall not exceed 5% of the estimated price while Rule 56 provides that performance guarantee dealing with the successful bidder shall not exceed 10% of the contract amount and there is no provision under the Rules for any additional performance security at any stage of the bidding.

5. We have gone through the provisions of the Act, as well as the Rules. The preamble to the Act provides for the establishment of the Procurement Regulatory Authority for regulating procurement of goods, services and works in the public sector. Public procurement[2] means procurement of goods, works or services by a procuring agency wholly or partly financed out of the Provincial Consolidated Fund or the Public Account of the Province or funds of a procuring agency. Procuring agency[3] means a department of the government or an autonomous body of the government, a local government, etc. The functions and powers entrusted to the Authority under the Act are geared towards improving governance, management, transparency, accountability and quality of public procurement. These functions and powers include: monitoring the application of laws, rules, regulations relating to public procurement; making regulations and laying down codes of ethics and procedures for public procurement; establishing performance indicators for public procurement; preparing standard documents to be used in connection with public procurement; presenting an annual report to the government regarding overall functioning of the public procurement system; and make rules for carrying out the purposes of the Act.

6. The Rules promulgated by the Government for carrying out the purposes of the Act, inter alia, define; "bidding documents", "bid security" and "performance guarantee[4]." Rule 4 lays down the principles of procurement i.e., (i) procurement to be in a fair and transparent manner (ii) the object of procurement is to bring value for money to the procuring agency and (iii) the procurement process be efficient and economical. Under the Rules the procuring agency is to use standard bidding documents as and when notified under the regulations and until the standard bidding documents are specified under the regulations, a procuring agency may use bidding documents already in use of the procuring agency to the extent that they are not inconsistent with the Rules.[5] And any violation of these Rules amounts to mis-procurement[6]. Rules 27 and 56 provide for bid security and performance guarantee in the following manner:

27. Bid security.---The procuring agency may require the bidders to furnish a bid security not exceeding five per cent of the estimated price.

Explanation.---In this rule, the words 'estimated price' mean the price of procurement estimated by the procuring agency before initiation of the process of procurement.

56. Performance guarantee.---Where needed and clearly expressed in the bidding documents, the procuring agency shall require the successful bidder to furnish a performance guarantee which shall not exceed ten percent of the contract amount.

7. The above regulatory framework provides a stable and predictable environment for both the procuring agency and the contractor. Deviating from this framework can create uncertainty and confusion, potentially deterring qualified bidders from participating in the procurement process and possibly leading to disputes or litigation. One of the fundamental principles of public procurement is compliance with the law. Procurement activities must adhere to the legal and regulatory framework established by the law. Introducing new terms and conditions outside or inconsistent to the regulatory framework under the law can compromise the fairness and transparency of the public procurement process. It could lead to perceptions or instances of bias, unfair advantage, or discrimination against certain bidders, which undermines the integrity of the public procurement process.

8. According to Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development ("OECD"), public procurement is the regulation of principles, rules and procedures applied to States in order to implement efficient processes when acquiring goods, services or works, and comply with its' policy objectives.[7] It is within this context that the OECD Principles for Enhancing Integrity in Public Procurement come into play which are primarily directed at policy makers in governments at the national level, but may also offer guidance for sub-national government and state-owned enterprises. These Principles provide a policy instrument for enhancing integrity in the entire public procurement cycle and take a holistic view by addressing various risks to integrity, from needs assessment, through the award stage, contract management and up to final payment. These twelve (12) Principles[8] are anchored in four pillars[9] namely transparency, good management, prevention of misconduct and accountability and control in order to enhance integrity in public procurement and, inter alia, include; (i) Transparency; providing an adequate degree of transparency in the entire procurement cycle in order to promote fair and equitable treatment for potential suppliers, (ii) Integrity; preserving the integrity of the public procurement system through general standards and procurement specific safeguards, (iii) Access; facilitating access to procurement opportunities for potential competitors of all sizes, (iv) Balance; recognizing that any use of the public procurement system to pursue secondary policy objectives should be balanced against the primary procurement objective, (v) Participation; fostering transparent and effective stakeholder participation, (vi) Efficiency; developing processes to drive efficiency throughout the public procurement cycle while satisfying the needs of the government and its citizens, (vii) E -procurement; improving the public procurement system by harnessing the use of digital technologies to support appropriate e-procurement innovation through the procurement cycle, (viii) Capacity; developing a procurement workforce with the capacity to continuously deliver value for money efficiently and effectively, (ix) Evaluation; driving performance improvements through evaluation of the effectiveness of the public procurement system from individual procurements to the system as a whole, at all levels of government where feasible and appropriate, (x) Risk Management; integrating risk management strategies for mapping, detecting and mitigating throughout the public procurement cycle, (xi) Accountability; applying oversight and control mechanisms to support accountability throughout the public procurement cycle, including appropriate complaint and sanction processes, (xii) Integration; supporting integration of public procurement into overall public finance management, budgeting and service delivery processes.

9. The regulatory framework under the Act and the Rules closely monitors and regulates public procurement and provides for the bidding documents, the steps to be taken during public procurement and the securities that can be furnished by a contractor, which include bid security and performance guarantee. The Authority under the Act is to lay special emphasis on the governance, management, transparency, accountability, and quality of public procurement. While the global guideline on public procurement developed by OECD mentions fundamental pillars of public procurement as: transparency, good management, prevention of misconduct and accountability and control. Therefore, to enhance integrity in public procurement; transparency, level playing-field, standardization of bidding documents and uniformity of compliance of the regulatory framework are essential ingredients that cannot be waived or comprised. It is to uphold these guiding principles that the procuring agency cannot go beyond the regulatory framework and introduce terms in the bidding documents that are inconsistent to the regulatory regime under the Act, Rules, etc. In this case strangely the additional performance security is sought from the lowest bidder and not from the successful bidder who is to deposit only performance guarantee (mentioned in the bidding document as performance security). The imposition of additional security not only disincentivizes the contractors trying to submit competitively low bids, but it also defies logic as the successful bidder has to give lesser security than the lowest bidder, who might not be a successful bidder, eventually. Where the lowest bidder becomes the successful bidder, he will have to furnish two securities while any other bidder who is not the lowest bidder, but has been declared successful bidder, must only furnish one security. This incongruence in the bidding documents leads to discrimination and offends the principles of public procurement discussed above. Therefore, compliance to the regulator framework becomes mandatory in public procurement to uphold the foundational principles of public procurement. Therefore, insertion of additional performance security in clause 26(A) and the follow up clauses 26(B) and 15 dealing with the consequence of non-payment of additional performance security in the bidding document are beyond the scope of the Rules being inconsistent with Rules 27 and 56 of the Rules. Consequently, the demand raised for the payment of additional performance security vide letters 29.12.2020 and 18.01.2021 by the procurement agencies along with the above clauses are set aside being unlawful and violative of the Rules. Any additional security to be imposed on a contractor can only be introduced through Rules to be framed by the Government so that the principles of procurement are met and there is transparency, level playing-field and non-discrimination in public procurement.

10. We have notice that Rule 68 of the Rules provides that after the coming into force of the procurement contract, disputes between the parties to the contract shall be settled through mediation or arbitration. The words of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor are telling: "The courts of this country should not be the places where resolution of disputes begins. They should be the places where the disputes end after alternative methods of resolving disputes have been considered and tried."[10] Even though in the instant case alternate dispute resolution mechanism was not available as interpretation of the Act and the Rules were involved, which is best left to the court of law, we wish to underline that courts must encourage out of court settlements through Alternate Dispute Resolution ("ADR"), in particular mediation. The essence of mediation lies in its voluntary and confidential process, where a neutral third party, the mediator, assists disputants in reaching a consensus. Unlike in litigation, where the outcome is often a zero-sum game, mediation thrives on the principle of win-win solutions, preserving relationships and allowing for creative resolutions that legal parameters might not accommodate. "The notion that ordinary people want black-robed judges, well-dressed lawyers, and fine paneled courtrooms as settings to resolve their disputes is incorrect. People with problems, like people with pains, want relief, and they want it as quickly and inexpensively as possible."[11]

11. Mediation, as a form of alternative dispute resolution (ADR), has garnered widespread acclaim for its efficiency, cost-effectiveness, and ability to facilitate amicable settlements. In contrast to the adversarial nature of litigation, mediation embodies a collaborative approach, encouraging parties to find mutually beneficial solutions. The courts should not only encourage mediation but also exhibit a pro-settlement bias and a pro-mediation bias. By Pro-mediation bias or pro-settlement we mean a predisposition or preference within the legal system for resolving disputes through mediation rather than through litigation or other forms of dispute resolution. This bias is not about favoring one party over another but rather about favoring the process of mediation itself as a preferred method of dispute resolution. This bias is grounded in the belief that settlements are generally more efficient and satisfactory for all parties involved compared to outcomes determined by a court.

12. Prominent legal scholars and jurists, including the likes of Roger Fisher and William Ury, authors of the seminal work "Getting to Yes," advocate for mediation. They emphasize its potential to produce outcomes that are more satisfactory to all parties involved, compared to the often rigid and polarizing verdicts of court proceedings. Their work underscores the importance of interests over positions, encouraging parties to seek common ground rather than entrenching themselves in adversarial stances. For instance, in "Judging Civil Justice," legal scholar Hazel Genn discusses the encouragement of settlement as a way to reduce court caseloads and promote the efficient use of judicial resources. Courts may exhibit a pro-settlement bias by encouraging parties to settle even before the case goes to trial or during the litigation process.

13. By fostering a pro-settlement bias, courts can contribute to a more harmonious and efficient dispute resolution landscape, where parties are empowered to resolve conflicts collaboratively and constructively. Encouraging mediation aligns with the broader goals of justice systems worldwide: to resolve disputes in a manner that is fair, efficient, and conducive to the long-term well-being of all involved parties. "In the future, it is likely that the traditional trial will be the exception rather than the rule."[12]

whereas C.P.L.A.2277-L/2021 and C.P.L.A.3396-L/2022 are converted into appeals and allowed in the above terms.

Date of hearing: 13th March, 2024.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---C.P.L.A. No. 1800-L of 2018: Brief facts of the case are that the respondent being an employee of the petitioner bank was promoted to the post of Officer Grade-I w.e.f. 01.01.2014. Aggrieved of the said order, as the petitioner sought promotion w.e.f. 03.03.2011, he filed an appeal under Rule 40 of the National Bank of Pakistan (Staff) Service Rules, 1973 ("Rules"). The said appeal was dismissed vide order dated 12.08.2016 against which the respondent preferred a writ petition before the High Court, which was allowed vide order dated 22.02.2018. Against the said order the petitioner-bank filed an intra-court appeal ("ICA"), which was dismissed on the ground of maintainability, being hit by the proviso to Section 3(2) of the Law Reforms Ordinance, 1972 ("Ordinance") through the impugned judgment dated 6 June 2018. Hence, the instant petition.

2. Learned counsel for the petitioner-bank submits that the intra-court appeal was maintainable before the High Court because under Rule 40 only an employee can file an appeal but no such remedy is available to the petitioner-bank, therefore, proviso to Section 3(2) of the Ordinance is not attracted in the present case and the petitioner-bank can file an ICA before the High Court. In support of this contention learned counsel placed reliance on National Electric Power Regulatory Authority v. Faisalabad Electric Supply Company Ltd. (PLD 2015 Lahore 661), Secretary to the Government of Punjab, Revenue Department and others v. Sajjad Ahmad and another (2012 SCMR 114), Syed Arif Raza Rizvi v. Messrs Pakistan International Airlines through Chairman/M.D. Karachi (PLD 2001 SC 182) and Federal Board of Revenue through Chairman, Islamabad and others v. Abdul Ghani and another (2021 SCMR 1154).

3. Learned counsel for the respondent on the other hand submits that proviso to Section 3(2) of the Ordinance does not create any distinction as to the availability of appeal, review or revision to any of the parties but simply provides that if the proceedings in which the original order has been passed provides for an appeal, revision or review, no ICA is provided before the High Court. In support of this contention learned counsel placed reliance on JS Bank Limited v. Province of Punjab (2021 SCMR 1617) and a recent unreported judgment of this Court dated 16.11.2023 passed in Civil Petition No.835 of 2021 titled (2024 SCMR 472) "International Islamic University, Islamabad through its Rector and another v. Syed Naveed Altaf and others". He finally contends that the ICA filed by the petitioner-bank before the High Court was not maintainable.

4. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties and have gone through the case law presented by them. Section 3 of the Ordinance provides as follows:

3. Appeal to High Court in certain cases.---(1) An appeal shall lie to a Bench of two or more Judges of a High Court from a decree passed or final order made by a single Judge of that Court in the exercise of its original civil jurisdiction.

(2) An appeal shall also lie to a Bench of two or more Judges of a High Court from an order made by a single Judge of that Court under clause (1) of Article 199 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan] not being an order made under sub-paragraph (i) of paragraph (b) of that clause:---

Provided that the appeal referred to in this subsection shall not be available or competent if the application brought before the High Court under Article 199 arises out of any proceedings in which the law applicable provided for at least one appeal or one revision or one review to any court, tribunal or authority against the original order. (emphasis supplied)

The main test to determine whether an ICA is available under the proviso to Section 3(2) of the Ordinance is to see whether the proceedings, in which the original order has been passed, provide for an appeal, revision or review (collectively referred to as "appeal," for convenience) to any Court, Tribunal or authority against the original order. Applying this test what needs to be seen and verified is whether the proceedings provided for an appeal against the original order and not whether parties to the proceedings enjoyed the right to appeal against the original order. The proviso under Section 3(2) of the Ordinance is proceedings specific and not parties specific. So it matters less if one of the parties to the proceedings is not entitled to right of appeal against the original order passed in the said proceedings. See[1] Karim Bibi v. Hussain Bakhsh (PLD 1984 SC 344) and Muhammad Abdullah v. Deputy Settlement Commissioner, Centre-I, Lahore (PLD 1985 SC 107).

5. In the instant case, the proceedings under the National Bank of Pakistan (Staff) Service Rules, 1973, provide for an appeal under Rule 40 against the original order. This is sufficient to disentitle the parties to maintain an intra-court appeal, irrespective of the fact that one or more of the parties to the proceedings did not have a right of appeal against original order. Therefore, ICA is not maintainable in the present case. The case law relied upon by the learned counsel for the petitioner-bank is not relevant to the issue, except the High Court judgment passed in National Electric Power Regulatory Authority v. Faisalabad Electric Supply Company Ltd. (PLD 2015 Lahore 661),[2] which does not correctly interpret the proviso to Section 3(2) of the Ordinance and is therefore disapproved.

6. In view of the above, leave is declined, and this petition is dismissed.

7. As the CPLA No.1800-L/2018 filed by the respondent-bank has been dismissed vide order of even date, the petitioner can approach the respondent-bank for the redressal of his grievance. The respondent-bank is directed to decide the same through a speaking order preferably within a period of two months from the receipt of this Order. This petition is disposed of in the above terms.

Election Commission v. Javaid Hashmi PLD 1989 SC 396 ref.

---Arts. 4,17(2), 218(3) & 222(d)---Elections Act (XXXIII of 2017), S. 8(c)---Election Commission---Powers and duties as to conducting elections---Law enacted by Parliament to regulate duties and power of the Election Commission---Scope---Under Article 218(3) of the Constitution the Election Commission does not have such general and inherent power which is absolute or superior to the law enacted by the Parliament---General power under Article 218(3) of the Constitution and section 8(c) of the Elections Act, 2017 can be exercised by the Election Commission within two parameters: (i) during the election process, which starts with the issuance of the election programme and culminates with the publication of the name of thereturned candidates in the official gazette, and (ii) when there is no express provision in the law enacted by the Parliament to deal with the matter or issue that arises during the performance of constitutional duty of conducting the elections honestly, justly, fairly and in accordance with law---Scope of the general powers of the Election Commission under Article 218(3) of the Constitution and section 8(c) of the Elections Act, 2017 stated.

Reading of clause (d) of Article 222 of the Constitution makes it clear that the Parliament can enact a law that regulates the conduct of elections and such law would consequentially also regulate the constitutional duty and power of the Election Commission to conduct the election. However, Parliament cannot, by enacting a law, confer any of the duties and functions of the Election Commission entrusted to it under Part VIII of the Constitution to any other executive or judicial authority or office, either entirely or partly.

Province of Sindh v. M.Q.M. PLD 2014 SC 531 and Election Commission v. Province of Punjab PLD 2014 SC 668 ref.

So far as the general power of the Election Commission under Article 218(3) is concerned, the expression and in accordance with law used in that very Article clearly suggests that it is to be exercised to ensure that the election is conducted in accordance with the law enacted by the Parliament, and not in suppression thereof. The Election Commission, thus, cannot exercise its general power in a manner that would make the conduct of election otherwise than in accordance with the law enacted by the Parliament, that is, in violation or breach of such law. Therefore, a law enacted by the Parliament that regulates the conduct of elections and consequentially the constitutional duty and power of the Election Commission to conduct the election, is not hit by the provisions of the latter part of Article 222 of the Constitution; as the requirement for the Election Commission to conduct the election in accordance with law while performing its constitutional duty has been prescribed by the Constitution itself, not by a law enacted by the Parliament.

However, where the law enacted by the Parliament does not cover an unforeseen matter or issue that may arise during the election process, the Election Commission is to exercise its general power under Article 218(3) of the Constitution, in the same manner as all other discretionary powers are exercised, that is, fairly, reasonably and judiciously in accordance with the principles of equity, justice and good conscience. While exercising its general power in such a situation, the Election Commission must remember the fundamental principle that the general, plenary and inherent powers are exercised to supplement, not supplant or supersede, the law. Such powers cannot be exercised to defeat the express provisions of law but are invoked only when there is no specific provision of law on the matter or issue that needs to be dealt with.

Messrs Conforce v. Syed Ali PLD 1977 SC 599; Roazi Khan v. Nasir 1997 SCMR 1849 and Muhammad Sadiq v. Bashiran PLD 2000 SC 820 ref.

Accepting the contention that the Election Commission has such general and inherent power under Article 218(3) of the Constitution which is absolute or superior to the law enacted by the Parliament, would be tantamount to going against the constitutional mandate of the rule of law ensured under Article 4 of the Constitution. In the matter of elections, the right of the citizens to vote and contest elections cannot be entirely left to be dealt with at the discretion of the Election Commission under its general and inherent power by construing such power to be above the law enacted by the Parliament.

Province of Sindh v. M.Q.M. PLD 2014 SC 531 and Javed Jabbar v. Federation of Pakistan PLD 2003 SC 955 ref.

Thus, on the question of the status of the general power of the Election Commission under Article 218(3) of the Constitution vis- -vis a law enacted by the Parliament, it is safe to conclude that this power operates in the area uncovered by such law. Alike is the scope and applicability of the powers of the Election Commission under Section 8(c) of the Elections Act, 2017 which is also evident from the opening words of Section 8, Save as otherwise provided . These words indicate that if something otherwise is provided in the Elections Act, then this Section will not apply. Further, the amplitude of the power of the Election Commission under Section 8(c), like its general power under Article 218(3) of the Constitution, is extended to the performance of its executive duty to conduct the election and thus it can be exercised only at any stage of the election process, not after the completion thereof. In other words, one can say, the general power under Article 218(3) of the Constitution and Section 8(c) of the Elections Act can be exercised by the Election Commission within two parameters: (i) during the election process, which starts with the issuance of the election programme and culminates with the publication of the name of thereturned candidates in the official gazette, and (ii) when there is no express provision in the law enacted by the Parliament to deal with the matter or issue that arises during the performance of constitutional duty of conducting the elections honestly, justly, fairly and in accordance with law.

(d) Elections Act (XXXIII of 2017)---

----Ss. 8(c), 9(1) & 88---Constitution of Pakistan, Art. 218(3)---Election Commission, powers of---Tampering with the election record---Order for re-poll at certain polling stations after the consolidation of the final result of the poll by the Returning Officer---Legality---Whether the Election Commission of Pakistan (ECP) has the power to order a re-poll in one or more polling stations or in the whole constituency, under Article 218(3) of the Constitution read with section 8(c) or section 9(1) of the Elections Act 2017, on the ground of tampering made with the election record (polling bags, ballot papers, etc.) after the consolidation of the final result of the poll by the Returning Officer under Section 95 and the publication of the name of the returned candidate in the official gazette under section 98 of the Elections Act, 2017.

Election Commission made an order ( impugned order ), under Article 218(3) of the Constitution read with Section 8(c) of the Elections Act, 2017( Elections Act ) to hold a re-poll in the 20 polling stations of which record had been tampered with. The Election Commission passed the impugned order after the consolidation of the final result of the poll by the Returning Officer under Section 95 of the Elections Act and the publication of the name of the appellant as a returned candidate in the official gazette under Section 98 of the Elections Act, when the election process has been completed. But as the notification of the appellant as a returned candidate had been issued under the interim order of the Supreme Court, the same could not have concluded the election process to create a bar on the exercise of its general power by the Election Commission under Article 218(3) of the Constitution read with Section 8(c) of the Elections Act. The objection that the Election Commission exercised its power in the present case after the completion of the election process is, therefore, not sustainable.

The matter of directing a re-poll or a fresh poll by the Election Commission in the process of conducting the election has expressly been dealt with in the Elections Act. There are three provisions in the Elections Act that deal with this matter in relation to the duty and power of the Election Commission to conduct the election , which are Sections 9, 88 and 121 of the Elections Act. As the matter of directing a re-poll by the Election Commission in the process of conducting the election has expressly been dealt with in the Elections Act, the Election Commission was not justified to invoke and exercise its general power under Article 218(3) read with Section 8(c) of the Elections Act in the present matter.

A reading of Section 88 of the Elections Act shows that the tampering with the ballot box referred to therein relates to the polling day, not thereafter. Secondly, the power of the Election Commission to direct a fresh poll at the relevant polling station is not to be exercised if the Election Commission is satisfied that the result of the election has been determined by the polling that has already taken place at that polling station (before stopping the poll by the Presiding Officer), along with the result of the polling at other polling stations in the same constituency. In the present case, as per the report of the Returning Officer as well as the report of the Inquiry Committee constituted by the Election Commission, the tampering with the election record had taken place not on the polling day, rather it was made after the consolidation of the final result of the poll by the Returning Officer under Section 95 of the Elections Act. The impugned order passed by the Election Commission can, therefore, not sustain within the scope of the provisions of Section 88 of the Elections Act.

In the present case, as the illegality of tampering with the election record had been committed after the consolidation of the final result of the poll by the Returning Officer under Section 95 of the Elections Act, the Election Commission could not have invoked and exercised its power under Section 9(1) of the Elections Act; for such illegality had not affected the result of the poll already consolidated by the Returning Officer under Section 95 of the Elections Act. Further, the fact that who, the appellant or the respondent, was responsible for the tampering made with the election record after the consolidation of the final result of the poll, could not have been decided, nor has it been decided, by the Election Commission within the scope of summary enquiry under Section 9(1) of the Elections Act. This fact could only have been decided by the Election Tribunal in a full-fledged trial. Without deciding that fact, ordering a repoll in 20 polling stations is tantamount to punishing the appellant without determining his fault, and awarding the suspected culprit, if he were the respondent. In such an uncertain situation, the Election Commission should not have vitiated the official acts of the election officials, which were the counting of votes and the consolidation of the final result of the poll, as they had a presumption of regular performance as per Article 129(e) of the Qanun-e-Shahadat 1984. The impugned order is, therefore, not sustainable under Section 9(1) of the Elections Act. The re-poll held in pursuance of the impugned order and the subsequent notification of the respondent as a returned candidate are quashed. The respondent shall be de-notified, while the appellant re-notified, as a returned candidate. Appeal is allowed.

----Wrong or inapplicable provision of law mentioned by the Court---Effect---Mentioning of a wrong or inapplicable provision of law or non-mentioning of the applicable provision of law while exercising a jurisdiction or a power which is otherwise vested in a court, tribunal or authority, does not by itself have fatal consequences.

----Ss.9(1), 139, 142 & 154(1)(b)(i)---Power of the Election Commission to declare a poll void---Scope of section 9 of the Elections Act, 2017 stated.

The opening expression used in Section 9(1) of the Elections Act, 2017 ( the Elections Act ), Notwithstanding anything contained in this Act , shows that the jurisdiction of the Election Commission under this Section has an overriding effect against any other provision of the Elections Act. Thus, the Election Commission is competent to exercise its jurisdiction under this Section, notwithstanding the availability of the remedy of the election petition under Section 139 read with Section 142 and the jurisdiction of the Election Tribunal to grant the same relief under Section 154(1)(b)(i) of the Elections Act. To the extent of the grounds specified in Section 9(1) upon which the Election Commission can exercise its power to order a re-poll, the jurisdiction of the Election Commission and the Election Tribunal is, therefore, concurrent. The Election Commission can exercise its jurisdiction under Section 9(1) of the Elections Act, to order a re-poll if:

i. There have been grave illegalities or violations of the provisions of the Elections Act or the Rules made thereunder;

ii. Such illegalities or violations are evident from facts apparent on the face of the record; and

iii. Such illegalities or violations have materially affected the result of the poll at one or more polling stations or in the whole constituency.

Aftab Mirani v. Muhammad Ibrahim PLD 2008 SC 779 ref.

Although the ground of grave illegalities or violations of the provisions of the Elections Act or the Rules made thereunder in the election process is common for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions by the Election Commission and the Election Tribunal, the difference lies in the nature of proof of those illegalities and violations, and in the scope of enquiry. The words from facts apparent on the face of the record used in Section 9(1) restrict the jurisdiction of the Election Commission to such grave illegalities or violations of the Elections Act or the Rules which are evident from the facts apparent on the face of the record . The Election Commission can, therefore, exercise its jurisdiction under Section 9(1) only when the allegation or issue of grave illegalities or violations of the Elections Act does not require a full-fledged trial and recording of pro and contra evidence of the contesting parties, which can only be undertaken by the Election Tribunal.

Khurshid Kasuri v. Returning Officer 1994 CLC 296 approved.

Although the Election Commission has the power, under Section 9(1) of the Elections Act, to conduct such enquiry as it may deem necessary for its satisfaction about the alleged grave illegalities or violations, in addition to the facts apparent on the face of the record , but before initiating such inquiry by the Election Commission the facts apparent on the face of the record must prima facie indicate the commission of some grave illegality or violation of the Elections Act or the Rules made thereunder, during the election process. The Election Commission cannot initiate a roving enquiry to search for some illegalities or violations, on bald and vague allegations unsupported by prima facie proof, in the exercise of its jurisdiction under Section 9(1) of the Elections Act.

Further, the enquiry which the Election Commission can conduct under Section 9 can only be of a summary nature, notwithstanding the omission of the word summary in Section 9(1), as the Election Commission can make an order for re-poll under this Section before the expiration of sixty days after publication of the name of the returned candidate under Section 98 of the Elections Act, not thereafter. Where the Election Commission does not finally dispose of a case initiated under Section 9(1) within the said period, the proceedings stand abated and the election of the returned candidate is deemed to have become final, subject to the decision of the Election Tribunal on the election petition, if any, as per section 9(3) of the Elections Act. Moreover, as the dismissal of a petition or the abatement of proceedings of a case under Section 9 by the Election Commission does not bar the reagitation before and trial by the Election Tribunal, of the same grounds of grave illegalities or violations of the Elections Act or the Rules made thereunder, the legislature cannot be presumed to have intended two full-fledged trials of the same issue before both forums: the Election Commission and the Election Tribunal. Therefore, the enquiry to be conducted by the Election Commission under Section 9(1) can only be of a summary nature, notwithstanding the omission of the word summary in this Section.

Aftab Mirani v. Muhammad Ibrahim PLD 2008 SC 779 ref.

The second restriction on the exercise of power under Section 9(1) by the Election Commission is that by reason of the grave illegalities or violation of the provisions of the Elections Act or the Rules, the result of the poll at one or more polling stations or in the whole constituency must have been materially affected. Any illegality or violation which does not relate to holding and conducting the poll in the election process, and has thus not affected the result of the poll, cannot form the basis for invoking and exercising the power under Section 9(1) by the Election Commission. The grave illegalities or violations must be such that have materially affected the result of the poll. Although such illegalities or violations may have been committed at any stage of the election process, but not later than the final consolidation of the result of the poll by the Returning Officer under Section 95 of the Elections Act; as any illegality or violation committed after the consolidation of the final result by the Returning Officer cannot be said to have materially affected the result of the poll. It, therefore, does not fall within the scope of the provisions of Section 9(1) of the Elections Act and cannot be a subject of enquiry by the Election Commission to exercise jurisdiction under this Section.

Muhammad Salman v. Naveed Anjum 2021 SCMR 1675 ref.

Any fact-finding enquiry or departmental regular enquiry may be got conducted by the Election Commission, in the matter of any illegality or violation committed after the consolidation of the final result to take appropriate administrative or criminal action against the delinquent election officials, but not for an action under Section 9(1) of the Elections Act.

(g) Appeal---

----Scope---If a court, tribunal or authority not having jurisdiction wrongly assumes and exercises such a jurisdiction and makes an order without jurisdiction, an appeal lies from that order in the same manner as an appeal lies from an order with jurisdiction.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---The question before us, in the present case, is whether the Election Commission of Pakistan has the power to order a re-poll in one or more polling stations or in the whole constituency, under Article 218(3) of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan 1973 read with Section 8(c) or Section 9(1) of the Elections Act 2017, on the ground of tampering made with the election record (polling bags, ballot papers, etc.) after the consolidation of the final result of the poll by the Returning Officer under Section 95 and the publication of the name of the returned candidate in the official gazette under Section 98 of the Elections Act 2017.

2. The background facts of the case in which the said question has arisen for our consideration are that Mr. Zulfiqar Ali Bhatti ("appellant") and Mr. Amir Sultan Cheema ("respondent"), along with several other candidates, contested the general election of 2018 for the membership of the National Assembly of Pakistan from the constituency of NA 91 Sargodha-IV. In the poll held on 25-07-2018, the appellant secured 1,10,654 votes and the respondent 1,10,567 votes. The respondent made an application, on 27.07.2018, to the Returning Officer for recounting the votes, under Section 95(5) of the Elections Act 2017 ("Elections Act"). The Returning Officer dismissed the application on 29.07.2018 and consolidated the final result of the poll on that day. On 30.07.2018, the respondent filed a petition before the Election Commission of Pakistan ("Election Commission") for setting aside the order of the Returning Officer and accepting his application for recounting the votes. The Election Commission, by its order dated 31.07.2018, disposed of the respondent's petition while directing him to approach the appropriate forum (Election Tribunal) through an election petition, for the redressal of his grievance. The respondent, however, challenged the orders of the Returning Officer and the Election Commission in the Lahore High Court through a writ petition. The High Court allowed the writ petition on 03.08.2018, set aside the order of the Returning Officer and directed the Returning Officer to undertake the recount of the votes in the polling stations to be indicated by the respondent. The appellant challenged the order of the High Court in this Court through a petition for leave to appeal. This Court, vide its order dated 10.08.2018, granted the leave, suspended the operation of the impugned order and directed the Election Commission to issue the notification of the appellant as a returned candidate, which was issued on the same day. Given the issuance of the said notification, the respondent filed the election petition before the Election Tribunal, on 19.09.2018. However, during the pendency of the election petition, this Court disposed of the appeal of the appellant vide a consent order dated 10.10.2018, directing the Returning Officer to recount the votes of the whole constituency and submit a report of the recount to the Election Commission.

3. In the course of the proceedings of the recount, the Returning Officer found that the election record (seals of gunny bags and poling bags, and stamps on ballot papers) of 20 polling stations had been tampered with, after the consolidation of the final result of the poll. He, therefore, declined to consolidate the result of the recount and reported the matter to the Election Commission vide his report dated 30.11.2018. He also advised the respondent to approach the Election Tribunal where his election petition was then sub judice. On the report of the Returning Officer, the Election Commission constituted a Technical Inquiry Committee on 10.12.2018, to carry out the requisite "Fact Finding Inquiry". The Inquiry Committee, in its report dated 09.01.2019, endorsed the fact reported by the Returning Officer regarding tampering with the election record. On the basis of the report of the Inquiry Committee, the Election Commission made an order on 14.01.2019, which was notified on 18.01.2019 ("impugned order"), under Article 218(3) of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan 1973 ("Constitution") read with Section 8(c) of the Elections Act,[1] to hold a re-poll in the 20 polling stations of which record had been tampered with.

4. In view of the order of the Election Commission for holding a re-poll in 20 polling stations, the respondent withdrew his election petition on 25.01.2019, while the appellant challenged this order of the Election Commission in the Islamabad High Court through a writ petition filed under Article 199 of the Constitution as well as in this Court through the present appeal filed under Section 9(5) of the Elections Act, by way of abundant caution due to ambiguity in ascertaining the appropriate remedy. The Islamabad High Court dismissed the writ petition of the appellant, vide its order dated 15.02.2019, on the ground that the appellant had availed the alternate statutory remedy of appeal before this Court, and observed that the appellant may re-agitate the matter in writ jurisdiction if his appeal filed in this Court under Section 9(5) of the Elections Act is dismissed on the ground of maintainability. The appellant filed the petition for leave to appeal against that order of the Islamabad High Court also, in this Court. Both the appeal and the petition for leave to appeal of the appellant are being decided by this judgment.

5. It would be pertinent to mention here that in pursuance of the impugned order of the Election Commission, the re-poll in 20 polling stations was held on 02.02.2019 and after consolidating the result of this re-poll in 20 polling stations with the result of the first poll in other polling stations, the respondent was notified as a returned candidate on 19.02.2019. The durability of this superstructure built upon the impugned order is, however, dependent upon the validity of that order.

6. We have considered the arguments of the learned counsel for the parties, read the case law cited by them and examined the record of the case.

Scope of the powers of the Election Commission under Article 218(3) of the Constitution and Section 8(c) of the Elections Act

7. As the Election Commission and the respondent have mainly referred to the provisions of Article 218(3) of the Constitution and Section 8(c) of the Elections Act, to establish that the Election Commission had the power to make the impugned order, it would be appropriate to reproduce the provisions thereof here for ease of reference, before embarking the discussion on the question under consideration with reference to these provisions:

Article 218. Election Commission.

(3) It shall be the duty of the Election Commission to organize and conduct the election and to make such arrangements as are necessary to ensure that the election is conducted honestly, justly, fairly and in accordance with law, and that corrupt practices are guarded against.

Section 8. Power of Commission to ensure fair election.

Save as otherwise provided, the Commission may-

(c) issue such instructions, exercise such powers and make such consequential orders as may in its opinion, be necessary for ensuring that an election is conducted honestly, justly, fairly and in accordance with the provisions of this Act and the Rules.

A bare reading of Section 8(c) of the Elections Act shows that it merely reiterates the power that is vested in the Election Commission under Article 218(3) of the Constitution by substituting the words "make such arrangements" with the words "issue such instructions, exercise such powers and make such consequential orders" that are necessary to ensure that the election is conducted honestly, justly, fairly and in accordance with law. This reiteration of the power of the Election Commission by a sub-constitutional law is of little legal significance, in view of the conferment of that power already by the supreme law of the land - the Constitution. Therefore, we basically need to understand the scope of the constitutional provision.

8. Article 218(3) of the Constitution entrusts the Election Commission with the duty "to organize and conduct the election", and empowers it, in general terms, "to make such arrangements as are necessary to ensure that the election is conducted honestly, justly, fairly and in accordance with law, and that corrupt practices are guarded against".[2] The power so conferred is restricted to the fulfillment of the duty specified, that is, "to organize and conduct the election".[3] Therefore, in order to understand the amplitude of this power, we need to find out the meaning of the term "election" as used in Article 218(3) and to ascertain when the duty of the Election Commission to "conduct the election", as entrusted to it under this Article, starts and when it stands completed. Secondly, it also requires determination whether the duty of the Election Commission to conduct the election and the power to make the necessary arrangements therefor can be regulated by a law enacted by the Parliament; if so, what would be the status of the general power of the Election Commission under Article 218(3) of the Constitution vis- -vis such law.

9. So far as the first question is concerned, the meaning of the term "election" and of the expression "conduct the election" as used in Articles 218 and 225 of the Constitution has already been expounded by a four-member Bench of this Court in Javaid Hashmi case[4]. The words "election" and "conduct the election", as expounded in that case as well as in the other cases approvingly cited therein, have been used in Articles 218 and 225 of the Constitution in a wide sense to connote the entire election process consisting of several steps starting with the issuance of the election programme and culminating with the declaration of the returned candidate, which include filing of the nomination papers, scrutiny of the nomination papers, withdrawal of the candidates, holding the poll, counting of the votes, consolidation of the result and declaration of the returned candidates, etc. In this wide sense, the process of conducting the election starts with the issuance of the election programme and stands completed on the publication of the names of the returned candidates in the official gazette.[5]

10. On the second question about regulating the constitutional duty and power of the Election Commission as to conducting the election, by a law enacted by the Parliament, we could not lay our hands on any judgment of this Court that has specifically taken up and dealt with this question. It, therefore, requires us to make a thorough examination of the operational scheme of the constitutional provisions contained in Part VIII of the Constitution on the subject of "Elections", as we can correctly understand the meaning and scope of a particular provision on the subject of "Elections" only when we read this Part of the Constitution as an integrated whole.

11. Part VIII of the Constitution is divided into two Chapters and contains fifteen Articles (213-226). Chapter I, comprised of Articles 213 to 221, mainly contains the provisions on the matters of the constitution of the Election Commission, the appointment of the Chief Election Commissioner and four members of the Election Commission, the term of their office, the procedure for their removal from office, the appointment of the officers and staff of the Commission, and duties of the Election Commission. While the core matters relating to the subject of "Election" that have been provided for in Chapter II (Articles 222 to 226) are the enactment of electoral laws by the Parliament, the time of general election and bye-election, the appointment of the care-taker Cabinet, and the establishment of special tribunals for resolution of election disputes by law enacted by the Parliament.

12. 'Broadly speaking, before an election machinery can be brought into operation, there are three requisites', as said by Justice Fazal Ali, 'which require to be attended to, namely, (1) there should be a set of laws and rules making provisions with respect to all matters relating to, or in connection with, elections, and it should be decided as to how these laws and rules are to be made; (2) there should be an executive charged with the duty of securing the due conduct of elections; and (3) there should be a judicial tribunal to deal with disputes arising out of or in connection with elections.'[6] On reading the provisions of Part VIII of the Constitution, we can say that, in general, Article 222 of the Constitution deals with the first of these requisites, Articles 218 and 219 with the second, and Article 225 with the third requisite.

13. The most relevant provision of Article 222, in our view, to the question being considered is that of clause (d) thereof, which is reproduced here for ready reference:

222. Electoral laws.

Subject to the Constitution, Majlis-e-Shoora (Parliament) may by law provide for:

(a) .....

(b) .....

(c) .....

(d) the conduct of elections and election petitions; the decision of doubts and disputes arising in connection with elections;

(e) .....

but no such law shall have the effect of taking away or abridging any of the powers of the Commissioner or the Election Commission under this Part.

The reading of clause (d) of Article 222 of the Constitution makes it clear that the Parliament can enact a law that regulates the conduct of elections and such law would consequentially also regulate the constitutional duty and power of the Election Commission to conduct the election. The confusion as to the scope of the general power of the Election Commission under Article 218(3) is, however, caused by the latter part of Article 222 which says that "no such law shall have the effect of taking away or abridging any of the powers of the Commissioner or the Election Commission under this Part". Although Article 218, as well as Article 219 of the Constitution which list out the functions of the Election Commission, uses the term "duty" for the Election Commission in relation to the conduct of the election, and the word "powers" or "power" has at no other place been expressly used in Part VIII of the Constitution for the Election Commission, we find no difficulty in construing that the "powers" referred to in Article 222 are those "duties" and "functions" the performance of which has specifically been entrusted to the Election Commission under this Part of the Constitution. For, in legal parlance, the words "power", "duty" and "function" are often used interchangeably, and the use of any one of these words is ordinarily understood to include the others, such as the word "function" is said to include "power" and "duty"[7]. The latter part of Article 222, therefore, operates against the taking away or abridging any of the "duties" and "functions" of the Election Commission that has been entrusted to the Election Commission under Part VIII of the Constitution. The Parliament cannot, by enacting a law, confer any of such duties and functions of the Election Commission to any other executive or judicial authority or office,[8] either entirely or partly. This is what, in our view, is meant by the latter part of Article 222.

14. So far as the general power of the Election Commission under Article 218(3) is concerned, the expression "and in accordance with law" used in that very Article clearly suggests that it is to be exercised to ensure that the election is conducted in accordance with the law enacted by the Parliament, and not in suppression thereof. The Election Commission, thus, cannot exercise its general power in a manner that would make the conduct of election otherwise than in accordance with the law enacted by the Parliament, that is, in violation or breach of such law. Therefore, a law enacted by the Parliament that regulates the conduct of elections and consequentially the constitutional duty and power of the Election Commission to conduct the election, is not hit by the provisions of the latter part of Article 222 of the Constitution; as the requirement for the Election Commission to conduct the election "in accordance with law" while performing its constitutional duty has been prescribed by the Constitution itself, not by a law enacted by the Parliament.

15. However, where the law enacted by the Parliament does not cover an unforeseen matter or issue that may arise during the election process, the Election Commission is to exercise its general power under Article 218(3) of the Constitution, in the same manner as all other discretionary powers are exercised, that is, fairly, reasonably and judiciously in accordance with the principles of equity, justice and good conscience. While exercising its general power in such a situation, the Election Commission must remember the fundamental principle that the general, plenary and inherent powers are exercised to supplement, not supplant or supersede, the law. Such powers cannot be exercised to defeat the express provisions of law but are invoked only when there is no specific provision of law on the matter or issue that needs to be dealt with.[9]

16. Accepting the contention that the Election Commission has such general and inherent power under Article 218(3) of the Constitution which is absolute or superior to the law enacted by the Parliament, would be tantamount to going against the constitutional mandate of the rule of law ensured under Article 4 of the Constitution. Article 4 of the Constitution declares it firmly that to enjoy the protection of law and to be treated in accordance with law is the inalienable right of every citizen, wherever he may be, and of every other person for the time being within Pakistan. Given this constitutional mandate, in the matter of elections, the right of the citizens to vote[10] and contest elections[11] cannot be entirely left to be dealt with at the discretion of the Election Commission under its general and inherent power by construing such power to be above the law enacted by the Parliament.

17. Article 4 of the Constitution is the bedrock of the rule of law, and an antithesis to the rule of men, in our country. It is a restraint on the executive and judicial organs of the State to abide by the rule of law.[12] No person, authority, tribunal or court exercising executive or judicial powers can take any action against any person in contravention of the law. This principle equally applies to this Court in exercising its general and inherent power under Article 187(1) of the Constitution. Under this Article, the Court can issue any direction, order or decree to do complete justice between the parties in any case or matter pending before it, but cannot pass an order in contravention of any of the fundamental rights or any constitutional provision or any relevant statutory law.[13]

18. Thus, we can safely conclude on the question of the status of the general power of the Election Commission under Article 218(3) of the Constitution vis- -vis a law enacted by the Parliament, that this power operates in the area uncovered by such law.[14] Alike is the scope and applicability of the powers of the Election Commission under Section 8(c) of the Elections Act, which is also evident from the opening words of Section 8, "Save as otherwise provided". These words indicate that if something otherwise is provided in the Elections Act, then this Section will not apply.[15] Further, the amplitude of the power of the Election Commission under this Section, like its general power under Article 218(3), is extended to the performance of its executive duty to "conduct the election" and thus it can be exercised only at any stage of the election process,[16] not after the completion thereof.

19. In other words, we can say, the general power under Article 218(3) of the Constitution and Section 8(c) of the Elections Act can be exercised by the Election Commission within two parameters: (i) during the election process, which starts with the issuance of the election programme and culminates with the publication of the name of the returned candidates in the official gazette, and (ii) when there is no express provision in the law enacted by the Parliament to deal with the matter or issue that arises during the performance of constitutional duty of conducting the elections honestly, justly, fairly and in accordance with law.[17]

Applicability of Article 218(3) of the Constitution and Section 8(c) of the Elections Act to the present case

20. In the present case, the Election Commission passed the impugned order after the consolidation of the final result of the poll by the Returning Officer under Section 95 and the publication of the name of the appellant as a returned candidate in the official gazette under Section 98 of the Elections Act, when the election process has been completed. But as the notification of the appellant as a returned candidate had been issued under the interim order of this Court, the same could not have concluded the election process to create a bar on the exercise of its general power by the Election Commission under Article 218(3) of the Constitution read with Section 8(c) of the Elections Act. The objection that the Election Commission exercised its power in the present case after the completion of the election process is, therefore, not sustainable.

21. The second limitation on the exercise of its general power by the Election Commission under Article 218(3) of the Constitution read with Section 8(c) of the Elections Act is, however, found attracted. The matter of directing a re-poll or a fresh poll by the Election Commission in the process of conducting the election has expressly been dealt with in the Elections Act. There are three provisions in the Elections Act that deal with this matter in relation to the duty and power of the Election Commission to "conduct the election", which are Sections 9, 88 and 121 of the Elections Act.[18] As the matter of directing a re-poll by the Election Commission in the process of conducting the election has expressly been dealt with in the Elections Act, the Election Commission was not justified to invoke and exercise its general power under Article 218(3) read with Section 8(c) of the Elections Act in the present matter.

22. However, we are cognizant of the well-settled legal position that the mentioning of a wrong or inapplicable provision of law or non-mentioning of the applicable provision of law while exercising a jurisdiction or a power which is otherwise vested in a court, tribunal or authority, does not by itself have fatal consequences.[19] Therefore, we proceed to examine whether the impugned order could have been passed by the Election Commission under Section 9 or 88 of the Elections Act and can be sustained under any of these provisions of the law.[20]

Scope of Section 88 of the Elections Act and its applicability to the present case

23. We shall discuss the scope and applicability of Section 9 later. First, we consider the provisions of Section 88, which are reproduced here for ease of reference:

88. Stopping of the poll.---(1) The Presiding Officer shall stop the poll and inform the Returning Officer that he has done so if-

(a) the poll at the polling station is, at any time, so interrupted or obstructed for reasons beyond the control of the Presiding Officer that it cannot be resumed during the polling hours fixed under section 70; and

(b) any ballot box used at the polling station is unlawfully taken out of the custody of the Presiding Officer, or is accidentally or intentionally destroyed, or is lost or is damaged or tampered with to such an extent that the result of the poll at the polling station cannot be ascertained.

(2) Where a poll has been stopped under subsection (1), the Returning Officer shall immediately report the circumstances to the Commission and the Commission shall direct a fresh poll at that polling station unless it is satisfied that the result of the election has been determined by the polling that has already taken place at that polling station, along with the result of the polling at other polling stations in the same constituency.

(3) .....

(4) .....

A reading of Section 88 shows that the tampering with the ballot box referred to therein relates to the polling day, not thereafter. Secondly, the power of the Election Commission to direct a fresh poll at the relevant polling station is not to be exercised if the Election Commission is satisfied that the result of the election has been determined by the polling that has already taken place at that polling station (before stopping the poll by the Presiding Officer), along with the result of the polling at other polling stations in the same constituency.

24. In the present case, as per the report of the Returning Officer as well as the report of the Inquiry Committee constituted by the Election Commission, the tampering with the election record had taken place not on the polling day, rather it was made after the consolidation of the final result of the poll by the Returning Officer under Section 95 of the Elections Act. The impugned order passed by the Election Commission can, therefore, not sustain within the scope of the provisions of Section 88 of the Elections Act.

Scope of Section 9 of the Elections Act and its applicability to the present case

25. The scope of Section 9 of the Elections Act as well as that of its predecessor provision, that is, Section 103AA of the Representation of People Act 1976, has been a subject of detailed discussion by this Court in several cases. We would, therefore, refer to its scope here succinctly. Before doing that, we think, it would be appropriate to cite the relevant part of Section 9 here, for ease of reference:

9. Power of the Commission to declare a poll void.---(1) Notwithstanding anything contained in this Act, if, from facts apparent on the face of the record and after such enquiry as it may deem necessary, the Commission is satisfied that by reason of grave illegalities or such violations of the provisions of this Act or the Rules as have materially affected the result of the poll at one or more polling stations or in the whole constituency including implementation of an agreement restraining women from casting their votes, it shall make a declaration accordingly and call upon the voters in the concerned polling station or stations or in the whole constituency as the case may be, to recast their votes in the manner provided for bye-elections.

Explanation

(3) Notwithstanding the publication of the name of a returned candidate under section 98, the Commission may exercise the powers conferred on it by subsection (1) before the expiration of sixty days after such publication; and, where the Commission does not finally dispose of a case within the said period, the election of the returned candidate shall be deemed to have become final, subject to the decision of an Election Tribunal on an election petition, if any.

(4) While exercising the powers conferred on it by subsection (1), the Commission shall be deemed to be an Election Tribunal to which an election petition has been presented and shall, notwithstanding anything contained in Chapter IX, regulate its own procedure.

(5) Any person aggrieved by a declaration of the Commission under this section may, within thirty days of the declaration, prefer an appeal to the Supreme Court.

The opening expression used in Section 9(1), "Notwithstanding anything contained in this Act", shows that the jurisdiction of the Election Commission under this Section has an overriding effect against any other provision of the Elections Act. Thus, the Election Commission is competent to exercise its jurisdiction under this Section, notwithstanding the availability of the remedy of the election petition under Section 139 read with Section 142 and the jurisdiction of the Election Tribunal to grant the same relief under Section 154(1)(b)(i) of the Elections Act. To the extent of the grounds specified in Section 9(1) upon which the Election Commission can exercise its power to order a re-poll, the jurisdiction of the Election Commission and the Election Tribunal is, therefore, concurrent.[21] The Election Commission can exercise its jurisdiction under Section 9(1) of the Elections Act, to order a re-poll if:

i. There have been grave illegalities or violations of the provisions of the Elections Act or the Rules made thereunder;

ii. Such illegalities or violations are evident from facts apparent on the face of the record; and

iii. Such illegalities or violations have materially affected the result of the poll at one or more polling stations or in the whole constituency.

Although the ground of grave illegalities or violations of the provisions of the Elections Act or the Rules made thereunder in the election process is common for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions by the Election Commission and the Election Tribunal, the difference lies in the nature of proof of those illegalities and violations, and in the scope of enquiry.

26. The words "from facts apparent on the face of the record" used in Section 9(1) are of vital importance in this regard. They restrict the jurisdiction of the Election Commission to such grave illegalities or violations of the Elections Act or the Rules which are evident "from the facts apparent on the face of the record". The Election Commission can, therefore, exercise its jurisdiction under Section 9(1) only when the allegation or issue of grave illegalities or violations of the Elections Act does not require a full-fledged trial and recording of pro and contra evidence of the contesting parties,[22] which can only be undertaken by the Election Tribunal.[23]

27. We are aware of the power of the Election Commission, under Section 9(1) of the Elections Act, to conduct such enquiry as it may deem necessary for its satisfaction about the alleged grave illegalities or violations, in addition to the "facts apparent on the face of the record", but before initiating such inquiry by the Election Commission the facts apparent on the face of the record must prima facie indicate the commission of some grave illegality or violation of the Elections Act or the Rules made thereunder, during the election process.[24] The Election Commission cannot initiate a roving enquiry to search for some illegalities or violations, on bald and vague allegations unsupported by prima facie proof, in the exercise of its jurisdiction under Section 9(1) of the Elections Act.

28. Further, the enquiry which the Election Commission can conduct under this Section can only be of a summary nature, notwithstanding the omission of the word "summary" in Section 9(1),[25] as the Election Commission can make an order for re-poll under this Section before the expiration of sixty days after publication of the name of the returned candidate under Section 98 of the Elections Act, not thereafter. Where the Election Commission does not finally dispose of a case initiated under Section 9(1) within the said period, the proceedings stand abated and the election of the returned candidate is deemed to have become final, subject to the decision of the Election Tribunal on the election petition, if any, as per section 9(3) of the Elections Act. Moreover, as the dismissal of a petition or the abatement of proceedings of a case under Section 9 by the Election Commission does not bar the re-agitation before and trial by the Election Tribunal, of the same grounds of grave illegalities or violations of the Elections Act or the Rules made thereunder,[26] the legislature cannot be presumed to have intended two full-fledged trials of the same issue before both forums: the Election Commission and the Election Tribunal. Therefore, we are of the opinion that the enquiry to be conducted by the Election Commission under Section 9(1) can only be of a summary nature, notwithstanding the omission of the word "summary" in this Section.

29. The second restriction on the exercise of power under Section 9(1) by the Election Commission is that by reason of the grave illegalities or violation of the provisions of the Elections Act or the Rules, the result of the poll at one or more polling stations or in the whole constituency must have been materially affected. Any illegality or violation which does not relate to holding and conducting the poll in the election process, and has thus not affected the result of the poll, cannot form the basis for invoking and exercising the power under Section 9(1) by the Election Commission. The grave illegalities or violations must be such that have materially affected the result of the poll.[27] Although such illegalities or violations may have been committed at any stage of the election process, but not later than the final consolidation of the result of the poll by the Returning Officer under Section 95 of the Elections Act; as any illegality or violation committed after the consolidation of the final result by the Returning Officer cannot be said to have materially affected the result of the poll. It, therefore, does not fall within the scope of the provisions of Section 9(1) of the Elections Act and cannot be a subject of enquiry by the Election Commission to exercise jurisdiction under this Section.

30. Needless to mention that any fact-finding enquiry or departmental regular enquiry may be got conducted by the Election Commission, in the matter of any illegality or violation committed after the consolidation of the final result to take appropriate administrative or criminal action against the delinquent election officials, but not for an action under Section 9(1) of the Elections Act.

31. In the present case, the bar of exercising the powers by the Election Commission before the expiration of sixty days after publication of the name of the appellant as a returned candidate under Section 98 of the Elections Act, was not attracted as the said publication had been made under an interim order of this Court. However, as the illegality of tampering with the election record had been committed, in the present case, after the consolidation of the final result of the poll by the Returning Officer under Section 95 of the Elections Act, the Elections Commission could not have invoked and exercised its power under Section 9(1) of the Elections Act; for such illegality had not affected the result of the poll already consolidated by the Returning Officer under Section 95 of the Elections Act. Further, the fact that who, the appellant or the respondent, was responsible for the tampering made with the election record after the consolidation of the final result of the poll, could not have been decided, nor has it been decided, by the Election Commission within the scope of summary enquiry under Section 9(1) of the Elections Act. This fact could only have been decided by the Election Tribunal in a full-fledged trial. Without deciding that fact, ordering a re-poll in 20 polling stations is tantamount to punishing the appellant without determining his fault, and awarding the suspected culprit, if he were the respondent.[28] In such an uncertain situation, the Election Commission should not have vitiated the official acts of the election officials, which were the counting of votes and the consolidation of the final result of the poll, as they had a presumption of regular performance as per Article 129(e) of the Qanun-e-Shahadat 1984. The impugned order is, therefore, not sustainable under Section 9(1) of the Elections Act.

Conclusion

32. For all that has been discussed and said above, we conclude that the Election Commission had no power to order a re-poll in the 20 polling stations, under Article 218(3) of the Constitution read with Section 8(c) or Section 9(1) of the Elections Act, on the ground of tampering made with the election record after the consolidation of the final result of the poll by the Returning Officer under Section 95 of the Elections Act. The impugned order of the Election Commission is not sustainable and is liable to be set aside by this Court in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction under Section 9(5) of the Elections Act. Needless to restate the well-settled principle that if a court, tribunal or authority not having jurisdiction wrongly assumes and exercises such a jurisdiction and makes an order without jurisdiction, an appeal lies from that order in the same manner as an appeal lies from an order with jurisdiction.[29] The appeal of the appellant is, therefore, allowed and the impugned order is set aside. Consequentially, the superstructure built upon the impugned order also crumbles and falls down. The re-poll held in pursuance of the impugned order and the subsequent notification of the respondent as a returned candidate are quashed. The respondent shall be de-notified, while the appellant re-notified, as a returned candidate.

33. The Islamabad High Court rightly dismissed the writ petition of the appellant, on the ground of the availability of the adequate statutory remedy of appeal before this Court. The petition for leave to appeal of the appellant filed against the order of the Islamabad High Court is meritless and is therefore dismissed; it was mistakenly mentioned as allowed in the short order, which shall stand corrected accordingly.

MWA/Z-9/SC Order accordingly.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---The petitioners seek leave to appeal against a consolidated judgment of the Lahore High Court, dated 02.2.2021 ("impugned judgment") whereby the High Court, while accepting the writ petitions of the respondents, has set aside the notifications issued in respect of the acquisition of land owned by the respondents and others.

2. Briefly, the facts of the case are that the Executive Engineer, Small Dams Division, Islamabad requested for acquisition of land in District Rawalpindi for the construction of the Dadhocha Dam ("the Dam"). A preliminary notification under Section 4(1) of the Land Acquisition Act of 1894 ("Act") was issued on 02.11.2010, published in the official Gazette on 03.11.2010, for acquiring land measuring 7977- Kanals 10-Marlas in Tehsil Rawalpindi, District Rawalpindi ("Preliminary Notification"). After publication of the Preliminary Notification, the District Price Assessment Committee, Rawalpindi ("DPAC"), in its meeting held on 17.9.2011, approved the estimated cost of the land to be acquired by fixing the market value of the land to be between Rs.60,000/- to Rs.1,00,000/- per Kanal. For various reasons, no further steps were taken by the petitioners in relation to the acquisition up till the issuance of an addendum to the Preliminary Notification on 12.3.2020, published in the official Gazette on 13.3.2020, whereby the land to be acquired in Tehsil Rawalpindi was increased from 7977-Kanals 10-Marlas to 14720-Kanals 17-Marlas ("Addendum Notification"). A meeting of the DPAC was held again on 20.3.2020 to consider the price of the land and it approved the same valuation as had already been approved by the DPAC in 2011. Subsequently, a notification under Sections 17(4) and 6 of the Act was issued on 21.4.2020, published in the official Gazette on 24.4.2020, whereby urgency was invoked to expedite the process of acquisition of the land, and the provisions of Sections 5 and 5-A of the Act were held not to be applicable ("Urgency Notification").

3. The respondents challenged the acquisition proceedings, the above notifications and the acts taken thereunder, by filing writ petitions. Meanwhile, the award was announced on 13.8.2020 ("Award") on the basis of the same valuation of land as determined by the DPAC in 2011, and endorsed in 2020, thereby, concluding the acquisition proceedings after nearly 10 years. The writ petitions were allowed by the High Court through the impugned judgment and the notifications were set aside; however, the petitioners were set at liberty to initiate fresh proceedings for acquisition of the land for construction of the Dam by way of issuing a new notification under Section 4 of the Act. Hence, the petitioners have filed the present petitions seeking leave to appeal from the said impugned judgment.

4. The learned counsel for the petitioners has argued that preliminary notifications under Section 4 of the Act were issued in the year 2010 to acquire (i) land measuring 7977-Kanals 10-Marlas in Tehsil Rawalpindi, (ii) land measuring 170-Kanals 11-Marlas in Tehsil Kahuta and (iii) land measuring 10418-Kanals 05-Marlas in Tehsil Kallar Syedan, of District Rawalpindi; that the acquisition proceedings could not proceed further due to certain disputes as to the construction of the Dam at the proposed location; that after resolution of those disputes, land measuring 10418-Kanals 05-Marlas of Tehsil Kallar Syedan notified in 2010 was reduced to 1820-Kanals 15-Marlas and in lieu of the said land, through the Addendum Notification issued in 2020, acquisition of land in Tehsil Rawalpindi was increased from 7977-Kanals 10-Marlas to 14720-Kanals 17-Marlas for construction of the Dam; and that the value of the land was assessed according to the market value prevailing at the time of issuance of the Preliminary Notification as per Section 23 of the Act, and the Award was then passed after fulfilling all the legal formalities.

5. While explaining the delay in the proceedings, he has submitted that pursuant to the issuance of the Preliminary Notification, the Defence Housing Authority ("DHA") approached the Government of Punjab with a request to shift the site for the construction of the Dam about 06 kilometers upstream. The Government of Punjab constituted a Committee on 04.2.2011 to consider the request, which recommended the original site of the Dam. The Government of Punjab then constituted another Committee to give a fresh recommendation vis--vis the feasibility of the site for construction of the Dam, which also recommended the original site. The matter then ended up before this Court and was finally disposed of vide order dated 30.4.2019 passed in Civil Review Petition No. 742 of 2015, whereafter further steps under the Act were taken to conclude the acquisition proceedings as expeditiously as possible by invoking the urgency provisions of the Act.

6. On the other hand, the learned counsel for the respondents (landowners) has supported the impugned judgment. He has contended that after the issuance of the Preliminary Notification, the petitioners went into deep slumber and no further steps were taken for acquisition of the land; and that after a lapse of more than 09 years, instead of initiating fresh acquisition proceedings, the petitioners issued the Addendum Notification in order to deprive the respondents and other landowners of fair compensation in view of the escalation in prices of the land during the said period, therefore, the High Court has rightly declared the notifications as redundant and illegal.

7. We have considered the respective contentions of the learned counsel for the parties and have examined the record of the case with their able assistance. It appears that the High Court has set aside the acquisition proceedings due to the inordinate delay in the issuance of the Addendum Notification. Therefore, the present case requires determination on the following questions:

(i) Whether the District Collector had the lawful authority to issue the Addendum Notification and if he had such authority, whether such authority has been exercised in a proper and legal manner under the law; and

(ii) What is the legal effect of the issuance of the Addendum Notification on the acquisition proceedings, particularly on the determination of compensation?

We shall take up and decide the above questions in seriatim.

Authority to issue the Addendum Notification and its exercise

8. The Act neither provides for nor prohibits issuance of an addendum to a notification already issued under Section 4 of the Act. However, as per Section 20 of the Punjab General Clauses Act 1956 ("1956 Act"); where a power to issue a notification is conferred under an Act, then that power includes a power, exercisable in the like manner and subject to the like sanctions and conditions (if any), to add to, amend, vary or rescind any such notification so issued. A similar provision is also contained in Section 21 of the [Federal] General Clauses Act 1897. Therefore, in the absence of any provision in the Act that either expressly or by necessary implication prohibits the issuance of an addendum to a notification issued under Section 4, the District Collector is found to have the lawful authority, by virtue of Section 20 of the 1956 Act, to issue an addendum to the notification issued under Section 4 of the Act, as in the instant case, provided it was issued in the like manner and subject to the like sanctions and conditions under Section 4 of the Act.

9. Section 4 of the Act does not provide for any time limit for issuance of a notification under the said provision and stipulates that 'whenever' it appears to the Collector that land in a locality is needed or likely needed for public purpose or for a company, a notification to that effect shall be published in the official Gazette. The term 'whenever' denotes that a notification under Section 4 of the Act in the first instance will be issued whenever the land is needed or likely to be needed for a public purpose or a company and therefore, complete discretion is extended to the Collector with regards to when it is required whereupon the notification shall be issued. However, the same connotation cannot be extended to the said term when an addendum or corrigendum is issued by the Collector, by exercising powers under Section 20 of the 1956 Act, in relation to the said notification. Such an interpretation would amount to conferring unlimited and unfettered powers to the Government to finalize/ conclude the acquisition proceedings which would result in uncertainty as to whether the land would be acquired or not and therefore, would be against the spirit of Article 23 of the Constitution[1] that provides for the fundamental right of citizens to acquire, hold and dispose of property. Therefore, for the purpose of issuing any such notification to add to, amend or vary a notification already issued under Section 4 of the Act, it is necessary to interpret the term 'whenever' appearing in Section 4, being a condition stipulated under the said provision while exercising the powers conferred under Section 20 of the 1956 Act.

10. It is settled law that when a statute is silent about limitation, a reasonable time limit is to be supplied by the Courts.[2] In Mehraj[3] this Court interpreted the phrase 'at any time' appearing in Section 5 of the Act to mean 'within a reasonable time' and even though reasonable time was not definitively dealt with by providing a time limit, it was held that it would be determined according to the facts and circumstances of the case. Notably, the issuance of a notification under Section 5, after a notification under Section 4 is issued, is continuation of the acquisition proceedings, similarly, an addendum or a corrigendum to the notification under Section 4 of the Act is also furtherance of the acquisition proceedings. The term 'whenever'[4] appearing in Section 4 of the Act is also synonymous to 'at any time' appearing under Section 5. Therefore, the same interpretation is to be extended to 'whenever' appearing in Section 4 of the Act when an addendum or corrigendum is issued in relation thereto.[5] Hence, where any notification is issued to amend, vary or add to the earlier notification issued under Section 4 of the Act, the same is to be issued within a reasonable time which shall be determined according to the specific facts and circumstances of the case.

11. However, it must be noted that an addendum or corrigendum to a notification under Section 4 cannot be issued after a notification under Section 5 or Section 17(4) of the Act has been issued pursuant to the said notification under Section 4, though fresh acquisition proceedings can be initiated by issuing a fresh notification under Section 4 of the Act if some more land is needed or likely to be needed later for the same purpose. This is because the next step after the issuance of a notification under Section 4 in an acquisition proceeding, as shall be explained later herein, is either to issue a notification under Section 5 in the ordinary acquisition process or to issue a notification under Section 17(4) for urgent acquisition of the land. After the issuance of a notification either under Section 5 or under Section 17(4), the same acquisition proceeding cannot revert to the initial stage of issuing a premilinary notification under Section 4 of the Act. An addendum or corrigendum to a notification under Section 4 can thus only be issued before the next step in the acquisition process is undertaken i.e. before the issuance of a notification under Section 5 or under Section 17(4) of the Act.

12. Coming to the instant case, in the normal course of acquisition such an inordinate delay in issuing the Addendum Notification, as has occurred in the present case, could not have been sustained. However, in the instant case, after the Preliminary Notification was issued and the request for shifting the Dam to an alternate location was rejected, the matter then ended up before this Court and was finally disposed of vide order dated 30.4.2019 passed in Civil Review Petition No. 742 of 2015 with the outcome that the Dam will be built on the original site. In these circumstances, the acquisition proceedings could not have continued while the matter was under adjudication and there was uncertainty as to the site of the Dam. The Addendum Notification was then subsequently issued after the matter was conclusively disposed of by this Court. No further steps in the acquisition proceedings had been taken between the issuance of the Preliminary Notification and the issuance of the Addendum Notification, therefore, the matter was still in the initial preliminary notification stage under Section 4 of the Act. If the next step in the acquisition proceedings, through the issuance of a notification under Section 5 or Section 17(4), had been taken after the issuance of the Preliminary Notification, then the Addendum Notification to the Preliminary Notification under Section 4 of the Act could not have been issued or sustained. This is because once steps are taken to advance the acquisition proceedings to the next stage, they cannot be reverted to the previous stage, though fresh acquisition proceedings can be initiated by issuing a fresh notification under Section 4 of the Act if more land is needed or likely to be needed for the same purpose later, as stated above. Therefore, in the said circumstances, the Addendum Notification was issued within a reasonable time and cannot be set aside being based on mala fide. The Collector is, therefore, found to have exercised his legal authority to issue the Addendum Notification to the Preliminary Notification in a proper and legal manner under the law, in the circumstances of the case. Invoking urgency through the subsequent Urgency Notification is also found to be a reasonable decision in view of the delay already occurred due to the prolonged litigation regarding the location of the Dam and the urgent need of building dams in Pakistan.

The legal effect of issuance of an addendum notification on the acquisition proceedings.

13. Moving on to the second question, we are of the view that in order to ascertain the legal effect of the Addendum Notification on the subsequent acquisition proceedings, particularly on the determination of compensation, it is necessary to understand the significance of the notification under Section 4 of the Act in terms of the land notified thereunder. Section 4 of the Act provides for the initiation of the acquisition process through publication of a preliminary notification in the official Gazette, notifying the land that is needed or likely to be needed for any public purpose or for a company. Thereafter, either of two routes (normal or urgent) leading up to a declaration under Section 6 can be adopted, which, as per Section 6(3), is conclusive evidence that the land is needed for a public purpose, or for a company, and the Commissioner can then acquire the land in the manner provided thereafter in the Act.

14. Firstly, after a certain land in a locality is notified through a notification under Section 4 of the Act, following the normal route the Commissioner issues a notification under Section 5 specifying the particular land of that locality to be acquired as included in the locality already notified under Section 4. Thereafter, under Section 5-A, any persons interested in that land can file objections to its acquisition before the Collector within 30 days after the issuance of the notification under Section 5. Under subsection (2) of Section 5-A, the Collector is to provide an opportunity of hearing to any such objector and after making such further inquiry, if any, as he thinks necessary, he is to submit the case for decision of the Commissioner, together with the record of the proceedings held by him and a report containing his recommendations on the objections. When the Commissioner is satisfied, after considering the report, if any, made by the Collector under subsection (2) of Section 5-A, that any land is needed for a public purpose, or for a company, he makes a declaration to this effect under Section 6 of the Act, which declaration is then published in the official Gazette. Notably, Section 6(4) of the Act also stipulates that where the area of the land in the said declaration is less than the area of land previously notified under Section 4, then such previous notification, so far as it relates to the excess area, shall be deemed to have been superseded by the said declaration. Thus, a notification under Section 5 can only be issued in relation to the land that has been previously notified under Section 4, and it also appears that a final declaration under Section 6 can also be issued only with regards to the land that has been previously notified under Section 4 of the Act.

15. The urgent route is adopted through the issuance of a notification under Section 17(4) of the Act. Under this Section, the Commissioner can dispense with the applicability of the provisions of Sections 5 and 5-A if he is of the opinion that the land is urgently required and can make a final declaration under Section 6 at any time after the publication of the notification under Section 4. This also makes it apparent that where a notification under Section 17(4) is issued, it shall be with regards to the land already notified under Section 4, after which a formal declaration can be issued under Section 6 of the Act at any time.

16. In view of the above, it is evident that the acquisition process cannot be initiated, formalized and then concluded unless a notification under Section 4 of the Act notifying the complete and final land to be acquired is issued. Hence, it follows that the date of the notification issued under Section 4 will not necessarily be the date of the first notification issued under the said provision, instead, it will be whenever the complete and final land is notified. In instances where addendums or corrigenda to a notification under Section 4 are issued, the indicator of the finality of the land notified would be when, after the issuance of an addendum or corrigendum, the public functionaries move forward with the acquisition proceedings by either issuing a notification under Section 5 or under Section 17(4) of the Act. Therefore, the date of the last addendum or corrigendum issued in relation to the notification under Section 4 of the Act before any step is taken to advance the acquisition proceedings to the next stage, is deemed to be the date of the notification under Section 4 of the Act for the purposes of the acquisition proceedings under the Act. This is because the complete land under the said provision becomes finally notified through the addendum or corrigendum and, after this, the state functionaries take the next step in the acquisition proceedings.

17. In the instant case, the Collector issued the Addendum Notification to the Preliminary Notification by adding land to be acquired in addition to the land already notified under the latter notification, thereby, notifying the complete and final land that is needed or likely to be needed for the construction of the Dam. Thereafter, the next step in the process of acquisition was undertaken through the issuance of the Urgency Notification under Section 17(4) of the Act. No further steps to take the acquisition proceedings to the next stage had been taken after the issuance of the Preliminary Notification and before the issuance of the Addendum Notification. Therefore, the Addendum Notification did not have the effect of reverting the acquisition proceedings to the previous stage, in which case, the Addendum Notification could not have been sustained and fresh acquisition proceedings through the issuance of a fresh preliminary notification under Section 4 of the Act would have had to be initiated to acquire the land added through the Addendum Notification. Hence, in the present case, with the issuance of the Addendum Notification, the notification issued under Section 4 became final and complete in terms of the land notified thereunder. Therefore, the date of issuance of the Addendum Notification shall be taken as the date on which the notification under Section 4 of the Act is deemed to have been issued.

18. Consequently, the issuance of an addendum notification would also affect the date of the publication of the notification under Section 4 that is referred to in Section 23(1) of the Act. The provisions of Section 23(1) of the Act prescribe that in determining the amount of compensation to be awarded for the land acquired, the market value of the acquired land at the date of the publication of the notification under Section 4 shall be taken into consideration. Since a notification under Section 4 becomes complete on the date when the complete and final land is notified thereunder, it is the date of the publication of the addendum or the corrigendum, or the last addendum or corrigendum if there are more than one, by virtue of which the complete land is finally notified, that is to be taken as the date of the publication of the notification under Section 4 referred to in Section 23(1) of the Act for the purposes of considering the market value of the acquired land while determining compensation.

19. Depriving a person of his/her property through acquisition by virtue of Article 24 of the Constitution is an exception to the fundamental right of every citizen to acquire, hold and dispose of property, as guaranteed under Article 23. By virtue of Article 24, the Constitution provides for a balance between the citizen's right to rehabilitate or resettle or acquire alternate land and the State's power of eminent domain, as it stipulates that along with such acquisition being only for a public purpose, it can only be undertaken under an authority of law that provides for compensation, which in this instance is the Act. The right to compensation under an authority of law has a Constitutional underpinning that is the protection given to the right to own property.[6] The main object of the Act, therefore, is to provide complete indemnity to the landowners and no property can be acquired without proper and adequate compensation[7] so that the opportunity to rehabilitate or resettle or acquire alternate land is not lost. Landowners are entitled to the maximum possible benefit in the circumstances of each case as such acquisition is not by way of mutual negotiations but under State power conferred on public functionaries.[8] The interpretation and applicability of the provisions of the Act must, therefore, be in consonance with the spirit of Articles 23 and 24 of the Constitution and the object of the Act, which require properly and adequately compensating landowners whose lands are being acquired thereunder.

20. Therefore, where a notification under Section 4 of the Act is subsequently amended, varied or added to through an addendum or corrigendum, the date of the publication of the initial notification under Section 4 cannot be taken as the material date for the purposes of considering the market value of the land for determining compensation under Section 23(1) of the Act. Such an interpretation would not only be against the Constitutional mandate by upsetting the balance the Constitution seeks to maintain through adequately and properly compensating the owners of the land that is being acquired, it would also be against the object of the Act to that effect. Instead, in such circumstances, the date of publication of the subsequent addendum or corrigendum, finally notifying the complete land under Section 4 of the Act, must be considered to determine the market value of the land for the purposes of compensation. As such, in the present case, the assessment of the market value of the land by the DPAC as on the date of the publication of the Preliminary Notification instead of the date of the publication of the Addendum Notification, cannot be sustained. The Award, having been announced on the basis of this legally wrong assessment, therefore, also becomes redundant and unsustainable.

Conclusion

21. In view of the above answers to the two questions of law, we find that though the Preliminary Notification, the Addendum Notification and the Urgency Notification were validly issued in the present case, the Award was not passed in accordance with law. We are cognizant of the legal position that interference on the matter of determination of fair compensation is not ordinarily warranted under the judicial review jurisdiction of the High Court under Article 199 of the Constitution and such matter is best decided by a civil court in its reference jurisdiction under Section 18 of the Act after recording the respective evidence of the parties. However, where the acquisition authorities under the Act have misdirected themselves on a point of law, which does not require any factual determination, the High Court must intervene to correct the legal error and set the course of law right. In the present case, it is an admitted position that the assessment of the market value of the acquired land was made by the DPAC as per the date of the Preliminary Notification instead of the date of the Addendum Notification, which was a clear legal error. The Award was made passed on the basis of the said legally wrong assessment, and thus suffered from the same legal error. The Award is thus found to have been passed without lawful authority and of no legal effect in terms of Article 199 (1) (a) (ii) of the Constitution.

22. Therefore, we convert these petitions into appeals and partly allow the same by holding that the Preliminary Notification, the Addendum Notification and the Urgency Notification were validly issued and shall remain operative. However, the Award is set aside with the direction to the petitioners to determine the compensation of the acquired land afresh, treating the date of the publication of the Addendum Notification as the date of the publication of the notification under Section 4 referred to in Section 23(1) of the Act, for assessing the market value of the acquired land. It goes without saying that while determining compensation and announcing the award afresh, other matters/factors prescribed under the law for determining the compensation, including the potential value of the land and the escalation in prices of the land from the date of the publication of the Addendum Notification to the date of announcing the new award, shall also be considered and taken into account.

(Against the order of Lahore High Court, Lahore, dated 16.03.2023, passed in Crl. Misc. No.3167-B of 2023).

(a) Criminal Procedure Code (V of 1898)---

----S. 497---Constitution of Pakistan, Articles 4, 9, 10A, 25 & 185(3)---Bail---Rule of consistency---Benchmark for applying the rule of consistency in granting bail to an accused stated.

The rule of consistency applied in bail matters is premised on the fundamental right to equality before the law guaranteed under Article 25 of the Constitution of Pakistan. This right to equality before the law ensures that persons similarly placed in similar circumstances are to be treated in the same manner. In other words, among equals the law should be equally administered; the like should be treated alike. Article 25 of the Constitution does not prohibit different treatment to persons who are not similarly placed or who are not in similar circumstances. To claim equality before the law an accused person must therefore show that he and his coaccused who has been granted bail are similarly placed in similar circumstances. In other words, he must show that the prosecution case, as a whole, against him is at par with that against his co-accused who has been granted bail, and not distinguishable in any substantial aspect. The rule of consistency is also pillared on Articles 4 and 10A of the Constitution ensuring that level playing field and fairness is maintained in adjudicating cases of co-accused. The right to liberty under Article 9 of the Constitution has to be extended fairly and without discrimination to an applicant seeking bail. The rule of consistency in bail matters is fundamental to ensuring fairness, reducing arbitrary decision-making, and maintaining public confidence in the criminal justice system. It's a key aspect of the rule of law, ensuring that all individuals are treated equally under the law.

Fida Hussain v. State PLD 2002 SC 46; Abdul Jalil v. N.W.F.P. Forest Development Corporation 2010 SCMR 1933 and Tariq Nawaz v. Government of Pakistan 2001 PLC (C.S.) 57 ref.

The rule of consistency in bail matters is attracted and applied after the grant of bail to a co-accused. Grant of bail by a court considers several factors like the contents of the FIR, the incriminating material collected by the police during investigation, the past history of the accused, etc. The grounds which form the basis for the grant of bail to a co-accused is thus the benchmark for grant of bail to the accused under the rule of consistency. The benchmark for applying the rule of consistency is not only the role attributed to the accused in the FIR but also the material collected in the investigation. Therefore, the court has to assess whether the role of the accused in the FIR, examined in the background of the material collected by the Police is the same as that of the co-accused, who has been granted bail. It is this congruence in the case of the co-accused and the accused that attracts the rule of consistency.

To decide upon the applicability of the rule of consistency for granting bail under Section 497(2), Cr.P.C., the courts have to examine the whole material available on the record of the case. Without doing so, it cannot be determined whether the accused who claims the benefit of this rule and his co-accused who has been granted bail are similarly placed in similar circumstances.

----S. 497(1)---Constitution of Pakistan, Art. 185(3)---Bail---Offences falling within the prohibitory clause of Section 497(1), Cr.P.C.---In the offences that fall within the prohibitory clause of Section 497,(1), Cr.P.C., the post-arrest bail is granted on three grounds: (i) under the first proviso to Section 497(1), Cr.P.C., on the ground of the accused being a minor, or a woman, or a sick or infirm person; (ii) under the third proviso to Section 497(1), Cr.P.C., on the ground of delay in the conclusion of the trial beyond the period prescribed for no fault of the accused; and (iii) under Section 497(2), Cr.P.C., on the ground that there are no reasonable grounds for believing that the accused has committed the offence, but rather there are sufficient grounds for further inquiry into his guilt.

----S. 497(1)---Constitution of Pakistan, Art. 185(3)---Bail---Whether or not there exist any "reasonable grounds" for believing that the accused has committed the alleged offence---For the determination of the question under Section 497(2), Cr.P.C., as to whether or not there exist any "reasonable grounds" for believing that the accused has committed the alleged offence, the courts have to appraise although tentatively the whole material available on the record of the case---This question cannot be determined by merely examining the contents of the FIR---Essentially, it is the tentative assessment of the evidence collected in the investigation both for and against the accused that is determinative of the said question.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---The petitioner seeks leave to appeal against an order of the Lahore High Court, dated 16.03.2023, whereby the post-arrest bail has been declined to him in case FIR No. 209/2021 registered at Police Station, Jinnah Road, District Gujranwala, for the offences punishable under Sections 302, 148 and 149 of the Pakistan Penal Code ("P.P.C.").

2. Briefly, as per the crime report (FIR), the allegation against the petitioner is that on 3 April 2021 at about 09:00 a.m., he and other accused persons, namely, Umar Farooq, Zain, Goga, Farooq, Khalid and one unknown person, committed the murder of Zain Ahmad, aged 20/21 years, and Qais Ahmad, aged 15/16 years, the sons of the complainant. In the investigation, the accused Farooq and Khalid were found not present on the spot at the time of occurrence. On this ground, they have been admitted to post-arrest bail by the courts below.

3. The learned counsel for the petitioner has argued that the role attributed to the present petitioner in the FIR is similar to that of the accused, Khalid and Farooq, who have been granted post-arrest bail; therefore, the petitioner is also entitled to the concession of bail on the basis of rule of consistency. On the other hand, the learned counsel for the State and the complainant have submitted that the rule of consistency does not apply to the petitioner as his case is distinguishable from that of those accused persons. Both sides have also relied upon several cases in support of their respective contentions.

4. We have considered the arguments of the learned counsel for the parties, read the cases cited by them and examined the record of the case.

5. From the respective contentions of the parties, the question of law that has arisen for our consideration is: what is the benchmark for applying the rule of consistency in granting bail to an accused? In other words, what is that has to be compared between the case of the accused and the co-accused in order to determine consistency for the purpose of determining the applicability of the rule of consistency in granting bail under Section 497(2) of the Code of Criminal Procedure ("Cr.P.C."); whether it is merely the role attributed to the accused and the co-accused in the FIR? or whether the role has to be assessed by compositely considering the FIR and the material collected during investigation by the Police?

6. The rule of consistency applied in bail matters is premised on the fundamental right to equality before the law guaranteed under Article 25 of the Constitution of Pakistan.[1] This right to equality before the law ensures that persons similarly placed in similar circumstances are to be treated in the same manner. In other words, among equals the law should be equally administered; the like should be treated alike.[2] Article 25 of the Constitution does not prohibit different treatment to persons who are not similarly placed or who are not in similar circumstances. To claim equality before the law an accused person must therefore show that he and his co-accused who has been granted bail are similarly placed in similar circumstances. In other words, he must show that the prosecution case, as a whole, against him is at par with that against his co-accused who has been granted bail, and not distinguishable in any substantial aspect. The rule of consistency is also pillared on Articles 4 and 10A of the Constitution ensuring that level playing field and fairness is maintained in adjudicating cases of co-accused. The right to liberty under Article 9 of the Constitution has to be extended fairly and without discrimination to an applicant seeking bail. The rule of consistency in bail matters is fundamental to ensuring fairness, reducing arbitrary decision-making, and maintaining public confidence in the criminal justice system. It's a key aspect of the rule of law, ensuring that all individuals are treated equally under the law.

7. The rule of consistency in bail matters is attracted and applied after the grant of bail to a co-accused. Grant of bail by a court considers several factors like the contents of the FIR, the incriminating material collected by the police during investigation, the past history of the accused, etc. The grounds which form the basis for the grant of bail to a co-accused is thus the benchmark for grant of bail to the accused under the rule of consistency. Therefore, the court has to assess whether the role of the accused in the FIR, examined in the background of the material collected by the Police is the same as that of the co-accused, who has been granted bail. It is this congruence in the case of the co-accused and the accused that attracts the rule of consistency.

8. The offence of Qatl-i -Amd (intentional murder) involved in the present case, being punishable with death or imprisonment for life under Section 302, P.P.C., falls within the prohibitory clause of Section 497(1), Cr.P.C. In the offences that fall within the prohibitory clause of Section 497(1), Cr.P.C., the post-arrest bail is granted on three grounds: (i) under the first proviso to Section 497(1), Cr.P.C., on the ground of the accused being a minor, or a woman, or a sick or infirm person; (ii) under the third proviso to Section 497(1), Cr.P.C., on the ground of delay in the conclusion of the trial beyond the period prescribed for no fault of the accused; and (iii) under Section 497(2), Cr.P.C., on the ground that there are no reasonable grounds for believing that the accused has committed the offence, but rather there are sufficient grounds for further inquiry into his guilt.[3] The accused, Farooq and Khalid, have been granted bail on the third ground, i.e., under Section 497(2), Cr.P.C.

9. For the determination of the question under Section 497(2), Cr.P.C., as to whether or not there exist any "reasonable grounds" for believing that the accused has committed the alleged offence, the courts have to appraise although tentatively the whole material available on the record of the case.[4] This question cannot be determined by merely examining the contents of the FIR. Essentially, it is the tentative assessment of the evidence collected in the investigation both for and against the accused that is determinative of the said question.[5] Likewise, to decide upon the applicability of the rule of consistency for granting bail under Section 497(2), Cr.P.C., the courts have to examine the whole material available on the record of the case.[6] Without doing so, it cannot be determined whether the accused who claims the benefit of this rule and his co-accused who has been granted bail are similarly placed in similar circumstances. We have, therefore, no doubt in our minds in holding that the benchmark for applying the rule of consistency is not only the role attributed to the accused in the FIR but also the material collected in the investigation. The petitioner's stance to only look at the role attributed to him in the FIR and to those of his co-accused, Farooq and Khalid, who have been granted bail under Section 497(2), Cr.P.C. for determining the applicability of the rule of consistency is not legally tenable.

10. The cases referred to by the learned counsel for the petitioner have distinguished facts and circumstances. In Fazal,[7] the bail to the co-accused had been granted on the ground of delay in the conclusion of the trial, which ground was also available to the petitioner; hence, he was granted bail by this Court on the same ground on the rule of consistency. In Abdus Sattar,[8] the co-accused had been granted bail because the role attributed to him attracted the offence of causing grievous hurt punishable under the erstwhile Section 325, P.P.C., which offence did not fall within the prohibitory clause of Section 497(1), Cr.P.C., and the petitioner who was granted bail by this Court had also been alleged to have committed the said offence. The offence of murder punishable under the erstwhile Section 302, P.P.C., was not attributed to either of them. Similar were the facts in Abid.[9]

11. In the present case, the courts below have granted the post-arrest bail to the accused, Farooq and Khalid, under Section 497(2), Cr.P.C. after making a tentative assessment of the evidence collected in the investigation both for and against them. The tentative assessment of that evidence has led them to the finding that there are no reasonable grounds for believing that the said accused have committed the offence of murder of the complainant's son, but rather there are sufficient grounds for further inquiry into their guilt. The material collected in the investigation in the case of Farooq and Khalid shows that they were not present on the scene of the crime. This is not so in the case of the petitioner. Therefore, material collected in the investigation against the present petitioner is different from that collected against them. The ground on which they have been granted bail is not available to the petitioner. The case against the petitioner is therefore not at par with that against those accused persons but rather is distinguishable in a substantial aspect. The allegation made against the petitioner of being present on the spot and having made fires on the deceased sons of the complainant by his firearm is not only supported by the statements of the eye-witnesses but also corroborated by the recovery of the weapon of offence effected from him in the investigation. There is, as such, sufficient incriminating material available on the record of the case to connect the petitioner with the commission of the alleged offence, and his case does not come within the scope of the provisions of Section 497(2), Cr.P.C., nor does the rule of consistency apply to him.

12. For the above reasons, we find no legal fault in the order of the High Court declining post-arrest bail to the petitioner. The petition is found meritless. It is, therefore, dismissed and the leave to appeal is declined. However, it is clarified that the observations and findings made in this order, as well as in the orders of the courts below in the bail declining orders passed on the applications of the petitioner, or in the bail granting orders passed on the applications of the accused, Farooq and Khalid, are tentative, which shall have no effect upon the final determination of the case by the trial court on conclusion of the trial.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---Through the present petitions, the petitioners seek leave to appeal against the orders of the Islamabad High Court, dated 27.10.2023 and 08.11.2023, whereby the post-arrest bail has been declined to them in case FIR No. 06/2023 registered at Police Station, CTW/FIA, Islamabad, for the offences punishable under Sections 5 and 9 of the Official Secrets Act 1923 read with Section 34 of the Pakistan Penal Code, 1860.

2. Briefly, as per the crime report (FIR), the allegation against the petitioner Imran Ahmed Khan Niazi, a former Prime Minister of Pakistan, is that he communicated the information contained in a secret classified document (a Cypher Telegram received from Parep Washington, USA) to unauthorized persons, i.e., the public at large, by twisting the facts to achieve his ulterior motives and personal gains in a manner prejudicial to the interests of the State security, and had also illegally retained a copy of the said document. While the petitioner Makhdoom Shah Mahmood Qureshi, a former Foreign Minister, is alleged to have abetted him in so doing. By these actions, it is alleged, the petitioners have directly/indirectly benefited the interest of foreign powers and caused loss to the State of Pakistan.

3. We have heard the arguments of the learned counsel for the parties at some length, read the cases cited by them and examined the record of the case.

4. The offences of wrongful communication of the official confidential information, etc., as defined in defined in clauses (a) to (d) of Section 5(1) of the Official Secrets Act 1923 ("Act") are generally punishable, under clause (b) of Section 5(3), with imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both, and are bailable under clause (b) of Section 12(1) of the Act. It is only when an offence is committed in contravention of clause (a) of Section 5(1) and is intended or calculated to be, directly or indirectly, in the interest or for the benefit of a foreign power, or is in relation to any of the defense installations or affairs[1], or in relation to any secret official code, that it is punishable under clause (b) of Section 5(3) of the Act, with death or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to fourteen years. Such an offence is non-bailable and also falls within the prohibitory clause of Section 497(1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure 1898 ("Cr.P.C."). In respect of such offences, other than the provisos to Section 497(1), bail is granted under Section 497 (2), Cr.P.C., if it appears to Court at any stage of the investigation, inquiry or trial, as the case may be, that there are not reasonable grounds for believing that the accused has committed such an offence but rather that there are sufficient grounds for further inquiry into his guilt.

5. The only question, therefore, before us in the present case is that whether there are not reasonable grounds for believing, at this stage, that the petitioners have committed the offence punishable under clause (b) of Section 5(3) of the Act but rather that there are sufficient grounds for further inquiry into their guilt of the said offence. In this regard, we are cognizant of the one of the elementary principles of the law of bail that to answer the said question, the Court cannot indulge in the exercise of a deeper appraisal of the material available on record of the case but is to determine it only tentatively by looking at such material.

6. Having so examined the material available on record, we find that there is no sufficient incriminating material available, at this stage, which could show that the petitioner, Imran Ahmed Khan Niazi communicated the information contained in the Cypher Telegram received from Parep Washington, USA to the public at large with the intention or calculation, directly or indirectly, in the interest or for the benefit of a foreign power nor the disclosed information relates to any of the defence installations or affairs, nor did he disclose any secret official code to the public at large. We, therefore, are of the tentative opinion that there are not reasonable grounds for believing, at this stage, that the petitioners have committed the offence punishable under clause (b) of Section 5(3) of the Act but rather that there are sufficient grounds for further inquiry into their guilt of the said offence, which is to be finally decided by the learned trial court after recording of the evidence of the parties. The discretion exercised by the High Court in declining bail to the petitioners is found to have been exercised perversely, that is, against the weight of the material available on record of the case, which warrants interference by this Court.

7. For the above reasons, these petitions are converted into appeals and the same are allowed. The impugned orders are set-aside. The bail applications of the petitioners are accepted subject to their furnishing of bail bonds in the sum of one million with two sureties each in the like amount to the satisfaction of the learned trial court.

8. Needless to mention that the observations made in this order are of tentative nature which shall not in any manner influence the trial court, and that this concession of bail may be cancelled, if the petitioners misuse it in any manner, including causing delay in the expeditious conclusion of the trial.

Judge

ATHAR MINALLAH, J.---The two petitioners, Imran Ahmad Khan Niazi and Shah Mahmood Qureshi, had sought bail but it was concurrently declined by the trial court and the High Court respectively. They have now sought leave of this Court for restoring their liberty by ordering their release pursuant to grant of the concession of bail. Both the petitioners intend to contest the forthcoming elections which are scheduled to be held on February 08, 2024. The Election Commission of Pakistan, in exercise of powers conferred under the Election Act 2017 ('Act of 2017'), has announced and duly notified the election schedule. Mr. Imran Ahmad Khan Niazi had formed the political party, Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf, and was elected as the Leader of the House in the National Assembly after the last general elections held in 2018 and, pursuant thereto, he had served as the Prime Minister of the country. Mr. Shah Mahmood Qureshi is one of the most senior office bearers of the party. The questions of public importance that have arisen for the consideration of this Court are; whether, during the election period, candidates who intend to contest the elections or who are affiliated with a political party and their participation in the political process is important for the registered voters, should remain incarcerated, or, whether, in such an eventuality granting bail ought to be considered favorably as a rule and declined only in exceptional circumstances e.g when there is likelihood of abscondence or there is threat to the society because there are grounds to believe that the accused may repeat the offence. In order to answer the questions it is essential to determine the rights of stakeholders involved in such peculiar circumstances and also examine the significance of the chequered history of the electoral process during the past seven decades.

2. The Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ('Constitution') unequivocally contemplates that the authority of the government is solely premised on the will of the people. The will of the people is essentially expressed through exercising the right to participate in the political process and to vote on the day fixed for polls. Elections are the primary and exclusive mode which facilitates and enables the citizen, particularly the registered voter, to choose the person who would represent them and through whom the latter would participate in the governance of the State and exercise the authority of the government. This is one of the most fundamental right of every citizen recognized by the framers of the Constitution. There are other equally important rights associated with or implicit in the right of a citizen to vote and they, inter alia, include the right to meaningfully participate in the political process, freedom of expression, assembly, association and movement. The importance of the right of access to information regarding the competing political parties, their manifestos and candidates cannot be overstated. Each party and candidate must enjoy an equal and non-discriminatory opportunity to effectively function without any fear or threat of intimidation. The United Nations has explicitly recognized the concept of an 'informed choice' as an integral part of 'free choice'.[1] It has been emphasized that 'if elections are to be genuine then they must demonstrably reflect the will of the people. 'Voters can neither formulate nor express that will without access to information about the candidates, the parties and the process'.[2] In order to achieve these fundamental tenets it is not enough to hold elections but to ensure that the citizens have a fair opportunity to express their will by exercising their electoral rights through 'genuine elections'. Our Constitution, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights unambiguously recognize 'genuine elections' as the only true manifestation of the expression of the will of the people.

3. The essential characteristics of a 'genuine election' have been described as a political process which would 'reveal and give effect to the freely expressed will of the people. Sham elections, designed temporarily to quell internal dissent or to distract international scrutiny obviously do not meet the international standards'.[3] Genuine elections can only be ensured if they offer an actual and free choice to an informed voter. Discrimination or intimidation on the basis of political opinions are alien to the concept of genuine elections and even such a perception would be sufficient to compromise the integrity of the electoral process and relegate it to the status of sham elections. Every candidate and political party must have an equal opportunity to reach out to the citizens and to have access to the public resources, including the print and electronic media. The framework of the Constitution has created and guarantees a political right in favor of every citizen to govern the State and exercise the authority of the government through their chosen representatives. Implicit in this fundamental right is the expression of the will of the people. 'The ultimate indication of whether elections are free is the extent to which they facilitate the free expression of the political will of the people concerned. It is, after all, this will which, according to the Universal Declaration (art 21, para 3), is the very basis of legitimate government authority'.[4] The concept of facilitating the effective and meaningful expression of the political will of the people through 'genuine elections' is thus embedded in the scheme of the Constitution and the edifice of the fundamental rights is built upon it. The test of 'genuine elections' is the ability of the voter, political worker, candidate and political party to effectively exercise and enjoy the aforementioned rights without discrimination or any threat of intimidation, direct or indirect. The concept of genuine election is the key to leveling the playing field for all the stakeholders. When all the political competitors do not enjoy the same advantages and disadvantages during the election period, then the fundamental rights of the citizens are breached and, simultaneously, the Constitution is gravely violated. It is, therefore, inevitable to ensure that every political competitor is treated equally without discrimination and everyone has the same chance to succeed. Incarceration of a political competitor during the period of elections, except when it is necessary due to exceptional circumstances, gravely affects the fundamental rights of the voters and prejudices the genuineness and integrity of the elections. As far as the question is concerned as to why political leaders and political workers should be extended preferential treatment, the answer, as already discussed, is that there is a higher and greater interest of the people at large involved which is always given preference over other interests. Moreover, unnecessary incarceration, which would not serve any useful purpose in itself, becomes a ground for releasing an ordinary accused on bail unless the offence alleged to have been committed is heinous or there are exceptional circumstances for refusing extension of bail. There cannot be a greater public interest than ensuring genuine elections and if the incarcerated person intends to contest elections or the standing of a political party is dependent upon the latter then in my opinion this ought to be considered a ground for the grant of bail during the election period. The concession of bail in such an eventuality should be considered favorably as a rule and declined in exceptional circumstances. The strict application of this principle is also essential keeping in view the chequered electoral history during the past seven decades.

4. The process of democratization and democracy itself were gravely undermined from the very inception of Pakistan as an independent sovereign State. The undemocratic elite had struck for the first time when the Constituent Assembly was dissolved and later the unconstitutionality was legitimized by the Federal Court by contriving the doctrine of necessity. It laid the foundations for repression against political opponents. Almost all the elected Prime Ministers remained incarcerated after being prematurely removed from office. Prime Ministers were disqualified and political opponents were persecuted for dissent and prevented from competing in elections by denying a level playing field. The last general elections held in 2018 was an example of denying equal treatment to a particular political party. One of the Prime Ministers was even sent to the gallows and people were later restrained from attending his funeral. Half of the nation's life has been spent under military dictators who did not face a days incarceration for abrogating the Constitution, toppling elected Prime Ministers and subjecting political workers to the worst form of oppression. In stark contrast, the elected Prime Ministers and chosen representatives were prevented from participating in the electoral process by keeping them incarcerated or forcing them into exile. The incarceration of political leadership belonging to Baluchistan, the then North West Frontier Province or Sindh for their political dissent and opinions cannot be erased from history books. The notion of 'genuine election' has remained illusory in the past seven decades and it definitely has profound consequences for the democratic process and the rights of the people. It is the duty of the Election Commission and the respective Governments to ensure that the people are facilitated in expressing their will through 'genuine election'. It is also their duty to ensure that there is no perception of oppression or repressive actions against one political party while others are treated favourably. The unflattering electoral history and oppressive treatment of political dissidents during the period of elections necessitates considering the grant of bail favorably as a rule.

5. The petitioners are alleged to be involved in an offence which does not fall under the category of offences that threaten the society such as rape, child abuse, homicide etc. The investigation has been completed and trial is in progress. The trial is entirely dependent on documentary evidence. The incarceration of the petitioners will not serve any useful purpose. Moreover, their release on bail during the period of elections would ensure 'genuine elections' and thus enable the people to exercise the right to express their will effectively and meaningfully. There are no exceptional circumstances to decline the concession of bail.

Abdul Wahid Qureshi and Tariq Aziz, Advocate-on-Record for Petitioner.

Respondents not represented.

Date of hearing: 30th July, 2024.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---Brief facts of the case are that the petitioner filed a suit for partition, permanent, possession, permanent and mandatory injunction regarding the built-up property constructed house two floors over land measuring 1 Kanal numbered as Plot No. 7-M, Raja Akhtar Road, Korang Valley, Shahpur, Barakahu, Islamabad. The suit property was owned by the father of the parties and after necessary proceedings, the trial court issued a preliminary decree vide order dated 13.01.2020 and appointed a local commission. Subsequently, reserve price of the suit property was fixed by the trial court which was objected by the petitioner on 16.03.2020. Thereafter, a court auctioneer was appointed by the trial court who conducted the auction proceedings and submitted his final report to the court on 18.03.2023 which was also objected by the petitioner. The said objections were turned down by the trial court vide order dated 12.04.2023 against which the petitioner preferred an appeal which was allowed vide order dated 08.07.2023. A revision petition was filed by the respondent No. 7 before the Islamabad High Court, Islamabad which was allowed vide judgment dated 02.07.2024 ("impugned judgment"). Hence, the instant petition for leave to appeal.

2. We have heard the learned counsel for the petitioner at some length and have gone through the impugned judgment of the High Court, examined the law on the subject and the record of the case. We have not been able to take any exception to the impugned judgment and are of the view that the present petition is completely frivolous and vexatious and the process of the court has been abused by the petitioner just to pressurize the other side and delay the matter on one pretext or the other, thereby depriving her siblings and mother from the lawful auction of the said suit property. Therefore, it does not warrant any interference.

3. Before parting with this Order, it is significant to highlight that according to the statistics provided by the Law and Justice Commission of Pakistan, there are about 2.2 million (2,255,295) cases pending before all courts in the country.[1] Such frivolous, vexatious and speculative litigation unduly burdens the courts giving artificial rise to pendency of cases which in turn clogs the justice system and delays the resolution of genuine disputes. Such litigation is required to be rooted out of the system and strongly discouraged and one of the ways to curb such practice of instituting frivolous and vexatious cases is by imposing of costs under Order XXVIII, Rule 3 of the Supreme Court Rules, 1980 which lay the foundation for expeditious justice and promote a smart legal system, enhancing access to justice by entertaining genuine claims.[2] In view of the aforesaid, leave is, therefore, declined and this petition is dismissed with costs of Rs. 50,000/- to be paid to the respondents and in case of its failure, the same shall be recoverable as a money decree. Copy of this Order be dispatched to the respondents for information.

Civil Petition No.3391 of 2024, decided on 9th August, 2024.

Customs Act (IV of 1969)---

----Ss. 194-A & 194-B---Constitution of Pakistan, Art. 199---Customs Appellate Tribunal---Power of Appellate Tribunal to execute orders passed by it---Customs Appellate Tribunal has the power to execute orders passed in exercise of its appellate jurisdiction under Sections 194-A and 194-B of the Customs Act 1969---Since an adequate remedy is provided by law, the writ jurisdiction of the High Court is not to be invoked for the execution of such orders.

There is no provision in the Customs Act, 1969 that specifically provides for the power of the Customs Appellate Tribunal ('Tribunal') to execute its orders. However, it is a well-established principle of statutory construction that where a statute confers jurisdiction, it also grants, by necessary implication, the powers to do all such acts or employ all such means as are essentially necessary for its execution. An express grant of statutory power carries with it, by necessary implication, the authority to do all such acts that are necessary to make such a grant effective. A statute that expressly confers a substantive power upon a court or tribunal also impliedly grants all incidental and ancillary powers necessary for the effective exercise of that substantive power. These incidental and ancillary powers thus necessarily flow from the express substantive power. [p. 1809] A Maxwell on Interpretation of Statutes (11th Ed.) p. 350; Commissioner, Khairpur v. Ali Sher Sarki PLD 1971 SC 242 and Sutherland Statutory Construction (3rd Ed.), Articles 5401 and 5402 ref.

There is no doubt that the Tribunal functions as a judicial body within the limits of its jurisdiction. It has all the powers expressly conferred upon it by the statute, i.e., the Customs Act, 1969. Furthermore, being a judicial body, it also possesses all those incidental and ancillary powers necessary for the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon it and to make fully effective the grant of statutory substantive powers. Such powers are recognized as incidental and ancillary, not because they are inherent in the Tribunal or because its jurisdiction is plenary, but because it is the legislative intent that the power expressly granted in the assigned field of jurisdiction is efficaciously and meaningfully excercised. [p. 1810] B

Union of India v. Paras Laminates (1990) 4 SCC 453 and Income Tax Officer v. Mohammed Kunhi AIR 1969 SC 430 ref.

A statutory tribunal that has been conferred the power to adjudicate a dispute and pass an order on it also has the power to implement that order. Even if this power has not been specifically spelled out in the statute, it must be deemed to have been impliedly conferred upon the statutory tribunal. Courts and statutory tribunals must be held to possess the power to execute their own orders; for when a court or tribunal is conferred jurisdiction or substantive power to make an order, the power to execute such an order, being ancillary and incidental, is also impliedly conferred by the statute. This is necessary because the jurisdiction or substantive power would be useless if the order passed in exercise thereof could not be executed and enforced. The same principle applies to the jurisdiction and substantive power of the Tribunal under Sections 194-A and 194-B of the Customs Act, 1969. The power to execute an order passed under these express provisions of the Customs Act, 1969 being ancillary and incidental, is also impliedly conferred upon the Tribunal by the Customs Act, 1969. Thus, the Tribunal has the power to execute orders passed in exercise of its appellate jurisdiction under Sections 194-A and 194-B of the Customs Act, 1969. Consequently, since an adequate remedy is provided by law, the writ jurisdiction of the High Court cannot be invoked for executing orders passed by the Tribunal.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---The short but important question of law involved in the present case is whether the Customs Appellate Tribunal ("Tribunal") has the power to execute orders passed in exercise of its appellate jurisdiction under Sections 194-A and 194-B of the Customs Act 1969 ("Customs Act"), or whether the writ jurisdiction of the High Court is to be invoked for the execution of such orders. This question has arisen in the following factual context.

2. The officials of the Customs Collectorate (Enforcement), Lahore, seized a certain quantity of gold, alleged to be smuggled, along with a vehicle transporting the said gold, from the possession of Umer Farooq and Mussarat Shaheen (appellants 3 and 2). During the investigation, Muhammad Khalid (appellant 1) claimed ownership of the seized gold and asserted that Umer Farooq was merely his representative, who was transporting the gold to his shop in Faisalabad. All three appellants were charged with contravening several provisions of the Customs Act and the Imports and Exports (Control) Act 1950. By its order dated 29 November 2021, the Collector of Customs (Adjudication), Lahore, confiscated the seized gold and car, allowing the release of the car subject to the payment of a redemption fine. The appellants appealed this order before the Tribunal under Section 194-A of the Customs Act. By its judgment dated 20 December 2022, the Tribunal partially allowed the appeal to the extent of certain pieces of gold that were not found to be of foreign origin and ordered their unconditional release. The Tribunal also ordered the release of the car to its lawful owner upon payment of the redemption fine at the rate of 20% of the customs value. The order of the Collector (Adjudication) was maintained regarding the pieces of seized gold found by the Tribunal to be of foreign origin.

3. Both the appellants and the Collector of Customs preferred customs references against the Tribunal's judgment. During the pendency of these references, the appellants submitted an application to the Collector of Customs (Enforcement), Lahore, seeking implementation of the Tribunal's judgment and contending that its operation had not been stayed by the High Court in the reference proceedings. Receiving no response from the Collector of Customs (Enforcement), the appellants filed a writ petition in the Lahore High Court, praying that the Collector of Customs (Enforcement) be directed to comply with the Tribunal's judgment. The Lahore High Court dismissed the writ petition by its order dated 28 June 2024 ("impugned order"), observing inter alia that the appellants could not seek implementation of the Tribunal's judgment since they themselves had assailed it in the reference proceedings. Hence, the appellants have approached this Court through the present petition for leave to appeal.

4. We have heard the arguments of the learned counsel for the parties and have examined the record of the case.

5. As per the facts presented before us, the Tribunal's judgment has not been stayed by the High Court in the reference proceedings. The Tribunal's judgment is, thus, fully operative and executable.[1] In this regard, there is also a Customs General Order (CGO) No. 2 of 2024, issued by the Federal Board of Revenue in exercise of its powers under Section 223 of the Customs Act, which directs customs officials to implement orders passed by the Tribunal or any other adjudicating forum, except where stay orders have been issued by the next appellate forum. The issue, however, arises when, despite this legal position, the customs officials fail to implement the orders of the Tribunal, even though their operation has not been suspended in the reference proceedings, as in the present case. What remedy is then available to redress the grievance of the person seeking implementation of the Tribunal's order? Does the Tribunal that passed the order have the power to execute and ensure its implementation?

6. There is no provision in the Customs Act that specifically provides for the power of the Tribunal to execute its orders. However, it is a well-established principle of statutory construction, as stated by Maxwell[2] and approvingly cited by this Court in Ali Sher Sarki,[3] that where a statute confers jurisdiction, it also grants, by necessary implication, the powers to do all such acts or employ all such means as are essentially necessary for its execution. An express grant of statutory power carries with it, by necessary implication, the authority to do all such acts that are necessary to make such a grant effective.[4] A statute that expressly confers a substantive power upon a court or tribunal also impliedly grants all incidental and ancillary powers necessary for the effective exercise of that substantive power. These incidental and ancillary powers thus necessarily flow from the express substantive power.

7. There is no doubt that the Tribunal functions as a judicial body within the limits of its jurisdiction. It has all the powers expressly conferred upon it by the statute, i.e., the Customs Act. Furthermore, being a judicial body, it also possesses all those incidental and ancillary powers necessary for the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon it and to make fully effective the grant of statutory substantive powers. Such powers are recognized as incidental and ancillary, not because they are inherent in the Tribunal or because its jurisdiction is plenary, but because it is the legislative intent that the power expressly granted in the assigned field of jurisdiction is efficaciously and meaningfully exercised. The powers of the Tribunal are, no doubt, limited. Its area of jurisdiction is clearly defined, but within the bounds of its jurisdiction, it has all the powers expressly and impliedly granted. The implied grant is, of course, limited by the express grant and, therefore, can only include such powers as are truly incidental and ancillary for doing all such acts or employing all such means as are reasonably necessary to make the grant effective.[5]

8. As held in Vishwabharathi[6] by the apex court of a neighbouring jurisdiction, a statutory tribunal that has been conferred the power to adjudicate a dispute and pass an order on it also has the power to implement that order. Even if this power has not been specifically spelled out in the statute, it must be deemed to have been impliedly conferred upon the statutory tribunal. Courts and statutory tribunals must be held to possess the power to execute their own orders; for when a court or tribunal is conferred jurisdiction or substantive power to make an order, the power to execute such an order, being ancillary and incidental, is also impliedly conferred by the statute. This is necessary because the jurisdiction or substantive power would be useless if the order passed in exercise thereof could not be executed and enforced. The same principle applies to the jurisdiction and substantive power of the Tribunal under Sections 194-A and 194-B of the Customs Act. The power to execute an order passed under these express provisions of the Customs Act, being ancillary and incidental, is also impliedly conferred upon the Tribunal by the Customs Act. We thus conclude that the Tribunal has the power to execute orders passed in exercise of its appellate jurisdiction under Sections 194-A and 194-B of the Customs Act. Consequently, since an adequate remedy is provided by law, the writ jurisdiction of the High Court cannot be invoked for executing orders passed by the Tribunal.

9. In view of this legal position, we maintain the impugned order of the High Court dismissing the writ petition of the appellants, but for the reasons stated above. The petition is dismissed and leave to appeal is declined. The appellants, however, may approach the Tribunal for execution of the order passed by it, if so advised.

10. A copy of this order shall be sent to the Member (Customs), Federal Board of Revenue, for information and for issuing an appropriate warning or taking suitable action against customs officials who are not adhering to CGO No. 2 of 2024.

MWA/K-11/SC Petition dismissed.

----Service matters---Punishment, award of---Institutional autonomy---Concept of institutional autonomy in matters relating to award of punishment and limited circumstances in which courts/tribunals can interfere in the same.

Courts are tasked with a delicate balancing act: respecting the institutional autonomy of public sector institutions, while ensuring these institutions operate within the bounds of the law and do not infringe upon individual rights or the public interest. The imposition of punishment under the law is primarily the function of the competent authority and the role of the Tribunal or Court is rather secondary unless it is found to be against the law or is unreasonable. This is because the department/ competent authority, being the fact-finding authority, is best suited to decide the particular penalty to be imposed keeping in view a host of factors such as the nature and gravity of the misconduct, past conduct, the nature and the responsibility of the duty assigned to the delinquent, previous penalty, if any, and the discipline required to be maintained in the department, as well as any extenuating circumstances. The underlying rationale is based on the concept of institutional autonomy which provides for a degree of self-governance and independence by a public sector institution. This autonomy is essential for ensuring that such institutions can function effectively, impartially, and according to their legal mandates. The autonomy of public institutions is not just a matter of administrative convenience, but a fundamental requirement for the effective functioning of a democratic society, as public sector organizations are guardians of the public interest. The role of the courts is not to second-guess institutions as certain matters are the province of institutions themselves. Thus, as long as the institutions pursue their institutional purpose and function, and as long as they abide by law, professional norms and best practices, they are largely entitled to regulate themselves. Institutional decisions are, however, subject to judicial oversight and can be corrected if they suffer from any illegality, irrationality or procedural impropriety. Other than that, the courts must give deference to the institutional decisions and desist from second guessing them on the basis of their own subjective standards of leniency, compassion or fairness. Such decisions are best left to the institutions owing to their policy-making prerogatives and expertise.

given in the impugned judgment justifying their reinstatement on the ground that the respondents worked for 14 years and had subsequently obtained new licenses was not sufficient and did not wash away their act of submitting fake and bogus licenses and thus managing their appointments fraudulently---Once the appointment was sought on the basis of bogus licenses, such appointment could not be legitimized---This was based on the principle referred to as the "doctrine of unclean hands."---This legal doctrine holds that a person who has acted unethically, deceitfully, or with dishonesty should not be entitled to the benefits derived from such actions---When applied to employment, particularly in sensitive roles like the police service, this principle asserts that someone who gains their position through fraudulent means—such as by falsifying documents—cannot be trusted to uphold the integrity and responsibilities of that position---Furthermore, discovering the fraud, even several years after the fact, could still be ground for disciplinary action because the initial appointment was obtained illegitimately---The rationale was that trust and integrity are foundational to public service roles, and a breach of this nature undermined the trust necessary for the role and could potentially have legal and institutional consequences---Said principle maintains that the integrity of the institution and the trust placed in its officials are paramount, and therefore, any breach, regardless of when discovered, must be addressed decisively---Respondents knew that they had submitted fake and bogus licenses during the recruitment process---Thus, the Tribunal had failed to take into consideration the fact that the basic qualification/eligibility to the post of driver constable was a genuine license which the respondents did not meet---In the absence of the same, the Tribunal acted in an arbitrary and whimsical manner overlooking the specific facts and circumstances by granting relief to the respondents in violation of the law---Petition was converted into an appeal and allowed; the impugned judgment was set aside and the dismissal orders of the respondents passed by the department were upheld.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---The brief facts giving rise to the instant petition are that driver constables ("respondents") were appointed by the District Police, Lahore in the year 2007. Subsequently, on the basis of a complaint, an investigation into the genuineness of their LTV driving licenses ("licenses") was carried out and after necessary verification, it was found that the traffic police had no record of their driving licenses and the same were found fake and bogus. Upon receiving the said information, show cause notices were issued to the respondents in the year 2015. Thereafter, regular departmental inquiry proceedings were initiated under the Punjab Police (E & D) Rules, 1975 ("Rules") during which the respondents admitted that they had not participated in any visual or physical test to get the licenses and that the same were obtained through an agent.[1] Upon receipt of the inquiry report, the respondents were dismissed from service under Rule 3 of the Rules vide orders dated 21.09.2021. Subsequently, the respondents filed departmental appeals which were dismissed vide orders dated 04.03.2022. Instead of approaching the Tribunal, they first preferred revision petitions, which were dismissed in the year 2022, respectively. Feeling aggrieved, they filed service appeals before the Punjab Service Tribunal, Lahore ("Tribunal") which were allowed vide judgment dated 16.05.2023 ("impugned judgment") and the respondents stood reinstated into service. Hence, the present petitions.

2. Learned counsel for the petitioners submits that the respondents' appointments were made on the basis of fake and bogus licenses and despite being given an opportunity to provide a defense, they failed to rebut the allegations levelled against them. On the contrary, learned counsel for the respondents submits that they were unaware of the fake and bogus nature of their licenses and applied for new licenses as soon as they were made aware of the same.

3. The two reasons given by the Tribunal for reinstating the respondents in service were that (i) the disciplinary proceedings instituted against the respondents were based on vague allegations and the same could not sustain and, (ii) the disciplinary action was taken against the respondents after they had served the department for more than 14 years, after having subsequently obtained new licenses.

4. We have heard the learned counsel at length and have gone through the impugned judgment, examined the law on the subject and the record of the case.

5. At the outset, it is significant to underline that courts are tasked with a delicate balancing act: respecting the institutional autonomy of public sector institutions, while ensuring these institutions operate within the bounds of the law and do not infringe upon individual rights or the public interest. The imposition of punishment under the law is primarily the function of the competent authority i.e., Police department in this case, and the role of the Tribunal or Court is rather secondary unless it is found to be against the law or is unreasonable.[2] This is because the department/ competent authority, being the fact-finding authority, is best suited to decide the particular penalty to be imposed keeping in view a host of factors such as the nature and gravity of the misconduct, past conduct, the nature and the responsibility of the duty assigned to the delinquent, previous penalty, if any, and the discipline required to be maintained in the department, as well as any extenuating circumstances.[3] The underlying rationale is based on the concept of institutional autonomy which provides for a degree of self-governance and independence by a public sector institution. This autonomy is essential for ensuring that such institutions can function effectively, impartially, and according to their legal mandates. The autonomy of public institutions is not just a matter of administrative convenience, but a fundamental requirement for the effective functioning of a democratic society, as public sector organizations are guardians of the public interest.[4] The role of the courts is not to second-guess institutions as certain matters are the province of institutions themselves.[5] Thus, as long as the institutions pursue their institutional purpose and function, and as long as they abide by law, professional norms and best practices, they are largely entitled to regulate themselves.[6] Institutional decisions are, however, subject to judicial oversight and can be corrected if they suffer from any illegality, irrationality or procedural impropriety. Other than that, the courts must give deference to the institutional decisions and desist from second-guessing them on the basis of their own subjective standards of leniency, compassion or fairness. Such decisions are best left to the institutions owing to their policy-making prerogatives and expertise.

6. It is an admitted position that the respondents were dismissed from service based on an established charge of misconduct[7] after a proper regular departmental inquiry was conducted by the competent authority. The findings in the inquiry report were not only accepted by the competent authority but have also been affirmed by the appellate authority of the same department. In the instant case, the major penalty of dismissal from service was imposed by the competent authority in accordance with law and the relevant rules. The fact that the respondents procured their appointment based on bogus and fake driving licenses cannot be condoned. The reasoning given in the impugned judgment justifying their reinstatement on the ground that the respondents worked for 14 years and had subsequently obtained new licenses is not sufficient and does not wash away their act of submitting fake and bogus licenses and thus managing their appointments fraudulently.[8] It is well settled law that when the basic order is without lawful authority, then the entire superstructure raised thereon falls to the ground automatically.[9] Once the appointment was sought on the basis of bogus licenses, such appointment cannot be legitimized. The principle at work here is often referred to as the "doctrine of unclean hands." This legal doctrine holds that a person who has acted unethically, deceitfully, or with dishonesty should not be entitled to the benefits derived from such actions. When applied to employment, particularly in sensitive roles like the police service, this principle asserts that someone who gains their position through fraudulent means-such as by falsifying documents-cannot be trusted to uphold the integrity and responsibilities of that position. Furthermore, discovering the fraud, even several years after the fact, can still be ground for disciplinary action because the initial appointment was obtained illegitimately. The rationale is that trust and integrity are foundational to public service roles, and a breach of this nature undermines the trust necessary for the role and could potentially have legal and institutional consequences. The principle maintains that the integrity of the institution and the trust placed in its officials are paramount, and therefore, any breach, regardless of when discovered, must be addressed decisively.

7. It is also pertinent to note that there is no cavil to the proposition that under Section 5 of the Punjab Service Tribunal Act, 1974 ("Act"), the Tribunal enjoys powers to set aside, confirm, vary or modify any order passed by the departmental authorities. However, such power is required to be exercised carefully, judiciously and after recording cogent reasons for the same keeping in view and considering the specific facts and circumstances of each case.[10] All Courts and Tribunals seized of matters before them are required to pass orders strictly in accordance with the parameters of the Constitution, the law and the rules and regulations lawfully framed under the law. No court has the jurisdiction to grant arbitrary relief without the support of any power granted by the Constitution or the law.[11] Any relief granted on the touchstone of subjective standards of leniency and compassion, rather than the law, cannot be sustained. Any such subjective decision disregards the importance of institutional autonomy; which rests on well-thought out values, ethos, policies and internal disciple of the institution. The impugned judgment has also erred in law by failing to take into account the entire evidence available on record which revealed that the respondents knew that they had submitted fake and bogus licenses during the time of the recruitment process and admitted that they had not participated in any visual or physical test to get the licenses during the regular departmental inquiry proceedings. It is admitted that the respondents knew that they had submitted fake and bogus licenses during the recruitment process.[12] Thus, the Tribunal has failed to take into consideration the fact that the basic qualification/eligibility to the post of driver constable was a genuine license which the respondents did not meet. In the absence of the same, the Tribunal acted in an arbitrary and whimsical manner overlooking the specific facts and circumstances by granting relief to the respondents in violation of the law.

8. Moreover, the ground of discrimination as alleged[13] by the respondents is also untenable in law as Article 25 of the Constitution has no application to a claim based upon other unlawful acts and illegalities. It only comes into operation when some persons are granted a benefit in accordance with law but others, similarly placed and in similar circumstances are denied that benefit. But where a person gains, or is granted, a benefit illegally, other persons cannot plead, nor can the courts accept such a plea, that the same benefit must be allowed to them also in violation of law.[14] Therefore, in the given circumstances, when it has been established on record that the respondents were guilty of misconduct, there lies no basis to show leniency in their favour, hence the reasoning given by the Tribunal in the impugned judgment is misplaced.

9. In view of the aforesaid, the impugned judgment is set aside and the dismissal orders of the respondents dated 21.09.2021 passed by the department are upheld. The present petition is, therefore, converted into an appeal and allowed.

MWA/S-27/SC Appeal allowed.

C.P. No. 5918 of 2021, decided on 3rd November, 2023.

(Against the order of the Lahore High Court, Lahore, dated 06.10.2021, passed in W.P. No. 50349 of 2019).

----Arts. 4 & 10A---Fair trial---Scope---Duty of Courts to deal with everyone in accordance with law---Courts, from top to bottom, must always remember that while dealing with matters of life, liberty, body, reputation or property of all persons must be dealt with in accordance with law, and that every person appearing before them is entitled to a fair trial and due process for the determination of his civil rights and obligations or in any criminal charge against him.

(b) Family Courts Act (XXXV of 1964)---

----S. 5 & Sched.---Constitution of Pakistan, Arts. 4 & 10A---Maintenance of minor---Grandfather, obligation of---Scope---Decree for maintenance of minor passed against the father of a child by the Family Court---Such decree cannot be executed against the grandfather---Child has to institute a suit for maintenance against his grandfather, in case no property of his father, the judgment debtor, is found for the execution of the decree.

Under the Islamic law of maintenance of the children, if the father of a child has died or the father, being a poor person, has no financial resources to maintain his child, the obligation to maintain such child passes on to his grandfather provided he is financially in easy circumstances. Thus, obligation of a grandfather to maintain his grandchild is dependant upon two conditions: (i) the father of the child must be a poor person who has no financial resources to maintain that child, and (ii) the grandfather of the child must be a person who is financially in easy circumstances. In case either of these conditions is not fulfilled, the grandfather is not under any obligation to maintain his grandchild. These two conditions are thus also the grounds of defence available to a grandfather against whom his grandchild makes a claim of maintenance. The grandfather must be provided with an opportunity to defend the claim made against him by rebutting the existence of either of these two facts. This is the requirement of the fundamental right guaranteed by Article 10A of the Constitution of Pakistan, which mandates that for the determination of his civil rights and obligations, a person shall be entitled to a fair trial and due process.

Rehmat Bibi v. Mohammad Ali PLD 1971 Lah. 151 and Nizam Khan v. Additional District Judge PLD 1976 Lah. 930 ref.

The matter of providing maintenance to his grandchild is a matter of civil obligation; for its determination, the grandfather must be provided with a fair trial and due process. Both the above conditions, the fulfillment of which brings a grandfather under obligation to maintain his grandchild, are factual propositions, not legal ones. Their existence or non-existence can, therefore, only be proved through producing their respective evidence by the parties in a properly instituted suit for maintenance. Such evidence cannot be recorded in the execution proceeding nor can any determination be made therein by the executing court on these facts. The recording of evidence and making of findings on these facts in an execution proceeding would be a useless exercise, as despite making a positive finding, an executing court cannot modify the decree nor can it execute the decree against a person who was not a party to the suit. Further, the Family Courts Act, 1964 prescribes a procedure for how the claims of maintenance are to be entertained and decided by the Family Courts. Such a claim made against a grandfather operates against his property; he is, therefore, entitled to be dealt with the procedure prescribed by law, i.e., the Family Courts Act, as per Article 4 of the Constitution. Therefore, a decree for maintenance passed against the father of a child cannot be executed against the grandfather, and the child has to institute a suit for maintenance against his grandfather, in case no property of his father, the judgment debtor, is found for the execution of the decree.

Mavra Arshad v. Ehsan Ghani 2005 SCMR 1293 distinguished.

In the present case, the petitioner (grandfather) was neither a party to the suit instituted by his grandchild against his father nor was any decree passed against him. A decree that was not passed against the petitioner cannot be executed against him or his property. The order, whereby the executing court attached the property of the petitioner, and the order, whereby his application for the release of the attached property was dismissed, both are illegal. Petition for leave to appeal was converted into appeal and allowed accordingly with the observation that the minor decree-holder, if so advised, is at liberty to institute a suit for maintenance against the petitioner, his grandfather, in accordance with the law, and if such a suit is instituted, the Family Court may make an appropriate order for interim maintenance of the minor at an appropriate stage of the suit if it is satisfied that the two conditions which make a grandfather liable for providing maintenance to his minor grandchild are prima facie fulfilled.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---'Doing what is right may still result in unfairness if it is done in the wrong way.'[1] The right thing must be done in the right way. Just ends are not justified unjust means. The present case is a classic instance of doing a right thing in a wrong way. In their urge to provide a child with due maintenance at the earliest, the courts below have circumvented the due process of law, and instead of achieving the desired result, have thrown the parties into a protracted, unnecessary litigation. Courts in this country, from top to bottom, must always remember that while dealing with matters of life, liberty, body, reputation or property of all persons must be dealt with in accordance with law,[2] and that every person appearing before them is entitled to a fair trial and due process for the determination of his civil rights and obligations or in any criminal charge against him.[3]

2. Briefly, the facts necessary to state for the decision of the present petition are that in the year 2018, the petitioner's grandson, Muhammad Rehan, then aged about 3 years, instituted a family suit through his mother, Aziz Fatima, for his maintenance against his father and the petitioner's son, Ansar Abbas. The suit was decreed and a petition was filed for the execution of the decree against the judgment debtor, Ansar Abbas. Despite issuing the warrant of his arrest, the presence of the judgment debtor could not be procured to pay the decretal amount nor could the decree holder trace out any of his property. The decree holder found the revenue record of the property owned by the petitioner, his grandfather, and requested the executing court to attach that property for recovery of the decretal amount, which was accepted by the executing court, and the petitioner's property was attached vide order dated 07.09.2018. The petitioner filed an application for the release of his property from attachment, pleading that he had neither been a party to the suit nor had any decree been passed against him. The executing court dismissed this application of the petitioner by its order dated 17.10.2018. The petitioner challenged the orders of the executing court in the High Court invoking its writ jurisdiction. Through the impugned order, the High Court dismissed his writ petition; hence, this petition for leave to appeal.

3. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties, read the cases cited by them and examined the record of the case.

4. Under the Islamic law of maintenance of the children, if the father of a child has died or the father, being a poor person, has no financial resources to maintain his child, the obligation to maintain such child passes on to his grandfather provided he is financially in easy circumstances.[4] This statement of Islamic law is not disputed before us. The matter of contention between the parties that requires determination by us is: whether a decree for maintenance passed against the father of a child can be executed against the grandfather or the child has to institute a suit for maintenance against his grandfather, in case no property of his father, the judgment debtor, is found for the execution of the decree.

5. As it is evident from the above statement of the Islamic law of maintenance of the children, the obligation of a grandfather to maintain his grandchild is dependant upon two conditions: (i) the father of the child must be a poor person who has no financial resources to maintain that child, and (ii) the grandfather of the child must be a person who is financially in easy circumstances. In case either of these conditions is not fulfilled, the grandfather is not under any obligation to maintain his grandchild. These two conditions are thus also the grounds of defence available to a grandfather against whom his grandchild makes a claim of maintenance.

6. A child who claims his maintenance from his grandfather has to prove these two conditions, and the grandfather must be provided with an opportunity to defend the claim made against him by rebutting the existence of either of these two facts. This is the requirement of the fundamental right guaranteed by Article 10A of the Constitution of Pakistan, which mandates that for the determination of his civil rights and obligations, a person shall be entitled to a fair trial and due process. The matter of providing maintenance to his grandchild is a matter of civil obligation; for its determination, the grandfather must be provided with a fair trial and due process.

Both the above conditions, the fulfillment of which brings a grandfather under obligation to maintain his grandchild, are factual propositions, not legal ones. Their existence or non-existence can, therefore, only be proved through producing their respective evidence by the parties in a properly instituted suit for maintenance. Such evidence cannot be recorded in the execution proceeding nor can any determination be made therein by the executing court on these facts. The recording of evidence and making of findings on these facts in an execution proceeding would be a useless exercise, as despite making a positive finding, an executing court cannot modify the decree[5] nor can it execute the decree against a person who was not a party to the suit.[6] Further, the Family Courts Act 1964 prescribes a procedure for how the claims of maintenance are to be entertained and decided by the Family Courts. Such a claim made against a grandfather operates against his property; he is, therefore, entitled to be dealt with the procedure prescribed by law, i.e., the Family Courts Act, as per Article 4 of the Constitution.

7. We, therefore, hold that a decree for maintenance passed against the father of a child cannot be executed against the grandfather, and the child has to institute a suit for maintenance against his grandfather, in case no property of his father, the judgment debtor, is found for the execution of the decree.[7] The case of Mavra Arshad[8] relied upon by the respondents does not advance but rather contradicts their stance as in that case, the grandfather was a party to the suit as a defendant, along with the father of the child.

8. In the present case, the petitioner was neither a party to the suit instituted by his grandchild against his father nor was any decree passed against him. A decree that was not passed against the petitioner cannot be executed against him or his property. The order dated 07.09.2018, whereby the executing court attached the property of the petitioner, and the order dated 17.10.2018, whereby his application for the release of the attached property was dismissed, both are illegal. By dismissing the writ petition of the petitioner filed against those orders, the High Court has failed to exercise the remedial jurisdiction vested in it under Article 199(1)(a)(ii) of the Constitution. The present petition is, therefore, converted into an appeal and the same is allowed. By setting aside the impugned order, the writ petition of the petitioner is accepted, declaring that the orders of the executing court, dated 07.09.2018 and 17.10.2018, were made without lawful authority and are therefore of no legal effect. Consequently, the application of the petitioner for the release of his property from the attachment stands allowed. It is, however, clarified that the minor decree-holder, if so advised, is at liberty to institute a suit for maintenance against the petitioner, his grandfather, in accordance with the law, and if such a suit is instituted, the Family Court may make an appropriate order for interim maintenance of the minor at an appropriate stage of the suit if it is satisfied that the two conditions which make a grandfather liable for providing maintenance to his minor grandchild are prima facie fulfilled.

Acts of corruption and corrupt practices do infringe the Fundamental Rights of the public and thus meet the test of Article 184(3) of the Constitution.

The National Accountability (Amendment) Act, 2022 ("First Amendment") and the National Accountability (Second Amendment) Act, 2022 ("Second Amendment") (collectively referred to as the "2022 Amendments") have limited the NAB's jurisdiction thus excluding hundreds of pending references from trial before any forum and have also made the proof of the offence of corruption and corrupt practices significantly harder for references that satisfy the jurisdictional requirements of Section 4 and Section 5(o) of the National Accountability Ordinance, 1999 ("NAB Ordinance").

The 2022 Amendments exclude the jurisdiction of the NAB to investigate and prosecute holders of public office in two significant respects thereby ex-facie violating Articles 9, 14, 23 and 24 of the Constitution by exonerating the holders of public office from their alleged acts of corruption and corrupt practices by failing to provide a forum for their trial. The 2022 Amendments have therefore rendered the NAB toothless in accomplishing its objective of 'eradicat[ing] corruption and corrupt practices and hold[ing] accountable all those persons accused of such practices' and have left public property belonging to the people of Pakistan vulnerable to waste and malfeasance by the holders of public office. Such interference in the NAB's jurisdiction and powers most certainly affects the Fundamental Rights of the people at large. Present Constitutional petition fulfils the requirements of Article 184(3) of the Constitution and so is maintainable.

The National Accountability (Amendment) Act, 2022 ("First Amendment") and the National Accountability (Second Amendment) Act, 2022 ("Second Amendment") (collectively referred to as the "2022 Amendments") have brought about the following modifications in the National Accountability Ordinance, 1999 ("NAB Ordinance"):

i. Section 3 of the Second Amendment has changed the definition of 'offence' in Section 5(o) of the NAB Ordinance by inserting a minimum pecuniary jurisdiction of Rs.500 million below which value the NAB cannot take cognizance of the offence of corruption and corrupt practices;

ii. Section 2 of the First Amendment by inserting subsections (a)-(f) into Section 4 of the NAB Ordinance and Section 2 of the Second Amendment by adding subsection (g) in Section 4 of the NAB Ordinance has excluded certain holders of public office from application of the NAB Ordinance and thereby limited its effect;

iii. Section 8 of the First Amendment has inserted new ingredients in the offence under Section 9(a)(v) of the NAB Ordinance and added explanations thereto. Section 9(a)(v) criminalizes the act of holding assets beyond means;

iv. Section 10 of the First Amendment has deleted Section 14 of the NAB Ordinance which provides evidentiary presumptions that may be drawn against the accused;

v. Section 14 of the First Amendment has deleted Section 21(g) of the NAB Ordinance which permitted foreign evidence to be admissible in legal proceedings under the mutual legal assistance regime; and

vi. Section 14 of the Second Amendment has added a second proviso to Section 25(b) of the NAB Ordinance whereby an accused who enters into a plea bargain duly approved by the Accountability Court under Section 25(b) can renege from the same if he has not paid the full amount of the bargain settlement as approved by the Accountability Court.

Section 3 of the Second Amendment

Section 3 of the Second Amendment has amended Section 5(o) of the NAB Ordinance to set the minimum pecuniary jurisdiction of the NAB at Rs.500 million for inquiring into and investigating cases involving the commission of the offence of corruption and corrupt practices. As a result, offences that cause loss valued at less than Rs.500 million no longer come within the ambit of the NAB. The principal focus of the NAB is to mainly prosecute mega scandals. Whilst the judgments of the Superior Courts indicate that the minimum pecuniary threshold of NAB should be Rs.100 million (except in limited circumstances where offences less than Rs.100 million cannot be prosecuted by any other accountability agency), Section 3 of the Second Amendment has increased this minimum threshold to Rs.500 million. No cogent argument was put forward by counsel for the respondent Federation as to why Parliament has fixed a higher amount of Rs.500 million for the NAB to entertain complaints and file corresponding references in the Accountability Courts when the Superior Courts have termed acts of corruption and corrupt practices causing loss to the tune of Rs.100 million as mega scandals.

State v. Hanif Hyder 2016 SCMR 2031; Amjad Hussain v. National Accountability Bureau 2017 YLR 1 and Iftikhar Ali Haideri v. National Accountability Bureau 2019 YLR 255 ref.

Counsel for the respondent Federation submitted that merely because the minimum pecuniary threshold of the NAB has been increased does not mean that holders of public office stand absolved; that other accountability fora exist in the country where the trials of the accused holders of public office who have been removed from the jurisdiction of the NAB can be held. Counsel referred to the provisions of Prevention of Corruption Act, 1947 ("1947 Act") and Pakistan Penal Code, 1860 ("P.P.C.") amongst other laws. However, on a careful examination of these legislations it becomes clear that the two are applicable only to public servants. Under the Constitution persons in the service of Pakistan are those who are holding posts in connection with the affairs of the Federation or Province. As a result, such persons are either dealing with the property of the Federal/Provincial Government or with the pecuniary interests of the Federal/Provincial Government. They, therefore, come within the definition of public servant set out in the Pakistan Penal Code, 1860 ('P.P.C.") and adopted by the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1947 ('the 1947 Act') and so can be prosecuted under these laws for the offence of corruption and corrupt practices. However, elected holders of public office do not qualify as public servants under the guise of being in the service of Pakistan because Article 260 of the Constitution specifically excludes them from such service. Resultantly elected holders of public office are not triable either under the 1947 Act or the P.P.C. for the offence of corruption and corrupt practices.

R.S. Nayak v. A.R. Antulay AIR 1984 SC 684 and Zakir Hossain Sarkar v. State (70) DLR (2018) 203 ref.

By virtue of Section 3 of the Second Amendment elected holders of public office have been granted both retrospective and prospective exemption from accountability laws. Once excluded from the jurisdiction of the NAB no other accountability fora can take cognizance of their alleged acts of corruption and corrupt practices. Such blanket immunity offends Articles 9, 14, 23 and 24 of the Constitution because it permits and encourages the squandering of public assets and wealth by elected holders of public office as there is no forum for their accountability. This in turn affects the economic well-being of the State and ultimately the quality and dignity of the people's lives because as more resources are diverted towards illegal activities less resources remain for the provision of essential services to the people such as health facilities, education institutes and basic infrastructure etc. The immunity also negates Article 62(1)(f) of the Constitution which mandates that only 'sagacious, righteous, non-profligate, honest and ameen' persons enter Parliament. It also offends the equal treatment command of Article 25 of the Constitution as differential treatment is being meted out to persons in the service of Pakistan than to elected holders of public office. This is because persons in the service of Pakistan can still be prosecuted for the offence of corruption and corrupt practices under the 1947 Act as they fall within the definition of public servants.

Section 3 of the Second Amendment is ultra vires the Constitution and of no legal effect on account of absolving persons accused of the offence of corruption and corrupt practices without a judicial verdict which amounts to legislative judgment. Since persons in the service of Pakistan can be tried for offences contained in Section 9(a)(i)-(v) of the NAB Ordinance under the 1947 Act, the bar of Rs.500 million shall continue for such offences. To this extent Section 3 of the Second Amendment is declared to be intra vires the Constitution. However, on account of the fact that persons in the service of Pakistan cannot be tried for the offences noted in Section 9(a)(vi)-(xii) under the 1947 Act or any other accountability law the bar of Rs.500 million will not apply to them for such offences. Section 3 of the Second Amendment is therefore declared to be void and without legal effect for these offences for discharging the accused without trial which is tantamount to legislative judgment and is held to be so from the date of commencement of the Second Amendment.

Section 2 of the 2022 Amendments

Section 2 of the 2022 Amendments has altered Section 4 of the NAB Ordinance. Section 2 of the 2022 Amendments is an attempt by Parliament to rein in the unguided powers of the NAB and to protect the bureaucracy from unnecessary harassment. However, the exceptions granted by Section 2 operate as an enmasse exemption for holders of public office from facing accountability. The freshly inserted condition that the NAB shall provide evidence of monetary or other material benefit received by the holder of public office or a person acting on his behalf to overcome the exceptions listed in Section 2 of the 2022 Amendments cannot be satisfied in the references already pending before the Accountability Courts. Therefore, where such condition will not be met by the NAB the result will be (and in fact has been) that references will be returned. Section 2 of the 2022 Amendments affects the same Fundamental Rights i.e., Articles 9, 14, 23 and 24 and raises the same problems in terms of the accountability of elected holders of public office as Section 3 of the Second Amendment, namely, that whilst persons in the service of Pakistan may still be investigated and prosecuted under the 1947 Act for the offences listed in Section 9(a)(i)-(v) of the NAB Ordinance, elected holders of public office will not be amenable to the jurisdiction of any other accountability fora for the offence of corruption and corrupt practices.

Section 2 of the 2022 Amendments is also declared to be void from the date of commencement of the 2022 Amendments. Section 2 of the 2022 Amendments insofar as these pertain to the offences set out in Section 9(a)(i)-(v) of the NAB Ordinance are declared to be intra vires the Constitution because persons in the service of Pakistan can be prosecuted for these offences under the 1947 Act. However, Section 2 is ultra vires the Constitution from the date of commencement of the 2022 Amendments for the offences listed in Section 9(a)(vi)-(xii) of the NAB Ordinance because persons in the service of Pakistan cannot be tried for such offences under the 1947 Act or any other accountability law.

Sections 8 and 10 of the First Amendment

Section 8 of the First Amendment has significantly altered Section 9 of the NAB Ordinance which lays down various categories of the offence of corruption and corrupt practices. Apart from reducing the circumstances in which the offence of assets beyond means can be made out against the holder of a public office, the First Amendment has made another material change in Section 9(a)(v) of the NAB Ordinance, namely, the obligation on the NAB to prove that an accused has accumulated substantially disproportionate assets 'through corrupt and dishonest means.' This element was previously not a part of Section 9(a)(v). Prior to First Amendment the NAB was not required to demonstrate that the accused had obtained the resources or property 'through corrupt and dishonest means' because the mere presence of disproportionate assets led to the presumption that the accused had engaged in corrupt and dishonest conduct. Such a presumption is provided in Section 14(c) of the NAB Ordinance. The fact of the matter is that the proof of acquisition of assets 'through corrupt and dishonest means' itself constitutes a complete offence. Therefore, by changing Section 9(a)(v), the First Amendment has amalgamated two separate offences into one. As a result, the original offence contained in Section 9(a)(v) has now been rendered redundant. To further ensure the futility of the said offence all of the evidentiary presumptions contained in Section 14 of the NAB Ordinance sustaining the erstwhile offence under Section 9(a)(v) and the remaining offences in the NAB Ordinance have been omitted by Section 10 of the First Amendment.

Further, by the insertion of Explanation II to Section 9(a)(v) of the NAB Ordinance entries in bank statements have been removed from the scope of assets whereas banking transactions can only be regarded as assets if there is evidence of the creation of a corresponding asset through specific transactions. The source, object and quantum of credits/receipts in the bank accounts can now no longer be shown for proving the creation of assets. Nor can debit transfers from one account to another be used to show accumulation of money for the creation of an asset. It goes without saying that bank records are usually the most pivotal evidence in financial crimes. However, by virtue of Explanation II limited resort can be made to them. If accused persons cannot be held to account for owning or possessing assets beyond their means, the natural corollary will be that public assets and wealth will become irrecoverable which would encourage further corruption. This will have a direct adverse effect on the peoples' right to life and to public property because the economic well-being of the State will be prejudiced.

The amended Section 9(a)(v) and the omission of Section 14(c) would treat similarly placed persons differently because while elected holders of public office are relieved from prosecution for the offence under Section 9(a)(v), persons in the service of Pakistan will still have to go through the rigors of trial under the 1947 Act for the same offence. This would offend the equal treatment command of Article 25 of the Constitution.

The phrase 'through corrupt and dishonest means' used in Section 9(a)(v) along with its Explanation II is struck down from the NAB Ordinance from the date of commencement of the First Amendment for being unworkable. Additionally, Section 14 in its entirety is restored to the NAB Ordinance from the date of commencement of the First Amendment. Sections 8 and 10 of the First Amendment are declared invalid to this extent.

The amendments made in Section 9(a)(v) of the NAB Ordinance by Section 8 of the First Amendment are upheld in their entirety as persons in the service of Pakistan can be tried for the same offence under the 1947 Act. However, Section 10 of the First Amendment is struck down from the date of commencement of the First Amendment and Section 14(a), (b) and (d) stand restored to the NAB Ordinance because such presumptions do not exist in any other accountability law.

Section 14 of the First Amendment

Section 14 of the First Amendment has omitted Section 21(g) of the NAB Ordinance, which dealt with International Cooperation Request for mutual legal assistance. It is a common fact that many accused persons being tried under the NAB Ordinance have stashed their wealth and assets abroad in tax havens under fiduciary instruments. However, after the omission of the said provision the admissibility of foreign public documents shall be governed by Article 89(5) of the Qanun-e-Shahadat Order, 1984 ("1984 Order"). The process of admitting foreign public documents under the 1984 Order is protracted and cumbersome because it requires either the production of the original document or a copy which is certified not only by the legal keeper of the document but also by the Embassy of Pakistan. Further, the character of the document needs to be established in accordance with the law of the foreign country. Additionally, foreign private documents would need to be established through the procedure set out in Articles 17 and 79 of the 1984 Order which would require that two attesting witnesses from the foreign country enter personal appearance for proving the execution of the foreign private document. Such a process naturally entails time as the foreign evidence needs to pass through red tape. It therefore defeats the purpose for which Section 21(g) was inserted into the NAB Ordinance. By deleting Section 21(g) from the NAB Ordinance, Section 14 of the First Amendment has made it near impossible for relevant and necessary foreign evidence to be used in the trials of accused persons. It therefore offends the Fundamental Rights of the people to access justice and protect public property from waste and malfeasance.

Section 21(g) is hereby restored in the NAB Ordinance for both elected holders of public office and persons in the service of Pakistan with effect from the date of commencement of the First Amendment for facilitating peoples right to access justice and for protecting their public property from squander. Accordingly, Section 14 of the First Amendment is struck down for being illegal.

Section 14 of the Second Amendment

Section 14 of the Second Amendment has inserted two new provisos to Section 25(b) of the NAB Ordinance, which provision pertains to plea bargains entered into by accused persons. Despite the benign purposes behind introducing the second proviso to Section 25(b), the actual effect of it is that it nullifies Section 25(b) itself which was inserted in the NAB Ordinance to facilitate early recovery of the ill-gotten wealth through settlement where practicable because it places no restrictions on the accused from revoking the plea bargain entered into by him. Further, the second proviso gives the accused an uninhibited right to withdraw from a plea bargain without obtaining the approval of the Accountability Court which in the first place approved the plea bargain. The exclusion of the Accountability Court by the second proviso to Section 25(b) of the NAB Ordinance therefore undermines the independence of the Judiciary and is violative of Article 175(3) of the Constitution. Furthermore allowing an accused person to renege from his plea bargain would be tantamount to conferring an unlawful benefit on him i.e., he would escape the consequences (disqualification to contest elections or to hold public office) stipulated in Section 15(a) of the NAB Ordinance.

The second proviso to Section 25(b) is struck down from the NAB Ordinance from the date of commencement of the Second Amendment. As a result, Section 14 of the Second Amendment is declared to be void and of no legal effect to this extent.

Supreme Court directed that all orders passed by the NAB and/or the Accountability Courts placing reliance on the struck down Sections are declared null and void and of no legal effect. Therefore, all inquiries, investigations and references which have been disposed of on the basis of the struck down Sections are restored to their positions prior to the enactment of the 2022 Amendments and shall be deemed to be pending before the relevant fora. The NAB and all Accountability Courts shall proceed with the restored proceedings in accordance with law. The NAB and/or all other fora shall forthwith return the record of all such matters to the relevant fora and in any event not later than seven days from date of present judgment which shall be proceeded with in accordance with law from the same stage these were at when the same were disposed of/closed/returned. Constitutional petition was allowed.

The Parliament has, through the impugned National Accountability (Amendment) Act, 2022 ("First Amendment") and the National Accountability (Second Amendment) Act, 2022 ("Second Amendment") (collectively referred to as the "2022 Amendments"), merely changed the forums for investigation and trial of the offences of corruption involving the amount or property less than Rs.500 million. After the amendment, the cases of alleged corruption against the holders of public offices that involve the amount or property of value less than Rs.500 million are to be investigated by the anti-corruption investigating agencies and tried by the anti-corruption courts of the Federation and Provinces respectively, under the Prevention of Corruption Act 1947 and the Pakistan Criminal Law Amendment Act 1958, instead of the National Accountability Ordinance, 1999 ("NAB Ordinance"). This matter undoubtedly falls within the exclusive policy domain of the legislature, not justiciable by the courts. This and other challenged amendments, which relate to certain procedural matters, in no way take away or abridge any of the fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution to the people of Pakistan.

The majority view in the present case is not correct as even after the challenged amendments:

(i) the elected holders of public offices (members of Parliament, Provincial Assemblies and Local Government Bodies, etc.) are still triable under the Prevention of Corruption Act 1947 ('PCA') and the Pakistan Penal Code 1860 ('P.P.C.') for the alleged offences of corruption and corrupt practices and no one goes home scot-free. They are still triable under other laws. This aspect has been seriously misunderstood by the majority;

(ii) the challenged amendment of adding the threshold value of Rs.500 million for an offence to be investigated and tried under the NAB Ordinance, simply changes the forums for investigation and trial of the alleged offences of corruption and corrupt practices involving the amount or property less than Rs.500 million. The matter of defining a threshold of value for the investigation and trial of offences under the NAB Ordinance is undoubtedly a policy matter that falls within the exclusive domain of the legislature (Parliament), not of the courts. If a legislature has the constitutional authority to pass a law with regard to a particular subject, it is not for the courts to delve into and scrutinize the wisdom and policy which led the legislature to pass that law; and

(iii) the said and other challenged amendments (law made by the Parliament) do not take away or abridge any of the fundamental rights guaranteed under Articles 9, 14, 23, 24 and 25 of the Constitution. The majority view has assumed the right to accountability of the elected holders of public offices through criminal prosecution as included in the fundamental rights to life, dignity and property guaranteed by Articles 9, 14 and 24 of the Constitution, without making any discussion for establishing its close relationship of such an extent with those fundamental rights that makes this right to be an integral part of them.

Mobashir Hassan v. Federation of Pakistan PLD 2010 SC 265 distinguished.

The omission of Section 14 of the NAB Ordinance by the 2022 Amendments has made no substantial effect in view of the provisions of Article 122 of the Qanun-e- Shahadat 1984. Clauses (a), (b) and (d) of the omitted Section 14 of the NAB Ordinance relate to the intention of the accused other than that which the character and circumstances of the act proved against him by the prosecution suggest. These clauses are, therefore, merely descriptive instances of the applicability of Article 122 read with its illustration (a) of the Qanun-e-Shahadat. And clause (c) of the omitted Section 14 of the NAB Ordinance that relates to possessing assets disproportionate to known sources of income is the descriptive instance of the applicability of Article 122 read with its illustration (b) of the Qanun-e-Shahadat. Notwithstanding such an innocuous effect, the change in the rules of evidence squarely falls within the scope of the legislative competence of the Parliament under Article 142(b) of the Constitution and unless such change offends any of the fundamental rights, it is not justiciable in courts.

Pir Mazharul Haq v. State PLD 2005 SC 63; Mansur-Ul-Haque v. Government of Pakistan PLD 2008 SC 166; State v. Idrees Ghauri 2008 SCMR 1118; Qasim Shah v. State 2009 SCMR 790; Rehmat v. State PLD 1977 SC 515 and Hashim Babar v. State 2010 SCMR 1697 ref.

Similar is the position with the addition of words "through corrupt and dishonest means" by the challenged amendments in Section 9(a)(v) of the NAB Ordinance: It also has no substantial effect on the mode of proving the offence of unaccounted assets possessed by a holder of public office beyond his known sources of income; as when the prosecution succeeds in proving that the particular assets of the accused are disproportionate to his known sources of income (legal means) and are thus acquired through some corrupt and dishonest means, the burden of proving the "fair and honest means" whereby the accused claims to have acquired the same, being within his knowledge, are to be proved by him as per provisions of Article 122, read with its illustration (b), of the Qanun-e-Shahadat.

The majority view has also declared ultra vires the Constitution the addition of Explanation II to Section 9(v) of the NAB Ordinance; the omission of clause (g) of Section 21; and the addition of second proviso to Section 25(b). However in declaring these amendments as ultra vires the Constitution, the majority view has not explained how they infringe any of the fundamental rights or any other provision of the Constitution, nor could the counsel for the petitioner point out in his arguments any such infringement. These amendments being related to "criminal law, criminal procedure and evidence" fall within the legislative competence of the Parliament as per Article 142(b) of the Constitution and in no way take away or abridge any of the fundamental rights in terms of Article 8(2) of the Constitution.

The mode of holding the elected representatives accountable for the offences of corruption and corrupt practices through criminal prosecution has not been provided by the Constitution but by the sub constitutional laws - the P.P.C., the PCA and the NAB Ordinance. If Parliament can enact these laws in the exercise of its ordinary legislative power, it can surely amend them in the exercise of the same legislative power. The argument cannot be acceded to that Parliament after enacting these laws has no power to amend, modify or repeal them.

The counsel for the petitioner could not explain how the right to accountability of the elected holders of public offices through criminal prosecution under the NAB Ordinance is an integral part of the fundamental rights to life, dignity, property and equality or how it partakes of the same basic nature and character as the said fundamental rights so that the exercise of such right is in reality and substance nothing but an instance of the exercise of these fundamental rights. Nor could he establish that the "direct and inevitable effect" of the challenged amendments constitutes an infringement of these fundamental rights. The "effect" of the challenged amendments on these fundamental rights portrayed by him is so "remote and uncertain" that if such effect is accepted as an infringement of the fundamental rights then there would hardly be left any space and scope for Parliament to make laws on any subject; as all laws enacted by Parliament would "ultimately" reach any of the fundamental rights, particularly rights to life or property, in one way or the other through such a long winding conjectural path of farfetched "in turn" effects. Constitutional petition was dismissed.

Surah Al-Anfal, Verse 27:

"O ye that believe! betray not the trust of Allah and the Messenger, nor misappropriate knowingly things entrusted to you."

(Translation by Yusuf Ali)

Through the present Constitution Petition No.21 of 2022 the petitioner has challenged the amendments made to the National Accountability Ordinance, 1999 ("NAB Ordinance") by the National Accountability (Amendment) Act, 2022 ("First Amendment") and the National Accountability (Second Amendment) Act, 2022 ("Second Amendment") (collectively referred to as the "2022 Amendments").

Origins and Content of the Unamended NAB Ordinance

2. Before delving into the facts giving rise to the present petition it would be appropriate to briefly set out the origins and history of the NAB Ordinance. The NAB Ordinance was a successor of the Ehtesab Act, 1997 and was promulgated by the then Chief Executive of Pakistan, General Pervez Musharraf, on 16.11.1999 with retrospective effect from 01.01.1985. The NAB Ordinance is a special law enacted to 'eradicate corruption and corrupt practices and hold accountable all those persons accused of such practices.' To achieve its purposes the NAB Ordinance:

i. Set up Special Courts for conducting trials of the offence of corruption and corrupt practices [refer Sections 5(g) and 16 of the NAB Ordinance prior to the 2022 Amendments];

ii. Defined the categories of holders of public office who are subject to the NAB Ordinance. The two main categories are parliamentarians ("elected holders of public office") and 'persons in the service of Pakistan' [refer Section 5(m) of the NAB Ordinance prior to the 2022 Amendments];

iii. Expanded the class of persons who could be investigated and prosecuted for the offence of corruption and corrupt practices [refer Section 5(o) of the NAB Ordinance prior to the 2022 Amendments];

iv. Set up the NAB for the purposes of conducting pre-trial inquiries and investigations in relation to the offence of corruption and corrupt practices and to prosecute the same [refer Section 6 of the NAB Ordinance prior to the 2022 Amendments];

v. Retained certain categories of the offence of corruption and corrupt practices from previous accountability laws whilst also adding certain new categories such as 'misuse of authority' and 'wilful default' [refer Section 9 (a) (vi) and (viii) of the NAB Ordinance prior to the 2022 Amendments];

vi. Declared the offence of corruption and corrupt practices non-bailable [refer Section 9(b) of the NAB Ordinance prior to the 2022 Amendments];

vii. Retained certain evidentiary presumptions against accused persons whilst also adding a new category of presumption for persons accused of misusing their authority [refer Section 14 of the NAB Ordinance prior to the 2022 Amendments];

viii. Permitted the Chairman NAB or any authorised officer of the Federal Government to seek mutual legal assistance from foreign States [refer Section 21 of the NAB Ordinance prior to the 2022 Amendments]; and

ix. Introduced the concept of a plea bargain [refer Section 25(b) of the NAB Ordinance prior to the 2022 Amendments].

3. The vires of the NAB Ordinance were challenged soon after its promulgation but the Court in Khan Asfandyar Wali v. Federation of Pakistan (PLD 2001 SC 607) upheld its provisions albeit with certain directions and observations. Since then despite three elected governments coming into power the NAB Ordinance has not been repealed and it remains the premier accountability law in the country.

Factual Background

4. With the above context we can now lay down the facts relevant to the present petition. On 22.06.2022 the First Amendment to the NAB Ordinance became an Act of Parliament. Its essential features are:

i. Its provisions have deemed effect from the date of commencement of the NAB Ordinance i.e., 01.01.1985 [refer Section 1(2) of the First Amendment];

ii. It excludes the decisions, advice, reports, opinions tendered by and works, functions, projects, schemes executed by holders of public office and public/ governmental bodies from the ambit of the NAB unless there is proof of the holders of public office or persons acting on their behalf having received any monetary or material benefit from the decisions, advice, reports, opinions, works, functions, projects or schemes [refer Section 2 of the First Amendment];

iii. It has defined 'public at large' to mean at least 100 persons [refer Section 3 of the First Amendment];

iv. It has altered the ingredients of the offences listed in Section 9(a)(v), (vi) and (ix) of the NAB Ordinance [refer Section 8 of the First Amendment];

v. It has given Accountability Courts the power to grant bail to accused persons [refer Section 8 of the First Amendment];

vi. It has omitted Section 14 of the NAB Ordinance which allowed the Accountability Court to draw various evidentiary presumptions against the accused [refer Section 10 of the First Amendment];

vii. It has omitted Section 21(g) of the NAB Ordinance which allowed evidentiary material transferred by a foreign Government to be receivable as evidence in legal proceedings notwithstanding the provisions of the Qanun-e-Shahadat Order, 1984 [refer Section 14 of the First Amendment]; and viii. It has reduced the period of custody of the accused for the purposes of inquiry and investigation from 90 days to 14 days [refer Section 16 of the First Amendment].

5. On 25.06.2022 the petitioner filed the titled Constitution Petition with the prayer that the First Amendment be struck down (albeit with the exception of a few beneficial changes) for violating the Fundamental Rights of the people of Pakistan enshrined in Articles 9 (security of person), 14 (inviolability of dignity of man), 19A (right to information), 24 (protection of property rights) and 25 (equality of citizens) of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution").

6. The first hearing in the case took place on 19.07.2022. During the course of the petitioner's arguments the Second Amendment also became an Act of Parliament on 12.08.2022. The significant features of this amendment are:

i. Its provisions have deemed effect from the date of commencement of the NAB Ordinance i.e., 01.01.1985 [refer Section 1(2) of the Second Amendment];

ii. It has enlarged the category of holders of public office and public/ governmental bodies excluded from the jurisdiction of the NAB [refer Section 2 of the Second Amendment];

iii. It has limited the pecuniary jurisdiction of the NAB to cases involving loss of Rs.500 million or more thereby rendering the NAB incompetent to investigate and prosecute offences of corruption and corrupt practices which have caused a loss of less than Rs.500 million [refer Section 3 of the Second Amendment]; and

iv. It has provided accused persons with the opportunity to renege from the plea bargains entered into by them and approved by the Accountability Court if they fail to make the complete payment as approved by the Accountability Court [refer Section 14 of the Second Amendment].

The petitioner filed an application on 31.08.2022 for amending his Constitution Petition to also challenge the Second Amendment on the touchstone of the Fundamental Rights already raised in respect of the First Amendment. This application was allowed by the Court on 01.09.2022 with the consent of the learned counsel for the respondent Federation. Thereafter, the proceedings continued for more than a year and comprised of 53 hearings in total. During this period of one year two further amendments were passed in relation to the NAB Ordinance, namely:

i. The National Accountability (Amendment) Act, 2023 which became an Act of Parliament on 29.05.2023 ("2023 Act"). This Act has primarily amended Section 4 of the NAB Ordinance to provide a transfer mechanism for pending inquiries, investigations and references to the relevant agency, authority, department, court, tribunal or forum [refer Section 2 of the 2023 Act]; and

ii. The National Accountability (Amendment) Ordinance, 2023 which was promulgated on 03.07.2023 ("2023 Ordinance") by the President. The main feature of this Ordinance is that it has re-inserted the evidentiary presumptions against the accused for certain categories of the offence of corruption and corrupt practices [refer Section 2 of the 2023 Ordinance]. Although this Ordinance has retrospective effect from the date of commencement of the NAB Ordinance the restoration of the presumptions will have no effect on the references that have already been returned by the Accountability Courts to the NAB due to the 2022 Amendments. The 2023 Ordinance has therefore brought about only a cosmetic change in the NAB Ordinance and it does not rectify the deficiency created by the omission of the presumptions by the First Amendment.

Although learned counsel for the petitioner filed his written submissions on the amendments brought about in the NAB Ordinance by the 2023 Act, the primary focus of the proceedings remained the 2022 Amendments and this judgment shall also only examine the vires of the 2022 Amendments though mention may be made of the 2023 Act and the 2023 Ordinance in passing.

7. It is also pertinent to mention here that as a result of the 2022 Amendments a large number of references filed by the NAB in the Accountability Courts were affected. The data, as provided by the Addl. Prosecutor General, NAB, is set out below:

i. 386 references were returned by the Accountability Courts to NAB in 2022 whereas 212 references were returned in 2023. Therefore, a total of 598 references have been returned so far. Of these 35 references pertain to elected holders of public office;

ii. The public money involved in the returned references is more than Rs. 150 billion;

iii. 327 of the 386 references were returned in 2022 due to the minimum pecuniary jurisdiction of the NAB being increased to Rs.500 million under the Second Amendment;

iv. Out of the 598 returned references only 54 have yet been transferred to other courts for further action of which 17 have been transferred to the Custom Court and 4 to the Banking Court. As a result, 544 references are with the NAB in storage; and

v. 127 references remain with the Accountability Courts after the 2022 Amendments.

8. Before we examine the contentions of the learned counsel for the parties, a comparative table detailing the pivotal changes brought about in the content of the NAB Ordinance by the 2022 Amendments is produced below:

In any trial, of an offence punishable under clause (v) of subsection (a) of section 9 of this Ordinance, the fact that the accused person or any other person on his behalf, is in possession, for which the accused person cannot satisfactorily account, of assets or pecuniary resources disproportionate to his known source of income, or that such person has, at or about the time of the commission of the, offence with which he is charged, obtained an accretion to his pecuniary resources or property for which he cannot satisfactorily account, the Court shall presume, unless the contrary is proved, that the accused person is guilty of the offence of corruption and corrupt practices and his conviction therefor shall not be invalid by reason only that it is based solely on such a presumption. d. 9. It may be noticed from the provisions produced above that the 2022 Amendments have indeed brought about a significant change in the legal position under the NAB Ordinance. Whereas prior to the 2022 Amendments the NAB Ordinance applied to all persons in Pakistan after the 2022 Amendments the scope of NAB Ordinance has been significantly restricted with nearly all holders of public office exempted from its application unless there is proof of any monetary or material benefit being received by them or a person acting on their behalf. However, even if the NAB manages to overcome the exceptions listed in the amended Section 4 of the NAB Ordinance the jurisdictional hurdle of an accused having caused a minimum loss of Rs.500 million or more would still need to be crossed. If that is not done the accused will be ousted from the jurisdiction of the NAB. Therefore, it is only when the requirements of Section 4 and Section 5(o) of the NAB Ordinance (as altered by the 2022 Amendments) are satisfied can the accused person be inquired/ investigated into by the NAB and be tried in the Accountability Court.

10. However, by the addition of the new conditions in and explanations to Section 9(a)(v) coupled with the omission of Section 21(g) that permitted the admission of foreign evidentiary material in legal proceedings under the mutual legal assistance regime set up by the United Nations Convention against Corruption, the burden cast on the prosecution to establish that a holder of public office has accumulated unaccounted domestic (or foreign) assets beyond his means has been made formidable. Along with that the presumption noted in Section 14(c) has also been deleted. The result of these amendments relating to proof of the offence of accumulated assets beyond means will be that in the future few persons will be prosecuted for such an offence by the NAB with still lesser convictions under Section 9(a)(v). The above result is in addition to the effect that the 2022 Amendments envisage the return of pending inquiries, investigations and references but do not provide any mechanism for then transferring them to the relevant agency, authority, department, court, tribunal or forum. That procedure was provided for the first time by the 2023 Act. However, the 2023 Act is applicable to only those inquiries, investigations and references of which either the NAB or the Accountability Court is seized. As noted above, there are hundreds of references that have been returned by the Accountability Courts to the NAB pursuant to the 2022 Amendments and prior to the 2023 Act. These references returned in the interregnum between the two amendments have gone into limbo, a fact affirmed by the record supplied by the Additional Prosecutor General, NAB.

11. At this stage it would also be appropriate to note that the offence of corruption and corrupt practice is an umbrella term used to describe different categories of offences noted in Section 9(a) of the NAB Ordinance. The 2022 Amendments have changed three such categories, namely:

i. Assets beyond means [refer Section 9(a)(v) of the NAB Ordinance];

ii. Misuse of authority [refer Section 9(a)(vi) of the NAB Ordinance]; and

iii. Cheating [refer Section 9 (a) (ix) of the NAB Ordinance].

Additionally, Section 9(a)(vii) which criminalised the issuance of any directive, policy, SRO or any other order which granted undue concession or benefit to the holder of public office, his relative, associate, benamidar or any other person has been omitted by the First Amendment. This judgment, however, shall only deal with Section 9(a)(v) as that is the category of the offence of corruption and corrupt practices which prima facie appears to have the widest implications of an adverse nature on the Fundamental Rights of the people.

Arguments of Counsel

12. Both the learned counsel for the petitioner and the learned counsel for the respondent Federation made extensive submissions on the maintainability and merits of the petition. Their main contentions were:

A. Submissions by the Petitioner

i. The titled petition is maintainable under Article 184(3) of the Constitution as the 2022 Amendments directly and adversely affect the Fundamental Rights of the people of Pakistan i.e., Articles 9, 14, 19A, 24 and 25 and violate a salient feature of the Constitution, namely, Parliamentary form of Government blended with Islamic provisions;

ii. The provisions of the 2022 Amendments have effectively decriminalised the offence of 'corruption and corrupt practices' thereby allowing the holders of public office to retain their ill-gotten wealth whilst being exempted from prosecution under the NAB Ordinance. The specific sections of the 2022 Amendments that decriminalise the offence of 'corruption and corrupt practices' and exclude holders of public office from the province of the NAB will be discussed later in the judgment; and

iii. The Court is empowered under Article 184(3) of the Constitution to either strike down the 2022 Amendments or to direct the Federation to bring the 2022 Amendments in line with the requirements of the Constitution and Fundamental Rights.

B. Submissions by the Respondent Federation

i. The instant Constitution Petition is not maintainable because it does not satisfy the twin criteria laid down in Article 184(3) of the Constitution, the petitioner lacks bona fide and locus standi to challenge the 2022 Amendments and the petition at the present stage is premature and based on speculations and conjectures;

ii. No cogent reason has been given by the petitioner for not challenging the 2022 Amendments before the High Courts;

iii. The 2022 Amendments have been enacted after taking into consideration the criticisms levelled against the NAB Ordinance, including by the Superior Judiciary in its judgments/ orders; and

iv. An incorrect perception is being created that the 2022 Amendments have decriminalised the offence of corruption and corrupt practices because there exist other accountability foras in the country which can investigate, prosecute and try accused persons for the offences which no longer fall within the ambit of the NAB.

13. Apart from the above submissions, information was also sought from the Additional Prosecutor General, NAB (produced above in para 7) regarding the particulars of the references that have been returned to the NAB pursuant to the 2022 Amendments and their fate since. Written submissions were also provided by the learned Attorney General for Pakistan who predominantly attacked the maintainability of the present petition and endorsed the submissions of the learned counsel for the respondent Federation in toto.

14. Having heard the learned counsel for all the parties and having examined the available record the Court reserved its judgment on 05.09.2023. Our decision on the present petition and the reasons for the same are set out hereinbelow.

Maintainability

15. The learned counsel for the respondent Federation strongly objected to the maintainability of the titled petition for failing to satisfy the jurisdictional requirements of Article 184(3) of the Constitution. It was his case that the petitioner had failed to identify the precise Fundamental Right that had been violated by the 2022 Amendments. Additionally, he submitted that the petitioner lacked locus standi and bona fides to challenge the 2022 Amendments because firstly, when he was Prime Minister his government introduced many of the amendments that have been consolidated by the 2022 Amendments and secondly, he had committed a dereliction of duty by refusing to sit in the National Assembly and raise concerns regarding the 2022 Amendments therein. Learned counsel also stated that the dispute raised by the petition in respect of the 2022 Amendments is hypothetical as there are no facts before the Court as a result of which the Court will be considering and deciding the question of vires of the 2022 Amendments in the abstract.

16. In response, learned counsel for the petitioner consistently maintained his stance that the cumulative effect of the 2022 Amendments is that the offence of corruption and corrupt practices committed by the holders of public office has been decriminalised thereby violating the following Fundamental Rights of the people of Pakistan:

> "9. Security of person. No person shall be deprived of life or liberty save in accordance with law.
> 14. Inviolability of dignity of man, etc. (1) The dignity of man and, subject to law, the privacy of home, shall be inviolable.
> 24. Protection of property rights. (1) No person shall be compulsorily deprived of his property save in accordance with law.
> 25. Equality of citizens. (1) All citizens are equal before law and are entitled to equal protection of law."

Learned counsel for the petitioner further submitted that since the 2022 Amendments directly and adversely affect the Fundamental Rights of the public not only are the conditions of Article 184(3) satisfied but also the objections of learned counsel for the respondent Federation regarding bona fides and locus standi of the petitioner lose force.

17. As the learned counsel for the respondent Federation has primarily attacked the maintainability of the instant Constitution Petition, we shall examine that question first. The Court has been conferred original jurisdiction by Article 184(3) of the Constitution which reads:

> ...
> (3) Without prejudice to the provisions of Article 199, the Supreme Court shall, if it considers that a question of public importance with reference to the enforcement of any of the Fundamental Rights conferred by Chapter I of Part II is involved, have the power to make an order of the nature mentioned in the said Article."

By virtue of the afore-noted provision the Court can pass appropriate orders in cases where the enforcement of a Fundamental Right(s) affecting the public at large is involved. It is by now well-established in our jurisprudence that acts of corruption and corrupt practices do infringe the Fundamental Rights of the public and thus meet the test of Article 184(3). Reliance in this regard is placed on the decisions of the Court in Suo

Motu Case No.19 of 2016 (2017 SCMR 683); Corruption in Hajj Arrangements in 2010 (PLD 2011 SC 963); Bank of Punjab v. Haris Steel Industries (Pvt.) Ltd. (PLD 2010 SC 1109). For reference relevant passages from the cases of Corruption in Hajj Arrangements (supra) and Bank of Punjab are produced below:

"Corruption in Hajj Arrangements

28. ...However, when the cases of massive corruption, not only one, but so many came for hearing, therefore, this Court in the exercise of its constitutional jurisdiction had enforced fundamental rights of the citizens under Articles 4, 9, 14 and 25 of the Constitution... Undoubtedly, whenever the Court will notice that there is corruption or corrupt practices, it would be very difficult to compromise or digest it because the public money of the country cannot be allowed to be looted by any one whatsoever status he may have.

Bank of Punjab

25. A perusal of the above quoted provision [Art. 184(3)] would demonstrate that this Court was possessed of powers to make any order of the nature mentioned in Article-199 of the Constitution, if, in the opinion of this Court, a question of public importance relating to the enforcement of any of the Fundamental Rights was involved in the matter[.] As has been mentioned in the preceding parts of this order, what was at stake was not only a colossal amount of money/property belonging to at least one million depositors i.e. a large section of the public but what was reportedly at stake was also the very existence of the Bank of Punjab which could have sunk on account of the mega fraud in question and with which would have drowned not only the said one million depositors but even others dealing with the said Bank. And what had been sought from this Court was the protection and defence of the said public property. It was thus not only the right of this Court but in fact its onerous obligation to intervene to defend the said assault on the said fundamental right to life and to property of the said public."

18. Although learned counsel for the respondent Federation had no cavil with the proposition that the Court can undertake proceedings in the original jurisdiction to check corruption and corrupt practices committed by the holders of public office, he stressed that unlike the cases previously decided by the Court the instant matter pinpoints no specific act of corruption and/or corrupt practice. In fact, the entire controversy raised by the petitioner is conjectural and academic. However, we are not persuaded with this argument of learned counsel because as noted above in paras 7 and 9-10, the 2022 Amendments have limited the NAB's jurisdiction thus excluding hundreds of pending references from trial before any forum and have also made the proof of the offence of corruption and corrupt practices significantly harder for references that satisfy the jurisdictional requirements of Section 4 and Section 5(o) of the NAB Ordinance. We think it would be a legal absurdity to hold that whilst the Court can take cognizance of individual acts of corruption and corrupt practices under Article 184(3) it cannot do so when amendments have been introduced in the accountability law i.e., the NAB Ordinance which exclude the jurisdiction of the NAB to investigate and prosecute holders of public office in two significant respects thereby ex-facie violating Articles 9, 14, 23 and 24 of the Constitution by exonerating the holders of public office from their alleged acts of corruption and corrupt practices by failing to provide a forum for their trial. The 2022 Amendments have therefore rendered the NAB toothless in accomplishing its objective of 'eradicat[ing] corruption and corrupt practices and hold[ing] accountable all those persons accused of such practices' and have left public property belonging to the people of Pakistan vulnerable to waste and malfeasance by the holders of public office. Such interference in the NAB's jurisdiction and powers most certainly affects the Fundamental Rights of the people at large as noted by the Court in Progress Report of NAB in OGRA Case (2015 SCMR 1813):

"3. ...We may emphasize that NAB has been created as a principal watchdog against corruption in Pakistan. Corruption is itself rightly perceived as eating into the very foundation and vitals of society. A corruption watchdog which, therefore, does not function efficiently adversely affects inter alia, the fundamental rights in Articles 14, 18, 19A, 23 and 24 of the Constitution."

Although the above observation was made by the Court in the context of the NAB's poor handling of the Oil and Gas Regulatory Authority Scam, we see no reason why the same rationale cannot apply to the present matter where the legislature through the 2022 Amendments has left the NAB ineffective in pursuing cases of corruption and corrupt practices exposing the public property of the people to misappropriation. We accordingly hold that the present Constitution Petition fulfils the requirements of Article 184(3) of the Constitution and so is maintainable.

19. Be that as it may, the learned counsel for the respondent Federation raised other preliminary objections to the petition as well. One of them being that the petitioner does not possess either locus standi or bona fides to challenge the 2022 Amendments because he never questioned the 2022 Amendments in Parliament. However, it is settled law that when the Court exercises jurisdiction under Article 184(3) of the Constitution it is not concerned with the antecedents or standing of the person who has filed the petition because that person is merely acting as an informant. Instead, the Court favours a substantive approach focusing more on the content of the petition and whether the same crosses the threshold set out in Article 184(3). In this respect, we are fortified by the dicta of the Court in Muhammad Yasin v. Federation of Pakistan (PLD 2012 SC 132):

"24. Before concluding our discussion on the issue of maintainability of this petition we need to address the respondent's submission that the petition has been filed mala fide. We have found no lawful basis for this submission... we have already held in the case titled Moulvi Iqbal Haider v. Capital Development Authority and others (PLD 2006 SC 394 at 413) that the contents of a petition under Article 184 (3) ibid will override concerns arising on account of the conduct or antecedents of a petitioner..."

Likewise, the Court in Muhammad Ashraf Tiwana v. Pakistan (2013 SCMR 1159) observed that:

"16. ...The questions which the contents of this petition have brought to light are, without doubt, matters of public importance and, as discussed above relate directly to the enforcement of fundamental rights. Therefore, concerns about the conduct or antecedents of the petitioner, if any, would stand overridden by the contents of the petition. We may also emphasize that exercise of jurisdiction under Article 184(3) ibid is not dependent on the existence of a petitioner..."

20. We have already noted above that the instant petition satisfies the conditions of Article 184(3), therefore, any apprehensions about the locus standi and bona fides of the petitioner stand overridden. Insofar as the prior amendments passed during the petitioner's term as Prime Minister are concerned, the same were promulgated through different Ordinances all of which have lapsed and are no longer in the field. On the other hand, the 2022 Amendments have come into being through Acts of Parliament and will remain on the statute book unless these are repealed by Parliament in the future. Further, the amendments brought about in the petitioner's tenure did not contain analogous retrospectivity clauses, as exist in the 2022 Amendments, as a result of which the impact of the Ordinances on pending references and past and closed transactions was limited.

21. The learned counsel for the respondent Federation also submitted that the petitioner could have voiced his grievances against the 2022 Amendments in the National Assembly as a member of the Opposition. Indeed, in the Court's recent judgment reported as Pakistan Peoples Party Parliamentarians v. Federation of Pakistan (PLD 2022 SC 574) the necessity of a robust Opposition for a healthy democracy was emphasised. However, the choice to remain in or walk out of Parliament is a political decision made consciously by parliamentarians and their political parties. The decision being political in nature the Court cannot and does not sit in judgment over such matters. In any event, we have already held above that locus standi is not an impediment when the Court is exercising original jurisdiction. Therefore, to dismiss the instant petition solely on the ground that the petitioner did not object to the 2022 Amendments in the National Assembly would result in the Court deciding the question of maintainability on the basis of an irrelevant consideration. More so when we have already held above that the 2022 Amendments do raise questions of public importance having a bearing on the Fundamental Rights of the people of Pakistan.

22. Learned counsel for the respondent Federation lastly took exception with the Court exercising its original jurisdiction in this matter instead of first letting the High Courts decide the vires of the 2022 Amendments. He relied on Manzoor Elahi v. Federation of Pakistan (PLD 1975 SC 66) and Benazir Bhutto v. Federation of Pakistan (PLD 1988 SC 416) to reiterate that the Court's original jurisdiction is to be exercised sparingly and in deference to the High Courts jurisdiction under Article 199 of the Constitution. We are of the view that the Court's judgment in Suo Motu No.1 of 2023 dated 01.03.2023 has already dealt with this point. For reference, the relevant passage is produced below:

"45. ...Secondly, it appears that the petition under Article 184(3) [Manzoor Elahi v. Federation of Pakistan] was the first of its kind before the Court under the present Constitution... The jurisprudence as regards Article 184(3) was thus quite literally in its infancy. In the half-century that has since passed, things have of course changed enormously. The jurisprudence has matured, developed and deepened and the Court has developed an altogether more muscular approach in its understanding and application of Article 184(3). There has been a sea change in how the Court views this constitutional power. Thus, e.g., the observation of the learned Chief Justice, that "[t]his is an extraordinary power which should be used with circumspection" (pg. 79) is, with respect, hardly reflective of present times. Time does not stand still and nor does the jurisprudence of the Court. In the common law tradition, the law is connected to the past but not shackled by it."

We find ourselves in agreement with the dicta cited above and endorse it. Indeed, on an examination of the jurisprudence of the Court that has developed under Article 184(3) of the Constitution it becomes clear that since the decisions in Manzoor Elahi (supra) and Benazir Bhutto (supra) there have been numerous instances where the Court has considered and decided the vires of legislation in its original jurisdiction. Some of these cases are Mehram Ali v. Federation of Pakistan (PLD 1998 SC 1445) which decided the vires of the Anti-Terrorism Act, 1997; Liaquat Hussain v. Federation of Pakistan (PLD 1999 SC 504) which decided the vires of the Pakistan Armed Forces (Acting in Aid of the Civil Power) Ordinance, 1998; Asfandyar Wali (supra) which decided the vires of the NAB Ordinance; Mobashir Hassan v. Federation of Pakistan (PLD 2010 SC 265) which decided the vires of the National Reconciliation Ordinance, 2007; Baz Muhammad Kakar v. Federation of Pakistan (PLD 2012 SC 923) which decided the vires of the Contempt of Court Act, 2012; Zulfiqar Ahmed Bhutta v. Federation of Pakistan (PLD 2018 SC 370) which decided the vires of Sections 203 and 232 of the Elections Act, 2017.

23. In light of the above discussion, we find there to be no merit in the objections raised by the learned counsel for the respondent Federation in respect of the maintainability of the present Constitution Petition. As a result, his objections are rejected and the titled petition is declared to be maintainable under Article 184(3) of the Constitution.

Impugned Provisions of the 2022 Amendments

24. In his Constitution Petition the petitioner has sought the nullification of virtually the entire 2022 Amendments. However, on a careful examination of these we are not convinced that the Fundamental Rights of the people of Pakistan are violated by each and every section of the 2022 Amendments. Our considered view at the outset about the provisions of the 2022 Amendments is that prima facie judicial scrutiny of only Sections 2, 8, 10 and 14 of the First Amendment and Sections 2, 3 and 14 of the Second Amendment is required. These provisions have brought about the following modifications in the NAB Ordinance:

i. Section 3 of the Second Amendment has changed the definition of 'offence' in Section 5(o) of the NAB Ordinance by inserting a minimum pecuniary jurisdiction of Rs. 500 million below which value the NAB cannot take cognizance of the offence of corruption and corrupt practices;

ii. Section 2 of the First Amendment by inserting subsections (a)-(f) into Section 4 of the NAB Ordinance and Section 2 of the Second Amendment by adding subsection (g) in Section 4 of the NAB Ordinance has excluded certain holders of public office from application of the NAB Ordinance and thereby limited its effect;

iii. Section 8 of the First Amendment has inserted new ingredients in the offence under Section 9 (a) (v) of the NAB Ordinance and added explanations thereto. Section 9(a)(v) criminalizes the act of holding assets beyond means;

iv. Section 10 of the First Amendment has deleted Section 14 of the NAB Ordinance which provides evidentiary presumptions that may be drawn against the accused;

v. Section 14 of the First Amendment has deleted Section 21(g) of the NAB Ordinance which permitted foreign evidence to be admissible in legal proceedings under the mutual legal assistance regime; and

vi. Section 14 of the Second Amendment has added a second proviso to Section 25(b) of the NAB Ordinance whereby an accused who enters into a plea bargain duly approved by the Accountability Court under Section 25(b) can renege from the same if he has not paid the full amount of the bargain settlement as approved by the Accountability Court.

The remaining provisions of the 2022 Amendments may be considered later in an appropriate case.

Section 3 of the Second Amendment

25. As already noted above in para 6, Section 3 of the Second Amendment has amended Section 5(o) of the NAB Ordinance to set the minimum pecuniary jurisdiction of the NAB at Rs.500 million for inquiring into and investigating cases involving the commission of the offence of corruption and corrupt practices. As a result, offences that cause loss valued at less than Rs.500 million no longer come within the ambit of the NAB. The apparent rationale for enhancing the pecuniary jurisdiction is noted in the Statement of Objects and Reasons attached to the Second Amendment. It reads:

"...Through the insertion of proposed amendments, the pecuniary jurisdiction of the NAB has been fixed to take only action against mega scandals..."

The necessity to streamline the jurisdiction of the NAB and focus its efforts on mega scandals i.e., those involving an amount of Rs.500 million or more was explained by learned counsel for the respondent Federation by reference to the jurisprudence of the Superior Courts. Reliance was placed on State v. Hanif Hyder (2016 SCMR 2031) wherein the Court observed:

"2. During the hearing of these proceedings, we have noticed that the NAB in exercise of powers under section 9 of the NAB Ordinance has started taking cognizance of the petty matters and therefore, notice was issued to the D.G. NAB to submit report in regard to the enquiries and or investigations, which the NAB has undertaken in respect of the amounts involv[ing] less than 100 Million and References, if any, filed which involved amount less than 100 million. A list has been provided. It is evident from this list that prima facie the enquiries and investigations undertaken by the NAB are not of mega scandals and apparently petty matters have been enquired into on the complaints. This is not the wisdom behind legislation of NAB Ordinance. The NAB Ordinance was primarily legislated to counter mega scandals and book the persons who are involved in mega scandals of corruption and corrupt practices."

A decision by the Division Bench of the Sindh High Court reported as Amjad Hussain v. National Accountability Bureau (2017 YLR 1) was also referred:

"11. Learned PGA NAB on instructions from the Chairman NAB made written as well as oral submissions in order to assist the Court. He submitted that NAB was aware of this issue of pecuniary jurisdiction and in this respect had passed an SOP in respect of the monetary value of cases which NAB would pursue which is set out below for ease of reference.

"Priority for Cognizance of Cases:

iii. Cases of former/sitting legislators of National Assembly, Senate and Provincial Assemblies (including ministers/advisers etc.) and elected representatives of local bodies, where amount involved is more than Rs. 100 million.

iv. Cases involving interest of members of public at large where the numbers of defrauded person are more than 50 persons and amount involved is not less than Rs. 100 million.

v. Cases against public servants, whether serving or retired, Bankers, Businessmen and Contractors where amount involved is more than Rs. 100 million.

40. ...taking into account the above discussion on the pecuniary jurisdiction of NAB including NAB making the best use of its human resources, equipment, office space etc., and budget limitations we hereby endorse by way of judicial order the NAB's SOP for dealing with pecuniary jurisdiction which is set out at para 11 of this order... as we consider the figure of Rs. 100 M to be significantly large to justify the intervention of the NAB being the premier anti corruption body in the Country..."

The above dictum of the Sindh High Court was endorsed by the Islamabad High Court in Iftikhar Ali Haideri v. National Accountability Bureau (2019 YLR 255).

26. It becomes clear from the pronouncements of the Superior Courts quoted above that the principal focus of the NAB is to mainly prosecute mega scandals. But whilst the judgments of the Superior Courts indicate that the minimum pecuniary threshold of NAB should be Rs. 100 million (except in limited circumstances where offences less than Rs. 100 million cannot be prosecuted by any other accountability agency), Section 3 of the Second Amendment has increased this minimum threshold to Rs.500 million. No cogent argument was put forward by learned counsel for the respondent Federation as to why Parliament has fixed a higher amount of Rs.500 million for the NAB to entertain complaints and file corresponding references in the Accountability Courts when the Superior Courts have termed acts of corruption and corrupt practices causing loss to the tune of Rs. 100 million as mega scandals.

27. It is accepted that Parliament is empowered to legislate freely within its legislative competence laid down by the Constitution. However, it is also a settled principle of our constitutional dispensation that the three organs of the State i.e., the Legislature, the Executive and the Judiciary perform distinct functions and that one organ of the State cannot encroach into the jurisdiction of another organ. Reliance is placed on the case of Mobashir Hassan (supra):

"34. ... It is also to be borne in mind that Constitution envisages the trichotomy of powers amongst three organs of the State, namely the legislature, executive and the judiciary. The legislature is assigned the task of law making, the executive to execute such law and the judiciary to interpret the laws. None of the organs of the State can encroach upon the field of the others..."

Nonetheless, by enacting Section 3 of the Second Amendment we are afraid that Parliament has in fact assumed the powers of the Judiciary because by excluding from the ambit of the NAB Ordinance the holders of public office who have allegedly committed the offence of corruption and corrupt practices involving an amount of less than Rs.500 million Parliament has effectively absolved them from any liability for their acts. This is a function which under the Constitution only the Judiciary can perform (with the exception of the President who has been conferred the power to grant a pardon under Article 45 of the Constitution). A similar view was also taken by the Court in Mobashir Hassan (supra) when it was examining the vires of Section 7 of the National Reconciliation Ordinance, 2007 under which pending investigations and proceedings initiated by the NAB against holders of public office were withdrawn and terminated with immediate effect:

"119. So far as withdrawal from the cases inside or outside the country, as per Section 33[A] of the NAO, 1999, inserted through Section 7 of the NRO, 2007, is concerned, it would mean that the 'holders of public office' have been absolved from the charge of corruption and corrupt practices, therefore, by adopting such procedure, the legislative authority had transgressed its jurisdiction, because such powers are only available to the judiciary and the Constitution provides guarantee to secure the independence of the judiciary..."

28. Learned counsel for the respondent Federation attempted to justify this encroachment into the jurisdiction of the Judiciary by submitting that merely because the minimum pecuniary threshold of the NAB has been increased does not mean that holders of public office stand absolved. That other accountability fora exist in the country where the trials of the accused holders of public office who have been removed from the jurisdiction of the NAB can be held. The Court having regard to the fact, as noted above in para 2, that holders of public office under the NAB Ordinance fall into two categories i.e., elected holders of public office and persons in the service of Pakistan, posed the following query to learned counsel for the respondent

Federation 'if the Accountability Court were to send/transfer a Reference against a parliamentarian [elected holders of public office] for lack of its jurisdiction, then which would be the competent transferee court to adjudicate the Reference and under which law?' In his written response, the learned counsel referred to the provisions of Prevention of Corruption Act, 1947 ("1947 Act"); Pakistan Penal Code, 1860 ("P.P.C."); Income Tax Ordinance, 2001; and Anti-Money Laundering Act, 2010. For present purposes the two relevant laws are the 1947 Act and the P.P.C.. However, on a careful examination of these legislations it becomes clear that the two are applicable only to public servants. Public servant is defined in the P.P.C. in Section 21 as follows:

"21. "Public servant".---The words "public servant" denote a person falling under any of the descriptions hereinafter following, namely:-

Second.- Every Commissioned Officer in the Military, Naval or Air Forces of Pakistan while serving under the Federal Government or any Provincial Government;

Third.- Every Judge;

Fourth.- Every officer of a Court of Justice whose duty it is, as such officer, to investigate or report on any matter of law or fact, or to make, authenticate, or keep any document, or to take charge or dispose of any property, or to execute any judicial process, or to administer any oath, or to interpret, or to preserve order in the Court; and every person specially authorized by a Court of Justice to perform any of such duties;

Fifth.- Every juryman, assessor, or member of a panchayat assisting a Court of Justice or public servant;

Sixth.- Every arbitrator or other person to whom any cause or matter has been referred for decision or report by any Court of Justice, or by any other competent public authority;

Seventh.- Every person who holds any office by virtue of which he is empowered to place or keep any person in confinement;

Eighth.- Every officer of the Government whose duty it is, as such officer, to prevent offences, to give information of offences, to bring offenders to justice, or to protect the public health, safety or convenience;

Ninth.- Every officer whose duty it is, as such officer, to take, receive, keep or expend any property on behalf of the Government, or to make any survey, assessment or contract on behalf of the Government, or to execute any revenue-process, or to investigate, or to report, on any matter affecting the pecuniary interests of the Government, or to make, authenticate or keep any document relating to the pecuniary interests of the Government, or to prevent the infraction of any law for the protection of the pecuniary interests of the Government, and every officer in the service or pay of the Government or remunerated by fees or commission for the performance of any public duty;

Tenth.- Every officer whose duty it is, as such officer, to take, receive, keep or expend any property, to make any survey or assessment or to levy any rate or tax for any secular common purpose of any village, town or district, or to make, authenticate or keep any document for the ascertaining of the rights of the people of any village, town or district;

Eleventh.- Every person who holds any office in virtue of which he is empowered to prepare, publish, maintain or revise an electoral roll or to conduct an election or part of an election."

(emphasis supplied)

Section 2 of the 1947 Act also relies on Section 21 of the P.P.C. to define public servant. Therefore, in both laws the term 'public servant' has an identical meaning.

29. One example of public servants is given in Article 260 of the Constitution:

"260. Definitions. (1) In the Constitution, unless the context otherwise requires, the following expressions have the meaning hereby respectively assigned to them, that is to say,-

"service of Pakistan" means any service, post or office in connection with the affairs of the Federation or of a Province, and includes an All-Pakistan Service, service in the Armed Forces and any other service declared to be a service of Pakistan by or under Act of [Majlis-e-Shoora (Parliament)] or of a Provincial Assembly, but does not include service as... member of a House or a Provincial Assembly;"

It may be noticed that under the Constitution persons in the service of Pakistan are those who are holding posts in connection with the affairs of the Federation or Province. As a result, such persons are either dealing with the property of the Federal/ Provincial Government or with the pecuniary interests of the Federal/ Provincial Government. They, therefore, come within the definition of public servant set out in the P.P.C. and adopted by the 1947 Act and so can be prosecuted under these laws for the offence of corruption and corrupt practices. However, elected holders of public office do not qualify as public servants under the guise of being in the service of Pakistan because Article 260 of the Constitution specifically excludes them from such service. Further, although no authoritative pronouncement has been delivered in this respect by the Superior Courts of Pakistan, the Indian Supreme Court in R.S. Nayak v. A.R. Antulay (AIR 1984 SC 684) has categorically held that members of the Legislative Assembly (equivalent to our elected holders of public office) are not public servants within the meaning of Section 21 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860 (which is similar to Section 21 of the P.P.C.).[1] Further the Bangladesh Supreme Court in Zakir Hossain Sarkar v. State [70 DLR (2018) 203] has noted that a Member of Parliament (equivalent to our elected holders of public office) is not a public servant because he is neither appointed by the Government nor paid by it and he does not discharge his constitutional duties of law-making in accordance with the rules and regulations made by the Executive (para 23 of that judgment). The result is that contrary to what learned counsel for the respondent Federation has submitted elected holders of public office are not triable either under the 1947 Act or the P.P.C. for the offence of corruption and corrupt practices.

30. This legal situation also explains why the Holders of Representative Offices (Prevention of Misconduct) Act, 1976 ("1976 Act") was enacted and Holders of Representative Offices (Punishment for Misconduct) Order, 1977 ("1977 Order") was promulgated. Both these laws applied only to holders of representative office i.e., elected holders of public office and subjected them to prosecution for offences similar to those prescribed in the NAB Ordinance. If the submission of learned counsel for the respondent Federation is correct that elected holders of public office can be tried under the 1947 Act and the P.P.C. then there would have been no need to pass the 1976 Act or the 1977 Order since both the 1947 Act and the P.P.C. precede these laws. Ultimately, the 1976 Act was repealed by the Parliament and Provincial Assemblies (Disqualification for Membership) (Amendment) Ordinance, 1990 whereas the 1977 Order was repealed by the Ehtesab Act, 1997. As noted above in para 2, the Ehtesab Act, 1997 was the predecessor of the NAB Ordinance and the latter repealed the former. This chain of legislative events shows that in 1976 Parliament became aware of the vacuum in the law whereby persons in the service of Pakistan could be held to account for their corruption and corrupt practices but elected holders of public office could not. Therefore, Parliament passed the 1976 Act. The said Act was then succeeded by multiple legislations which had the same object i.e., accountability of elected holders of public office with the NAB Ordinance being the latest and the most comprehensive effort so far to accomplish this objective.

31. By amending Section 5(o) of the NAB Ordinance to raise the minimum pecuniary threshold of the NAB to Rs.500 million, Section 3 of the Second Amendment has undone the legislative efforts beginning in 1976 to bring elected holders of public office within the ambit of accountability laws because by virtue of Section 3 elected holders of public office have been granted both retrospective and prospective exemption from accountability laws. Once excluded from the jurisdiction of the NAB no other accountability fora can take cognizance of their alleged acts of corruption and corrupt practices as noted above. Such blanket immunity offends Articles 9, 14, 23 and 24 of the Constitution because it permits and encourages the squandering of public assets and wealth by elected holders of public office as there is no forum for their accountability. This in turn affects the economic well-being of the State and ultimately the quality and dignity of the peoples lives because as more resources are diverted towards illegal activities less resources remain for the provision of essential services to the people such as health facilities, education institutes and basic infrastructure etc. The immunity also negates Article 62(1)(f) of the Constitution which mandates that only 'sagacious, righteous, non -profligate, honest and ameen' persons enter Parliament. It also offends the equal treatment command of Article 25 of the Constitution as differential treatment is being meted out to persons in the service of Pakistan than to elected holders of public office. This is because persons in the service of Pakistan can still be prosecuted for the offence of corruption and corrupt practices under the 1947 Act as they fall within the definition of public servants (refer para 29 above). The 1947 Act shares some of the essential features of the NAB Ordinance, namely, it provides for the prosecution of public servants who have accumulated assets beyond means [refer Section 5(1)(e) of the 1947 Act] and it permits the drawing of an evidentiary presumption against public servants who cannot account for their disproportionate pecuniary resources or property [refer Section 5(3) of the 1947 Act]. Consequently, if Section 3 of the Second Amendment is allowed to remain on the statute book there will be an anomalous situation in that elected holders of public office will be exempted from accountability under the amended and much relaxed requirements of the NAB Ordinance even though they 'while acting as trustees and the chosen representatives of the people, take decisions which are often of grave consequence for the protection of the economic, political and over-all national interests of the people of Pakistan. In other words, theirs is a fiduciary duty of the highest order' [ref: Mehmood Akhtar Naqvi v. Federation of Pakistan (PLD 2012 SC 1089) at para 6 of Justice Jawwad S. Khawaja's concurring note] whilst the persons in the service of Pakistan will have to undergo the rigours of accountability laws without exception. Such a situation cannot be countenanced by either the Constitution or the law.

32. In this regard, we must also note that the learned counsel for the respondent Federation filed his concise statement on 12.09.2023 wherein he has attached the decision/ guideline of the Chairman NAB dated 08.08.2023 in respect of returned references. The decision/ guideline reads:

"Therefore, a policy/decision has been made by the competent authority that all References which have been returned to NAB shall now be placed before the Accountability Courts by filing an application pleading this amendment as per case law laid down in the judgment Adam Amin Chaudhry v. NAB in W.P. No.3787/2022 and requesting that the Reference be revived and re-examined, the viewpoint of the NAB be solicited and thereafter it be forwarded in terms of section 4(4)(d) of the National Accountability (Amendment) Act, 2023 to the appropriate forum."

We have already noted above in para 6 that the 2023 Act has provided a mechanism for transferring pending inquiries, investigations and references to the relevant agency, authority, department, court, tribunal or forum if the NAB or Accountability Courts are seized of these matters. But returned references can by no stretch of the imagination be considered as pending before the Accountability Courts. Therefore, the above decision/ guideline issued by Chairman NAB a year after the

First Amendment to seek the revival of the 544 references returned to the NAB that are lying in storage to have them forwarded to the appropriate forum cannot vest jurisdiction in the Accountability Courts to reopen cases of which it is not seized. In any event, the decision/ guideline still does not resolve the pivotal issue i.e., that there is neither an accountability law other than the NAB Ordinance and an investigating authority other than the NAB nor any accountability forum other than the Accountability Court where the acts of corruption and corrupt practices committed by elected holders of public office can be investigated and prosecuted. The decision/ guideline may therefore prove effective only in cases of corruption and corrupt practices where the accused are persons in the service of Pakistan. Consequently, the decision/ guideline issued by Chairman NAB has no bearing on the vires of Section 3 of the Second Amendment which is unconstitutional on account of absolving persons accused of the offence of corruption and corrupt practices without a judicial verdict which amounts to legislative judgment [refer Province of Punjab v. National Industrial Cooperative Credit Corporation (2000 SCMR 567) at para 8].

Declaration on Section 3 of the Second Amendment

A. Elected Holders of Public Office

i. On account of our analysis noted above in paras 27- 32, Section 3 of the Second Amendment is declared to be ultra vires the Constitution and of no legal effect from the date of commencement of the Second Amendment.

B. Persons in the Service of Pakistan

ii. The cases of persons in the service of Pakistan can be categorised under two headings, namely, offences which are common to both the 1947 Act and the NAB Ordinance and offences which are unique to the NAB Ordinance.

iii. The offences which are common to the 1947 Act and the NAB Ordinance are those listed in Section 9(a)(i)-(v) of the NAB Ordinance whereas the offences in 9 (a) (vi)- (xii) are distinct to the NAB Ordinance.

iv. Since persons in the service of Pakistan can be tried for offences contained in Section 9(a)(i)-(v) of the NAB Ordinance under the 1947 Act the bar of Rs.500 million shall continue for such offences. To this extent Section 3 of the Second Amendment is declared to be intra vires the Constitution.

v. However, on account of the fact that persons in the service of Pakistan cannot be tried for the offences noted in Section 9(a)(vi)-(xii) under the 1947 Act or any other accountability law the bar of Rs.500 million will not apply to them for such offences. Section 3 of the Second Amendment is therefore declared to be void and without legal effect for these offences for discharging the accused without trial which is tantamount to legislative judgment and is held to be so from the date of commencement of the Second Amendment.

33. Section 2 of the 2022 Amendments has altered Section 4 of the NAB Ordinance. For reference Section 4, as amended by the 2022 Amendments, is produced below:

"4. Application: (1) This Ordinance extends to the whole of Pakistan and shall apply to all persons, including those persons who are or have been in the service of Pakistan, except persons and transactions specified in subsection (2).

(2) The provisions of this Ordinance shall not be applicable to the following persons or transactions, namely:-

(a) all matters pertaining to Federal, Provincial or Local taxation, other levies or imposts, including refunds, or loss of exchequer pertaining to taxation, transactions or amounts duly covered by amnesty schemes of Government of Pakistan;

(b) decisions of Federal or Provincial Cabinet, their Committees or Sub-Committees, Council of Common Interests (CCI), National Economic Council (NEC), National Finance Commission (NFC), Executive Committee of the National Economic Council (ECNEC), Central Development Working Party (CDWP), Provincial Development Working Party (PDWP), Departmental Development Working Party (DDWP), Board of Directors of State Owned Enterprises (SOEs), Board of Trustees/Directors of all Statutory Bodies, the State Bank of Pakistan and such other bodies except where the holder of the public office has received a monetary gain as a result of such decision;

(c) any person or entity who, or transaction in relation thereto, which are not directly or indirectly connected with the holder of a public office except offences falling under clauses (ix), (x) and (xi) of subsection (a) of section 9;

(d) procedural lapses in performance of any public or governmental work or function, project or scheme, unless there is evidence to prove that a holder of public office or any other person acting on his behalf has been conferred or has received any monetary or other material benefit from that particular public or governmental work or function, whether directly or indirectly on account of such procedural lapses, which the said recipient was otherwise not entitled to receive;

(e) a decision taken, an advice, report or opinion rendered or given by a public office holder or any other person in the course of his duty, unless there is sufficient evidence to show that the holder of public office or any other person acting on his behalf received or gained any monetary or other material benefit, from that decision, advice, report or opinion, whether directly or indirectly, which the said recipient was otherwise not entitled to receive;

(f) all matters, which have been decided by, or fall within the jurisdiction of a regulatory body established under a Federal or Provincial law; and

(g) all matters where the funds, property or interest not involving or belonging to the appropriate government, except for the offences under clause (ix), (x) or (xi) of subsection (a) of section 9."

Prior to the 2022 Amendments Section 4 of the NAB Ordinance read:

"4. Application: It extends to the whole of Pakistan and shall apply to all persons in Pakistan, all citizens of Pakistan and persons who are or have been in the service of Pakistan wherever they may be, including areas which are part of Federally and Provincially Administered Tribal Areas."

34. From the comparison of the unamended and amended versions of Section 4 it becomes plain that exceptions have been created for the decisions, advice, reports, opinions of and works, functions, projects, schemes undertaken by holders of public office and public/ governmental bodies unless there is evidence of the holder of public officer or a person acting on his behalf having received monetary or other material benefit. Such exceptions are novel not only to the NAB Ordinance but also other accountability laws such as the 1947 Act. The rationale behind introducing these exceptions in the NAB Ordinance is explained in the Statement of Objects and Reasons attached to the First Amendment:

"Currently National Accountability Bureau (NAB) is dealing with a large number of inquiries and investigation in addition to handling mega corruption cases. Under the existing regime a number of inquiries have been initiated against the holders of Public Office and government servants on account of procedural lapses where no actual corruption is involved. This has enhanced NAB's burden and had an adverse impact on the workings of the Federal Government. Additionally, NAB has also assumed parallel jurisdiction and is inquiring into matters pertaining to taxation, imposition of levies etc., and therefore interfering in the domain of tax regulatory bodies. As such, a number of amendments have been proposed to redefine the operational domain of NAB."

The Court appreciates the efforts of Parliament to address and rectify what has long been regarded unguided discretion of the NAB authorities. The Court as far back in Asfandyar Wali (supra) observed in relation to the NAB Ordinance that:

"228. ...To protect decision making level officers and the officers conducting inquiry/ investigation from any threats, appropriate measures must be taken to relieve them of the anxiety from the likelihood of harassment for taking honest decisions.

229. Viewed in the above context, although shifting of burden of proof on an accused in terms of Section 9 (a) (vi) (vii) read with Section 14(d) may not be bad in law in its present form, but would certainly be counter productive in relation to the principle of good governance. If decision making level officials responsible for issuing orders, SROs etc. are not protected for performing their official acts in good faith, the public servants and all such officers at the level of decision making would be reluctant to take decisions and/or avoid or prolong the same on one pretext or another which would ultimately lead to paralysis of State-machinery. Such a course cannot be countenanced by this Court."

35. Clearly then Section 2 of the 2022 Amendments is an attempt by Parliament to rein in the unguided powers of the NAB and to protect the bureaucracy from unnecessary harassment. However, the exceptions granted by Section 2 operate as an en-masse exemption for holders of public office from facing accountability. The freshly inserted condition that the NAB shall provide evidence of monetary or other material benefit received by the holder of public office or a person acting on his behalf to overcome the exceptions listed in Section 2 of the 2022 Amendments cannot be satisfied in the references already pending before the Accountability Courts. Therefore, where such condition will not be met by the NAB the result will be (and in fact has been) that references will be returned. In this regard, our analysis set out above in paras 27-32 being highly relevant is adopted because Section 2 of the 2022 Amendments affects the same Fundamental Rights i.e., Articles 9, 14, 23, 24 and raises the same problems in terms of the accountability of elected holders of public office as Section 3 of the Second Amendment, namely, that whilst persons in the service of Pakistan may still be investigated and prosecuted under the 1947 Act for the offences listed in Section 9(a)(i)-(v) of the NAB Ordinance, elected holders of public office will not be amenable to the jurisdiction of any other accountability fora for the offence of corruption and corrupt practices.

Declaration on Section 2 of the 2022 Amendments

A. Elected Holders of Public Office

i. For suffering from the same defects as noted above in paras 27-32, Section 2 of the 2022 Amendments is also declared to be void from the date of commencement of the 2022 Amendments.

B. Persons in the Service of Pakistan

ii. Section 2 of the 2022 Amendments insofar as these pertain to the offences set out in Section 9(a)(i)-(v) of the NAB Ordinance are declared to be intra vires the Constitution because persons in the service of Pakistan can be prosecuted for these offences under the 1947 Act.

iii. However, Section 2 is ultra vires the Constitution from the date of commencement of the 2022 Amendments for the offences listed in Section 9(a)(vi)-(xii) because persons in the service of Pakistan cannot be tried for such offences under the 1947 Act or any other accountability law.

Sections 8 and 10 of the First Amendment

36. Section 8 of the First Amendment has significantly altered Section 9 of the NAB Ordinance which lays down various categories of the offence of corruption and corrupt practices. For present purposes, the changes brought about in Section 9(a)(v) of the NAB Ordinance are relevant. The Section as it existed prior to and after the First Amendment is produced below:

"Prior to the First Amendment

9. Corruption and Corrupt Practices: (a) A holder of a public office, or any other person, is said to commit or to have committed the offence of corruption and corrupt practices-

(v) if he or any of his dependents or benamidars owns, possesses, or has acquired right or title in any assets or holds irrevocable power of attorney in respect of any assets or pecuniary resources disproportionate to his known sources of income, which he cannot reasonably account for or maintains a standard of living beyond that which is commensurate with his sources of income;

After the First Amendment

9. Corruption and Corrupt Practices: (a) A holder of a public office, or any other person, is said to commit or to have committed the offence of corruption and corrupt practices-

(v) if he or any of his dependents or other benamidars, through corrupt and dishonest means, owns, possesses or acquires rights or title in assets substantially disproportionate to his known sources of income which he cannot reasonably account for.

Explanation I.--The valuation of immovable property shall be reckoned on the date of purchase either according to the actual price shown in the relevant title documents or the applicable rates prescribed by District Collector or the Federal Board of Revenue whichever is higher. No evidence contrary to the later shall be admissible.

Explanation II.--For the purpose of calculation of movable assets, the sum total of credit entries of bank account shall not be treated as an asset. Bank balance of an account on the date of initiation of inquiry may be treated as a movable asset. A banking transaction shall not be treated as an asset unless there is evidence of creation of corresponding asset through that transaction."

37. It may be noticed from the above that apart from reducing the circumstances in which the offence of assets beyond means can be made out against the holder of a public office, the First Amendment has made another material change in Section 9(a)(v), namely, the obligation on the NAB to prove that an accused has accumulated substantially disproportionate assets 'through corrupt and dishonest means.' This element was previously not a part of Section 9(a)(v). This is evident from the ingredients of Section 9(a)(v) which were well-established in the jurisprudence of the Court and required that the NAB prove that:

i. The accused is a holder of public office;

ii. The nature and extent of the pecuniary resources of the property found in the accused's possession;

iii. The known sources of income of the accused; and

iv. The resources or property found in the possession of the accused are objectively disproportionate to his known sources of income [ref: Muhammad Hashim Babar v. State (2010 SCMR 1697) at para 4].

Once the NAB had established the above-mentioned four elements the accused was presumed to be guilty of the offence of corruption and corrupt practices unless he could account for the resources or property so recovered from him. The NAB was not required to demonstrate that the accused had obtained the resources or property 'through corrupt and dishonest means' because the mere presence of disproportionate assets led to the presumption that the accused had engaged in corrupt and dishonest conduct. Such a presumption is provided in Section 14(c) of the NAB Ordinance. The fact of the matter is that the proof of acquisition of assets 'through corrupt and dishonest means' itself constitutes a complete offence. Therefore, by changing Section 9(a)(v) the First Amendment has amalgamated two separate offences into one. As a result, the original offence contained in Section 9(a)(v) has now been rendered redundant. To further ensure the futility of the said offence all of the evidentiary presumptions contained in Section 14 of the NAB Ordinance sustaining the erstwhile offence under Section 9(a)(v) and the remaining offences in the NAB Ordinance have been omitted by Section 10 of the First Amendment. The presumption relevant to Section 9(a)(v) of the Ordinance existed in Section 14(c). This latter provision read:

"14. Presumption against accused accepting illegal gratification: ...

c. In any trial, of an offence punishable under clause (v) of sub-section (a) of section 9 of this Ordinance, the fact that the accused person or any other person on his behalf, is in possession, for which the accused person cannot satisfactorily account, of assets or pecuniary resources disproportionate to his known source of income, or that such person has, at or about the time of the commission of the, offence with which he is charged, obtained an accretion to his pecuniary resources or property for which he cannot satisfactorily account, the Court shall presume, unless the contrary is proved, that the accused person is guilty of the offence of corruption and corrupt practices and his conviction therefor shall not be invalid by reason only that it is based solely on such a presumption."

38. Further, by the insertion of Explanation II to Section 9(a)(v) entries in bank statements have been removed from the scope of assets whereas banking transactions can only be regarded as assets if there is evidence of the creation of a corresponding asset through specific transactions. The source, object and quantum of credits/ receipts in the bank accounts can now no longer be shown for proving the creation of assets. Nor can debit transfers from one account to another be used to show accumulation of money for the creation of an asset. It goes without saying that bank records are usually the most pivotal evidence in financial crimes. However, by virtue of Explanation II limited resort can be made to them. On a first reading, the changes to Section 9(a)(v), the addition of Explanation II and the omission of Section 14(c) might appear innocuous in nature but their effect both individually and collectively has actually rendered the offence of corruption and corrupt practices in the category of assets beyond means pointless. If accused persons cannot be held to account for owning or possessing assets beyond their means, the natural corollary will be that public assets and wealth will become irrecoverable which would encourage further corruption. This will have a direct adverse effect on the peoples' right to life and to public property because the economic well-being of the State will be prejudiced.

39. Additionally, when other accountability laws are examined in this context such as the 1947 Act, it become obvious that no similar or corresponding changes have been made in that Act in relation to the offence of assets beyond means. The relevant provisions from the 1947 Act are produced below for reference:

"5. Criminal Misconduct.-- (1) A public servant is said to commit the offence of criminal misconduct:

(e) If he, or any of his dependents, is in possession, for which the public servant cannot reasonably account of pecuniary resources or of property disproportionate to his known sources of income.

(3) In any trial of an offence punishable under subsection (2) the fact that the accused person or any other person on his behalf is in possession, for which the accused person cannot satisfactorily account, of pecuniary resources or property disproportionate to his known sources of income may be proved, and on such proof the Court shall presume unless the contrary is proved, that the accused person is guilty of criminal misconduct and his conviction therefore shall not be invalid by reason only that it is based solely on such presumption."

We have already held above in paras 29 and 31 that persons who are in the service of Pakistan can still be tried under the 1947 Act for the offence of corruption and corrupt practices even if they stand excluded from the jurisdiction of the NAB pursuant to the amendments made in Section 4 of the NAB Ordinance. However, the same cannot be said of elected holders of public office because they only fall within the purview of the NAB Ordinance. The amended Section 9(a)(v) and the omission of Section 14(c) would treat similarly placed persons differently because while elected holders of public office are relieved from prosecution for the offence under Section 9(a)(v), persons in the service of Pakistan will still have to go through the rigors of trial under the 1947 Act for the same offence. This would offend the equal treatment command of Article 25 of the Constitution. Insofar as the other presumptions contained in Section 14 of the NAB Ordinance for the other categories listed in Section 9(a) ibid are concerned, the same too stand revived as their omission will prevent the recovery of public assets and wealth from the holders of public office thereby defeating the peoples Fundamental Rights of accessing justice and protecting their public property. Moreso, when presumptions comparable to those in Section 14(a) [presumption as to motive] and (d) [presumption as to guilt] for the categories of 'illegal gratification,' 'obtaining a valuable thing without consideration,' 'fraudulent misappropriation,' 'obtaining property/valuable thing/ pecuniary advantage through illegal means' and 'misuse of authority' do not exist in any other accountability law, including the 1947 Act.

Declaration on Sections 8 and 10 of the First Amendment

A. Elected Holders of Public Office

i. For the foregoing reasons the phrase 'through corrupt and dishonest means' used in Section 9(a)(v) along with its Explanation II is struck down from the NAB Ordinance from the date of commencement of the First Amendment for being unworkable. Additionally, Section 14 in its entirety is restored to the NAB Ordinance from the date of commencement of the First Amendment. Sections 8 and 10 of the First Amendment are declared invalid to this extent.

B. Persons in the Service of Pakistan

ii. The amendments made in Section 9 (a) (v) of the NAB Ordinance by Section 8 of the First Amendment are upheld in their entirety as persons in the service of Pakistan can be tried for the same offence under the 1947 Act.

iii. However, Section 10 of the First Amendment is struck down from the date of commencement of the First Amendment and Section 14(a), (b) and (d) stand restored to the NAB Ordinance because such presumptions do not exist in any other accountability law.

Section 14 of the First Amendment

40. Section 14 of the First Amendment has omitted Section 21(g) of the NAB Ordinance. This provision provided that:

"21. International Cooperation Request for mutual legal assistance: The Chairman NAB or any officer authorized by the Federal Government may request a Foreign State to do any or all of the following acts in accordance with the law of such State:--

(g) Notwithstanding anything contained in the Qanun-e-Shahadat Order, 1984 (P.O. 10 of 1984) or any other law for the time being in force all evidence, documents or any other material transferred to Pakistan by a Foreign Government shall be receivable as evidence in legal proceedings under this Ordinance;"

The primary objective of Section 21(g) in particular and Section 21 in general was explained by the Court in Mobashir Hassan (supra):

"99. ...A perusal of above Section [21] indicates that on account of international cooperation, request for mutual legal assistance means, the NAB or any officer, authorized by the Federal Government, has been empowered to make a request to a Foreign State to do any or all things mentioned therein... for achieving the object to save the assets outside the country, allegedly belonging to the nation, a mechanism has been provided on the basis of international cooperation.

104. The Government of Pakistan is also signatory to the above UN Convention [against Corruption] as it has been ratified by Pakistan on 31st August, 2007, regarding international cooperation in criminal matters in accordance with Articles 44 to 50 of the above noted UN Convention, according to which, where appropriate and consistent with their domestic legal system, the State Parties shall consider assisting each other in investigation or proceedings in civil and administrative matters, relating to corruption.

129. Section 21 of the NAO, 1999 is a comprehensive provision of law, which spells out the nature of the request to a Foreign State for mutual legal assistance... We believe that to curb the culture of corruption and corrupt practices globally it has become necessary to enact such law on the basis of which the objects noted hereinabove could be achieved.

130. ...A perusal of UN Convention Against Corruption indicates that... State parties shall consider assisting each other in investigations of and proceedings in civil and administrative matters relating to corruption; as well as affording to one another the widest measure of mutual legal assistance in investigations, prosecutions, and judicial proceedings in relation to the offences covered by the Convention; prevention and detection of transfers of proceeds of crime. On the other hand, the promulgation of the NRO, 2007, instead of preventing corruption and corrupt practices, has encouraged the same..."

41. It is a common fact that many accused persons being tried under the NAB Ordinance have stashed their wealth and assets abroad in tax havens under fiduciary instruments. However, after the omission of the said provision the admissibility of foreign public documents shall be governed by Article 89(5) of the Qanun-e-Shahadat Order, 1984 ("1984 Order") which reads:

"89. Proof of other public documents. The following public documents may be proved as follows:

(5) Public documents of any other class in a foreign country, by the original, or by a copy certified by the legal keeper thereof with a certificate under the seal of a notary public, or of a Pakistan Consul or diplomatic agent, that the copy is duly certified by the officer having the legal custody of the original, and upon proof of the character of the document according to the law of foreign country."

It may be observed that the process of admitting foreign public documents under the 1984 Order is protracted and cumbersome because it requires either the production of the original document or a copy which is certified not only by the legal keeper of the document but also by the Embassy of Pakistan. Further, the character of the document needs to be established in accordance with the law of the foreign country. Additionally, foreign private documents would need to be established through the procedure set out in Articles 17 and 79 of the 1984 Order which would require that two attesting witnesses from the foreign country enter personal appearance for proving the execution of the foreign private document. Such a process naturally entails time as the foreign evidence needs to pass through red tape. It therefore defeats the purpose for which Section 21(g) was inserted into the NAB Ordinance i.e., that after State cooperation led to the receipt of relevant foreign evidence the same would be directly admissible in legal proceedings initiated under the NAB Ordinance without fulfilling the onerous conditions of Article 89(5) of the 1984 Order. By deleting Section 21(g) from the NAB Ordinance Section 14 of the First Amendment has made it near impossible for relevant and necessary foreign evidence to be used in the trials of accused persons. It therefore offends the Fundamental Rights of the people to access justice and protect public property from waste and malfeasance.

Declaration on Section 14 of the First Amendment

42. Section 21(g) is hereby restored in the NAB Ordinance for both elected holders of public office and persons in the service of Pakistan with effect from the date of commencement of the First Amendment for facilitating peoples right to access justice and for protecting their public property from squander. Accordingly, Section 14 of the First Amendment is struck down for being illegal.

Section 14 of the Second Amendment

43. Section 14 of the Second Amendment has inserted two new provisos to Section 25(b) of the NAB Ordinance. The said provision pertains to plea bargains entered into by accused persons:

"25. Voluntary return and plea bargain: ...

(b) Where at any time after the authorization of investigation, before or after the commencement of the trial or during the pendency of an appeal, the accused offers to return to the NAB the assets or gains acquired or made by him in the course, or as a consequence, of any offence under this Ordinance, the Chairman, NAB, may, in his discretion, after taking into consideration the facts and circumstances of the case, accept the offer on such terms and conditions as he may consider necessary, and if the accused agrees to return to the NAB the amount determined by the Chairman, NAB, the Chairman, NAB, shall refer the case for the approval of the Court, or as the case may be, the Appellate Court and for the release of the accused:

Provided that statement of an accused entering into plea bargain or voluntary return shall not prejudice case of any other accused:

Provided further that in case of failure of accused to make payment in accordance with the plea bargain agreement approved by the Court, the agreement of plea bargain shall become inoperative to the rights of the parties immediately."

(emphasis supplied)

44. For present purposes we are concerned only with the second proviso to Section 25(b) of the NAB Ordinance which renders a plea bargain entered into by an accused person inoperative if the accused fails to make the complete payment as approved by the Accountability Court. Read on its own this proviso appears to protect the interests of the State by ensuring prompt recovery of looted public money and this intention is also reflected in the Statement of Objects and Reasons attached to the Second Amendment:

" ...Section 25 is related to protect the interest of the Government that in case persons entering into plea bargain fail to make payment pursuant to the payment approved by the court, the plea bargain agreement will become infructuous."

45. However, despite the benign purposes behind introducing the second proviso to Section 25(b), the actual effect of it is that it nullifies Section 25(b) itself which was inserted in the NAB Ordinance 'to facilitate early recovery of the ill-gotten wealth through settlement where practicable' [ref: Asfandyar Wali case (supra) at para 267] because it places no restrictions on the accused from revoking the plea bargain entered into by him. It is established law that whilst a proviso can qualify or create an exception to the main section it cannot nullify the same [ref: Muhammad Anwar Kurd v. State (2011 SCMR 1560) at para 22]. Further, the second proviso gives the accused an uninhibited right to withdraw from a plea bargain without obtaining the approval of the Accountability Court which in the first place approved the plea bargain. The Court in the case of Asfandyar Wali (supra) recognised that plea bargain is in the nature of compounding an offence and therefore it should be subject to the sanction of the Accountability Court. We see no reason and none was advanced by learned counsel for the respondent Federation as to why the Accountability Court should be excluded from the revocation of an agreement which compounded the offence committed by the accused. The exclusion of the Accountability Court by the second proviso to Section 25(b) of the NAB Ordinance therefore undermines the independence of the Judiciary and is violative of Article 175(3) of the Constitution.

46. Moreover, it is an admitted fact that under the proviso to Section 15(a) of the NAB Ordinance (disqualification to contest elections or to hold public office) an accused person who enters into a plea bargain suffers the same consequences as an accused person who is convicted of the offence of corruption and corrupt practices under Section 9(a). Such consequences are that the accused person either forthwith ceases to hold public office, if any, held by him or further stands disqualified for a period of ten years for seeking or from being elected, chosen, appointed or nominated as a member or representative of any public body etc. Therefore, allowing an accused person to renege from his plea bargain would be tantamount to conferring an unlawful benefit on him i.e., he would escape the consequences stipulated in Section 15(a) of the NAB Ordinance.

Declaration on Section 14 of the Second Amendment

47. The second proviso to Section 25(b) is struck down from the NAB Ordinance from the date of commencement of the Second Amendment for exceeding its purpose by nullifying Section 25(b), for violating the independence of the Judiciary and for enabling accused persons to avoid the consequences of Section 15(a). As a result, Section 14 of the Second Amendment is declared to be void and of no legal effect to this extent.

Conclusion

48. On the basis of the above discussion the Court holds:

i. The titled Constitution Petition is maintainable on account of violating Articles 9 (security of person), 14 (inviolability of dignity of man), 24 (protection of property rights) and 25 (equality of citizens) of the Constitution and for affecting the public at large because unlawful diversion of State resources from public development projects to private use leads to poverty, declining quality of life and injustice.

ii. Section 3 of the Second Amendment pertaining to Section 5(o) of the NAB Ordinance that sets the minimum pecuniary threshold of the NAB at Rs.500 million and Section 2 of the 2022 Amendments pertaining to Section 4 of the NAB Ordinance which limits the application of the NAB Ordinance by creating exceptions for holders of public office are declared void ab initio insofar as these concern the references filed against elected holders of public office and references filed against persons in the service of Pakistan for the offences noted in Section 9(a)(vi)-(xii) of the NAB Ordinance;

iii. Section 3 of the Second Amendment and Section 2 of the 2022 Amendments pertaining to Sections 5(o) and 4 of the NAB Ordinance are declared to be valid for references filed against persons in the Service of Pakistan for the offences listed in Section 9(a)(i)-(v) of the NAB Ordinance;

iv. The phrase 'through corrupt and dishonest means' inserted in Section 9 (a) (v) of the NAB Ordinance along with its Explanation II is struck down from the date of commencement of the First Amendment for references filed against elected holders of public office. To this extent Section 8 of the First Amendment is declared void;

v. Section 9(a)(v) of the NAB Ordinance, as amended by Section 8 of the First Amendment, shall be retained for references filed against persons in the service of Pakistan;

vi. Section 14 and Section 21(g) of the NAB Ordinance are restored from the date of commencement of the First Amendment. Consequently, Sections 10 and 14 of the First Amendment are declared void; and

vii. The second proviso to Section 25(b) of the NAB Ordinance is declared to be invalid from the date of commencement of the Second Amendment. Therefore, Section 14 of the Second Amendment is void to this extent.

49. On account of our above findings, all orders passed by the NAB and/or the Accountability Courts placing reliance on the above Sections are declared null and void and of no legal effect. Therefore, all inquiries, investigations and references which have been disposed of on the basis of the struck down Sections are restored to their positions prior to the enactment of the 2022 Amendments and shall be deemed to be pending before the relevant fora. The NAB and all Accountability Courts are directed to proceed with the restored proceedings in accordance with law. The NAB and/or all other fora shall forthwith return the record of all such matters to the relevant fora and in any event not later than seven days from today which shall be proceeded with in accordance with law from the same stage these were at when the same were disposed of/closed/returned.

50. The titled Constitution Petition is allowed in these terms.

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH J*.---I have read the judgment authored by the Hon'ble Chief Justice of Pakistan to which my learned brother Justice Ijaz ul Ahsan has concurred ("majority judgment") provided to me last night. With great respect, I could not make myself agree to it. Due to the paucity of time, I cannot fully record reasons for my dissent and leave it for my detailed opinion to be recorded later. However, in view of the respect that I have for my learned colleagues and for their opinion, I want to explain, though briefly, why I am unable to agree with them.

2. In my humble opinion, the primary question in this case is not about the alleged lopsided amendments introduced in the NAB law by the Parliament but about the paramountcy of the Parliament, a house of the chosen representatives of about 240 million people of Pakistan. It is about the constitutional importance of parliamentary democracy and separation of powers between three organs of the State. It is about the limits of the jurisdiction of the Court comprising unelected judges, second judging the purpose and policy of an enactment passed by the Parliament, without any clear violation beyond reasonable doubt, of any of the fundamental rights guaranteed under the Constitution or of any other constitutional provision.

3. The majority judgment has fallen short, in my humble opinion, to recognize the constitutional command that 'the State shall exercise its power and authority through the chosen representatives of the people' and to recognize the principle of trichotomy of powers, which is the foundation of parliamentary democracy. The majority has fallen prey to the unconstitutional objective of a parliamentarian, of transferring a political debate on the purpose and policy of an enactment from the Houses of the Parliament to the courthouse of the Supreme Court. Without setting out a clear and objective test for determining how the claimed right to have accountability of the parliamentarians is an integral part of any of the fundamental rights guaranteed under the Constitution, the majority judgment through a long winding conjectural path of far-fetched "in turn" effects has tried hard to "ultimately" reach an apprehended violation of the fundamental rights. The majority judgment has also fallen short to appreciate that what Parliament has done, Parliament can undo; the legislative power of the Parliament is never exhausted. If the Parliament can enact the NAB law, it can also repeal the entire law or amend the same.

4. For these and further reasons to be recorded in my detailed opinion later, with great respect, I disagree with my learned brothers and dismiss this petition.

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---Benjamin Cardozo said: 'The voice of the majority may be that of force triumphant, content with the plaudits of the hour and recking little of the morrow. The dissenter speaks to the future, and his voice is pitched to a key that will carry through the years ... the [dissenters] do not see the hooting throng. Their eyes are fixed on eternities.'[1] Antonin Scalia was right when he said that '[d]issents augment rather than diminish the prestige of the Court'[2]. Courts must rise above the 'hooting throng' and keep their eyes set on the future of democracy, undeterred by the changing politics of today. Courts unlike political parties don't have to win popular support. Courts are to decide according to the Constitution and the law even if the public sentiment is against them.

Prologue

2. One of the foundations of democracy is a legislature elected freely and periodically by the people. Without a majority rule, as reflected in the power of the legislature, there is no democracy[3]. Justice McLachlin rightly said that in democracies, "the elected legislators, the executive and the courts all have their role to play. Each must play that role in a spirit of profound respect for the other. We are not adversaries. We are all in the justice business, together"[4].

3. Courts must realize that legislation is an elaborate undertaking which is an outcome of debate and deliberations of public, social and economic policy considerations. Role of a judge in a democracy recognizes this central role of the Legislature. The courts can judicially review the acts of the legislators if they offend the Constitution, in particular the fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution. While examining this conflict of rights and the legislation, the courts must consider that they are dealing with a legislative document that represents multiple voices, myriad policy issues and reflective of public ethos and interests, voiced through the chosen representatives of the people. And remembering that undermining the legislature undermines democracy. With this background, only if such a legislation is in conflict and in violation of the fundamental rights or the express provisions of the Constitution, can the courts interfere and overturn such a legislation. At the foundation of this approach is the basic view that the Court does not fight for its own power. The efforts of the Court should be directed towards protecting the Constitution and its values[5].

4. The delicate institutional balance between various institutions in the constitutional scheme is largely maintained through mutuality of respect which each institution bestows on the other.[6] In a parliamentary form of government, the executive (Government) is usually constituted from amongst the representatives of the majority party in the legislature (Parliament) and is thus, in a sense, a part of the latter. It is, therefore, very rare that the executive and the legislature come in a head-on collision against each other in the performance of their assigned functions under the Constitution. In this system of government, the judiciary is seen more often than not as an opponent of the executive or the legislature. This impression can only be removed, or at least moderated, by "mutuality of respect"[7] between the judiciary and other organs of the State, particularly between the judiciary and the legislature. The courts have formulated the doctrine of judicial restraint which

'urges Judges considering constitutional questions to give deference to the views of the elected branches and invalidate their actions only when constitutional limits have clearly been violated'[8]. As the legislative acts of a legislature are the manifestation of the will of the people exercised through their chosen representatives, the courts tread carefully to judicially review them and strike them down only when their constitutional invalidity is clearly established beyond any reasonable doubt.[9] A reasonable doubt is resolved in favour of the constitutional validity of the law enacted by a competent legislature by giving a constitution-compliant interpretation to the words that create such doubt.[10]

5. Steven Levitsky and Daniel Ziblatt in their recent book "How Democracies Die" have argued that two norms stand out as fundamental to a functioning democracy: "mutual toleration" and "institutional forbearance." These norms become more nuanced in the present context as we later on discuss the nature of the amendments to our accountability law in the country. "Mutual toleration" refers to the idea that as long as our rivals play by constitutional rules, we accept that they have an equal right to exist, compete for power, and govern. We may disagree with, and even strongly dislike, our rivals, but we nevertheless accept them as legitimate. This means recognizing that our political rivals are decent, patriotic, law-abiding citizens - that they love our country and respect the constitution just as we do. It means that even if we believe our opponents' ideas to be foolish or wrong-headed, we do not view them as an existential threat. Nor do we treat them as treasonous, subversive, or otherwise beyond the pale. We may shed tears on election night when the other side wins, but we do not consider such an event apocalyptic. Put another way, mutual toleration is politicians' collective willingness to agree to disagree.... [Political] parties can be rivals rather than enemies, circulating power rather than destroying each other. This recognition was a critical foundation for American democracy.... when norms of mutual toleration are weak, democracy is hard to sustain."[11]

6. "The second norm critical to democracy's survival is what we call institutional forbearance. Forbearance means patient self-control; restraint and tolerance... Where norms of forbearance are strong, politicians do not use their institutional prerogatives to the hilt, even of it is technically legal to do so, for such action could imperil the existing system.... Think of democracy as a game that we want to keep playing indefinitely. To ensure future rounds of the game, players must refrain from either incapacitating the other team or antagonizing them to such a degree, that they refuse to play again tomorrow. If one's rival quits, there can be no future games .... the opposite of forbearance is to exploit one's institutional prerogatives in an unrestrained way. Legal scholar Mark Tushnet call this "constitutional hardball"; ..it is a form of institutional combat aimed at permanently defeating one's partisan rivals - and not caring whether the democratic game continues."[12] With this understanding of democracy, "mutuality of respect" and "institutional forbearance", we are to deal with the present case.

Summation of the matter

7. In the exercise of its legislative power conferred on it by Article 142(b) of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan ("Constitution") to make laws with respect to criminal law, criminal procedure and evidence, the Parliament comprising the chosen representatives of the people of Pakistan has made certain amendments in the National Accountability Ordinance 1999 ("NAB Ordinance"). The petitioner, a parliamentarian who chose not to participate in the process of enactment of those amendments, either by supporting or opposing them in the Parliament, has instead, challenged those amendments in this Court invoking its original jurisdiction under Article 184(3) of the Constitution. It is the petitioner's assertion that the amendments made in the NAB Ordinance infringe the fundamental rights of the people of Pakistan in general and not of the persons who are to be dealt with in respect of their life, liberty and property under the NAB Ordinance. My learned colleagues, the Hon'ble Chief Justice and Hon'ble Justice Ijaz ul Ahsan ("majority"), have been convinced by the said assertion and have therefore declared most of the challenged amendments ultra vires the Constitution. With great respect, I have not been able to persuade myself to agree with them.

6(sic). The Parliament has, through the challenged amendment, merely changed the forums for investigation and trial of the offences of corruption involving the amount or property less than Rs.500 million. After the amendment, the cases of alleged corruption against the holders of public offices that involve the amount or property of value less than Rs.500 million are to be investigated by the anti-corruption investigating agencies and tried by the anti-corruption courts of the Federation and Provinces respectively, under the Prevention of Corruption Act 1947 and the Pakistan Criminal Law Amendment Act 1958, instead of the NAB Ordinance. This matter undoubtedly falls within the exclusive policy domain of the legislature, not justiciable by the courts. In my opinion, this and other challenged amendments, which relate to certain procedural matters, in no way take away or abridge any of the fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution to the people of Pakistan. Hence, my dissent.

Main premise of the majority judgment

7(sic). The majority has found that the 'elected holders of public office are not triable either under the 1947 Act [Prevention of Corruption Act] or the P.P.C. [Pakistan Penal Code] for the offence of corruption and corrupt practices'[13], and that by 'amending Section 5(o) of the NAB Ordinance to raise the minimum pecuniary threshold of the NAB to Rs.500 million, Section 3 of the Second Amendment has undone the legislative efforts beginning in 1976 to bring elected holders of public office within the ambit of accountability laws ... Once excluded from the jurisdiction of the NAB no other accountability fora can take cognizance of their alleged acts of corruption and corrupt practices'[14]. On these findings, the majority has concluded that such 'blanket immunity offends Articles 9, 14, 23 and 24 of the Constitution because it permits and encourages the squandering of public assets and wealth by elected holders of public office as there is no forum for their accountability. This in turn affects the economic well-being of the State and ultimately the quality and dignity of the people's lives because as more resources are diverted towards illegal activities, less resources remain for the provision of essential services to the people such as health facilities, education institutes and basic infrastructure etc.'[15]

Reasons for dissent

8. With utmost respect, the majority view, in my humble opinion, is not correct as even after the challenged amendments:

(i) the elected holders of public offices (members of Parliament, Provincial Assemblies and Local Government Bodies, etc.) are still triable under the Prevention of Corruption Act 1947 (PCA) and the Pakistan Penal Code 1860 (P.P.C.) for the alleged offences of corruption and corrupt practices and no one goes home scot-free. They are still triable under other laws. This aspect has been, with respect, seriously misunderstood by the majority;

(ii) the challenged amendment of adding the threshold value of Rs.500 million for an offence to be investigated and tried under the NAB Ordinance, simply changes the forums for investigation and trial of the alleged offences of corruption and corrupt practices involving the amount or property less than Rs.500 million. This matter falls within the exclusive policy domain of the legislature (Parliament); and

(iii) the said and other challenged amendments (law made by the Parliament) do not take away or abridge any of the fundamental rights guaranteed under Articles 9, 14, 23, 24 and 25 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan (Constitution).

I would elucidate the above three statements seriatim.

(i) Elected holders of public offices are triable under P.C.A. and P.P.C.

9. The answer to the question, whether the elected holders of public offices (i.e., members of Parliament and Provincial Assemblies, etc.) are triable for the alleged offences of corruption and corrupt practices under the P.C.A. and the P.P.C., hinges upon the definition of the expression "public servant" provided in the latter part of clause ninth of Section 21 of the P.P.C. The majority has found that the elected holders of public offices do not fall within the definition of "public servant" and are therefore not triable for the alleged offence of corruption and corrupt practices either under the P.C.A. or under the P.P.C. With respect I submit that before arriving at this finding, the majority has failed to fully examine the definition of the expression "public servant" provided in the latter part of clause ninth of Section 21, P.P.C., and have erroneously relied upon the two judgments from the foreign jurisdictions (R. S. Nayak v. A.R. Antulay AIR 1984 SC 684 and Zakir Hossain v. State 70 DLR [2018] 203), without noticing the difference of the provisions of Section 21, P.P.C., from the relevant provisions of the penal codes of those countries. The said difference is highlighted in the following comparative table:

| Latter part of clause ninth of Section 21 of the Pakistan Penal Code | Clause twelfth (a) of Section 21 of the Indian Penal Code | Clause twelfth (a) of Section 21 of the Penal Code of Bangladesh |
| every officer in the service or pay of the Government or remunerated by fees or commission for the performance of any public duty; | Every person in the service or pay of the Government or remunerated by fees or commission for the performance of any public duty by the Government; | Every person in the service or pay of the Government or remunerated by the Government by fees or commissions for the performance of any public duty; |

A bare reading of the above definitions shows that the notable difference between the definition in the Pakistan Penal Code (P.P.C.) and the definitions in the Indian Penal Code (I.P.C.) as well as in the Bangladesh Penal Code (B.P.C.) is that the word "Government" has been used once in the P.P.C. while in the I.P.C. and the B.P.C., it has been used twice. It is the absence of the word "Government" in the second limb of the definition provided in the P.P.C. that makes the real difference, which I will explain later, in the meaning and scope of these definition clauses of "public servant" in three penal codes. The word "or" used after the word "Government" in the P.P.C. and after the first word "Government" in the I.P.C. and the B.P.C. signifies that there are actually two types of officers (word "officer" used in the P.P.C.) or persons (word "person" used in the I.P.C. and B.P.C.) that fall within the scope of "public servant" as defined therein. When the two limbs of the above three definitions are split, they take the following forms:

| i. Every officer in the service or pay of the Government ii. Every officer remunerated by fees or commission for the performance of any public duty | i. Every person in the service or pay of the Government ii. Every person remunerated by fees or commission for the performance of any public duty by the Government | i. Every person in the service or pay of the Government Every person remunerated by the Government by fees or commissions for the performance of any public duty |

Having set out the relevant provisions of the penal codes of the three countries and the difference between them, we can now better appreciate the ratio of the cases relied upon by the majority.

Analysis of Antulay relied upon by the majority

10. Since in Zakir Hossain[16] the High Court Division of the Supreme Court of Bangladesh has mainly relied upon Antulay, it is this latter case decided by the Indian Supreme Court that requires a minute examination. The word "Government" has also been used in the IPC, as aforenoted, in relation to a person 'remunerated by fees or commission for the performance of any public duty'. In Antulay, the Indian Supreme Court therefore observed that a person would be a public servant under Clause (12) (a) of Section 21, IPC, if:

(i) he is in the service of the Government; or

(ii) he is in the pay of the Government; or

(iii) he is remunerated by fees or commission for the performance of any public duty by the Government.[17]

The Indian Supreme Court formulated the question thus:

[W]hether M.L.A. [Member of Legislative Assembly of a State] is in the pay of the Government of a State or is remunerated by fees for the performance of any public duty by the Government of a State?[18]

In the course of its discussion on the question, the Indian Supreme Court observed that '[t]he Legislature lays down the broad policy and has the power of purse. The executive executes the policy and spends from the Consolidated Fund of the State what Legislature has sanctioned. The Legislative Assembly enacted the Act enabling to pay to its members salary and allowances. And the members vote on the grant and pay themselves. Therefore, even though M.L.A. receives pay and allowances, he is not in the pay of the State Government because Legislature of a State cannot be included in the expression "State Government".[19]

10.1. Responding to the contention that an M.L.A. does not perform any public duty, the Indian Supreme Court observed that 'it would be rather difficult to accept an unduly wide submission that M.L.A. is not performing any public duty....He no doubt performs public duties cast on him by the Constitution and his electorate. He thus discharges constitutional functions for which he is remunerated by fees under the Constitution and not by the Executive.'[20]

10.2. After a thorough discussion on the pro and contra arguments, the Indian Supreme Court answered the question in the negative by concluding that '[t]he expression "Government and Legislature",...are distinct and separate entities. ... [T]he expression "Government" in Section 21(12) (a) [of the IPC] clearly denotes the executive and not the Legislature. M.L.A. is certainly not in the pay of the executive. Therefore, the conclusion is inescapable that even though M.L.A. receives pay and allowances, he can not be said to be in the pay of the Government i.e. the executive'[21] nor is he 'remunerated by fees paid by the Government i.e. the executive.'[22] On this conclusion, the Indian Supreme Court held that an M.L.A. 'is thus not a public servant within the meaning of the expression in Clause (12) (a) [of Section 21 of the IPC]'[23].

10.3. The close examination of the Antulay thus reveals that it was decided on the ratio that even though an M.L.A. receives pay and also performs public duties, he does not receive that pay from the Government nor is he remunerated by fees by the Government but rather he is remunerated by fees under the Constitution. Therefore, he does not fall within the definition of "public servant" under clause (12) (a) of Section 21 of the IPC. The deciding factor in that case was the requirement of being in the pay of the Government or being remunerated by fees by the Government. At the cost of repetition but for clarity and emphasis, it is restated that the Indian Supreme Court held:

> [An M.L.A.] no doubt performs public duties cast on him by the Constitution ... for which he is remunerated by fees under the Constitution and not by the Executive [Government].[24]

It is, therefore, the absence of the word "Government" in the second limb of the latter part of clause ninth of Section 21, P.P.C., that makes the real difference in the meaning and scope of the relevant definition clauses of "public servant" in the penal codes of three countries.

11. As per the second limb of the latter part of clause ninth of Section 21, P.P.C., every officer remunerated by fees or commission for the performance of any public duty is a public servant. Thus, to fall within the scope of this definition of "public servant":

(a) a person should be an officer,
(b) he should perform any public duty, and
(c) he should be remunerated by fees or commission for the performance of that public duty.

There is no condition that for the performance of public duty, the fees or commission is to be paid by the Government. Therefore, every officer remunerated by the fees or commission for the performance of any public duty is a public servant under Section 21, P.P.C., irrespective of the fact whether the fee is paid by the Government or by any other public body or by an Act of Parliament under the Constitution.

12. This statutory definition of a "public servant" in the P.P.C. fully corresponds to the common law definition formulated by Chief Justice Best in Henly[25] in the terms that 'every one who is appointed to discharge a public duty and receives a compensation in whatever shape, whether from the crown or otherwise, is constituted a public officer'. In a similar vein, Justice Lawrence held in Whittaker[26] that a 'public officer is an officer who discharges any duty in the discharge of which the public are interested, more clearly so if he is paid out of a fund provided by the public. If taxes go to supply his payment and the public have an interest in the duties he discharges, he is a public officer'. In these common law definitions articulated by the two distinguished judges, like the definition provided in Section 21, P.P.C., there is no emphasis on who makes the payment from a public fund for the performance of public duty.

13. What, therefore, needs determination is whether a member of Parliament fulfills all the above three conditions to fall within the scope of the definition of "public servant" provided in the ninth clause of Section 21, P.P.C. Applicability of each of the three conditions to a member of Parliament is examined next.

(a) A member of Parliament is an officer, i.e., a holder of an office

13.1. As for the first condition of being an officer, the word "officer" has not been defined in the P.P.C. While it is obvious that it refers to a person who holds an office, the matter does not end here as then arises a further question, what the word "office" means. Though the word "office" is of indefinite content, it is ordinarily understood to mean a position to which certain duties of a more or less public character are attached,[27] especially a position of trust, authority or service.[28.] It is a subsisting, permanent and substantive position, which has an existence independent of the person who fills it, which goes on and is filled in succession by successive holders.[29] The position is an office whether the incumbent is selected by appointment or by election and whether he is appointed during the pleasure of the appointing authority or is elected for a fixed term.[30] The position of a member of Parliament squarely falls within the scope of this definition of "office"; as it is subsisting, permanent and substantive, which exists independent of the person who for the time being fills it and which goes on and is filled in succession by others after him.[31] A member of Parliament is therefore the "holder of an office" and is thus an "officer" within the meaning and scope of this term used in clause ninth of Section 21, P.P.C. The invaluable observations of Justices Isaacs and Rich made in Boston[32], also support the finding that the position of a member of Parliament is an office and the holder of this position is an officer. They observed:

> A Member of Parliament is, ... in the highest sense, a servant of the State; his duties are those appertaining to the position he fills, a position of no transient or temporary existence, a position forming a recongnized place in the constitutional machinery of government…… Clearly a member of Parliament is a "public officer" in a very real sense, for he has..."duties to perform which would constitute in law an office".

(b) A member of Parliament performs a public duty

13.2. As a duty in the discharge of which the public is interested, is a "public duty", anyone can hardly dispute that a person in his position as a member of Parliament does perform a "public duty". 'He no doubt performs public duties cast on him by the Constitution',[33] which include enacting laws, regulating public funds and sanctioning expenditures therefrom, and overseeing the functioning of the Government (Cabinet of Ministers), etc. These duties are such in which the public has an interest; they are, therefore, public duties.[34]

(c) A member of Parliament is remunerated by fees, i.e., salary and allowances

13.3. So far as the remuneration for the performance of these public duties is concerned, a member of Parliament is remunerated by salary and allowances under an Act of Parliament.[35] In Antulay, such salaries and allowances were treated as "fees" by holding that a member of the Legislative Assembly 'no doubt performs public duties cast on him by the Constitution ... for which he is remunerated by fees under the Constitution'.[36] The words "remuneration" and "fees" are of wide amplitude; they include "compensation in whatever shape". In R v. Postmaster-General,[37] Justice Blackburn observed:

> I think the word 'remuneration' ... means a quid pro quo. If a man gives his services, whatever consideration he gets for giving his services seems to be a remuneration for them.

This definition of the word "remuneration" was adopted by this Court in National Embroidery Mills[38] for holding that 'the word "remuneration" has a wider significance than salary and wages' and that it 'includes payments made, besides the salary and wages.' Justice Blackburn's statement was also relied upon by the Indian Supreme Court in Bakshi[39] in support of the observation that the expression "remuneration", in its ordinary connotation, means reward, recompense, pay, wages or salary for service rendered. A "fee", like remuneration, also means a quid pro quo,[40] and in this regard is synonymous with "remuneration". Article 260 of our Constitution defines the word "remuneration" to include salary. The word "fees" used in the definition of "public servant" under consideration, being synonymous with the word "remuneration", also includes salary and allowances. A member of Parliament is, therefore, remunerated by fees (salary and allowances) for the performance of public duties.

14. A member of Parliament, thus, fulfills all the three conditions to fall within the scope of the definition of "public servant" provided in the second limb of the latter part of clause ninth of Section 21, P.P.C., and is, therefore, triable as a "public servant" for the alleged commission of an offence of corruption and corrupt practices (criminal misconduct) under the P.P.C. and the P.C.A.

Reference to cases holding members of Parliament and Ministers as public servants

15. In this conclusion, I am fortified by the judgment of the Indian Supreme Court delivered in the case of Narsimha Rao[41]. In that case, while interpreting the provisions of Section 2(c)(viii) of the Indian Prevention of Corruption Act 1988 it was held that a member of Parliament is a public servant within the meaning and scope of those provisions and is therefore triable under the said Act. To see the relevancy of that case to this case, it would be expedient to cite here the provisions of the Indian law on the basis of which the Indian Supreme Court so held. They are as follows:

(viii) any person who holds an office by virtue of which he is authorised or required to perform any public duty;

A bare reading of the above provisions shows that they contain two conditions that are common to the definition of "public servant" considered in this case: (a) a person should hold an office, i.e., he should be an officer, and (b) he should perform any public duty. The only missing condition which is present in the definition considered in this case but is not there in the above provisions is that of being "remunerated by fees". This third condition, the Indian Supreme Court had already held in Antulay, is also fulfilled by a member of Parliament as he receives salary and allowance.

16. It would also be pertinent to mention here that on the basis of the definition of "public servant" provided in the latter part of clause ninth of Section 21, P.P.C., the Dacca High Court, an erstwhile Pakistani High Court, held in the cases of Abul Monsur[42] and Mujibur Rahman[43] that a Minister is a public servant and is triable for the offences under the PCA. These cases referred to and relied upon the cases of Sibnath Banerji[44] and Shiv Bahadur[45] decided by the Privy Council and the Indian Supreme Court respectively, which had also held that a Minister is a public servant. The observations and reasoning of Justice Baquer in Abul Monsur for holding that a Minister is a public servant are quite instructive and worth quoting here:

The last lines "and every officer in the service or pay of the Crown or remunerated by fees or commission for the performance of any public duty" are very comprehensive. The Clause begins with "Every officer" and then again adds "and every officer" before closing. There is no disjunctive 'or'. Under those circumstances the inclusion of Minister in the category does not seem to be hit by the ejusdem generis rule ... The popular notion that a Minister is a public servant of the first order, does not seem to be absolutely erroneous. At any rate no person could be a more public person than a Minister in the sense that his duties are with the public and he is the people's man in the Government of the country ... The language of a statute is not unoften extended to new things which were not known and could not have been contemplated by the Legislature when it was passed. Of course subject to this that the thing coming afterwards is a species of the genus that the Legislature dealt with...It cannot be denied that the Minister is a species of the genus although the Minister may combine in himself other features that do not wholly apply in the case of ordinary officers and public servants ... The categories of public servants are never closed particularly in the background of the total change in the conception of 'public servant' in modern times. In a society imbued with a sense of wider and wider public service and duties, there can be no justification for confining the connotation of public servant literally to the concept of public servants as prevailing in 1850. Nor has it been so confined. The Minister in aiding and advising the Governor represents the public and in doing so, he performs a duty owed to the public in the most literal sense of the term. Criminal misconduct on the part of a Minister is the more reprehensible and there can be no valid reason for keeping his position sacrosanct and above the law on purely technical grounds. Law being not very far from the ethical sense of the community it is not to be given a meaning that is revolting to society.

Unfortunately, all these cases escaped the notice of the majority. It may also be pertinent to mention that elected officer holders or members of Parliament may commit corruption or corrupt practices, inter alia, through the following means: (i) Bribery: by accepting bribes from individuals or businesses in exchange for political favors, contracts, or regulatory decisions; (ii) Embezzlement: by misappropriating public funds for personal use, often by diverting money meant for public projects or services; (iii) Kickbacks: by receiving a portion of money from contracts or projects awarded to specific companies in return for steering those contracts their way; (iv) Nepotism and cronyism: by appointing family members or close associates to government positions or awarding them contracts without fair competition; (v) Extortion: by forcing individuals or businesses to pay money through threats or coercion; (vi) Money laundering: by concealing the origins of illegally obtained funds by making them appear legitimate through a series of transactions; (vii) Shell companies: by creating fake companies to funnel money illicitly, making it difficult to trace the funds back to the corrupt politician; (viii) Fraudulent land deals: by illegally acquiring public or private land and then selling it for personal gain; (ix) Insider trading: by using non-public information gained through political office to make profitable investments in the stock market; (x) Tax evasion: by underreporting income or using offshore accounts to hide money and avoid paying taxes. All these acts are triable for the offences of corruption and corrupt practices not only under the P.C.A. and the P.P.C. but they are also triable for different offences under the Income Tax Ordinance 2001, the Anti-Money Laundering Act 2010 and the Elections Act 2017, etc.

(ii) Change of forum for investigation and trial of certain offences falls within the policy domain of legislature (Parliament)

17. Since the members of Parliament (elected holders of public office) being "public servants" are triable under the P.P.C. and the P.C.A. for the alleged commission of the offences of corruption and corrupt practice (criminal misconduct), the observation of the majority that once excluded from the jurisdiction of the NAB no other accountability fora can take cognizance of their alleged acts of corruption and corrupt practices, respectfully submitted, does not stand. Similar is the position with the observation of the majority that by excluding from the ambit of the NAB Ordinance the holders of public office who have allegedly committed the offence of corruption and corrupt practices involving an amount of less than Rs.500 million, Parliament has effectively absolved them from any liability for their acts. Reliance on Mobashir Hassan[46] is, therefore, also not well placed.

18. The effect of adding the said threshold of value by the challenged amendments in the NAB Ordinance is simply that the cases of alleged corruption and corrupt practices (criminal misconduct) against the members of Parliament and Provincial Assemblies that involve the amount or property of value less than Rs.500 million shall now be investigated and tried under the PCA by the respective anti-corruption investigating agencies and anti-corruption courts of the Federation and Provinces. The matter of defining a threshold of value for the investigation and trial of offences under the NAB Ordinance is undoubtedly a policy matter that falls within the domain of the legislature, not of the courts. If a legislature has the constitutional authority to pass a law with regard to a particular subject, it is not for the courts to delve into and scrutinize the wisdom and policy which led the legislature to pass that law.

19. The majority has observed that 'No cogent argument was put forward by learned counsel for the respondent Federation as to why Parliament has fixed a higher amount of Rs.500 million for the NAB to entertain complaints and file corresponding references in the Accountability Courts when the Superior Courts have termed acts of corruption and corrupt practices causing loss to the tune of Rs.100 million as mega scandals.'[47] With great respect, it is not the domain of the courts to determine what value of the amount or property involved in an offence of corruption and corrupt practice makes it one of "mega scandals" to be investigated and tried under the NAB Ordinance. Any observation by a court that the NAB should investigate the offences involving "mega scandals", indicating any threshold in this regard can at most be a recommendation to be considered by the legislature, which is not binding on the latter. The legislature may, in its wisdom, after considering the recommendation either enhance or reduce the proposed threshold or may simply decide not to act upon that. The courts cannot force the legislature to act upon their recommendations nor can they strike down any law competently enacted by the legislature which does not commensurate with their recommendations.

20. Our Constitution is based on the principle of trichotomy of power in which legislature, executive and judiciary have their separately delineated functions. The legislature is assigned the function to legislate laws, the executive to execute laws and the judiciary to interpret laws. None of these three organs are dependent upon the other in the performance of its functions nor can one claim superiority over the others.[48] Each 'enjoys complete independence in their own sphere'[49] and is 'the master in its own assigned field'[50] under the Constitution. Any one of these three organs cannot usurp or interfere in the exercise of each other's functions,[51] nor can one encroach upon the field of the others[52]. This trichotomy of power is so important that it is said to be a 'basic feature of the Constitution',[53] a 'cornerstone of the Constitution,'[54] a 'fundamental principle of the constitutional construct',[55] and 'one of the foundational principles of the Constitution'[56]. In view of this constitutional arrangement of separation of powers between three organs of the State, this Court strongly repelled in Mamukanjan[57] an argument challenging the vires of a law enacted by the legislature on the ground that the law was enacted to undo the effect of a judgment passed by a High Court, thus:

The argument...is without substance and which if accepted would indeed lead to startling results. It would strike at the very root of the power of Legislature, otherwise competent to legislate on a particular subject, to undertake any remedial or curative legislation after discovery of defect in an existing law as a result of the judgment of a superior Court in exercise of its constitutional jurisdiction. The argument overlooks the fact, that the remedial or curative legislation is also "the end product" of constitutional jurisdiction in the cognate field. The argument if accepted, would also seek to throw into serious disarray the pivotal arrangement in the Constitution regarding the division of sovereign power of the State among its principal organs; namely, the executive, the Legislature and the judiciary each being the master in its own assigned field under the Constitution.

With great respect, I would submit that the above observations of the majority, in the words used in Mamukanjan, 'throw into serious disarray the pivotal arrangement in the Constitution regarding the division of sovereign power of the State among its principal organs'.

21. Although after explaining that the main premise of the majority judgment that the elected holders of public offices are not triable either under the P.C.A. or under the P.P.C. for the offence of corruption and corrupt practices is, in my humble opinion, not correct, it is not necessary to discuss the other related NAB amendments that have also been declared ultra vires the Constitution by the majority. Yet, I find it appropriate to briefly discuss such amendments.

(ii)-A No substantial effect of omission of Section 14 of the NAB Ordinance

22. The omission of Section 14 of the NAB Ordinance has made no substantial effect in view of the provisions of Article 122 of the Qanun-e-Shahadat 1984. The omitted Section 14 of the NAB Ordinance provides inter alia that in a trial of an offence punishable under Section 9(a)(v) of the NAB Ordinance, if the fact is proved that the accused is in possession of assets or pecuniary resources disproportionate to his known source of income, the Court shall presume, unless the contrary is proved, that the accused person is guilty of the offence of corruption and corrupt practices. The majority judgment has held that the omission of Section 14(c), along with the change made in Section 9(a)(v), might appear innocuous in nature but their effect both individually and collectively has actually rendered the offence of corruption and corrupt practices pointless in the category of assets beyond means, and if accused persons cannot be held to account for owning or possessing assets beyond their means, the natural corollary will be that public assets and wealth will become irrecoverable which would encourage further corruption.[58] With respect, I would say that no such effect has occurred by the omission of Section 14 from the NAB Ordinance.

23. The different clauses of the omitted Section 14 of the NAB Ordinance are actually the descriptive instances of the applicability of the principle of "evidential burden"[59] enshrined in Article 122 of the Qanun-e-Shahadat 1984 (formerly Section 106 of the Evidence Act 1872), which provides:

When any fact is especially within the knowledge of any person, the burden of proving that fact is upon him.

The illustrations of Article 122 of the Qanun-e-Shahadat are also quite instructive to understand the scope thereof, which are as follows:

(a) When a person does an act with some intention other than that which the character and circumstances of the act suggest, the burden of proving that intention is upon him.

(b) A is charged with travelling on a railway without a ticket. The burden of proving that he had a ticket is on him.

Clauses (a), (b) and (d) of the omitted Section 14 of the NAB Ordinance relate to the intention of the accused other than that which the character and circumstances of the act proved against him by the prosecution suggest. These clauses are, therefore, merely descriptive instances of the applicability of Article 122 read with its illustration (a) of the Qanun-e-Shahadat. And clause (c) of the omitted Section 14 of the NAB Ordinance that relates to possessing assets disproportionate to known sources of income is the descriptive instance of the applicability of Article 122 read with its illustration (b) of the Qanun-e-Shahadat. That being the legal position, this Court in Mazharul Haq[60] by referring to Rehmat[61] (wherein the scope of Section 106 of the Evidence Act, now Article 122 of the Qanun-e-Shahadat, had been explained) held:

[T]he ordinary rule that applies to criminal trials, viz., that the onus lies on the prosecution to prove the guilt of the accused, is not in any way modified by the rule of evidence contained in this section [14 of the NAB Ordinance] which cannot be used to make up for the inability of the prosecution to produce evidence of circumstances necessary to prove the guilt of the accused. It is only in cases where the facts proved by the evidence give rise to a reasonable inference of guilt unless the same is rebutted, that such inference can be negative[d] by proof of some fact which, in its nature, can only be within the special knowledge of the accused.

Also in Hashim Babar[62] referred to in the majority judgment, this legal position was reiterated, thus:

It is also settled principle of law that the initial burden of proof [legal burden] is on the prosecution to establish the possession of properties by an accused disproportionate to his known sources of income to prove the charge of corruption and corrupt practices under NAB Ordinance, 1999 and once this burden is satisfactorily discharged, onus [evidential burden] is shifted to the accused to prove the contrary and give satisfactory account of holding the properties...

Therefore, in view of the provisions of Article 122 of the Qanun-e-Shahadat, the omission of Section 14 from the NAB Ordinance by the challenged amendments does not have any substantial effect. Notwithstanding such an innocuous effect, the change in the rules of evidence squarely falls within the scope of the legislative competence of the Parliament under Article 142(b) of the Constitution and unless such change offends any of the fundamental rights, it is not justiciable in courts.

(ii)-B No substantial effect of addition of words "through corrupt and dishonest means" in section 9(a)(v) of the NAB Ordinance

24. Similar is the position with the addition of words "through corrupt and dishonest means" by the challenged amendments in Section 9(a)(v) of the NAB Ordinance: It also has no substantial effect on the mode of proving the offence of unaccounted assets possessed by a holder of public office beyond his known sources of income; as when the prosecution succeeds in proving that the particular assets of the accused are disproportionate to his known sources of income (legal means) and are thus acquired through some corrupt and dishonest means, the burden of proving the "fair and honest means" whereby the accused claims to have acquired the same, being within his knowledge, are to be proved by him as per provisions of Article 122, read with its illustration (b), of the Qanun-e-Shahadat.

(ii)-C Constitutionality of other amendments

25. The majority has declared ultra vires the Constitution the following amendments also: (i) the addition of Explanation II to Section 9(v), which provides that for the purpose of calculation of movable assets, the sum total of credit entries of bank account shall not be treated as an asset but rather the bank balance of an account on the date of initiation of inquiry may be treated as a movable asset and that a banking transaction shall not be treated as an asset unless there is evidence of creation of corresponding asset through that transaction; (ii) the omission of clause (g) of Section 21, which omission has made applicable the provisions of the Qanun-e-Shahadat to documents or any other material transferred to Pakistan by a Foreign Government in legal proceedings under the NAB Ordinance; and (iii) and the addition of second proviso to Section 25(b), which provides that in case of failure of accused to make payment in accordance with the plea bargain agreement approved by the Court, the agreement of plea bargain shall become inoperative to the rights of the parties immediately. With great respect, I would say that in declaring these amendments as ultra vires the Constitution, the majority has not explained how they infringe any of the fundamental rights or any other provision of the Constitution, nor could the learned counsel for the petitioner point out in his arguments any such infringement. These amendments being related to "criminal law, criminal procedure and evidence" fall within the legislative competence of the Parliament as per Article 142(b) of the Constitution and in no way take away or abridge any of the fundamental rights in terms of Article 8(2) of the Constitution.

(iii) Challenged amendments (law made by the Parliament) do not take away or abridge any of the fundamental rights

26. Despite my repeated questions during the prolonged hearings of the present case, the learned counsel for the petitioner could not pinpoint which of the fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution has either been "taken away" or "abridged" by the Parliament by making the challenged NAB Amendment Acts. Needless to mention that as per Article 8(2) of the Constitution, the Parliament cannot make any law which "takes away or abridges" the fundamental rights conferred by Chapter 1 of Part II of the Constitution (Articles 9-28) and if it does so a High Court under Article 199 and this Court under Article 184(3) of the Constitution can declare it to have been made without lawful authority (ultra vires) and of no legal effect (void).

27. The learned counsel for the petitioner attempted to establish that the challenged amendments have abridged the fundamental rights of the people of Pakistan to life (Art. 9), dignity (Art. 14), property (Art. 24) and equality (Art. 25). His argument was quite circuitous: that the challenged amendments have deprived the people of Pakistan form holding accountable through criminal prosecution their elected representatives for committing breach of trust with regard to public money and property; that the challenged amendments operate to bring to halt or abort the criminal prosecution of the holders of public offices for offences involving embezzlement of public money and property; that the challenged amendments have excluded certain acts of holders of public offices from the definition of the offences of corruption and corrupt practices and have made the proof of others impossible; that in absence of a strong accountability law, the holders of public offices would continue to indulge in loot and plunder of public money and property which were to be used for the welfare of the people of Pakistan in providing the basic necessities of life, such as, health and education facilities, etc.; that the challenged amendments have thus deprived the people of Pakistan from their fundamental rights to life, dignity, property and equality.

28. This argument of the learned counsel for the petitioner have prevailed with the majority in holding that the blanket immunity granted to the elected holders of public offices offends Articles 9, 14, 23 and 24 of the Constitution because it permits and encourages the squandering of public assets and wealth by elected holders of public office as there is no forum for their accountability. And this in turn, according to the majority, affects the economic well-being of the State and ultimately the quality and dignity of the people's lives because as more resources are diverted towards illegal activities, less resources remain for the provision of essential services to the people such as health facilities, education institutes and basic infrastructure, etc.[63]

29. With respect, I am completely at a loss to understand the correlation of the claimed right to the accountability of the elected representatives through criminal prosecution with fundamental rights to life (Art. 9), dignity (Art. 14), property (Art. 24) and equality (Art. 25). The Constitution by itself provides only one mode to hold the elected representatives accountable, that is, by exercising the right of vote in the election.

The mode of holding the elected representatives accountable for the offences of corruption and corrupt practices through criminal prosecution has not been provided by the Constitution but by the sub-constitutional laws - the P.P.C., the P.C.A. and the NAB Ordinance. If Parliament can enact these laws in the exercise of its ordinary legislative power, it can surely amend them in the exercise of the same legislative power. The argument cannot be acceded to that Parliament after enacting these laws has no power to amend, modify or repeal them.

Doctrines of exhaustion and functus officio, not applicable to legislative powers

30. 'What Parliament has done, Parliament can undo.'[64] The legislative power of Parliament does not exhaust by enactment of any law nor does Parliament become functus officio by making a law, on a particular subject. The doctrines of exhaustion and functus officio are not applicable to legislative powers.[65] A legislature that has made any law is competent, as enunciated in Asfandyar,[66] to change, annul, re-frame or add to that law. Even the legislature of today cannot enact a law, as held in Imran Tiwana,[67] whereby the powers of a future legislature or of its own to amend a law are curtailed. Therefore, if Parliament can enact the NAB Ordinance, it can also repeal the entire law or amend the same.

31. Further, holding a right to be included in or to be an integral part of a fundamental right guaranteed in the Constitution, is a very serious matter that has the effect of curtailing the legislative powers of Parliament in terms of Article 8(2) of the Constitution. This matter, therefore, demands a thorough and in-depth analysis of the relation of the claimed right with the fundamental right guaranteed in the Constitution, on the basis of an objective criterion. With great respect, I would say that the majority has assumed the right to accountability of the elected holders of public offices through criminal prosecution as included in the fundamental rights to life, dignity and property guaranteed by Articles 9, 14 and 24 of the Constitution, without making any discussion for establishing its close relationship of such an extent with those fundamental rights that makes this right to be an integral part of them.

32. No doubt, the fundamental rights guaranteed in the Constitution, an organic instrument, are not capable of precise or permanent definition delineating their meaning and scope for all times to come. With the passage of time, changes occur in the political, social and economic conditions of the society, which requires re-evaluation of their meaning and scope in consonance with the changed conditions. Therefore, keeping in view the prevailing socio-economic and politico-cultural values and ideals of the society, the courts are to construe the fundamental rights guaranteed in the Constitution with a progressive, liberal and dynamic approach.[68] But this does not mean that the judges are at liberty to give any artificial meaning to the words and expressions used in the provisions of the fundamental rights, on the basis of their subjective ideological considerations. The progressive, liberal and dynamic approach in construing fundamental rights guaranteed in the Constitution must be guided by an objective criterion, not by subjective inclination.

Objective criterion for recognizing new rights as fundamental rights

33. In this regard, the objective criterion, as articulated by Justice Bhagwati,[69] is to see whether the claimed right is an integral part of a named fundamental right or partakes of the same basic nature and character as the named fundamental right so that the exercise of such right is in reality and substance nothing but an instance of the exercise of the named fundamental right. A right is an integral part of a named fundamental right which gives, in the words of Justice Douglas,[70] "life and substance" to the named fundamental right. Further, the question whether a State action (legislative or executive) constitutes an infringement of a fundamental right is determined by examining its "direct and inevitable effect" on the fundamental right.[71]

34. The learned counsel for the petitioner could not explain how the right to accountability of the elected holders of public offices through criminal prosecution under the NAB Ordinance is an integral part of the fundamental rights to life, dignity, property and equality or how it partakes of the same basic nature and character as the said fundamental rights so that the exercise of such right is in reality and substance nothing but an instance of the exercise of these fundamental rights. Nor could he establish that the "direct and inevitable effect" of the challenged amendments constitutes an infringement of these fundamental rights. The "effect" of the challenged amendments on these fundamental rights portrayed by him is so "remote and uncertain" that if such effect is accepted as an infringement of the fundamental rights then there would hardly be left any space and scope for Parliament to make laws on any subject; as all laws enacted by Parliament would "ultimately" reach any of the fundamental rights, particularly rights to life or property, in one way or the other through such a long winding conjectural path of farfetched "in turn" effects. The acceptance of "remote and uncertain effect" on a fundamental right as an infringement of that right, I am afraid, would thus reduce to naught the principle of trichotomy of power which is, as aforesaid, a 'basic feature of the Constitution', a 'cornerstone of the Constitution,' a 'fundamental principle of the constitutional construct', and 'one of the foundational principles of the Constitution'. Reference by the learned counsel for the petitioner and reliance of the majority on the cases of Corruption in Hajj Arrangements[72] and Haris Steel Industries,[73] submitted with respect, is misplaced as the executive actions impugned therein had a "direct and inevitable effect", not "remote and uncertain effect", on the fundamental rights of the people of Pakistan.

Conclusion: Petition is meritless

35. As discussed above, the learned counsel for the petitioner has utterly failed to clearly establish beyond any reasonable doubt that the challenged amendments in the NAB Ordinance are constitutionally invalid on the touchstone of "taking away" or "abridging" any of the fundamental rights, in terms of Article 8(2) of the Constitution. I find the petition meritless and therefore dismiss it.

Locus standi of the petitioner

36. Before parting with this opinion, I want to bring on record my reservations on the locus standi of a parliamentarian to challenge the constitutional validity of an Act of Parliament. Parliament is a constitutional body, but being comprised of the chosen representatives of the people of Pakistan it attains the status of a prime constitutional body. Any action made or decision taken by the majority of a constitutional body is taken to be and treated as an action or decision of that body as a whole comprising of all its members, not only of those who voted for that action or decision, such as a decision made by the majority of a Cabinet of Ministers, the majority of a Bench of this Court or of all Judges in an administrative matter, the majority of the Judicial Commission of Pakistan or the majority of the Supreme Judicial Council, etc. Can any member of these constitutional bodies who was in the minority in making that decision challenge the validity of that decision in court? Not, in my opinion. The principle that decisions taken by a majority of members in a constitutional body (like a parliament or legislature) usually cannot be directly challenged in court by those in the minority is rooted in the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty and the separation of powers. There is a clear division between the legislative, executive and judiciary branches. This division ensures that each branch can function independently without undue interference from the others. If the judiciary could easily overturn majority decisions within a legislative body based solely on the objections of the minority, it would disrupt this balance and infringe on the independence of the legislative process. The principle of parliamentary sovereignty holds that the decisions of the Parliament, when made according to its rules and procedures, are supreme. This means that courts cannot typically interfere with the internal workings or decisions of the Parliament. Democratic systems are often built on the principle of majority rule. This ensures that decisions reflect the will of the majority while still respecting the rights of the minority. Allowing minority members to easily challenge majority decisions would undermine this fundamental democratic principle.

37. The majority has referred to and relied upon the case of Ashraf Tiwana[74] to repel the objection as to the locus standi of the petitioner, wherein this Court held that the exercise of jurisdiction under Article 184(3) of the Constitution is not dependent on the existence of a petitioner. But in doing so, the majority has missed the point that Ashraf Tiwana was decided before the decision of a five-member Bench of this Court in S.M.C. No.4/2021,[75] holding inter alia that the Chief Justice of Pakistan is the sole authority by and through whom the jurisdiction of this Court under Article 184(3) of the Constitution can be invoked suo motu, i.e., without the "existence of a petitioner". After this decision in S.M.C. No.4/2021, the question of locus standi of a petitioner cannot so easily be brushed aside. However, as I have found this petition even otherwise meritless, I leave these questions for full consideration and authoritative decision in any other appropriate case.

Judges of the constitutional courts and Members of the Armed Forces are accountable under the NAB Ordinance and the PCA

38. This case was heard on over 50 dates of hearing and during these prolonged hearings a question was also raised as to whether the judges of the constitutional court and the members of the Armed Forces enjoy exemption from the NAB Ordinance. I find that the generally professed opinion that members of the Armed Forces and the judges of the constitutional courts are not triable under the anti-corruption criminal laws of the land, requires some clarification. To maintain the said opinion, the reference is usually made to the case of Asfandyar[76]. This Court in Asfandyar observed that the non-applicability of the NAB Ordinance to the members of the Armed Forces and the judges of the Superior Courts is not discriminatory as they are held accountable under the Army Act 1952 and under Article 209 of the Constitution respectively. It appears that to secure the independence of these important national institutions, the Court made this observation in the context that if a member of the Armed Forces or a judge of a Superior Court is alleged to` have committed an offence of corruption and corrupt practices, he is at first to be proceeded against by his departmental authority; once he is found guilty of such offence by his departmental authority and is removed from his official position, only then can he be investigated and tried under the anti-corruption criminal laws of the land, i.e., the NAB Ordinance or the PCA as the case may be. If we do not read and understand the observations made by the Court in Asfandyar in this way, the legal position would be clearly hit by the basic constitutional value and the non-negotiable fundamental right of equality before law. The other holders of public offices, in addition to facing the civil consequences of their corruption and corrupt practices, are to suffer criminal punishment of undergoing the sentence of imprisonment and the forfeiture of the unaccounted-for assets, while the members of the Armed Forces and the judges of the constitutional courts would go scot-free in this regard. After removal from the official position, they would be set free to enjoy the assets accumulated by them through corrupt means. Such reading and understanding of the observation of the Court would allow the members of the Armed Forces and the judges of the constitutional courts to be unjustly enriched and then allowed to retain this unlawful enrichment without any accountability, this would make the members of the Armed forces and the judges of the constitutional courts untouchable and above the law; any such reading would be reprehensible and revolting to the conscience of the people of Pakistan and bring the Court into serious disrepute. We must, therefore, strongly shun the above generally professed opinion and be clear that members of Armed Forces and the judges of the constitutional courts are fully liable under the NAB Ordinance, like any other public servant of Pakistan.

(Against the order of the Balochistan High Court, Quetta, dated 12.12.2023, passed in C.P. No. 2010 of 2023).

Elections Act (XXXIII of 2017)---

----Ss. 57(2), 17 & 19---Constitution of Pakistan, Art. 17---General Elections, 2024---Delimitation of constituencies, dispute over---Proportionality, principle of---High Court interfering with the delimitation order of the Election Commission of Pakistan about three days before notification of the Election Programme of the General Elections, 2024---Propriety---Principle of proportionality and the concept of the larger good demand that general elections be given primacy, and issues concerning the delimitation of constituencies, while important, should be addressed subsequent to the elections---Such an approach ensures the continuity of democratic governance and upholds the fundamental rights of the electorate, while still acknowledging the need for eventual and necessary adjustments in constituency boundaries.

In democratic systems general elections are the cornerstone of representative governance, ensuring the people's right to choose their leaders and influence policy decisions. The periodic conduct of these elections is not merely a procedural necessity but a fundamental principle upholding the democratic ethos. On the other hand, the delimitation of a constituency, although significant for ensuring fair and effective representation, does not hold the same immediacy or overriding importance as the conduct of general elections. Delimitation, by its nature, is a detailed and often prolonged exercise, aimed at creating constituencies that reflect current demographic realities. While this is undoubtedly important for the health of a democratic system, it is not so critical that it should impede the timely conduct of general elections. In applying the principle of proportionality, it becomes evident that the larger good - the uninterrupted continuation of democratic processes and the assurance of the people's right to government formation - takes precedence. Postponing general elections to address constituency delimitation could lead to a vacuum in governance and a potential crisis of legitimacy. Such a situation would be antithetical to the principles of democracy and the larger good of the populace. Therefore, the principle of proportionality and the concept of the larger good demand that general elections be given primacy. Issues concerning the delimitation of constituencies, while important, should be addressed subsequent to the elections. This approach ensures the continuity of democratic governance and upholds the fundamental rights of the electorate, while still acknowledging the need for eventual and necessary adjustments in constituency boundaries. Therefore, if the Supreme Court proceeds to adjudicate upon the present issue of delimitation of two constituencies thereby re-examining or altering the notified constituencies by the Election Commission of Pakistan ("ECP") under challenge, the Court will invariably upset the timeline of the Election Programme and derail the electoral process already set afoot by the Election Programme announced on 15 December, 2023.

Applying the scale of proportionality, the constitutional importance of holding of General Elections in a constitutional democracy as per the Election Programme far outweighs the need for re-examining the delimitation of a constituency at this critical electoral juncture. Any intervention by the Supreme Court in revisiting the contours of delimitation of a constituency done by the ECP at this stage will open floodgates of similar litigation, resulting in choking the election process. Therefore, proceeding with the present case at this stage when the electoral clock has started ticking, would undermine democracy and adversely affect the fundamental right to vote and form a political government of millions of voters and political workers countrywide. The importance of elections in a democracy and the fulfillment of the larger objective of holding a timely election should be given due consideration to ensure that the Court remains within its democratic remit, which in the present case necessitates organizing and conducting of free, fair and timely elections by the ECP.

In the present case, the holding of timely elections in the two constituencies is more important than insisting upon otherwise proper delimitation thereof. Therefore, it is best that the court lays its hands off this matter for the time being till the General Elections are successfully completed. Supreme Court suspended the operation of the impugned order and granted leave to appeal to consider inter alia the question: whether in the circumstances of the case, the judicial intervention by the High Court with the delimitation order of the ECP, in its discretionary jurisdiction under Article 199 of the Constitution, was justified. Supreme Court directed that the ECP shall organize and conduct the election in the two constituencies as per the final delimitation notified on 30 November 2023 and in accordance with the Election Programme notified on 15 December 2023; that the controversy as to the delimitation of the two constituencies shall be decided after the elections, only for the purpose of future general elections if conducted on the basis of the population census of 2023; and that Office shall fix this case for hearing after the General Elections, 2024 are over.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---The role of a judge in a constitutional democracy is of a guardian who protects both the Constitution and the democracy. Democracy rests on the sovereignty of the people which is exercised through free and fair elections held on a regular basis. Elections are therefore of central importance without which the government is not democratic. Constitutional democracy is nurtured by free and fair elections, and timely elections are the hallmark of a functioning democracy. Elections are thus essential to maintain the democratic process and public trust in the system. Elections play a crucial role in upholding the principles of democracy; they ensure that the will of the people is respected and that leadership is accountable to the public. When election programme is announced, it is important for any litigation or legal challenges related to elections to be resolved promptly. Delaying elections or prolonging legal disputes can undermine public confidence in the electoral process and the democratic system as a whole. It can also create uncertainty and potentially destabilize the political environment.

2. It is in the background of this significance of the elections in a constitutional democracy that we attend to the question before us: whether we should now proceed with and adjudicate upon the controversy of delimitation of constituencies or be mindful and lay our hands off this matter at present and take it up for adjudication after the general elections so that the electoral process set in motion is successfully completed without any hindrance.

3. Briefly, the facts that have given rise to the said question are that vide short order[1] dated 12.12.2023 the Balochistan High Court allowed the constitution petition of respondents Nos. 1 to 4 and declared the delimitation order dated 26.11.2023 of the Election Commission of Pakistan ("ECP") to be void and of no legal effect. The High Court further directed the ECP to notify the final delimitation (Form-7) for both constituencies, in the following terms:

PB-I (Sherani-cum-Zhob):

District Sherani plus Patwar Circles Babar and Murgha Kibzai of District Zhob

PB-II (Zhob):

District Zhob minus Patwar Circles Babar and Murgha Kibzai.

However, no such notification has yet been issued as per the statement of the counsel for the ECP.

4. Without touching the merits of the case, we note with concern that while the impugned order was passed on 12 December 2023, the ECP has on 15 December 2023 notified the Election Programme of the General Elections-2024, under Section 57(2) of the Elections Act 2017, for the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies with the elections to be held on 8 February 2024. As per the said programme, the Returning Officers of the notified constituencies are to give public notice tomorrow, i.e., on 19 December 2023, of the dates specified by the ECP for different actions required to be done for holding the elections. In the Election Programme, the dates fixed for filing the nomination papers with the Returning Officers by the candidates are 20 December to 22 December 2023. Earlier on 3 November 2023, this Court in the case of Supreme Court Bar Association v. Federation of Pakistan[2] held:

18. The President of Pakistan and the ECP have announced the date for holding of general election to the National Assembly and to the provincial assemblies. The Federal Government, the Provincial Governments and the Islamabad Capital Territory have concurred. The matter of the holding of general election on 8 February 2024 stands resolved. No one should now put forward any pretext to derail democracy.

21 ... Pakistan was established democratically, is a democracy and must remain one. When general elections are due they have to be held. ...

5. It is well-established in democratic systems that general elections are the cornerstone of representative governance, ensuring the people's right to choose their leaders and influence policy decisions. The periodic conduct of these elections is not merely a procedural necessity but a fundamental principle upholding the democratic ethos. On the other hand, the delimitation of a constituency, although significant for ensuring fair and effective representation, does not hold the same immediacy or overriding importance as the conduct of general elections. Delimitation, by its nature, is a detailed and often prolonged exercise, aimed at creating constituencies that reflect current demographic realities. While this is undoubtedly important for the health of a democratic system, it is not so critical that it should impede the timely conduct of general elections. In applying the principle of proportionality, it becomes evident that the larger good - the uninterrupted continuation of democratic processes and the assurance of the people's right to government formation - takes precedence. Postponing general elections to address constituency delimitation could lead to a vacuum in governance and a potential crisis of legitimacy. Such a situation would be antithetical to the principles of democracy and the larger good of the populace. Therefore, the principle of proportionality and the concept of the larger good demand that general elections be given primacy. Issues concerning the delimitation of constituencies, while important, should be addressed subsequent to the elections. This approach ensures the continuity of democratic governance and upholds the fundamental rights of the electorate, while still acknowledging the need for eventual and necessary adjustments in constituency boundaries. Therefore, if we proceed to adjudicate upon the issue of delimitation of the constitutuencies before us thereby re-examining or altering the notified constituencies by the ECP under challenge, we will invariably upset the timeline of the Election Programme and derail the electrol process already set afoot by the Election Programme announced on 15 December, 2023.

6. Applying the scale of proportionality, to us the constitutional importance of holding of General Elections in a constitutional democracy as per the Election Programme far outweighs the need for re-examining the delimitation of a constituency at this critical electoral juncture. Any intervention by us in revisiting the contours of delimitation of a constituency done by the ECP at this stage will open floodgates of similar litigation, resulting in choking the election process. Therefore, proceeding with this case at this stage when the electoral clock has started ticking, would undermine democracy and adversely affect the fundamental right to vote and form a political government of millions of voters and political workers countrywide. The importance of elections in a democracy and the fulfillment of the larger objective of holding a timely election should be given due consideration to ensure that the Court remains within its democratic remit, which in the present case necessitates organizing and conducting of free, fair and timely elections by the ECP.

7. In the present case, because of the crucial stage of the election process, we are of the considered view that holding of general elections is far more imperative and should be prioritized over the delimitation of constituencies. The holding of timely elections in the two constituencies is more important than insisting upon otherwise proper delimitation thereof. Therefore, it is best that the court lays its hands off this matter for the time being till the General Elections are successfully completed. We, therefore, suspend the operation of the impugned order and grant leave to appeal to consider inter alia the question: whether in the circumstances of the case, the judicial intervention by the High Court with the delimitation order of the ECP, in its discretionary jurisdiction under Article 199 of the Constitution, was justified. The ECP shall organize and conduct the election in the two constituencies as per the final delimitation notified on 30 November 2023 and in accordance with the Election Programme notified on 15 December 2023. The controversy as to the delimitation of the two constituencies shall be decided after the elections, only for the purpose of future general elections if conducted on the basis of the population census of 2023. Office shall fix this case for hearing after the General Elections, 2024 are over.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---The matter originated with a complaint filed before the Council of Complaints ("COC") of the Pakistan Electronic Media Regulatory Authority ("PEMRA") alleging that the petitioner violated the Electronic Media (Programmes and Advertisements) Code of Conduct 2015 ("Code of Conduct") in a programme aired on its channel on 08.03.2021. After considering the reply of the petitioner, the COC in its meeting on 01.04.2021 found the contents of the programme to be violative of the Code of Conduct and recommended that a fine of Rs. 5,00,000/- be imposed on the petitioner. The said recommendation was approved by the Chairman PEMRA on 29.04.2021. The High Court dismissed the appeal filed against the order of the Chairman PEMRA. The petitioner now seeks leave of this Court to appeal against the order of the High Court.

2. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties and perused the record. The question posed before us is whether the Chairman PEMRA had the authority to approve the recommendations of the COC.

3. PEMRA is envisaged, in the Pakistan Electronic Media Regulatory Authority Ordinance 2002 ("Ordinance"), as an independent statutory body consisting of the Chairman and twelve members that would regulate electronic media in Pakistan.[1] The Ordinance hands out a distinct legal personality and operational autonomy to PEMRA. One of the objects identified in the preamble is to "improve the standards of information, education and entertainment". Thus, the Ordinance also establishes COCs under Section 26 with an adjudicatory-cum-recommen-datory role to address public complaints against any aspects of programmes broadcast or distributed by electronic media. The COC has powers to summon a licensee against whom a complaint has been made and call for explanation regarding any matter relating to their operation. The COC is supposed to render opinions on such complaints. Finally, in case of violation of the codes of programme content and advertisements, the COC may recommend appropriate action of censure or fine to PEMRA. However, the power to impose fine, which was the recommended action in this case, resides in Section 29(6) of the Ordinance and belongs to PEMRA. It follows that the COC is to place its recommendation before PEMRA and the power to impose fine vests in PEMRA.

4. The Ordinance expressly vests PEMRA with the power of delegation: Section 13 authorizes PEMRA to delegate, by general or special order, any of its powers, responsibilities or functions other than the power to grant, revoke or cancel a broadcast media or distribution service licence except Cable TV to the Chairman or a member or any member of its staff, or an expert, consultant, adviser, or other officer or employee of PEMRA subject to such conditions as it may by rules prescribe. It thus appears that there is an express authority to delegate, however, the power has to be duly delegated.

5. In the instant case, PEMRA has placed reliance on a decision taken in a meeting held on 31.07.2007 wherein the powers to approve the minutes of meeting of the COC in terms of Section 26 of the Ordinance was delegated to the Chairman PEMRA.[2] However, we note that this Court in PEMRA v. Pakistan Broadcasters Association[3] has already held that "the delegation could only be in terms of, and subject to, legally relevant and sustainable conditions imposed by rules." We are told that no rules have been framed whereby the authority to approve the recommendation of the COC has been delegated to the Chairman PEMRA. The word "delegate" must take its meaning from the context in which it appears and, when found in a statute, it ordinarily connotes a degree of formality especially when the provision requires that the delegation shall be in a particular form. A look at Section 26 of the Ordinance suggests that PEMRA has been given the power to delegate any of its powers, responsibilities or functions to the Chairman or a member or any member of its staff, or an expert, consultant, adviser, or other officer or employee of PEMRA, and in order to control the delegate in the exercise of delegated powers, responsibilities or functions the delegation has been subjected to such conditions as may be prescribed by the rules. The legislature has intended that the exercise of delegation envisaged under Section 13 of the Ordinance shall be structured with conditions prescribed under the rules framed with the approval of the Federal Government.

6. It is not for this Court to decide whether PEMRA should have exercised its power of delegation though it is certainly a question for this Court to decide if PEMRA has exercised it within permissible limits. What PEMRA has done in its meeting dated 31.07.2007 has been to delegate the power in the very terms in which it was given to PEMRA to the Chairman PEMRA specifying no standards and leaving everything in the Chairman PEMRA's discretion. Public bodies in whom discretion is vested are under an obligation to confine and structure it by the promulgation of decisional criteria so as to strike the best balance in the context between rules and discretion.[4] This is the reason that the legislature aimed to limit the delegation to the conditions prescribed by the rules.

7. The power to make rules is conferred to carry the enabling statute into effect, and that is an executive function. It is a function to administer the statute, which gives the power to make subordinate legislation. Thus, as the Ordinance gives discretion to PEMRA to delegate its powers, responsibilities or functions subject to conditions imposed by rules and the power to make rules is conferred on PEMRA, the validity of the exercise of discretion will be judged by the same principles as the exercise of any other administrative discretion.[5] Any rules delegating PEMRA's powers, responsibilities or functions must meet the test of reasonableness and non-arbitrariness. The act of delegation must align with the statutory purpose. PEMRA while delegating a power, responsibility or function shall not exercise the discretion of delegation in a manner that distorts the purpose of the statutory scheme. Furthermore, the conditions accompanying such delegation should possess rationality. As already held in Pakistan Broadcasters Association[6], the more important the power, responsibility or function being considered for delegation, the higher must be the "threshold" for PEMRA in deciding not to impose any conditions. Such threshold is to be gauged according to the importance of the power, responsibility or function that is being delegated, and as and when PEMRA decides to delegate more important powers, responsibilities or functions, the threshold, and in effect, the discretion to not impose conditions starts to dissipate. Furthermore, the determination of the suitable recipient for delegation primarily rests within the purview of PEMRA. Nevertheless, it is imperative that the selection be not characterized by irrationality, as any instance of improper delegation shall be a matter for the courts to decide.[7]

8. In view of the above, we come to the conclusion that the Chairman PEMRA did not have any validly delegated authority to approve the recommendation of the COC. Therefore, we convert this petition into appeal and allow the same.

MWA/F-20/SC Appeal allowed.

Mansoor Usman Awan, Attorney General, Zafar Iqbal Hussain, Spl. Secy. ECP/D.R., M. Arshad, D.G. (Law) ECP and Falak Sher, Legal Consultant, ECP on Court's call.

Date of hearing: 22nd December, 2023.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---Through this petition under Article 184 (3) of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, Gohar Ali Khan, the Chairman of Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaaf ("PTI"), has approached this Court praying that the Election Commission of Pakistan ("ECP") has to ensure free and fair elections in the country by providing a level playing field for the leaders and workers of the PTI. It is alleged that members of PTI, upon filing their nomination papers under the announced Election Programme, are being arrested, harassed and their nomination papers are being snatched from them which is blatant abuse of a fair and free electoral process. Learned counsel for the petitioner submits that in this regard they have approached the Election Commission of Pakistan under the Elections Act, 2017 ("Act") by filing complaints, however, there has been no response on behalf of the ECP.

2. On Court's call, the learned Attorney General for Pakistan and the Representatives of ECP are present before the Court. The said Representatives at the very outset submit that certain complaints have been received by the ECP this morning, which will be immediately attended to. Both the Attorney General for Pakistan and the Representative of the ECP have assured the Court that elections will be held freely and fairly as mandated under the Constitution. They further assured the Court that the grievance of the members of the PTI or any other political party received by the ECP will be decided and resolved on urgent basis and in accordance with law and where any action is required to be taken such an action will be taken so that every political party in the country enjoys a level playing field and that the elections are conducted freely and fairly.

3. The ECP plays a crucial role in the democratic process, especially in conducting elections. Under Article 218(3) of the Constitution, ECP enjoys the constitutional responsibility to conduct elections honestly, justly, fairly and in accordance with law and to guard against corrupt practices. While under Article 220 of the Constitution all the executive authorities in the country shall assist the ECP in the discharge of its functions. ECP is to ensure that elections are conducted in accordance with the democratic principles and that elections are free from undue influence, coercion, and corruption. ECP is also to ensure that all political parties and candidates have an equal opportunity to participate in the election process. The importance of free and fair elections, and maintaining a level playing field during elections, cannot be overstated. Free and fair elections provide legitimacy to the elected government and maintain the trust of the public in the democratic process. A level playing field is essential for the healthy competition, ensuring that elections are a true reflection of the people's choice, rather than the result of manipulation or coercion. It is important to remember that "organizing free and fair elections is more important than the results itself"[1].

4. The petitioner or for that matter any person representing any other political party in the electoral process may approach the ECP today at 03:00 p.m. for the redressal for their grievance relating to the elections. ECP shall attended to these grievances on urgent basis and resolve them expeditiously in order to ensure that the electoral process remains smooth, open, transparent, free and fair. Let this exercise be completed by ECP promptly without disturbing the timelines given in the Election Programme because voters must have faith in the electoral process for our democracy to succeed.

5. This petition is disposed of in the above terms.

MWA/G-1/SC Order accordingly.

Crl. P. No. 894-L of 2023, decided on 15th January, 2024.

----S. 497(1), third proviso---Constitution of Pakistan, Arts. 4, 9, 10A & 185(3)---Bail---Delay in conclusion of trial---Grant of statutory bail where the delay in the conclusion of the trial is due to the act of the Court---Principles stated.

According to the third proviso to Section 497(1), Cr.P.C. a court shall release the accused on bail in an offence punishable with death if he has been detained for a continuous period exceeding two years, unless the delay in the trial has been occasioned by an act or omission of the accused or any other person on his behalf or the conditions mentioned in the fourth proviso are attracted. The statutory right to be released on bail under the third proviso to Section 497, Cr.P.C. is not merely a statutory right but also stands firmly on constitutional guarantees under Articles 4, 9 and 10A of the Constitution. Under the said Articles the accused, like any other citizen enjoys the protection of law and to be treated in accordance with law; the accused cannot be deprived of liberty, except in accordance with law; and in determination of any criminal charge against him the accused shall be entitled to a fair trial and due process. These basket of rights are available to an accused who enjoys a presumption of innocence in his favour and understandably cannot be subjected to an indefinite pre-trial detention and therefore cannot be denied bail under the third proviso to section 497(1), Cr.P.C unless there is convincing material that the delay has been occasioned by the act or omission of the accused himself or if his case falls under any of the exceptions under the fourth proviso to section 497, Cr.P.C.

For an accused to be denied statutory bail, it must be demonstrated that his act or omission, was intentionally aimed at prolonging the trial. It must show a deliberate pattern of seeking adjournments without valid reasons during key hearings such as the examination or cross-examination of prosecution witnesses. Mere counting the number of adjournment requests alone is not enough to justify withholding bail. The application of the third proviso to Section 497(1) of the Cr.P.C when interpreted in the light of Articles 9 and 10A of the Constitution, broadens and enhances the rights of an accused who is presumed innocent during trial. The prosecution must present clear evidence that the accused or his counsel was actively trying to delay the trial through unnecessary adjournments or irrelevant applications, in order to justify denying bail. The act or omission on the part of the accused to delay of the timely conclusion of the trial must be an outcome of a concerted and consistent effort of the accused orchestrated to delay the trial.

Shakeel Shah v. The State 2022 SCMR 1 and Nadeem Samson v. State PLD 2022 SC 112 ref.

In the present case the record showed that the delay has been due to the act of the court. The trial has been suspended by the High Court on the filing of the Criminal Revision by the petitioner and during the continuum of the said suspension, the statutory period of delay i.e., continuous period exceeding two years under clause (b) of the third proviso to Section 497(1), Cr.P.C. has lapsed. The Criminal Revision is still pending before the High Court and it has been over three years since the petitioner (accused) was arrested. The Criminal Revision has not progressed for no fault of the petitioner, there is nothing on the record that the delay has been occasioned by the act or omission of the petitioner. The delay has been mainly due to the act of the High Court as the case was repeatedly relisted and not taken up on several hearings for no fault of the accused and thus the indefinite delay in the trial has been due to the act of theHigh Court which cannot be attributed to the accused in any circumstance. Petition was converted into appeal and allowed; and petitioner was admitted to bail.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---The Petitioner seeks leave to appeal against the order dated 22.08.2023, whereby his second post-arrest bail in case FIR No.C-29/2020 dated 26.05.2020, under Section 11, PECA, 2016 read with sections 295-B, 298-C, 120-B, 34 and 109 P.P.C. at the FIA Cybercrime Reporting Centre, Police Station FIA Cybercrime Wing, Lahore was declined.

2. Briefly, according to the crime report, the petitioner disseminated blasphemous content to the complainant through whats app/SMS using the mobile network and later on upon raid conducted at the residence of the petitioner blasphemous material was recovered.

3. We have heard the arguments of learned counsel for the parties and gone through the record of the case.

4. The first post arrest bail petition of the petitioner was dismissed on merits on 26.08.2021. The second bail petition was preferred by the petitioner on statutory ground, as well as, on fresh grounds, which too was dismissed by the High Court vide impugned order dated 22.08.2023. Hence this petition for leave to appeal.

5. Taking up the ground of statutory bail, the record reveals that the petitioner was arrested on 26.05.2020. During the proceedings before the trial court, the petitioner moved an application under Section 265-C, Cr.P.C. for providing him documents mentioned in the police report. The said application of the petitioner was dismissed by the trial court on 28.05.2021. The petitioner challenged the said order before the High Court through Criminal Revision[1] and the High Court was pleased to suspend the proceedings before the trial court vide order dated 07.09.2021. The said Criminal Revision is still pending and the injunctive relief granted continues.

6. According to the third proviso to Section 497, Cr.P.C. a court shall release the accused on bail in an offence punishable with death if he has been detained for a continuous period exceeding two years, unless the delay in the trial has been occasioned by an act or omission of the accused or any other person on his behalf or the conditions mentioned in the fourth proviso are attracted, which is not so in the present case. In our view the statutory right to be released on bail under the third proviso to Section 497, Cr.P.C. is not merely a statutory right but also stands firmly on constitutional guarantees under Articles 4, 9 and 10A of the Constitution. Under the said Articles the accused, like any other citizen enjoys the protection of law and to be treated in accordance with law; the accused cannot be deprived of liberty, except in accordance with law; and in determination of any criminal charge against him the accused shall be entitled to a fair trial and due process. These basket of rights are available to an accused who enjoys a presumption of innocence in his favour and understandably cannot be subjected to an indefinite pre-trial detention and therefore cannot be denied bail under the third proviso to section 497(1), Cr.P.C. unless there is convincing material that the delay has been occasioned by the act or omission of the accused himself or if his case falls under any of the exceptions under the fourth proviso to section 497, Cr.P.C.

7. For an accused to be denied statutory bail, it must be demonstrated that his act or omission, was intentionally aimed at prolonging the trial. It must show a deliberate pattern of seeking adjournments without valid reasons during key hearings such as the examination or cross-examination of prosecution witnesses.

Mere counting the number of adjournment requests alone is not enough to justify withholding bail. The application of the third proviso to Section 497(1) of the Cr.P.C when interpreted in the light of Articles 9 and 10A of the Constitution, broadens and enhances the rights of an accused who is presumed innocent during trial. The prosecution must present clear evidence that the accused or his counsel was actively trying to delay the trial through unnecessary adjournments or irrelevant applications, in order to justify denying bail. As already held by this Court, the act or omission on the part of the accused to delay of the timely conclusion of the trial must be an outcome of a concerted and consistent effort of the accused orchestrated to delay the trial. See Shakeel Shah and Nadeem Samson.[2] Learned counsel for the complainant, as well as, learned DAG have failed to establish that the delay in the trial was due to the act or omission of the accused whereas, as discussed hereunder, the record reveals that the delay has been due to the act of the court.

8. In this case the trial has been suspended by the High Court on the filing of the Criminal Revision by the petitioner and during the continuum of the said suspension, the statutory period of delay i.e., continuous period exceeding two years under clause (b) of the third proviso to Section 497(1), Cr.P.C. has lapsed. We have gone through the order sheet of the proceedings in the Criminal Revision which is still pending before the High Court and it has been over three years since the petitioner was arrested. The Criminal Revision has not progressed for no fault of the petitioner, there is nothing on the record that the delay has been occasioned by the act or omission of the petitioner. The delay has been mainly due to the act of the High Court as the case was repeatedly relisted and not taken up on several hearings for no fault of the accused and thus the indefinite delay in the trial has been due to the act of the High Court which cannot be attributed to the accused in any circumstance.[3]

9. While the High Court enjoys the authority to order stay or suspend the proceedings in a criminal trial, in a deserving case, it is equally important that such an exercise of authority must be carried out with caution and circumspection, ensuring expeditious disposal of the case after the grant of injunctive relief. High Court should not lose sight of the case where it has exercised its extraordinary power of staying or suspending the proceeding of a criminal trial but should make it a point of finally disposing of such proceedings as early as possible.[4] Public interest necessitates that the administration of justice is improved for sustaining the faith of a common man in rule of law and justice delivery system, which are closely and inextricably linked.

10. For the above reasons, this petition is converted into appeal and allowed. The impugned order of the High Court dated 22.08.2023 is set aside. The petitioner is admitted to bail subject to furnishing bail bonds in the sum of Rs.100,000/- with two sureties in the like amount to the satisfaction of the trial Court.

11. A copy of this Order be dispatched to the Registrar of the Lahore High Court to be placed before the Chief Justice for improving the administration of criminal justice in such like matters.

MWA/R-2/SC Bail granted.

----O.XXXII, R. 15---Mental Health Ordinance (VIII of 2001), Ss. 29 & 32---Financial Institutions (Recovery of Finances) Ordinance (XLVI of 2001), S. 7(2)---Suit for recovery of finance---Defendant of unsound mind---Guardian in the suit, appointment of---Banking Court, powers of---Banking Court has the power to determine the unsoundness of mind or mental infirmity of a person on an inquiry under Order XXXII of the C.P.C. based on the evidence and appoint a guardian for the suit for the limited purpose of representation before the court of law, without first seeking an appointment of a guardian under the Mental Health Ordinance, 2001.

Rule 15 of Order XXXII of C.P.C. provides that Rules 1 to 14 of Order XXXII shall apply to (i) persons adjudged to be of unsound mind and (ii) persons who though not so adjudged are found by the Court on inquiry, by reason of unsoundness of mind or mental infirmity, to be incapable of protecting their interests when suing or being sued. The said Rule, therefore, acknowledges two categories of persons of unsound mind: one who is already adjudged by a court of competent authority as a person of unsound mind; and the other, who is not so adjudged but the court itself on inquiry finds that the person is of unsound mind. In both cases, the court is to appoint a guardian for the suit for such a person. In the first category, in view of the provisions of Rule 4(2) of Order XXXII of C.P.C. the court is to ordinarily appoint the same person as guardian for the suit who has been appointed the guardian under the Mental Health Ordinance, 2001 ("MHO"); while in the second, the court may appoint any suitable person who has no interest against the person of unsound mind. In the second category, the court cannot decline to appoint the guardian for the suit merely for the reason that the defendant has not been so adjudged under the MHO by the competent authority.

Where no guardian has been appointed under the MHO, it does not preclude the Civil Court, or the Banking Court, to proceed and appoint a guardian for the suit under Order XXXII of C.P.C. so that the interest of a mentally disordered person is protected before the court of law and also ensures the continuation and efficient conclusion of the trial. The Banking Court, therefore, has the power to determine the unsoundness of mind or mental infirmity of a person on an inquiry under Order XXXII of the C.P.C. based on the evidence and appoint a guardian for the suit for the limited purpose of representation before the court of law, without first seeking an appointment of a guardian under the MHO.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---Brief facts of the case are that the respondent Bank filed a recovery suit under the Financial Institutions (Recovery of Finances) Ordinance, 2001 ("FIO") against the brother and father of the petitioner on 03.01.2011. While the father of the petitioner contested the suit by filing his application for leave to defend, the brother of the petitioner was proceeded against ex-parte vide order dated 10.02.2011. Subsequently, the petitioner filed an application under Rules 3 and 15 of Order XXXII of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 ("C.P.C.") before the Banking Court seeking his appointment as guardian for the suit of his brother who he asserted was suffering from mental infirmity and was of unsound mind. The said application was dismissed by the Banking Court on merits vide order dated 16.09.2013 on the ground that there was no valid document on the record to establish that the brother of the petitioner was of unsound mind or suffering from any mental infirmity. Aggrieved of the said order, the petitioner filed an appeal before the High Court under Section 22 of the FIO, which was dismissed through judgment dated 18.06.2020 ("impugned judgment"). The High Court maintained that the petitioner's brother had to be first adjudged as mentally disordered by the Court of Protection under the provisions of the (Punjab) Mental Health Ordinance, 2001[1] ("MHO") before the petitioner could be entitled to file an application under Order XXXII, C.P.C., before the Banking Court. Hence, the instant petition for leave to appeal.

2. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties and have examined the laws and the record of the case.

3. The question involved in the instant petition is whether a Banking Court can appoint a guardian for the suit, under Rules 3 and 15 of Order XXXII of the C.P.C., for a defendant who by reason of "unsoundness of mind" or "mental infirmity" is incapable of protecting his interests, or whether the defendant has to be first adjudged to be a person of unsound mind and get a guardian appointed under Sections 29 and 32 of the MHO by the Court of Protection and only then can an application for the appointment of his guardian for the suit under Order XXXII of the C.P.C. be entertained by a Banking Court?

4. The instant petition emanates from a suit for recovery filed under the FIO which prescribes a special mechanism for dealing with recovery of finance by the financial institutions from the customers and also establishes special courts, i.e., the Banking Courts for this purpose. Section 4 of the FIO gives its provisions overriding effect over any other law for the time being in force. Section 7 stipulates the powers of Banking Courts and grants them all powers vested in a Civil Court under the C.P.C. in the exercise of its civil jurisdiction. Furthermore, Section 7(2) of the FIO prescribes the Banking Court to follow the procedure laid out in the CPC in all matters with respect to which the procedure has not been provided for in the FIO. Therefore, for the procedure as to how a person of unsound mind or mental infirmity can file or defend a suit filed under the FIO, recourse has to be made to Rule 15 of Order XXXII of the CPC, which is reproduced hereunder for ready reference:

Order XXXII

Rule 15. Application of rules to persons of unsound mind. The provisions contained in rules 1 to 14, so far as they are applicable, shall extend to persons adjudged to be of unsound mind and to persons who though not so adjudged are found by the Court on inquiry, by reason of unsoundness of mind or mental infirmity, to be incapable of protecting their interests when suing or being sued.

(Underlining is ours)

The above cited Rule 15 of Order XXXII extends the applicability of the procedure given in Rules 1 to 14 to suits by or against persons of unsound mind. Rules 1 of Order XXXII provides that every suit by a minor shall be filed through a next friend and where a minor is the defendant in a suit, Rule 3 mandates the court to appoint his guardian for the suit. Rule 4(2) states that where a minor has a guardian appointed by a competent authority, such a guardian shall act as his next friend or be appointed his guardian for the suit, unless the court for the reasons to be recorded decides otherwise.

5. Rule 15 provides that Rules 1 to 14 of Order XXXII shall apply to (i) persons adjudged to be of unsound mind and (ii) persons who though not so adjudged are found by the Court on inquiry, by reason of unsoundness of mind or mental infirmity, to be incapable of protecting their interests when suing or being sued. The said Rule, therefore, acknowledges two categories of persons of unsound mind: one who is already adjudged by a court of competent authority as a person of unsound mind; and the other, who is not so adjudged but the court itself on inquiry finds that the person is of unsound mind. In both cases, the court is to appoint a guardian for the suit for such a person. In the first category, in view of the provisions of Rule 4(2) the court is to ordinarily appoint the same person as guardian for the suit who has been appointed the guardian under the MHO; while in the second, the court may appoint any suitable person who has no interest against the person of unsound mind. In the second category, the court cannot decline to appoint the guardian for the suit merely for the reason that the defendant has not been so adjudged under the MHO by the competent authority.

6. The mandate and wisdom of Order XXXII of the C.P.C. is to ensure smooth continuation of proceedings and expeditious trial of suits wherein a minor or a person of unsound mind sues or is sued. The concept of next friend or guardian for the suit is to provide proper representation to a minor or a person with unsound mind during litigation, in order to protect his interests; therefore, their role is limited to the particular litigation or legal action for which they are appointed. Guardian for the suit is also called as "Guardian ad Litem"; the Latin term "ad litem" means "for the lawsuit". Thus, guardian for the suit is appointed by a court specifically for the duration of legal proceedings and his role is temporary and limited to the particular lawsuit or legal matter. This might involve making decisions about litigation, settlement or other legal strategies. A guardian of the person or property of a minor or a person of unsound mind, on the other hand, is a person legally appointed to manage all the affairs of another person. Such a guardian has the authority to make decisions on behalf of the said person in various aspects of life, including financial, medical, and personal matters.

7. Now let us examine the scope and extent of MHO. This law deals with the care and treatment of mentally disordered persons, management of their property and other related matters. Under Section 29 of the MHO, whenever a person is possessed of property and is alleged to be mentally disordered, the Court of Protection may, upon an application by any of his relatives filed after having obtained consent in writing of the Advocate-General, direct an inquiry for the purposes of ascertaining whether such person is mentally disordered and incapable of managing himself, his property and his affairs. In case any person is found to be mentally disordered and incapable of taking care of himself, the Court of Protection appoints a guardian under Section 32 of the MHO. A guardian so appointed under MHO is someone who is legally appointed to take care of and manage the personal and property interests of a mentally disorered person.

8. The scope of the MHO is thus different and broader when compared to that of Order XXXII of the C.P.C. It provides for care and treatment of mentally disordered persons, for the management of their properties and their affairs and to encoruage community care of such persons. It is not limited only to representation before court in a suit. While the MHO does not specifically provide for representation before court while suing or being sued but it goes without saying that once a guardian is appointed by the Court of Protection he is to ordinarily act as the next friend and the guardian for the suit for the purposes of Order XXXII of the C.P.C. (see Rule 4(2) of the said Order). The important thing is that where no such guardian has been appointed under the MHO, it does not preclude the Civil Court, or the Banking Court in the present case, to proceed and appoint a guardian for the suit under Order XXXII, so that the interest of a mentally disordered person is protected before the court of law and also ensures the continuation and efficient conclusion of the trial. The Banking Court, therefore, has the power to determine the unsoundness of mind or mental infirmity of a person on an inquiry under Order XXXII of the C.P.C. based on the evidence and appoint a guardian for the suit for the limited purpose of representation before the court of law, without first seeking an appointment of a guardian under the MHO. The High Court has, therefore, committed a legal error by dismissing the appeal filed by the petitioner holding that the petitioner's brother had to first adjudged as a person of unsound mind under the MHO before an application could be moved under Order XXXII before the Banking Court.

9. For the above reasons, the instant petition is converted into appeal and allowed by setting aside the impugned judgment. The matter is remanded to the High Court to decide the appeal of the petitioner on merits and in accordance with the provisions of Rule 15 of Order XXXII of the CPC, as expounded above. We are sanguine that the said appeal will be decided expeditiously.

MWA/A-9/SC Appeal allowed.

----Ss. 2 &3---Criminal Law Amendment (Special Court) Act (XVII of 1976), S. 4---Constitution of Pakistan, Arts. 6 & 199---Trial for high treason---Judgment of Special Court---Territorial jurisdiction of Lahore High Court---Scope---Special Court convicted the respondent (former Chief of Army Staff) and sentenced him to death---However, the High Court ignored the judgment of the Special Court and decided the writ petition filed before it by allowing it through the impugned judgment ("impugned judgment")---High Court, amongst other reliefs granted therein, held that the very basis of initiation of proceedings against the respondent for the offence of high treason was beyond the constitutional mandate, ultra vires, coram non judice and unlawful---Legality---In the present case, the main grievance agitated and the ultimate relief sought by the respondent in his writ petition were about the acts done and the proceedings taken by the Special Court at Islamabad---Over such acts and proceedings, only the Islamabad High Court enjoyed territorial jurisdiction, and only the Islamabad High Court could judicially review the legality thereof under Article 199(1)(a)(ii) of the Constitution---Lahore High Court had no such jurisdiction; it wrongly assumed and exercised the jurisdiction that was not vested in it by the Constitution

The matter relating to the trial of the respondent (former Chief of Army Staff) for the offence of high treason had earlier come before the Supreme Court on at least three occasions. On two of these occasions, the Supreme Court had specifically directed the Special Court to continue with the trial of the respondent. However, the Lahore High Court, in purported exercise of its writ jurisdiction under Article 199 of the Constitution, set aside the entire proceedings of the trial, which was conducted by the Special Court against the respondent at Islamabad. The impugned judgment was passed by the Lahore High Court after the final judgment convicting the respondent had been announced by the Special Court.

Lahore High Court Bar Association v. General (Retd.) Pervez Musharraf 2019 SCMR 1029 ref.

Lahore High Court lacked territorial jurisdiction to entertain the writ petition of the respondent filed against the acts done and proceedings taken by the Special Court at Islamabad. Any act done or proceeding taken by the Special Court at Islamabad could only be challenged, as per Article 199(1)(a)(ii), before the High Court within whose territorial jurisdiction such act was done or proceeding taken, that is, the Islamabad High Court. The respondent, instead of agitating his grievance in the Islamabad High Court against the act done and proceeding taken by the Special Court at Islamabad, chose the forum of the Lahore High Court, and the latter court wrongly entertained the same.

Government of Pakistan v. Special Court PLD 2020 Isl. 82 ref.

In the present case, the main grievance agitated and the ultimate relief sought by the respondent in his writ petition were about the acts done and the proceedings taken by the Special Court at Islamabad. Over such acts and proceedings, only the Islamabad High Court enjoyed territorial jurisdiction, and only the Islamabad High Court could judicially review the legality thereof under Article 199(1)(a)(ii) of the Constitution. The Lahore High Court had no such jurisdiction; it wrongly assumed and exercised the jurisdiction that was not vested in it by the Constitution with regard to the acts done and proceedings taken outside its territorial jurisdiction. Though the Federal Government is deemed to function all over Pakistan, the actions of the Federal Government in constituting the Special Court and filing a complaint for high treason against the respondent in Islamabad, and the trial being conducted by the Special Court in Islamabad, can in no manner be said to have affected the respondent within the territorial jurisdiction of the Lahore High Court. Petitions were converted into appeals and allowed, and impugned judgment of the High Court was set-aside.

it could not do as the High Court was not the appellate forum---High Court, without enjoying any jurisdiction whatsoever, gave its own findings on the core subject matter of the trial, i.e., whether the respondent (former Chief of Army Staff) had committed the offence of high treason under Article 6 of the Constitution read with Section 2 of the High Treason (Punishment) Act, 1973---By doing this the High Court unlawfully assumed the appellate jurisdiction exclusively vested in the Supreme Court under Section 12(3) of the Criminal Law Amendment (Special Court) Act, 1976---High Court had also granted relief which was not even sought in the writ petition---Relief sought in the prayer clause of the writ petition mainly challenged the order of the Special Court, whereby it had reserved its judgment---No prayer was made to seek a determination as to whether the respondent had committed the offence of high treason---However, the High Court overstretched its jurisdiction by proceeding to determine the core question of whether the respondent had committed the offence of high treason, and then held that the actions of the respondent were not part of Article 6 at the time of the commission of the said actions---High Court not only assumed the exclusive jurisdiction of the Special Court which was to determine whether the respondent had committed the offence of high treason but also usurped the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court----Matter of the trial of the respondent for the offence of high treason had come before the Supreme Court a number of times and despite authoritative judgments and orders of the Supreme Court dealing specifically with the trial of the respondent by the Special Court, the High Court in derogation of the same set aside the entire proceedings of the trial of the respondent through the impugned judgment---Disregard of the judgments of the Supreme Court amounted to judicial effrontery and impropriety---Impugned judgment passed by the High Court in sheer violation of the judgments and orders of the Supreme Court was, therefore, not only without jurisdiction but also unconstitutional---Petitions were converted into appeals and allowed, and impugned judgment of the High Court was set-aside.

----S. 3---Criminal Law Amendment (Special Court) Act (XVII of 1976), S. 3---Trial for high treason---Judgment of Special Court---Lahore High Court in its writ jurisdiction set aside the entire proceedings of the trial conducted by the Special Court and observed that the Secretary Interior, in his capacity as the officer authorized by the Federal Government vide SRO 1234(I)/94 dated 29.12.1994 under Section 3 of the High Treason (Punishment) Act, 1973 ('High Treason Act'), can only file a complaint for high treason on the recommendations of the Federal Government, and under Section 3 of the Criminal Law Amendment (Special Court) Act, 1976 ('Special Court Act') it is the Federal Government that constitutes the Special Court; that the whole exercise was illegal, unconstitutional and void ab initio as said actions were taken by the Prime Minister, not by the Federal Government, and therefore, were not conducted in accordance with the principle laid down in the judgment reported as Mustafa Impex v. JUDGMENT

Judging is a cornerstone of the legal system, embodying the application of law to resolve disputes. Unlike monarchs who historically wielded absolute power, a judge operates within a framework of laws and principles that guide decision-making. Judges are not sovereigns with unfettered discretion but are guardians of the law, tasked with ensuring that justice is done according to established legal norms and principles. Their decisions must be guided by the law, precedents and the facts before them, not by personal desires or objectives. A Judge, in the pursuit of justice, cannot embark on a self-imposed crusade of right and wrong. He 'is not to innovate at pleasure. He is not a knight errant, roaming at will in pursuit of his own ideal of beauty or of goodness. He is to draw his inspiration from consecrated principles. He is not to yield to spasmodic sentiment, to vague and unregulated benevolence. He is to exercise a discretion informed by tradition, methodized by analogy, disciplined by the system, and subordinated to the primordial necessity of order in the social life.'[1] This ensures that justice is administered fairly, consistently and predictably, thereby upholding the rule of law.

2. In the matter at hand, serious questions have been raised as to the discretionary and equitable exercise of writ jurisdiction by the High Court under Article 199 of the Constitution. These questions pertain not only to the lack of territorial jurisdiction vested in the High Court in the instant matter, but also to a purported exercise of this jurisdiction when none was available or warranted under the Constitution or the law and that too, in violation of the judgments and orders of the Supreme Court.

Facts

3. The background facts of the case are that the respondent, General Pervez Musharraf ("respondent"), while acting as the Chief of Army Staff issued a Proclamation of Emergency Order, 2007 ("PEO") on 3 November 2007, imposing an emergency in the country and holding the Constitution in abeyance. He simultaneously issued a Provisional Constitutional Order, 2007 ("PCO") providing a governance mechanism during the said emergency, and the Oath of Office (Judges) Order, 2007 ("Oath Order") thereby removing and then replacing Judges of the superior courts. A 14-member Bench of this Court declared in Sindh High Court Bar Association,[2] the PEO, PCO and the Oath Order, and all actions taken pursuant thereto, to be unconstitutional and void ab initio. Review petitions filed against this judgment were also dismissed in Nadeem Ahmed.[3]

4. After this Court's decision in Sindh High Court Bar Association, certain constitutional petitions were filed before this Court with the prayer that the Federal Government be directed to lodge a complaint under Article 6 of the Constitution against the respondent and others for the offence of high treason. These petitions were disposed of vide order dated 03.07.2013 in Moulvi Iqbal Haider[4] on the statement/undertaking of the learned Attorney-General to the effect that the Prime Minister had directed for the commencement of an inquiry and investigation in relation to the actions of the respondent taken on 03.11.2007, whereafter, if required, a complaint might be filed under Section 5 of the Criminal Law Amendment (Special Court) Act, 1976 ("Special Court Act") for the trial of the offence of high treason.

5. Pursuant to the result of that inquiry and investigation, a Special Court was constituted by the Federal Government vide notification dated 20.11.2013 for the trial of the offence of high treason under the High Treason (Punishment) Act, 1973 ("High Treason Act"). A complaint was filed by the Federal Government on 12.12.2013 against the respondent for the offence of high treason under Article 6 of the Constitution read with Section 3 of the High Treason Act and Section 5 of the Special Court Act. The trial of the respondent then commenced. During the trial, the Special Court passed an order for associating other persons as suspects with the respondent and ordered a fresh investigation during the ongoing trial. This order of the Special Court was then challenged up till this Court. Vide order dated 26.02.2016 passed in Abdul Hameed Dogar,[5] this Court set aside the said order of the Special Court on the ground that the Special Court had no power to associate any other person for investigation into the offence of high treason as the same was the prerogative of the Federal Government, and directed it to proceed with the trial of the respondent "with all convenient dispatch and without any unnecessary delay".

6. Meanwhile, a review petition was filed against the decision of this Court, dated 03.07.2013, in Moulvi Iqbal Haider. While deciding this review petition vide order dated 01.04.2019 in Lahore High Court Bar Association,[6] this Court noted that the complaint was filed on 12.12.2013 before the Special Court, the charge was framed on 31.03.2014, the prosecution evidence was closed on 18.09.2014, and the trial was being delayed only because of the absence of the accused respondent who had been declared a proclaimed offender on 12.07.2016. Placing reliance on Section 9 of the Special Court Act, it was held that within the scope of the Special Court Act, if the accused voluntarily chooses not to exercise his right to appear and be present at trial, his trial in absentia does not infringe the fairness of the trial or violate the right to fair trial under Article 10A of the Constitution. It was held that by electing to be a fugitive of the law, the accused loses his right to audience. However, if he surrenders before the Court, his right to put up a defence stands restored. The Special Court was then directed to proceed with the trial provided that if the accused appeared, he would be entitled to record his statement under Section 342 of the Cr.P.C. and also lead any other defence under the law. However, if the accused failed to appear before the court and remained a proclaimed offender, the Special Court could proceed against him in his absence, under Section 9 of the Special Court Act.

7. The Special Court then proceeded with the trial and reserved its judgment vide order dated 19.11.2019. This order, whereby the Special Court reserved its judgment, was challenged by the respondent before the Lahore High Court, Lahore through a writ petition under Article 199 of the Constitution. While the matter was being heard by the High Court, the Special Court announced its judgment on 17.12.2019 convicting the respondent and sentencing him to death. However, the High Court ignored the judgment of the Special Court and decided the writ petition by allowing it through the impugned judgment dated 13.01.2020 ("impugned judgment"). The High Court, amongst other reliefs granted therein, held that the very basis of initiation of proceedings against the respondent for the offence of high treason was beyond the constitutional mandate, ultra vires, coram non judice and unlawful. Hence, the instant petitions for leave to appeal.

Contentions of the Parties

8. The learned counsel for the petitioners, with the main thrust of the arguments presented by Mr. Hamid Khan, Senior ASC, contended that the Lahore High Court acted in derogation of the directions and judgments of this Court; the High Court had no territorial jurisdiction; the impugned judgment is in derogation of Section 12 of the Special Court Act, which provides for the jurisdiction of the Special Court and ousts the jurisdiction of any other Court with regards to matters seized by the Special Court; the writ petition was not maintainable as there was an adequate remedy available through an appeal before this Court under Section 12(3) of the Special Court Act, which was also availed of by the respondent; even otherwise, the impugned judgment was passed after the Special Court had announced its judgment convicting the respondent and therefore, the cause of action (if any) had ceased to exist; the reliance on Mustafa Impex[7] is misplaced as the principle settled therein has no retrospective applicability as held in PMDC[8]; and therefore, the impugned judgment is void ab initio, illegal, unconstitutional and coram non judice. It was also contended that since the Lahore High Court had acted in complete derogation of the Constitution and the law, it was the duty of Bar Associations, Bar Councils and lawyers to ensure that the Constitution and the law are not violated and if such illegalities are committed, to bring the same to the notice of this Court so that the same can be rectified.

9. The learned Additional Attorney-General ("AAG"), representing the Federation and other official respondents, was asked about the stance of the said respondents regarding the impugned judgment. He stated that none of them supported the impugned judgment and contended that the impugned judgment was not legally sustainable. As to the respondent, this Court noted that he had passed away and, vide order dated 10.11.2023, allowed his legal heirs to come forward and join these cases if desired. However, none of the legal heirs appeared or appointed any counsel to represent them before this Court in these cases.

Opinion of the Court

10. We have heard the learned counsel for the petitioners and the learned AAG, and have perused the record with their able assistance.

11. At the very outset, we may note that the matter relating to the trial of the respondent for the offence of high treason had earlier come before this Court on at least three occasions. On two of these occasions, this Court had specifically directed the Special Court to continue with the trial of the respondent. It had also been observed by this Court that there cannot be a graver offence than that of high treason and no proceeding is more solemn than a trial for the offence of high treason.[9] However, the Lahore High Court, in purported exercise of its writ jurisdiction under Article 199 of the Constitution, set aside the entire proceedings of the trial, which was conducted by the Special Court against the respondent at Islamabad. The impugned judgment was passed after the final judgment convicting the respondent had been announced by the Special Court. Serious issues have been raised before us about the jurisdiction exercised by the High Court and the grounds for exercising such jurisdiction.

Territorial jurisdiction of the Lahore High Court

12. The primary contention of the learned counsel for the petitioners and the learned AAG is that the Lahore High Court lacked territorial jurisdiction to entertain the writ petition of the respondent filed against the acts done and proceedings taken by the Special Court at Islamabad. This contention, we find, is well-founded. Any act done or proceeding taken by the Special Court at Islamabad could only be challenged, as per Article 199(1)(a)(ii), before the High Court within whose territorial jurisdiction such act was done or proceeding taken, that is, the Islamabad High Court. Because of this legal position, the persons, including the respondent's counsel Barrister Salman Safdar, who were aggrieved of some acts and proceedings of the Special Court had challenged the same in the Islamabad High Court.[10] But the respondent, instead of agitating his grievance in the Islamabad High Court against the act done and proceeding taken by the Special Court at Islamabad, chose the forum of the Lahore High Court, and the latter court wrongly entertained the same.

13. The Lahore High Court assumed territorial jurisdiction in the matter, stating the reason that since the respondent also challenged, along with the acts and proceedings of the Special Court, the Federal Government's acts, i.e., the acts of filing the complaint and constituting the Special Court, it had the jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the matter. The reason is flawed and is also against the law declared by this Court in Sandalbar[11] and Amin Textile[12] as well as by the Lahore High Court in Sethi and Sethi.[13] The ratio of these cases is that it is the dominant object of the petition, i.e., the main grievance agitated and the ultimate relief sought in the petition, which determines the territorial jurisdiction of the High Courts. If the ultimate relief sought relates to an act done or proceeding taken within the territorial jurisdiction of a particular High Court, no other High Court in the country can assume and exercise writ jurisdiction on the pretext that one of the reliefs sought relates to an act of a federal body. The splitting of claims and reliefs in several actions (suits or petitions) regarding one cause of action is also not legally permissible under Order II, Rule 2, C.P.C.[14] No person can, therefore, seek relief regarding an act of a federal body from one High Court and relief regarding an act done in furtherance of or pursuance to that act from another High Court. Both reliefs must be sought in one petition and adjudicated by the High Court which has territorial jurisdiction over both acts.

14. In the present case, the main grievance agitated and the ultimate relief sought by the respondent in his writ petition were about the acts done and the proceedings taken by the Special Court at Islamabad. Over such acts and proceedings, only the Islamabad High Court enjoyed territorial jurisdiction, and only the Islamabad High Court could judicially review the legality thereof under Article 199(1)(a)(ii) of the Constitution. The Lahore High Court had no such jurisdiction; it wrongly assumed and exercised the jurisdiction that was not vested in it by the Constitution with regard to the acts done and proceedings taken outside its territorial jurisdiction.

15. We have also noted that probably, to grant itself territorial jurisdiction, the Lahore High Court observed in the impugned judgment that the PCO was issued by the respondent as Chief of Army Staff, at the General Headquarters, Rawalpindi, therefore, it had territorial jurisdiction to entertain the writ petition at Lahore. The grievances agitated in the writ petition and the reliefs sought therein had no connection with the legality of the PCO. It appears that the High Court either contrived or misunderstood the subject matter of the writ petition by considering it to be related to the legality of the PCO. In any event, this Court had already held, in Sindh High Court Bar Association,[15] the PCO to be unconstitutional. Therefore, the assumption of jurisdiction by the Lahore High Court on this ground was unabashedly misplaced. Though the Federal Government is deemed to function all over Pakistan, the actions of the Federal Government in constituting the Special Court and filing a complaint for high treason against the respondent in Islamabad, and the trial being conducted by the Special Court in Islamabad, can in no manner be said to have affected the respondent within the territorial jurisdiction of the Lahore High Court.

16. Although the lack of territorial jurisdiction of the Lahore High Court is sufficient to set aside the impugned judgment, however, in view of the seriousness of the matter, we are inclined to dilate upon the other legal grounds also, but without discussing the merits of the case. Since the appeal filed by the respondent under Section 12(3) of the Special Court Act against the final judgment of the Special Court has been dismissed by this Court by an order of even date, we shall confine ourselves to the jurisdictional and legal challenges made against the impugned judgment.

Availability of an alternate adequate remedy

17. The next challenge, made before us, on the exercise of jurisdiction by the High Court is that the respondent had an alternate adequate remedy under the law; therefore, the High Court should have kept its hands off the matter and should not have proceeded to exercise the writ jurisdiction under Article 199 of the Constitution. In this regard, we have noted that the Special Court conducting the trial of the respondent for the offence of high treason was constituted under a special law i.e., the Special Court Act. Section 3 of the Special Court Act confers exclusive jurisdiction on the Special Court to try certain offences, including any offence punishable under the High Treason Act. Section 3 of the Special Court Act is reproduced below, for ease of reference:

3. Certain offences triable by Special Court.

(1) Any offence punishable under sections 121, 121A, 122, 123 and 123A of the Pakistan Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860), and any offence punishable under the High Treason (Punishment) Act, 1973 (LXVIII of 1973), including an offence of conspiracy to commit any such offence, whether committed before or after the commencement of this Act, shall be tried by a Special Court in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

(2) No court other than the Special Court shall try an offence which is triable by the Special Court under subsection (1).

(3) If, in the course of a trial before the Special Court, the Court is of opinion that an accused before it has committed or appears to have committed any offence other than an offence referred to in subsection (1), the Special Court shall record such opinion and refer such accused for the trial of such other offence to a court having jurisdiction to try the offence.

Section 12 of the Special Court Act, reproduced below, states that the jurisdiction of the Special Court is not to be questioned; it also provides a right of appeal against the final judgment of the Special Court to the Supreme Court.

12. Jurisdiction, etc., of Special Court not to be questioned.

(1) No Court shall entertain any plea as to the jurisdiction of the Special Court or as to the legality or propriety of anything done or purported to be done by the Special Court or order the release under section 491 or section 498 of the Code[16] or any other law of any accused person in a case triable by the Special Court for so long as the Court is seized of the case.

(2) Save as provided in sub-section (3), no order, judgment or sentence of the Special Court shall be called in question in any manner whatsoever in or before any court or other authority.

(3) Any party aggrieved by the final judgment of the Special Court may prefer an appeal to the Supreme Court within thirty days of the passing of the judgment.

It is evident from the above provisions that through Section 3 of the Special Court Act, exclusive jurisdiction to try the offence of high treason is conferred on a Special Court constituted for this purpose. Further, under Section 12(1), no Court can entertain any plea as to the jurisdiction of the Special Court, or as to the legality or propriety of anything done or purported to be done by the Special Court in a case triable by the Special Court for so long as the Special Court is seized of the case. Section 12(2) further stipulates that, save as provided in subsection (3), i.e., except through an appeal filed before this Court, no order, judgment or sentence of the Special Court shall be called in question in any manner whatsoever in or before any Court or other authority. Through Section 12(3), a right of appeal before this Court has been provided against the final judgment of the Special Court, being the only right of appeal. Therefore, it was argued, the constitutional bar contained in Article 199(1) of the Constitution on exercising the writ jurisdiction in case of availability of an "other adequate remedy" was fully attracted.

18. Where an adequate remedy is available under the relevant law, this Court has strictly deprecated circumventing that remedy and invoking the writ jurisdiction of the High Court under Article 199 of the Constitution.[17] The writ jurisdiction of the High Court cannot be exploited while having an alternate equally efficacious and adequate remedy provided under the law; such remedy cannot be bypassed to attract the writ jurisdiction.[18] The doctrine of exhaustion of remedies accentuates that a litigant must not circumvent or bypass the provisions of the relevant law that provide for an adequate remedy.[19] If a party does not choose the remedy available under the law, the writ jurisdiction of the High Court cannot be invoked and exercised in his favour.[20] Where a matter arises under a statute and is adjudicated by a forum provided therein, and the said statute also provides a remedy of appeal or revision either in the High Court itself or directly before this Court, the High Court should not in its writ jurisdiction interfere with such matter.[21]

19. We therefore hold that the remedy of appeal provided before this Court by Section 12(3) of the Special Court Act against the judgment of the Special Court was an alternate, adequate and efficacious remedy. And, as we have already noted above, the main grievance agitated and the ultimate relief sought in the writ petition was about the acts and proceedings of the Special Court, which could only be agitated before this Court in appeal. Instead of waiting for the Special Court to announce its judgment (which was announced on 17.12.2019, i.e., within less than a month) and availing the remedy of appeal before this Court, the respondent filed the writ petition assailing the order of the Special Court whereby it reserved its judgment. Later on, the respondent himself acknowledged the availability of alternate adequate remedy by filing an appeal before this Court under Section 12(3) of the Special Court Act. Therefore, in view of the availability of an adequate remedy of appeal before this Court, the High Court could not have exercised its writ jurisdiction under Article 199 of the Constitution, arrogating to itself the appellate jurisdiction vested in this Court under Section 12(3) of the Special Court Act. Consequently, the impugned judgment fails on this ground as well.

Decision by High Court on merits of the case

20. Not only did the High Court assume jurisdiction not vested in it but it also dilated upon the merits of the matter, which it could not do as the High Court was not the appellate forum. The High Court, without enjoying any jurisdiction whatsoever, gave its own findings on the core subject matter of the trial, i.e., whether the respondent had committed the offence of high treason under Article 6 of the Constitution read with Section 2 of the High Treason Act. By doing this the High Court unlawfully assumed the appellate jurisdiction exclusively vested in the Supreme Court under Section 12(3) of the Special Court Act.

High Court granted the relief not sought

21. We have noted that the High Court had also granted relief which was not even sought in the writ petition. The relief sought in the prayer clause of the writ petition, as noted above, mainly challenged the order of the Special Court, dated 19.11.2019, whereby it had reserved its judgment. No prayer was made to seek a determination as to whether the respondent had committed the offence of high treason. However, the High Court overstretched its jurisdiction by proceeding to determine the core question of whether the respondent had committed the offence of high treason, and then held that the actions of the respondent were not part of Article 6 at the time of the commission of the said actions. The High Court not only assumed the exclusive jurisdiction of the Special Court which was to determine whether the respondent had committed the offence of high treason but also usurped the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. The High Court should have remained within the confines of the dispute brought before it and decided the same in accordance with the law and the Constitution.[22]

Constitutionality of Section 9 of the Special Court Act

22. The High Court also declared the entire Section 9 of the Special Court Act as ultra vires the Constitution, even though the respondent had only challenged its 'offending portion' to the extent it provides that "no trial shall be adjourned by reason of the absence of any accused person due to illness". Section 9 of the Special Court Act expressly restricts granting adjournments during the proceedings of such trial, undoubtedly because of the seriousness of the offence of high treason. Section 9 of the Special Court Act is reproduced here, for ready reference:

> 9. Restriction of adjournments.
> No trial before the Special Court shall be adjourned for any purpose unless the Special Court is of opinion that the adjournment is necessary in the interests of justice and, in particular, no trial shall be adjourned by reason of the absence of any accused person due to illness, or if the absence of the accused or his counsel has been brought about by the accused person himself, or if the behavior of the accused person prior to such absence has been, in the opinion of the Special Court, such as to impede the course of justice but, in any such case, the Special Court shall proceed with the trial after taking necessary steps to appoint an advocate to defend any such accused person.

A plain reading of Section 9 shows that it deals with the absence of the accused person not only due to his illness but also where the absence of the accused person or his counsel has been brought about by the accused person himself, or where the behaviour of the accused person prior to such absence has been such as to impede the course of justice. In such cases, the Special Court is mandated to proceed with the trial after taking the necessary steps to appoint an advocate to defend such an accused person. The respondent was neither "aggrieved", as required by Article 199(1)(a) or (c) of the Constitution, nor had assailed the entire provision of Section 9. However, the High Court proceeded to declare the entire provision as ultra vires the Constitution without providing any reasoning except that trial in absentia cannot take place. In any event, the matter of trial in absentia had been dealt with by this Court in Lahore High Court Bar Association.[23]

Misapplying Mustafa Impex

23. It was observed in the impugned judgment that the Secretary Interior, in his capacity as the officer authorized by the Federal Government vide SRO 1234(I)/94 dated 29.12.1994 under Section 3 of the High Treason Act, can only file a complaint for high treason on the recommendations of the Federal Government, and under Section 3 of the Special Court Act it is the Federal Government that constitutes the Special Court. The whole exercise was then set aside by declaring it as illegal, unconstitutional and void ab initio on the ground that the said actions were taken by the Prime Minister, not by the Federal government, and therefore, were not conducted in accordance with the principle laid down in Mustafa Impex.[24] The High Court, however, did not consider the decision of this Court rendered in PMDC,[25] which had held that the principle settled in Mustafa Impex did not have retrospective application, and applies only from the date of its pronouncement, i.e., 18.06.2016. The Special Court was constituted vide notification dated 20.11.2013 and the complaint was filed on 12.12.2013. Both these actions were taken before Mustafa Impex; therefore, the law declared therein did not apply to them. Any reconstitution of the Special Court before Mustafa Impex could also not be challenged for the same reason.

24. As to the reconstitution of the Special Court after Mustafa Impex, the relevant summaries moved, approvals granted and notifications issued have been placed on the record by the learned AAG. On perusing the same, we have noted that the process of reconstituting the Special Court was, in fact, in compliance with the law declared in Mustafa Impex. Particularly, we have noted that the Judges of the Special Court, who announced the final judgment on 17.12.2019, namely, Justices Waqar Ahmed Seth,[26] Nazar Akbar[27] and Shahid Karim,[28] were appointed with the approval of the Federal Government, i.e., the Federal Cabinet. Therefore, the High Court could not have set aside the acts of filing the complaint and the constitution or reconstitution of the Special Court on the ground that Mustafa Impex was not complied with.

Violation of the directions and judgments of this Court

25. Another disconcerting dimension of the case is that the High Court acted in outright violation of the express directions and judgments of this Court. The matter of the trial of the respondent for the offence of high treason had come before this Court a number of times and was dealt with in Moulvi Iqbal Haider,[29] Abdul Hameed Dogar[30] and Lahore High Court Bar Association,[31] and the respondent was duly represented by counsel in all these cases.

26. Despite the said authoritative judgments and orders of this Court dealing specifically with the trial of the respondent by the Special Court, the High Court in derogation of the same set aside the entire proceedings of the trial of the respondent through the impugned judgment. It ignored particularly the judgment of this Court rendered in Lahore High Court Bar Association[32] and declared Section 9 of the Special Court Act ultra vires in its entirety, which was not even prayed for by the respondent.

27. Failing to adhere to the judgments and orders of the Supreme Court undermines the credibility and effectiveness of the entire judicial system established by the Constitution. Judgments of this Court being binding on all judicial and executive authorities of the country is a constitutional obligation under Articles 189 and 190 of the Constitution. This obligation reflects a fundamental commitment to preserving the integrity and sanctity of the Supreme Court. Disregard of the abovementioned judgments and orders by the Lahore High Court amounts to judicial effrontery and impropriety. The impugned judgment passed by the Lahore High Court in sheer violation of the judgments and orders of this Court is, therefore, not only without jurisdiction but also unconstitutional.

28. The foregoing are the reasons for our short order dated 10.01.2024 whereby these petitions were dismissed in the following terms:

The impugned judgment dated 13 January 2020 passed by the Lahore High Court, Lahore in Writ Petition No. 71713 of 2019 is not sustainable and is accordingly set aside by converting these petitions into appeals and allowing them. Detailed reasons shall be given later.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---Learned counsel for the petitioners submits that allocation of the reserved seats for women and non-Muslims to the political parties other than the petitioner, Sunni Ittehad Council

("SIC"), is in violation of Article 51(6)(d) and (e) of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan ("Constitution") which provides for proportional representation system on the basis of total number of general seats secured by each political party from the Province concerned in the National Assembly. Once a political party has been allocated the reserved seats on the basis of proportional representation system, the remaining seats cannot be re-allocated to the same political party. As per Letter issued by the Election Commission of Pakistan dated 25.04.2024, he submits, it has been acknowledged that SIC is a parliamentary party having 82 general seats in the National Assembly. Therefore, SIC is entitled to reserved seats as per the proportional representation system in terms of Articles 51(6) (d) & (e) and 106(2)(c) of the Constitution.

2. On the other hand, Mr. Sikandar Bashir Mohmand, learned counsel for the Election Commission of Pakistan ("ECP"), submits that according to Articles 51 and 106 of the Constitution the reserved seats have to be allocated on the proportional representation system only to those political parties who have contested the general elections and won atleast one seat in the said elections. Since SIC did not contest the elections and did not win even a single seat in the general elections, it cannot be considered as a political party in terms of Articles 51(6) (d) & (e) and 106(2) (c) of the Constitution, for the purpose of allocating the reserved seats. Learned Attorney-General for Pakistan ("AGP") supports the contentions of the learned counsel for the ECP. Both the learned counsel for ECP and the learned AGP frankly concede that this is a case of first impression involving questions of constitutional law that have not been addressed by the Court earlier.

3. The above questions of allocation of reserved seats in the National and Provincial Assemblies touch upon the foundational constitutional concept of a parliamentary democracy that the voice of the electorate is truly reflected in the composition of the assemblies. Democratic mandate necessitates that the allocation of reserved seats enhances the representativeness of the electorate in the assemblies and upholds the principles of fairness and transparency in the electoral process. It is paramount to prioritize the integrity of the elections so that the Parliament remains a true reflection of the will of the people.

4. Therefore, leave to appeal is granted to consider, amongst others, the said questions. The appeals are to be posted for hearing on 03.06.2024. The appeal arising out of these petitions will be heard on the basis of available record; however, both sides are at liberty to file any additional documents, which were part of the record before the fora below but have not been filed with instant petitions.

5. Notices under Order XXVII-A, C.P.C. be issued to the learned AGP as well as the Advocates-General of the Provinces.

C.M.A. No. 2920 of 2024:

6. Notice for the same date. In the meanwhile, operation of the impugned judgment of the Peshawar High Court dated 25.03.2024, as well as, the order of the Election Commission of Pakistan dated 01.03.2024 is suspended. It is, however, clarified that this interim order relates to the disputed seats only, i.e., the reserved seats allocated over and above the initially allocated reserved seats to the political parties. It is also clarified that this order is to operate prospectively, w.e.f., from today.

C.M.A. No. 3554 of 2024:

7. Notice. To be heard along with C.P.L.A. No.1328/2024 on 03.06.2024.

(a) Criminal Procedure Code (V of 1898)---

----S. 497(1), third proviso---Constitution of Pakistan, Arts. 9, 10A & 14---Second bail application/petition---Maintainability---Fresh grounds---Scope---Delay in trial that occurs after rejection of first bail application on statutory ground of delay in conclusion of trial---Delay in the conclusion of the trial that occurs for no fault of the accused in the year following the rejection of his bail application on the statutory ground of delay, is to be considered a "fresh ground", not earlier available to him, for entertaining his second bail application, within the meaning and scope of that term.

As the statutory right to be released on bail on the ground of delay in the conclusion of the trial flows from the constitutional rights to liberty, fair trial and dignity guaranteed under Articles 9, 10A and 14 of the Constitution, the provisions of the 3rd proviso to section 497(1), Cr.P.C. must be fashioned in a manner that is progressive and expansive of these rights of the accused, who is still under trial, and his guilt being not yet proven, has in his favour the presumption of innocence.

The entitlement of an accused to post-arrest bail on the statutory ground of delay in the conclusion of the trial is time-based. If the delay exceeds a year for no fault of the accused, in offences punishable other than death, the right of the accused to post-arrest bail ripens. This right continues to ripen for each period of one year starting from the arrest of the accused if he satisfies the court that he is not at fault for the delay in a particular period of one year unless his case falls within the 4th proviso to Section 497(1), Cr.P.C. Denying this recurring right to post-arrest bail to the accused would amount to giving the prosecution a license to delay the conclusion of the trial for an unlimited period of time after the dismissal of the first bail application of the accused on the statutory ground of delay. The accused would, in such an eventuality, be left confined as an under trial prisoner for an unlimited period of time at the mercy of the prosecution to conclude the trial as and when it pleases to do so. The accused shall have no incentive to attend the trial regularly and cooperate in the early conclusion thereof, after the dismissal of his first bail application, if his subsequent orderly conduct cannot entitle him to post-arrest bail despite non-conclusion of the trial for no fault of his in the next one year. Such a situation would be absolutely antithetical to the constitutional scheme of fundamental rights and make a mockery of the rights to liberty, fair trial and dignity of the accused guaranteed under the Constitution.

The purpose and objective of the 3rd proviso to section 497(1), is to ensure that the trial of an accused is conducted expeditiously and that the pre-conviction detention of a person accused of an offence not punishable with death does not extend beyond the period of one year. If the trial in such an offence is not concluded within a period of one year for no fault of the accused, the statutory right to be released on bail ripens in his favour unless his case falls within any of the clauses of the 4th proviso. This right of the accused creates a corresponding duty upon the prosecution to conclude the trial within the specified period of one year. If any act or omission of the accused hinders the conclusion of the trial within a period of one year, no such right will accrue to him and he would not be entitled to be released on bail on the statutory ground of delay in conclusion of the trial. But if after the rejection of his plea for bail on this ground, the accused corrects himself and abstains from doing any such act or omission in the year following such rejection but the prosecution fails to perform its duty in concluding the trial within the specified period of one year, a fresh right, that is to say, a fresh ground, would accrue in his favour. The 3rd proviso to Section 497, Cr.P.C., thus, becomes operative as and when a period of one year passes but the trial is not concluded for no fault of the accused. Therefore,the delay in the conclusion of the trial that occurs for no fault of the accused in the year following the rejection of his bail application on the statutory ground of delay, is to be considered a "fresh ground", not earlier available to him, for entertaining his second bail application, within the meaning and scope of that term as elaborated in the case reported as Nazir Ahmed v. State PLD 2014 SC 241

Shakeel Shah v. State 2022 SCMR 1 ref.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---Through this petition, the petitioner/complainant seeks leave to appeal against an order of the Lahore High Court, dated 17.04.2023, whereby the High Court has allowed the post-arrest bail application of the respondent/ accused and granted him bail on the statutory ground of delay in the conclusion of the trial. The petitioner prays for setting aside the order of the High Court and cancellation of the bail granted to the respondent.

2. Briefly, the factual background of the case is that in the earlier round, the post-arrest bail application of the respondent was dismissed by the Lahore High Court by its order dated 11.01.2021, on merits as well as on the statutory ground of delay. The High Court, however, also directed the trial court to conclude the trial within a period of 30 days from the date of receipt of that order. The respondent, through a petition for leave to appeal, challenged the said order of the High Court before this Court, but on perusing the report of the trial court as to who caused the delay in the conclusion of the trial, learned counsel for the respondent did not press the petition, and the same was disposed of by this Court on 24 February 2021 with the observation that the trial court would decide the case expeditiously.

3. The trial of the respondent, however, could not be concluded till 15 September, 2022, when the respondent filed a fresh post-arrest bail application in the trial court, on the statutory ground of delay in the conclusion of the trial. The trial court dismissed the application of the respondent on 11 November 2022, with the observation that the earlier post-arrest bail application on the statutory ground of delay stood dismissed by the High Court as well as by the Supreme Court; therefore, the fresh application on the same ground was not maintainable. The respondent then went up to the High Court, and by the impugned order of 17 April 2023, the High Court allowed the second post-arrest bail application of the respondent on the statutory ground of delay in the conclusion of the trial; hence, the present petition.

4. We have heard the arguments of the learned counsel for the parties and examined the cases cited by them, as well as, the record of the case.

5. The report of the trial court submitted to the High Court shows that from April 2022 to April 2023 when the High Court granted the respondent bail, for a period of one year, the conclusion of the trial was mainly hindered by a defect in the functioning of the video-link system in the jail through which the respondent had to appear before the trial court. Other than this, on a few hearings during this year, the respondent could not appear because he was seriously ill and was hospitalized while on some other hearings when the respondent appeared the witnesses of the prosecution were not present. Thus, the respondent was not at fault for the delay in the conclusion of the trial at least in the year preceding the date on which he was granted bail by the High Court. The only question of law that requires determination, therefore, is whether the delay in the conclusion of the trial that occurs for no fault of the accused in the year following the rejection of his first bail application on the statutory ground of delay, can be considered a "fresh ground", not earlier available to him, for entertaining his second bail application, within the meaning and scope of that term as elaborated in Nazir Ahmed[1].

6. The present case does not involve any offence punishable with death.[2] And as per the 3rd proviso to Section 497(1), Cr.P.C., which provides the statutory ground of delay in the conclusion of the trial for granting post-arrest bail, a person accused of any offence not punishable with death is to be released on bail as of right if he has been detained for such offence for a continuous period exceeding one year and the delay in the conclusion of the trial has not been occasioned by his any act or omission or any other person acting on his behalf nor does his case fall within the 4th proviso to Section 497(1), Cr.P.C.

7. The argument of the learned counsel for the petitioner is that once a bail application of the accused on the statutory ground of delay is dismissed, holding the accused responsible for causing the delay in the conclusion of the trial, his second bail application on the same ground for any subsequent period cannot be entertained. The argument does not appeal to us. Firstly, the entitlement of an accused to post-arrest bail on the statutory ground of delay in the conclusion of the trial is time-based. If the delay exceeds a year for no fault of the accused, in offences punishable other than death, the right of the accused to post-arrest bail ripens. This right continues to ripen for each period of one year starting from the arrest of the accused if he satisfies the court that he is not at fault for the delay in a particular period of one year unless his case falls within the 4th proviso to Section 497(1), Cr.P.C. Secondly, denying this recurring right to post-arrest bail to the accused would, in our opinion, amount to giving the prosecution a license to delay the conclusion of the trial for an unlimited period of time after the dismissal of the first bail application of the accused on the statutory ground of delay. The accused would, in such an eventuality, be left confined as an undertrial prisoner for an unlimited period of time at the mercy of the prosecution to conclude the trial as and when it pleases to do so. Thirdly, the accused shall have no incentive to attend the trial regularly and cooperate in the early conclusion thereof, after the dismissal of his first bail application, if his subsequent orderly conduct cannot entitle him to post-arrest bail despite non-conclusion of the trial for no fault of his in the next one year. Such a situation would be absolutely antithetical to the constitutional scheme of fundamental rights and make a mockery of the rights to liberty, fair trial and dignity of the accused guaranteed under the Constitution.

8. It is a well-settled principle of interpretation in our jurisdiction that if two interpretations of a provision of a criminal statute are reasonably possible, the one that is favourable to the accused, not the prosecution, should be preferred.[3] As the statutory right to be released on bail on the ground of delay in the conclusion of the trial flows from the constitutional rights to liberty, fair trial and dignity guaranteed under Articles 9, 10A and 14 of the Constitution of Pakistan, the provisions of the 3rd proviso must be fashioned in a manner that is progressive and expansive of these rights of the accused, who is still under trial, and his guilt being not yet proven, has in his favour the presumption of innocence.

9. The purpose and objective of the 3rd proviso, as observed by this Court in Shakeel Shah[4], is to ensure that the trial of an accused is conducted expeditiously and that the pre-conviction detention of a person accused of an offence not punishable with death does not extend beyond the period of one year. If the trial in such an offence is not concluded within a period of one year for no fault of the accused, the statutory right to be released on bail ripens in his favour unless his case falls within any of the clauses of the 4th proviso. This right of the accused creates a corresponding duty upon the prosecution to conclude the trial within the specified period of one year. If any act or omission of the accused hinders the conclusion of the trial within a period of one year, no such right will accrue to him and he would not be entitled to be released on bail on the statutory ground of delay in conclusion of the trial. But if after the rejection of his plea for bail on this ground, the accused corrects himself and abstains from doing any such act or omission in the year following such rejection but the prosecution fails to perform its duty in concluding the trial within the specified period of one year, a fresh right, that is to say, a fresh ground, would accrue in his favour. The 3rd proviso to Section 497, Cr.P.C., thus, becomes operative as and when a period of one year passes but the trial is not concluded for no fault of the accused. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the delay in the conclusion of the trial that occurs for no fault of the accused in the year following the rejection of his bail application on the statutory ground of delay, is to be considered a "fresh ground", not earlier available to him, for entertaining his second bail application, within the meaning and scope of that term as elaborated in Nazir Ahmed.

10. The High Court has arrived at the right decision but has been rather remiss in elaborating the entitlement of the respondent to maintain a second post-arrest bail on the fresh statutory ground of delay that had arisen due to the delay in the conclusion of the trial for his no fault in a subsequent period of one year, which was earlier found not available to him for a previous period of one year. However, for the above reason, we find that the High Court has acted correctly in entertaining the second bail application of the respondent on the fresh ground of delay in the conclusion of the trial for a period of one year after the dismissal of his earlier bail application. There is no legal justification for interference by this Court in the impugned order. The petition is found meritless; it is therefore dismissed and the leave to appeal is declined. However, as the trial in the case has been pending for long, we direct the trial court to conclude the trial within a period of three months from the date of receipt of this order.

MWA/A-35/SC Petition dismissed.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---Two companies, Messrs Tanveer Cotton Mills (Pvt.) Ltd. and Messrs Tanveer Spinning and Weaving Mills (Pvt.) Ltd., ("petitioner-companies") have filed these petitions for leave to appeal under Section 6(14) of the Companies Act 2017 against a consolidated judgment of a Company Bench of the Lahore High Court, dated 17 June 2021 ("impugned judgment"). By the impugned judgment, the Company Bench allowed the petitions of the creditors, Summit Bank Ltd. and MCB Bank Ltd. ("respondent-banks"), for winding up the petitioner-companies and appointed official liquidators to manage the affairs of the petitioner-companies until the conclusion of the winding-up proceedings.

Further, the Company Bench ordered that since the industrial units owned by the petitioner-companies were operational, the official liquidators would ensure their continued operation through the existing employees.

2. The petitioner-companies have filed these petitions through their former chief executive, Mian Azhar Saleem, who is duly authorized by the resolutions of the board of directors of the petitioner-companies. However, before the Court could proceed to hear these petitions on their merits, the learned counsel for the respondent-banks raised a preliminary objection. He argued that since the petitioner-companies had been ordered to be wound up and the official liquidator appointed by the impugned judgment, they could not maintain these petitions in their names, especially through their former chief executive, who no longer has any authority in managing the affairs of the petitioner-companies after the appointment of the official liquidators. In support of his argument, he cited two judgments of the High Courts: (i) Hala Spinning Ltd. v. Industrial Development Bank (2002 CLD 978), and (ii) Muhammad Akbar v. Masood Baghpati (2019 CLD 1). This objection of the learned counsel for the respondent-banks thus gave rise to an important question of law, that is:

Whether a company that has been ordered to be wound up can challenge the winding-up order in its name through its board of directors or the chief executive officer.

The cases referred to by the learned counsel for the respondent-banks, however, were found not relevant, as they do not deal with the said question. The learned counsel for the petitioner-companies also could not cite any case of this Court or of any of the High Courts of the country that has dealt with the said question.

3. In this view of the matter and considering the importance of the question, we appointed Messrs Uzair Karamat Bhandari, Khawaja Ahmad Hosain and Faisal Siddiqi, distinguished practitioners in corporate law, as amici curiae to assist the Court in the matter. The learned amici curiae submitted comprehensive written briefs and presented detailed oral arguments on the said question of law. We appreciate their invaluable assistance and express our gratitude for their contribution. Additionally, Mr. Shahzada Mazhar, learned counsel for one of the respondent-banks, Barrister Haris Azmat, learned counsel for the applicants in the connected C.M.As. 2216-17 of 2024, and Mr. Akif Saeed, the Chairman, SECP, filed written submissions on the question.

4. We have read the cases referred to and considered the arguments on the aforementioned question of law.

5. While the question before us appears new in our jurisdiction, it has many precedents in other jurisdictions. The cases referred to us from other jurisdictions have answered the question in the affirmative, holding that a company that has been ordered to be wound up can challenge the winding-up order in its name, provided the institution of appeal and the person acting on behalf of the company are authorized by a resolution of its board of directors. No judgment from any jurisdiction has been cited by the learned amici curiae that takes a divergent view. Having reviewed the cases referred to, we concur with the view taken therein and the reasons stated. An in-depth discussion of these cases, we think, is unnecessary; instead, we find it appropriate to briefly state the main reasons that persuaded us to agree with the said view.

6. A well-settled principle of law, which hardly needs any references, is that where a right of appeal is provided from a judgment, decree or order without specifying the persons who can avail it, every person who is adversely affected and thus aggrieved by such judgment, decree or order can avail that right of appeal. A company is a separate juristic person, distinct from its directors and shareholders. When every person has a right to appeal a judgment, decree or order made against him, a company, which is also a person, cannot be treated differently. Just as any other person against whom an order is made can do, a company also has the right to argue before the appellate court that an order made against it is wrong. A winding-up petition is filed against a company. The winding-up order is made against the company. The company is thus a person aggrieved by such an order. Therefore, a company against which a winding-up order is passed does have the right to appeal it.[1]

7. Section 6(1) of the Companies Act 2017 provides that "[a]ny person aggrieved by any judgment or final order of the Court passed in its original jurisdiction under this Act may, within sixty days, file a petition for leave to appeal in the Supreme Court of Pakistan." It uses the general expression "any person aggrieved" and does not mention the specific persons competent to file a petition for leave to appeal. However, given the above legal position, a company against which a winding-up order has been passed falls within the scope of the expression "any person aggrieved" and thus can file a petition for leave to appeal in this Court under that Section.

8. However, the matter does not end here. The next question arises: how is the company to exercise its right of appeal? Being a juristic person, it needs to act through natural persons. Who are those natural persons: directors, chief executive officer or liquidator? The cases referred to by the learned amici curiae answer this question in favor of the directors, with which we agree. The reasons for our agreement with and adoption of the same view on this point are as follows.

9. Under company law, as stated in the proviso to Section 387 of the Companies Act 2017, upon the commencement of the winding-up of a company, the liquidator takes the place of the board of directors and the chief executive of the company. They become functus officio, and their powers are assumed by the liquidator. Before the winding-up order, the power to institute or defend litigation in the name of the company regarding its affairs usually vests in the board of directors under its articles. Upon the commencement of the winding-up proceedings, all powers and functions that were previously vested in the board of directors devolve upon the liquidator, who then acts on behalf of the company for its affairs. The winding-up order, however, is the very order under which the liquidator derives his authority to act on behalf of the company. It would be absurd and self-contradictory to suggest that the liquidator should act under the winding-up order to wind up the company and also challenge the same order in an appeal to save the company from being wound up. The very object of the appeal is to revoke the winding-up order and discharge the liquidator, causing the liquidator to lose his position and remuneration if the appeal succeeds. One is not expected or required to saw off the tree's branch he is sitting on. Further, it is the duty of the liquidator to act with complete impartiality between the parties contesting for and against the winding-up of the company. He is not to be a party in this contest. Consequently, the legal position emerges that despite the appointment of the liquidator, certain powers still remain with the directors of the company who, before the winding-up order, had the ultimate responsibility for managing the company and acting in its best interests in their fiduciary capacity. Such powers are usually referred to as 'residuary powers', and are not affected by the provisions of company law like the proviso to Section 387 of the Companies Act 2017.[2]

10. The criterion to determine the 'residuary powers' of the board of directors is to see whether or not the power in question has been passed on to the liquidator. If the answer is that it has not, that is a valid reason to conclude that the board of directors still retains the same.[3] Since the liquidator cannot act on behalf of the company in filing an appeal against the winding-up order, the board of directors retains this power. Therefore, a company against which the winding-up order has been passed is to exercise its right of appeal through the board of directors. The board of directors can, by its resolution, authorise any person, including the former chief executive of the company, to act on behalf of the company in filing an appeal or a petition for leave to appeal against the winding-up order, as has been done in the present case.

11. Another well-established principle of law also supports the above conclusion: an appeal is a continuation of the original proceeding. No one disputes, or can dispute, that the directors of a company can, and usually do, contest the original proceeding initiated for winding up the company, i.e., the petition filed for winding up the company. A company that is ordered to be wound up does not stand wound up or dissolved upon the making of a winding-up order. The winding-up order does not mark the culmination of the winding-up proceedings but rather, in fact, initiates such proceedings.[4] When the directors can defend the original winding-up proceeding, they surely can also file and pursue an appeal arising from that original proceeding, as it is an integral part of defending the company from being wound up until it stands wound up or dissolved. This continuity ensures that the company retains its right of defense throughout the legal process. It is a necessary corollary of the company's right to appeal that its directors control the conduct of the appeal, just as they had control over the defence to the winding-up petition in the first instance.[5] Denying the directors the capacity to exercise the company's right to appeal would effectively deprive the company of its locus standi to challenge the winding-up order, which would be contrary to the fundamental right of every person, including a juristic person like a company, to a fair trial and due process in the determination of civil rights and obligations, guaranteed by Article 10A of our Constitution.

12. A minor point remains to be addressed: who would pay the counsel for the company in filing the appeal or petition for leave to appeal against the winding-up order, as well as the costs to the respondents if the Court awards the same while dismissing the appeal or petition. Upon his appointment, the liquidator takes over the charge of all the assets and funds of the company, and the directors no longer have any control or authority to make or authorize any expenditure therefrom. Given this position, the directors inevitably have to arrange the funds for payment of fees to the counsel, etc., from their personal sources other than the funds and assets of the company and also bear the costs of appeal or petition for leave to appeal, if any, in case of dismissal.[6] However, if the company's appeal succeeds and the winding-up order is set aside, they may get reimbursement of those expenses from the company's funds under a resolution of the board of directors made after the success of the appeal.

13. Having thus answered the question of law raised and the ancillary points involved therein, we find the preliminary objection of the learned counsel for the respondent-banks to be not maintainable and therefore reject the same.

14. The office shall fix the case for hearing arguments on its merits after the summer vacation.

MWA/T-7/SC Order accordingly.

(Against the judgment of the Peshawar High Court, Peshawar, dated 25.03.2024, passed in Cr. M.B.A. No.551-P of 2024).

----Preamble---Constitution of Pakistan, Art. 35---United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC), Art. 3---Juvenile justice system---Child justice---Therapeutic jurisprudence---Purpose and objective of the juvenile justice system explained.

The juvenile justice system specifically addresses the situation of children alleged to have infringed criminal law and operates under the premise that juveniles are different from adults and require special attention and treatment. Since juveniles are more amenable to rehabilitation than adults, the juvenile justice system is designed not just to punish but to rehabilitate, emphasizing correction and guidance to help children develop into responsible adults. A range of factors underscore the need for a special justice system for juveniles. These include juveniles' lack of maturity, propensity to take risks, susceptibility to peer influence, as well as intellectual disabilities, mental illness, and victimization. This system is distinct from the ordinary criminal justice system and is based on a rehabilitative and restorative model rather than a retributive one. It emphasizes reducing crime by rehabilitating and reclaiming juvenile offenders, focusing on treating rather than punishing them. Central to this system is the principle of the 'best interest of the child', which ensures the fulfillment of a juvenile's basic rights, needs, identity, social well-being, and physical, emotional and psychological development. The rationale behind this non-punitive approach is that public safety is best served by emphasizing rehabilitation rather than the incapacitation and punishment of juveniles.

Kathleen Daly, 'Restorative v. Retributive Justice' (2002) 4(1) Punishment and Society Sage Publications 55; Anees Jillani, Cries Unheard: Juvenile Justice in Pakistan, Society for the Protection of the Rights of the Child (1999) and Cox, S.M., Conrad, J. J., and Allen, J. M., Juvenile Justice: A guide to theory and practice, McGraw-Hill Humanities, Social Sciences and World Languages (2003) ref.

The main objective of the Juvenile Justice System Act, 2018 ('the 2018 Act') is to modify and amend the law relating to the criminal justice system for juveniles, with a special focus on disposing of their cases through diversion and socially reintegrating with the 'best interest of the child' principle as a primary consideration. This approach, rooted in therapeutic jurisprudence, forms the foundation of the juvenile justice system. Therapeutic jurisprudence involves the use of social science to study the extent to which a legal rule or practice promotes the psychological or physical well-being of the people it affects. It offers an interdisciplinary perspective with a problem-solving approach that views the law itself as a potential therapeutic agent. Therapeutic jurisprudence forms the bedrock of the juvenile justice system, integrating the societal responsibilities of sanction and rehabilitation in line with the principles of rehabilitative and restorative justice. This holistic framework ensures that the juvenile justice system not only addresses legal accountability but also prioritizes the well-being and developmental needs of juvenile offenders. Juvenile justice also falls under the rubric of child justice. While juvenile justice is more narrowly focused on dealing with crimes, including aspects of both punishment and rehabilitation, child justice is more encompassing, aiming to protect and uphold the rights and best interests of all children involved in the legal system. Child justice is also centered around the idea that children, due to their age and maturity, should not be dealt with in the same manner as adults within the legal system. It emphasizes rehabilitation and education, rather than punishment, recognizing the potential for growth and change in young individuals. Both child and juvenile justice systems are shaped by international conventions like the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC), which provides a broad framework and standards for the treatment of children within judicial systems worldwide.

----Ss. 2(g), 2(m), 2(o), 6(4) & 6(5)---Juvenile accused---Heinous offence---Bail---Statutory delay in conclusion of trial---Principles---Since both 'minor offence' and 'major offence' are treated as bailable under Section 6(3) of the Juvenile Justice System Act, 2018 ('the 2018 Act'), the ground of delay in the conclusion of the trial provided by Section 6(5) for grant of bail applies solely to juveniles detained for a 'heinous offence'---Therefore, post-arrest bail is to be granted as a matter of right to a juvenile detained for a heinous offence, regardless ofhis age, whether above or below sixteen years, provided the prerequisites of Section 6(5) are fulfilled---Nature of the offence is not a valid ground to withhold bail under Section 6(5) of the 2018 Act.

By the impugned judgment, the High Court dismissed the petitioner's post-arrest bail petition, which was filed on the statutory ground of delay in the conclusion of his trial, in case FIR No. 417/2021, dated 16 August 2021, registered at Police Station Prang, District Charsadda, for offences punishable under Sections 302, 324, 392, 427, 201 and 34 of the Pakistan Penal Code, 1860 ("P.P.C."), and Section 15 of the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Arms Act, 2013.

2. Briefly, according to the crime report (FIR), the allegations against the petitioner are that during the night hours of 16 August 2021, Ubaid Ullah ("complainant") and Shafiq Ur Rehman ("deceased") were travelling on the motorway when the petitioner, along with the other co-accused, signaled them to stop. The deceased, who was driving the car, did not stop. As a result, the petitioner and the other co-accused fired upon them, causing the deceased to sustain injuries to which he subsequently succumbed, while the complainant remained unhurt.

3. In this case, the petitioner was arrested on 23 February 2023. He filed a bail petition, which was dismissed on merits by both the trial court and the High Court. Thereafter, on 18 September 2023, the petitioner moved an application seeking a determination of his juvenility. Relying on the secondary school certificate of the petitioner and the report of the medical board, the trial court declared the petitioner a juvenile, aged 14 years and 5 months, at the time of the commission of the offence. Therefore, the petitioner was under the age of 16 years at the time of his arrest and detention. The petitioner then moved a second bail petition on the statutory ground of delay in the conclusion of the trial, which was dismissed by both the trial court and the High Court, vide judgments dated 22 January 2024 and 25 March 2024, respectively.

4. The two reasons given by the High Court for the denial of bail to the petitioner on the statutory ground of delay in the conclusion of the trial were (i) that the petitioner committed a 'heinous offence', and (ii) that the delay in the conclusion of the trial was attributable to the petitioner, as he had moved an application for the determination of his age under Section 8 of the Juvenile Justice System Act, 2018 ("2018 Act"), which took time. Additionally, the High Court observed that the frequent absence of the co-accused during the trial also contributed to the delay.

5. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties and have perused the record of the case with their able assistance.

6. We may observe at the outset that the juvenile justice system specifically addresses the situation of children alleged to have infringed criminal law and operates under the premise that juveniles are different from adults and require special attention and treatment. Since juveniles are more amenable to rehabilitation than adults, the juvenile justice system is designed not just to punish but to rehabilitate, emphasizing correction and guidance to help children develop into responsible adults. A range of factors underscore the need for a special justice system for juveniles. These include juveniles' lack of maturity, propensity to take risks, susceptibility to peer influence, as well as intellectual disabilities, mental illness, and victimization. This system is distinct from the ordinary criminal justice system and is based on a rehabilitative and restorative model rather than a retributive one.[1] It emphasizes reducing crime by rehabilitating and reclaiming juvenile offenders, focusing on treating rather than punishing them.[2] Central to this system is the principle of the 'best interest of the child',[3] which ensures the fulfillment of a juvenile's basic rights, needs, identity, social well-being, and physical, emotional and psychological development. The rationale behind this non-punitive approach is that public safety is best served by emphasizing rehabilitation rather than the incapacitation and punishment of juveniles.[4]

7. In Pakistan, the juvenile justice system finds its ideological roots in the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution"). Article 25(3) of the Constitution empowers the State to make special provisions for the protection of children, even if such protection discriminates against adults.

Furthermore, Article 35 of the Constitution mandates that the State shall protect children. As a signatory to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child ("UNCRC"), Pakistan is also under international obligation to take special measures for the protection and rehabilitation of juveniles who come into conflict with the law. It is this international obligation, coupled with Pakistan's compliance with its constitutional mandate that formed the impetus behind the enactment of the juvenile justice system.[5]

8. The main objective of the 2018 Act is to modify and amend the law relating to the criminal justice system for juveniles, with a special focus on disposing of their cases through diversion and socially reintegrating with the 'best interest of the child' principle as a primary consideration.[6] This approach, rooted in therapeutic jurisprudence, forms the foundation of the juvenile justice system. Therapeutic jurisprudence, as defined by David B. Wexler,[7] involves 'the use of social science to study the extent to which a legal rule or practice promotes the psychological or physical well-being of the people it affects.'[8] It offers an interdisciplinary perspective with a problem-solving approach that views the law itself as a potential therapeutic agent. Therapeutic jurisprudence forms the bedrock of the juvenile justice system, integrating the societal responsibilities of sanction and rehabilitation in line with the principles of rehabilitative and restorative justice.[9] This holistic framework ensures that the juvenile justice system not only addresses legal accountability but also prioritizes the well-being and developmental needs of juvenile offenders. Juvenile justice also falls under the rubric of child justice. While juvenile justice is more narrowly focused on dealing with crimes, including aspects of both punishment and rehabilitation, child justice is more encompassing, aiming to protect and uphold the rights and best interests of all children involved in the legal system. Child justice is also centered around the idea that children, due to their age and maturity, should not be dealt with in the same manner as adults within the legal system. It emphasizes rehabilitation and education, rather than punishment, recognizing the potential for growth and change in young individuals. Both child and juvenile justice systems are shaped by international conventions like the UNCRC, which provides a broad framework and standards for the treatment of children within judicial systems worldwide.

9. With this understanding of the juvenile justice system, we approach and address the bail matter of a juvenile in the instant case. Since the bail matter of the petitioner, a juvenile accused of committing a 'heinous offence', is to be dealt with under subsections (4) and (5) of Section 6 of the 2018 Act, the provisions thereof are cited here for ready reference:

6. Release of a juvenile on bail.-

(4) Where a juvenile of more than sixteen years of age is arrested or detained for a heinous offence, he may not be released on bail if the Juvenile Court is of the opinion that there are reasonable grounds to believe that such juvenile is involved in commission of a heinous offence.

(5) Where the Juvenile Court is of the opinion that the delay in the trial of a juvenile has not been occasioned by an act or omission of such juvenile or any other person acting on his behalf or in exercise of any right or privilege under any law for the time being in force, such juvenile shall be released on bail if he has been detained for a continuous period exceeding six months and whose trial has not been completed.

A bare reading of the above provisions shows that Section 6(4) of the 2018 Act provides that where a juvenile of more than sixteen years of age is arrested or detained for a heinous offence, he may not be released on bail if the Juvenile Court is of the opinion that there are reasonable grounds to believe that such juvenile is involved in the commission of a heinous offence. While, Section 6(5) of the 2018 Act provides that any juvenile who has been detained for a continuous period exceeding six months and whose trial has not been completed shall be released on bail, provided that the delay in the conclusion of the trial has not been occasioned by an act or omission of such juvenile.

10. It is thus evident that while Section 6(4) deals with the matter of bail on merits, while Section 6(5) provides for a distinct and separate ground of bail, namely, the delay in the conclusion of the trial of the juvenile. It is also important to underline that since both 'minor offence'[10] and 'major offence'[11] are treated as bailable under Section 6(3),[12] the ground of delay in the conclusion of the trial provided by Section 6(5) for grant of bail applies solely to juveniles detained for a 'heinous offence'.[13] Therefore, post-arrest bail is to be granted as a matter of right to a juvenile detained for a heinous offence, regardless of his age, whether above or below sixteen years, provided the prerequisites of Section 6(5) are fulfilled.[14]

11. The 2018 Act is a beneficial legislation that favors juvenile offenders. It not only reduces the period for granting bail on the statutory ground of trial delay for juveniles detained pending trial under the previous law, i.e., the Juvenile Justice System Ordinance, 2000 ("2000 Ordinance"), from one year to six months but also removes the disqualification of having a previous criminal record for bail on this ground. Unlike the 2000 Ordinance or Section 497 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, the 2018 Act does not impose any other statutory disqualifications for granting bail to juveniles on the ground of delay in the conclusion of the trial. The subsequent ameliorative and benevolent legislation, i.e., the 2018 Act, reflects the legislature's intent to ensure that the trial of a juvenile is concluded within six months of his detention, and any delay beyond this period entitles the juvenile to be released on bail. Furthermore, since the denial of bail and detention of an accused pending trial curtail his fundamental rights to liberty, fair trial and dignity guaranteed by Articles 9, 10-A and 14 of the Constitution, statutory provisions on bail matters, such as Section 6(5) of the 2018 Act, must be interpreted in a manner that is progressive and expansive of these rights.

12. Now, turning to the instant case, the approach of the High Court to deny the petitioner the benefit of Section 6(5) of the 2018 Act by observing that the offence is 'heinous' is not legally correct but rather misconceived. The nature of the offence is not a valid ground to withhold bail under Section 6(5) of the 2018 Act; in fact, this provision only applies to heinous offences, as other offences are bailable under Section 6(3) of the 2018 Act.

13. The High Court has also erred in law by attributing the delay in concluding the trial to the petitioner, who had filed an application for determination of his age under Section 8 of the 2018 Act, which took time. It is crucial to emphasize that the initial duty to determine the age of an accused who appears or claims to be a juvenile lies with the police. When the police fail in this duty, it passes on to the court.[15] Therefore, the time spent by the court in making this determination constitutes an act of the court, which cannot be construed as delay caused by the petitioner in the trial, thereby depriving him of his right to bail on the statutory ground of delay.[16] So far as the delay caused by the frequent absence of the co-accused during trial is concerned, the same cannot be attributed to the petitioner as one is responsible for his own acts or omissions, not of others.[17]

14. The petitioner was arrested in this case on 23 February 2023 and has been detained continuously for more than six months since then, with his trial not yet concluded. It is crucial to note that the period of delay in concluding the trial is calculated from the date of the arrest.[18] There is no evidence on record indicating that the delay in concluding the trial was caused by any act or omission of the petitioner. Therefore, the prerequisites of Section 6(5) of the 2018 Act are fulfilled, which entitles the petitioner to the grant of post-arrest bail as a matter of right on the statutory ground of delay in the conclusion of the trial.

15. For the above reasons, the courts below are found to have made a legal error in declining bail to the petitioner under Section 6(5) of the 2018 Act, warranting interference by this Court in the interest of justice. The present petition is, therefore, converted into an appeal and the same is allowed. The impugned judgment is set aside, and the petitioner is admitted to bail, subject to furnishing bail bond in the sum of Rs. 50,000/- with two sureties in the like amount to the satisfaction of the trial court.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---Through the present review petition, the petitioner seeks a review of the order dated 8 November 2023 passed by one of us (Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J.) whereby his appeal filed against an order of the Registrar, dated 27 May 2022, was dismissed and the said order was maintained. By order dated 27 May 2022, the Registrar had returned being not entertainable a CMA of the petitioner filed for restoration of his C.M.A. No.2384/2022.

2. Briefly, the background facts that have given rise to the present review petition are as follows: By its order dated 3 May 2019, the Federal Service Tribunal dismissed the petitioner's service appeal regarding his annual increments, pensionary benefits, etc., for the period he remained dismissed from service. He filed a petition for leave to appeal (C.P.L.A. 3020/2019) against that order in this Court and also filed a review petition before the Tribunal. The Tribunal dismissed his review petition by its order dated 17 July 2019. Against this order, the petitioner filed another petition for leave to appeal (C.P.L.A. 3774/ 2019).

3. The present review petition pertains to the second CPLA, i.e., C.P.L.A. 3774/2019. This CPLA was dismissed by a two-member Bench on 5 October 2021, for non-prosecution and for being time-barred. Instead of filing a review petition, since the CPLA had been dismissed on the ground of being time-barred also, the petitioner filed an application (C.M.A. 12715/2021) for restoration of the said CPLA. Although this application was not entertainable in view of the law declared in Fazal Muhammad,[1] the office wrongly received and registered it. Anyhow, C.M.A. 12715/2021 was also dismissed by a two-member Bench for non-prosecution on 1 February 2022.

4. The petitioner then filed an application (C.M.A. 2384/2022) for the restoration of C.M.A. 12715/2021. This second application was dismissed by a two-member Bench on 10 May 2022, for non-prosecution and for being non-maintainable. Again, instead of filing a review petition, since C.M.A. 2384/2022 had been dismissed on the ground of being non-maintainable also, the petitioner filed an application (C.M.A.) for the restoration of C.M.A. 2384/2022. The Registrar returned this application for being not entertainable by order dated 27 May 2022, and the petitioner's appeal against this order of the Registrar was dismissed by one of us (Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J.) vide order dated 8 November 2023. Hence, the petitioner has filed this review petition.

5. We have heard the petitioner who appeared in person and examined the record of the case.

6. Both the Registrar's original order returning the petitioner's CMA and the appellate order maintaining that order were administrative in nature.[2] Therefore, we asked the petitioner to specify under which provision of the Constitution[3] or the Rules[4] he has filed the present review petition. He, however, could not cite any such provision. It hardly needs clarification that Article 188 of the Constitution and Order 26 of the Rules pertain to the review of judicial orders, not administrative orders. The misunderstanding of the petitioner, who has filed the present review petition in person without obtaining any legal advice, is understandable. But, it is surprising that the office has entertained the present review petition despite there being no provision for such a review petition in either the Constitution or the Rules.

7. As held by this Court in Fazal Muhammad[5] on the judicial side and reiterated in Ahsan Abid[6] on the administrative side, a petition that does not fall within the scope of any provision of the Constitution, the law or the Rules is "frivolous" and should not be received/ entertained by the Registrar, as per Rule 5 of Order 17 of the Rules. The office must be vigilant about this legal position and perform its administrative duty in this regard with due diligence.

8. The present review petition is neither entertainable nor maintainable under any provision of the Constitution or the Rules. It is, therefore, dismissed.

MWA/M-24/SC Review dismissed.

----O.XXI, R. 90, second proviso---Execution of decree---Auction sale---Application to set aside sale on ground of irregularity or fraud---Deposit of amount or furnishing of security in court---Purpose of the second proviso to Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C.---Evidently, the purpose of the second proviso is to discourage frivolous objections---Condition stipulated in the second proviso for entertaining the application ensures that the rule is not misused to delay the completion of the sale and expeditious conclusion of the execution proceedings, and that the objections are made only by bona fide persons on valid grounds---If upon adjudication the application is found frivolous, the amount deposited or the security furnished, as the case may be, by the applicant is to be appropriated for awarding costs to the person(s) who suffer from the delay in completing the sale due to the filing of the application---Therefore, in determining the amount required to be deposited, the executing court should consider various factors such as the decretal amount, the time elapsed since filing the execution petition, the sale amount and the applicant's previous conduct, etc., and fix an amount reflective of the costs likely to be awarded to the affected party in case of dismissal of the application.

of the property---This penalty amount, is to be deposited by the applicant, or its security furnished, as per the second proviso to Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C., before the court entertains the application to set aside the sale---Thus, there is no conflict between the two provisions; clauses (a) and (b) of Section 19(7) of the Ordinance are only complementary to the provisions of Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C., for the execution of decrees under the Ordinance---Banking Court is therefore bound to follow both the provisions in the matter of objections made to the sale of property in the execution of a decree.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---While hearing these cases, a three-member Bench of this Court disagreed with the view earlier taken by another three-member Bench in Habib and Company v. MCB (PLD 2020 SC 227) regarding the meaning and scope of the second proviso to Rule 90 of Order XXI of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 ("C.P.C."). Consequently, the matter of interpretation of the said proviso was referred for reconsideration by a larger Bench through an order dated 16 March 2021, reported as Samrana Nawaz v. MCB (PLD 2021 SC 581). These cases have, therefore, been posted before this larger Bench for an authoritative pronouncement of the law on the meaning and scope of the second proviso to Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C.

Divergent opinions on the meaning and scope of the second proviso to Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C.

2. Since the essential question involved in the present cases is that of interpretation of the second proviso to Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C., the provisions of the said Rule including the proviso under consideration ("second proviso") are cited at the outset for the convenience of reading and reference:

90. Application to set aside on ground of irregularity or fraud.---Where any immovable property has been sold in execution of a decree the decree-holder, or any person entitled to share in a rateable distribution of assets, or whose interests are affected by the sale, may apply to the Court to set aside the sale on the ground of a material irregularity or fraud in publishing or conducting it:

Provided that no sale shall be set aside on the ground of irregularity or fraud unless upon the facts proved the Court is satisfied that the applicant has sustained substantial injury by reason of such irregularity or fraud;

Provided further that no such application shall be entertained unless the applicant deposits such amount not exceeding twenty per cent of the sum realised at the sale, or furnishes such security, as the Court may direct.

The two competing opinions on the meaning and scope of the second proviso are: first, that the deposit of the amount, which is required under the proviso, is not to be made by the applicant along with the application but rather it is to be made on the direction of the court; and second, that such deposit of the amount is to be made by the applicant along with the application without waiting for any direction of the court in this regard, i.e., the application at the time of its filing in the court is to be accompanied by deposit of such amount.

3. We may mention here that prior to the decision of this Court in Habib, the first opinion was a considered and consistent opinion of the High Courts in the country.[1] There was not even a single dissent. However, by enunciating the second opinion, Habib impliedly overruled all those decisions of the High Courts without referring to them and without discussing and weighing the reasons stated therein.

Some fundamental principles of statutory interpretation

4. Before we delve into interpreting the second proviso, it would be advantageous to outline some fundamental principles of statutory interpretation that will guide our analysis. We all know that the ultimate objective of interpretation is to ascertain and give effect to the legislative intent, which constitutes the major step in the process of interpreting statutes and lies at the heart of the interpretative process. The first source from which the legislative intent is to be sought is the words of the statute; then an examination is to be made of the context and purpose of the enactment.[2] Therefore, in the process of interpreting a provision of law, the staring point is to read and understand the words used therein in their ordinary linguistic and grammatical meaning. Generally, such meaning is to be ascribed to them, more so when it is consistent with the context and purpose of the provision in which they are used. However, where there is a potential conflict between the ordinary meaning of words and the purpose of the provision, courts may depart from the literal meaning to advance the purpose and give effect to the legislative intent. Similarly, if the words are ambiguous and can reasonably bear more than one meaning, courts are to ascribe such meaning to them which will be consistent with the purpose of the provision. Or, if the words in their ordinary meaning lead to absurdity, courts may give them such meaning that will make the provision reasonable and consistent with the context and purpose thereof. The interpretative process, thus, combines both literal and purposive approaches to ensure that the legislative intent is ascertained and given effect.[3]

A literal interpretation of the second proviso to Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C.

5. Guided by the above principles, we start our analysis of the second proviso by reading and understanding the words used therein in their ordinary linguistic and grammatical meaning. The provisions of the second proviso are again cited here for ease of reference:

Provided further that no such application shall be entertained unless the applicant deposits such amount not exceeding twenty per cent of the sum realised at the sale, or furnishes such security, as the Court may direct. (Emphasis added)

The keywords that need to be understood for determining the meaning and scope of the second proviso, as underlined, are 'entertained', 'not exceeding twenty per cent' and 'as the Court may direct'.

5.1. The word 'entertain', according to its ordinary dictionary meaning, inter alia means 'to give attention or consideration',[4] 'to take into consideration',[5] 'to receive and take into consideration'[6] or 'to give judicial consideration'.[7] In legal parlance, as observed by this Court in Abdul Khaliq,[8] the word 'entertain' ordinarily means to 'adjudicate upon' or 'proceed to consider on merits'.[9] In the context of its use in the second proviso, we find that the word 'entertain' has been used in the same ordinary legal meaning, i.e., to proceed to consider and adjudicate upon merits. It implies that the application to set aside the sale on the ground of a material irregularity or fraud shall not be adjudicated upon on its merits unless the applicant deposits such amount not exceeding twenty per cent of the sum realised at the sale, or furnishes such security, as the court may direct. It does not imply merely filing of the application by the applicant or receiving of the application by the court.

5.2. The next important words in understanding the meaning and scope of the second provision are 'not exceeding twenty per cent' and 'as the Court may direct'. Their significance is pivotal in discerning the implications of the second proviso. These words being plain expressions of English language do not require further assistance from English language dictionaries. They clearly convey their intended meanings and are self-explanatory. The words 'not exceeding twenty per cent' prescribe the upper limit of the amount that the court may direct to be deposited for entertaining the application, and the words 'as the Court may direct' signify the court's discretion to fix any amount that does not exceed the upper limit.

6. With this understanding of the keywords used therein, we find that the second proviso stipulates that upon filing the application to set aside the sale, the court will direct the applicant to deposit an amount not exceeding twenty per cent of the sum realised at the sale or furnish security for that amount, and provide the applicant with an opportunity to fulfill this requirement. Until the applicant deposits the amount or furnishes the security, the court cannot proceed to consider and adjudicate upon the merits of the application. Only when the applicant complies with this requirement within the allowed time, can the court proceed to consider the application on its merits. If the applicant fails to do so, the court is to dismiss the application without proceeding to consider and adjudicate upon its merits.

7. The bar on entertaining the application thus arises from the failure of the applicant to "deposit such amount not exceeding twenty per cent of the sum realized at the sale, or furnish such security, as the Court may direct". It becomes operative and effective only when the court first determines the amount to be deposited or the nature of security to be furnished against that amount by the applicant. No applicant can anticipate what amount or security the court would direct him to deposit or furnish, as the case may be; nor can he be allowed to deposit the amount or furnish the security as per his own choice at the time of filing the application. The prior direction of the court to deposit a certain amount or furnish a specified security is a condition precedent (sine qua non) for declining to entertain and dismissing the application under the second proviso.

8. We, therefore, approve the afore-referred opinion of the High Courts[10] that the deposit of the amount, which is required under the proviso, is not to be made by the applicant along with the application but rather it is to be made on the direction of the court, and agree with the same view expressed by the three-member Bench that earlier heard these cases in its order dated 16 March 2021 (Samrana Nawaz v. MCB PLD 2021 SC 581), thus:

The expression "as the Court may direct" leaves little room to speculate whether the applicant is to deposit the 20% of the sale amount at the time of filing the objection petition or at a subsequent stage under direction of the court. The expression "such amount not exceeding twenty percent" further strengthens the position that the amount required to be deposited by the applicant is to be determined by the court which must not exceed twenty percent of the sale amount but can be less than that. An applicant cannot anticipate what the direction of the court would be in this regard and, therefore, he cannot deposit the requisite amount at the time of filing the objection petition. The mandatory requirement of the second proviso appears to become operative only once the court determines the "amount not exceeding twenty percent of the sum realised at the sale" and directs the applicant to deposit the same.

With respect, we find that the view taken in Habib that the second proviso "mandates every application under the provision to be accompanied by 20% of the auction price in order to be entertained" is manifestly wrong; hence, it is overruled.

Purpose of the second proviso to Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C.

9. Next, we briefly discuss the purpose of the second proviso and the considerations that may guide the executing court in exercising its discretion under the second proviso to determine an appropriate amount. Evidently, the purpose of the second proviso is to discourage frivolous objections. The condition stipulated in the second proviso for entertaining the application ensures that the rule is not misused to delay the completion of the sale and expeditious conclusion of the execution proceedings, and that the objections are made only by bona fide persons on valid grounds. If upon adjudication the application is found frivolous, the amount deposited or the security furnished, as the case may be, by the applicant is to be appropriated for awarding costs to the person(s) who suffer from the delay in completing the sale due to the filing of the application. Therefore, in determining the amount required to be deposited, the executing court should consider various factors such as the decretal amount, the time elapsed since filing the execution petition, the sale amount and the applicant's previous conduct, etc., and fix an amount reflective of the costs likely to be awarded to the affected party in case of dismissal of the application. The literal meaning of the second proviso as ascertained above, which signifies the discretion of the court to determine an appropriate amount not exceeding twenty per cent of the sum realised at the sale, thus aligns with its purpose as well.

Effect of Section 19(7) of the Financial Institutions (Recovery of Finances) Ordinance 2001 on Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C.

10. There remains another legal point that needs to be discussed before going on to the facts of the present cases. It is: what is the effect of clauses (a) and (b) of Section 19(7) of the Financial Institutions (Recovery of Finances) Ordinance 2001 ("Ordinance") on the provisions of Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C., particularly of the second proviso thereof discussed above. The provisions of the said clauses are reproduced here for ready reference:

(7) Notwithstanding anything contained in the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 (Act V of 1908), or any other law for the time being in force-

(a) the Banking Court shall follow the summary procedure for purposes of investigation of claims and objections in respect of attachment or sale of any property, whether or not mortgaged, pledged or hypothecated, and shall complete such investigation within 30 days of filing of the claims or objections;

(b) if the claims or objections are found by the Banking Court to be mala fide or filed merely to delay the sale of the property, it shall impose a penalty upto twenty percent of the sale price of the property;

It is evident from reading the above provisions that they have been given an overriding effect over the provisions contained in the C.P.C. Similarly as per Section 7(2) of the Ordinance, in the exercise of its civil jurisdiction under the Ordinance, a Banking Court is to follow the procedure provided in the C.P.C. in all matters but only with respect to which the procedure has not been provided for in the Ordinance. Thus, there remains no doubt that where a particular procedure has been provided in the Ordinance to deal with a certain matter, a Banking Court cannot apply the procedure provided in the C.P.C. In other words, a Banking Court is to follow the procedure provided in the C.P.C. in so far as it is not inconsistent with the procedure provided in the Ordinance. In case of conflict between the two, the procedure provided in the Ordinance is to be preferred and followed.

11. That being so, we are to examine the substance of the provisions of Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C. and Section 19(7) of the Ordinance; to see whether there is any conflict between them or the latter is only complementary to the former.

12. Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C., specifies the persons eligible to make the application to set aside the sale, namely, (i) any person entitled to share in a rateable distribution of assets, and (ii) any person whose interests are affected by the sale. It also outlines the grounds for challenging the sale, which are (i) material irregularity in publishing or conducting the sale, and (ii) fraud in publishing or conducting the sale. The first proviso of the Rule restricts the vitiating effect of these grounds only to situations where the applicant has sustained substantial injury due to such irregularity or fraud. And its second proviso mandates that the entertainability of the application is conditional upon the deposit of an amount not exceeding twenty per cent of the sum realised at the sale, or the furnishing of such security, as directed by the court. On the other hand, clauses (a) and (b) of Section 19(7) of the Ordinance address two aspects: (i) the requirement for Banking Courts to follow a summary procedure for investigating objections regarding the sale of any property and completing such investigation within 30 days of filing of the objections; and (ii) the provision for imposing a penalty of upto twenty percent of the sale price of the property if objections are found mala fide or aimed at delaying the sale.

13. As evident from the above analysis, clauses (a) and (b) of Section 19(7) of the Ordinance are not comprehensive provisions regarding objections to the sale of property in the execution of a decree. They do not specify who can make objections or the grounds on which objections can be made. Therefore, these clauses cannot function independently of Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C., regarding objections to the sale of property in the execution of a decree. It is worth noting that since Section 141, C.P.C., does not apply to applications under Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C.,[11] the procedure for investigating objections made under this rule is also summary, as provided in clause (a) of Section 19(7) of the Ordinance. The latter provision merely further prescribes a period of 30 days to complete the investigation of objections through a summary procedure. Clause (b) of Section 19(7) of the Ordinance provides for imposing a penalty of up to twenty percent of the sale price of the property if objections are found by the Banking Court to be mala fide or aimed at delaying the sale of the property. This penalty amount, as discussed earlier, is to be deposited by the applicant, or its security furnished, as per the second proviso to Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C., before the court entertains the application to set aside the sale. Thus, there is no conflict between the two provisions; clauses (a) and (b) of Section 19(7) of the Ordinance are only complementary to the provisions of Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C., for the execution of decrees under the Ordinance. A Banking Court is therefore bound to follow both the provisions in the matter of objections made to the sale of property in the execution of a decree.

14. Our attention has been drawn to a Lahore High Court Division Bench judgment in Messrs Majid & Sons[12] wherein, while relying upon a judgment of this Court in PICIC,[13] it has been held that due to the non-obstante clause of Section 18(6) of the Banking Companies (Recovery of Loans, Advances, Credits and Finances) Act 1997 (the predecessor provision of Section 19(7) of the Ordinance), the provisions of Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C., are excluded. In PICIC, a three-member Bench of this Court had held that objections in respect of the sale of a property could be filed under the provisions of Section 18(6) of the Banking Companies (Recovery of Loans, Advances, Credits and Finances) Act 1997, and not under the C.P.C., because of the non-obstante clause of this subsection. With respect, we note that in PICIC, a three-member Bench of this Court failed to appreciate that the detailed provisions on the matter of objections in respect of sale of a property in execution of a decree are contained in Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C., whereas the provisions of Section 18(6) of the 1997 Act (now Section 19(7) of the Ordinance) only covers two things and are thus merely complementary to them, as discussed above. Therefore, the decision on this point in PICIC suffers from patent illegality and is hereby overruled. Consequently, the Division Bench judgment of the Lahore High Court in Messrs Majid and Sons is also disapproved.

15. Having decided the questions of law, we now proceed to examine the facts of the present cases and decide them in light of the legal position stated above.

Facts of and decision on C.P. 2646-L/2018

16. On 21 July 2009, the respondent, MCB, instituted a suit against the petitioner, Samrana Nawaz, seeking recovery of a sum of Rs.69,34,793.00. The Banking Court decreed the suit on 6 April 2010 and converted it into execution proceedings for further action. In the execution proceedings, the property of the petitioner was sold through a public auction. The appellant filed objections to this sale under Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C. The Banking Court dismissed the appellant's objection petition, on 14 June 2011, on merits. The petitioner appealed this decision, but the Lahore High Court dismissed the appeal by a judgment dated 20 November 2018 ("impugned judgment"). The sole ground on which the High Court dismissed the petitioner's appeal and upheld the Banking Court's order was that since the petitioner had not deposited twenty percent of the sum realized at the sale at the time of filing the objection petition, her objection petition was not entertainable. Hence, this petition for leave to appeal is filed by the petitioner.

17. The deposit of the amount required under the second proviso, as held above, is not mandated to be made by the applicant along with the application; rather, it is to be made upon the direction of the court. In the present case, the Banking Court neither determined the specific amount to be deposited by the petitioner under the second proviso nor did it direct the petitioner to make any deposit. Therefore, the High Court could not legally dismiss the petitioner's appeal and uphold the Banking Court's order on the ground of non-deposit of twenty percent of the sum realized at the sale by the petitioner at the time of filing her objection petition. Instead, the proper course for the High Court was to ensure compliance with the requirement of the second proviso before considering her appeal on its merits by determining an appropriate amount to be deposited by the petitioner under the second proviso and allowing the petitioner an opportunity to deposit the same with the executing court, i.e., the Banking Court.

18. Therefore, the present petition is converted into an appeal, and the same is allowed. The impugned judgment is set aside. The petitioner's appeal before the High Court shall be deemed pending. The High Court shall, before considering the appeal on its merits, determine an appropriate amount to be deposited by the petitioner under the second proviso and allow the petitioner an opportunity to deposit the same with the executing court. If the petitioner deposits the amount determined by the High Court, her appeal shall be decided on its merits; otherwise, the same may be dismissed by upholding the order of the Banking Court on this ground alone.

Facts of and decision on C.A. 17-L/2019

19. On 21 July 2009, the respondent, MCB, instituted a suit against the appellant, Samrana Nawaz, seeking recovery of a sum of Rs.67,48,254.54. The Banking Court decreed the suit on 6 April 2010 and converted it into execution proceedings for further action. In the execution proceedings, four properties of the appellant were sold through public auction. The appellant filed objections to this sale under Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C. The Banking Court allowed the appellant's objection petition on 9 January 2012 and set aside the sale. The respondent appealed this decision, and the Lahore High Court accepted the appeal by a judgment dated 20 November 2018 ("impugned judgment"). The sole ground on which the High Court accepted the respondent's appeal was that since the appellant had not deposited twenty percent of the sum realized at the sale at the time of filing the objection petition, her objection petition was not entertainable. Hence, this appeal is filed by the appellant.

20. As stated above, the deposit of the amount, which is required under the second proviso, is not to be made by the applicant along with the application but rather it is to be made on the direction of the court. In the present case, the Banking Court neither determined the specific amount to be deposited by the appellant under the second proviso nor did it direct the appellant to make any deposit. Additionally, the respondent failed to raise this crucial point before the Banking Court when it proceeded to entertain the appellant's objection petition. It was imperative for the Banking Court to adhere to the requirement of the second proviso before proceeding to consider and adjudicate upon the merits of the appellant's objection petition. However, it failed in its duty in this regard.

21. The purpose behind requiring the deposit of a certain amount under the second proviso, as mentioned earlier, is to deter frivolous objections and to appropriate the deposited amount for awarding costs to those affected by the delay caused by such objections. In the present case, the appellant's objections were found valid, not frivolous, upon adjudication by the Banking Court. Since the appellant's objection petition was granted by the court, there was no occasion to compensate the respondent for filing a frivolous application by the appellant to delay the sale. Had the appellant's objection petition been dismissed by the Banking Court and the appellant appealed to the High Court, we would have asked the High Court to comply with the requirement of the second proviso before considering her appeal on its merits. However, in the scenario where the executing court had accepted the appellant's objection petition and it was the respondent who appealed, we find that the impugned judgment passed by the High Court is not legally sustainable.

22. Therefore, the present appeal is allowed, and the impugned judgment is set aside. The respondent's appeal before the High Court shall be deemed pending, and the High Court shall decide it on its merits, excluding the ground of non-deposit of the amount by the appellant under the second proviso.

Facts of and decision on C.A. 364-L/2020

23. The respondent, Bank of Punjab, instituted a suit against the appellants, Khalid Mujeeb Pervaiz and others, seeking recovery of a sum of Rs.144,802,140. A Single Bench of the Lahore High Court, exercising its jurisdiction as a Banking Court under the Ordinance, decreed the suit on 27 October 2014 to the extent of Rs.114,792,163.97 and converted it into execution proceedings for further action. In the execution proceedings, several properties of the appellants were sold through public auction. The appellants filed objections to this sale under Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C. However, by its order dated 9 May 2018, the Banking Court, i.e., the Single Bench of the High Court, dismissed the objection petition on the sole ground that the appellants had not deposited twenty percent of the sum realized at the sale along with their objection petition. The appellants appealed before the Division Bench of the High Court, but it was dismissed and the order of the Banking Court was upheld by a judgment dated 3 February 2020 ("impugned judgment") on the same ground. Hence, this appeal is filed by the appellant, with leave of the Court, which was granted to consider the question: "whether a 20% deposit of the auction price is obligatory for an objector without an order requiring the same being passed by the Banking Court in terms of the second proviso to Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C."

24. Since we have held above that the deposit of the amount required under the second proviso to Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C., is not obligatory for the applicant to make along with the application but rather it is to be made on the direction of the court, the Banking Court committed a legal error in dismissing the appellants' objection petition on the ground of non-deposit of twenty percent of the sum realized at the sale along with their objection petition. Further, the Division Bench, by dismissing the appellants. appeal, failed to correct that legal error in its appellate jurisdiction.

25. Therefore, the present appeal is allowed. The impugned judgment is set aside, and the appellants' appeal made before the Division Bench is accepted. Consequently, the order of the Banking Court, i.e., the Single Bench of the High Court, is also set aside. The appellants. objection petition shall be deemed pending. The Banking Court shall, before considering the objection petition on its merits, determine an appropriate amount to be deposited by the appellants under the second proviso to Rule 90 of Order XXI, C.P.C., and allow the appellants an opportunity to deposit the same. If the appellants deposit the amount determined by the Banking Court, their objection petition shall be decided on its merits; otherwise, the same shall not be entertained and shall be dismissed on this ground alone.

----Arts. 184, 185, 187 & 188---Implementation of orders and decisions of the Supreme Court by individuals, institutions and entities---Constitutional significance of implementing such orders and decisions stated.

It is imperative to underline that in a constitutional democracy, the rule of law is not just a principle but the bedrock upon which the legitimacy of governance rests. The Supreme Court of Pakistan, as the apex judicial body, is entrusted with the profound responsibility of interpreting the law, ensuring justice, and upholding the Constitution. Its orders are not merely recommendations or advisories; they are legal mandates that must be followed. These decisions are the culmination of rigorous legal scrutiny and deliberation intended to reflect the values and laws of the land. When the Supreme Court renders a verdict, it does so as the ultimate interpreter of the Constitution. To disregard or delay the implementation of such verdicts is to challenge the very framework of our legal system. The compliance with judicial decisions is not a matter of courtesy but a constitutional requirement that safeguards this balance. Non-compliance not only disrupts this delicate equilibrium but also sets a dangerous precedent that could lead to executive overreach.

Additionally, the implementation of these orders is crucial for maintaining public confidence in the judicial system. Courts are seen as the defenders of rights, the arbiters of disputes, and the interpreters of laws. If their decisions can be easily ignored or sidestepped by the individuals or entities, it undermines public trust in the efficacy of the judiciary and, by extension, the entire government. This erosion of trust can lead to a lack of faith in the processes that govern citizens' lives and, ultimately, in the democratic system itself. The importance of implementing these orders cannot be overstated, and it is imperative that the institutions recognize that it has no other choice but to comply.

----S. 3---Constitution of Pakistan, Arts. 184, 185, 187, 188 & 204---Non-implementation of orders and decisions of the Supreme Court by individuals, institutions and entities---Purpose of law of contempt of court in context of implementing Court judgments stated.

The law of contempt is a critical tool to enforce court orders, ensuring that the judiciary is respected and that its decisions are not taken lightly. The power to hold individuals or entities in contempt for failing to comply with a Court order is fundamental to the judiciary's ability to function effectively. Without this power, the judiciary would be rendered toothless, unable to enforce its decisions, thereby jeopardizing the administration of justice. The individuals or entities have no other choice but to implement the judgment of the Court, for in doing so, it upholds the Constitution, strengthens democracy, and preserves the public's trust in justice and the rule of law.

ORDER

Our Order dated 01.07.2024 records that the President, National Bank of Pakistan (NBP), who appeared before this Court, acknowledged that 11,000 pensioners or more have to be paid pension in pursuance to the judgment of this Court dated 25.09.2017. It is submitted by the learned counsel for NBP that 764 pensioners have been paid and the payment to the rest of the pensioners is underway.

2. Today, we have noticed that while processing cases of the pensioners for payment of their pension as per the judgment of this Court certain factual verification of some of the pensioners is required. We don't want this Court to be burdened with this exercise, which is primarily the function of NBP. In order to streamline the process, let the President, National Bank of Pakistan depute a Senior Officer of NBP as a focal person to ensure the implementation of the judgment of this Court dated 25.09.2017 in letter and spirit and where required, grant a hearing to the concerned pensioner.

C. Ps. Nos. 42 of 2022 and 25 of 2024, decided on 1st July, 2023.

Pakistan Climate Change Act (X of 2017)---

----Ss. 5 & 8---National Disaster Management Act (XXIV of 2010), Ss. 9 & 16---Constitution of Pakistan, Art. 184(3)---Climate change---Lack of a clear policy/strategy and action plan to deal with climate change---Special budget for climate change---Observations and directions recorded by the Supreme Court regarding importance of implementing a climate change policy and allocating a special budget for climate change stated.

Climate change was a serious existential threat to the people of Pakistan and directly affected the fundamental rights, still the recent provincial budgets had not allocated any Climate Fund for climate change or come up with any effective strategies. This became doubly worrying as Monsoon rains were round the corner and the country had still not recovered from the devastating floods of the year 2022.

Nothing concrete was placed before the Supreme Court to show if the Ministry of Climate Change had any climate change policy in place and if any effective steps had been taken in order to address the challenges of climate change. It was mentioned thatNational Disaster Management Authority (NDMA) and Provincial Disaster Management Authority (PDMA)were looking into the matter, however NDMA and PDMA were disaster management institutions, while the Ministry of Climate Change had to come up with preventive policies addressing the challenges of climate change head-on. It appeared that no such policy was in place and no action on the ground had been taken. Supreme Court provided opportunity to the Secretary Climate Change to place the relevant policy on the record and apprise the Supreme Court on the next date as to what were the key challenges of climate change and what strategies and plans had been put in place by the Ministry and what action had so far been taken.

Submissions made by the Chief Secretaries of Punjab, Sindh, KPK and Balochistan were not satisfactory. No material steps had been taken by the said Provinces to deal with the challenges of climate change as there was no clear strategy(ies), action plans or any adequate steps taken on the ground. The Chief Secretaries undertook that they would submit relevant strategy/action plans to deal with the issue of climate change in their respective Provinces before the next date. Supreme Court directed that the said strategies shall clearly identify the threats/challenges of climate change in their respective Provinces and steps taken to address the said challenges.

All the Chief Secretaries were asked whether a special budget had been allocated for climate change in the recent provincial budgets, their reply to said question was in the negative, however, as far as, Punjab was concerned, it had been pointed out that a loan of $ 50 million through Asian Development Bank had been obtained and parked as Climate Change Fund, however, no document in this regard had been placed on the record.

Supreme Court directed that all the Chief Secretaries, as well as Coordinator to the Prime Minister on Climate Change, Ministry of Climate Change and Secretary Climate Change, and, all the concerned officers shall appear before the Court on the next date of hearing and apprise the Court of their strategies and steps taken.

Date of hearing: 1st July, 2024.

ORDER

Ms. Roomina Khursheed Alam, Coordinator to the Prime Minister on Climate Change, Ministry of Climate Change and Secretary Climate Change have tendered appearance along with Additional Attorney General and submit that five posts for Members of the Authority established under Section 5 of the Pakistan Climate Change Act, 2017 ("Act") have been advertised and as a result 752 applications have been received, which are under process and soon the said five posts will be filled. Let the said exercise be completed within a fortnight from today without fail. The Notification of a duly constituted Authority be placed on the record on or before the next date of hearing.

2. When inquired, if the Ministry of Climate Change has any climate change policy in place and the effective steps taken in order to address the challenges of climate change, nothing concrete was placed before us. It was mentioned that NDMA and PDMA are looking into the matter. Our understanding is that NDMA and PDMA are disaster management institutions, while the Ministry of Climate Change has to come up with preventive policies addressing the challenges of climate change head-on. It appears that no such policy is in place and no action on the ground has been taken. Still we provide opportunity to the Secretary Climate Change to place the relevant policy on the record and apprise the Court on the next date as to what are the key challenges of climate change and what strategies and plans have been put in place by the Ministry and what action has so far been taken.

3. We have also heard the Chief Secretaries of Punjab, Sindh, KPK and Balochistan. We are not satisfied with their submissions and notice with concern that no material steps have been taken by the said Provinces to deal with the challenges of climate change as there is no clear strategy(ies), action plans or any adequate steps taken on the ground. The Chief Secretaries undertake that they will submit relevant strategy/action plans to deal with the issue of climate change in their respective Provinces before the next date. Let the said strategies clearly identifying the threats/ challenges of climate change in their respective Provinces and steps taken to address the said challenges.

4. All the Chief Secretaries were asked whether the special budget has been allocated for the climate change in the recent provincial budgets, their reply to this question was in the negative, however, as far as, Punjab is concerned, it has been pointed out that a loan of $ 50 million through Asian Development Bank has been obtained and parked as Climate Change Fund, however, no document in this regard has been placed on the record.

5. It is observed that climate change is a serious existential threat to the people of Pakistan and directly affects the fundamental rights, still the recent provincial budgets have not allocated any Climate Fund for climate change or come up with any effective strategies. This becomes doubly worrying as Monsoon rains are round the corner and the country has still not recovered from the devastating floods of the year 2022.

6. All the Chief Secretaries, as well as, Ms. Roomina Khursheed Alam, Coordinator to the Prime Minister on Climate Change, Ministry of Climate Change and Secretary Climate Change, and, all the concerned officers will appear before the Court on the next date of hearing and apprise the Court of their strategies and steps taken. To come up on 15.07.2024. Ms Ayesha Khan, Regional Managing Director Acumen, 609, 6th Floor, ISE Tower, F-7/1 Blue Area, Islamabad is also appointed as amicus curiae to assist the Court on the aforesaid date. Office will inform amici curiae to be present on the next date of hearing.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---The instant Constitution Petition No.4/2021 was filed under Article 184(3) of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution"), challenging the vires of Rule 2(c) and Schedule-IV of the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Power Crushers (Installation, Operation and Regulations) Rules, 2020 ("Rules") to the extent they are ultra vires Sections 7 and 19 of the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Power Crushers (Installation, Operation and Regulations) Act, 2020 ("Act") as well as the fundamental rights i.e., Articles 9, 23, 24, and 25 of the Constitution. During the course of hearing of this case in 2021, it was discovered that the core issue behind the challenge to the vires of the Rules is the air pollution in the area due to the unlawful operations of stone power crushers[1] in the village Suraj Galli, Tehsil Khanpur, District Haripur. Therefore, the environmental degradation through air pollution is at the heart of this case and forms the context for challenging the vires of the said Rules. It is for this reason that vide Order dated 15.06.2021, the Report prepared by Hagler Baily Pakistan ("HBP") as a local commission (in C.A. 844-846/2020, a connected matter) was directed to be put up in this case which is before us today as C.M.A. 4707/2020. It is pointed out that the power crushers installed in the said village are causing air pollution in the area which raises serious threat to human life and health. The Report of the HBP after inspecting the area formulated the following conclusions: "Regulatory Compliance: High PM concentrations resulting from mining and crushing activities were measured at all the monitoring locations. The measured PM concentrations were not in compliance with the NEQS (24-hour) limits. Long term exposure to such high concentrations of $PM_{10}$ can cause several health effects ranging from coughing, asthma to high blood pressure, cardiac diseases among the residents as well as the staff of the stone crushing plants. $PM_{10}$ is also known to affect animals by causing various respiratory problems and creating additional stress." (See Schedule A to this Order for details).

2. Vide Order dated 15.12.2021, the Court again called for a fresh Report on the compliance of the National Environmental Quality Standards ("NEQS") by the power crushers from HBP as technical counsel with the mandate to carry out site inspection of the stone crushing plants set up in village Suraj Galli and prepare a fresh Report specifically on the presence of particulate matter ($PM_{10}$) in the air. HBP submitted the Draft Report on 04.4.2022 (C.M.A No.2323/2022). The conclusions drawn by in the Draft Report read as follows:- "The measured PM concentrations were above the 24-hours limit prescribed in the NEQS at all six monitoring locations. Long-term exposure to such high concentrations of PM can cause several health effects ranging from mild coughing to asthma to high blood pressure to cardiac diseases among the residents and the workers of the stone-crushing plants." (See Schedule B of the Order for details).

3. Thereafter, not satisfied with the performance of the power crushers and in order to delve deeper into the issue of environmental degradation in the area, this Court vide Order dated 25.4.2022, was pleased to form a Power Crushers Commission ("Commission") under the chairmanship of Dr. Pervez Hassan. (See Schedule C of this Order for details). The Commission submitted its Final Report (C.M.A 6741/ 2024) on 06.07.2024, when the Chair of the Commission highlighted its final recommendations and conclusions as follows: "The Plants have not met, among others, the NEQS set out in Section 14. The Plants do not comply with the "existing" 300 metre safe distance applicable in the KPK which is borne out in the Report dated 10 August 2020 of Hagler Bailly Pakistan (Annexure A-1) and recorded in the Supreme Court Order dated 15 December 2021. The Plants do not comply with the "existing" NEQS, however unsatisfactory they may be. For the interim, as the Crush Plants at Suraj Gali are non-compliant with the legal and regulatory framework as on 28 May 2024 (the cut-off date of the Commission), the Supreme Court may consider closing them in the public interest and, subject to the other recommendations of the Commission such as the establishment of Crushing Zones, allow their opening on any of them establishing compliance with a neutral third party appointed by the Supreme Court."(See Schedule D of this Order for details).

4. The Final Report concludes that the three power crushers operating in the area in question are alarmingly violating the NEQS, as well as, the requirement of distance from the local community under the Rules. According to the Report, the $PM_{2.5}$ and $PM_{10}$ levels are much higher than the standards given in the NEQS which result in serious chronic and lifelong diseases for the local inhabitants. The air pollution generated by the power crushers carries calcium carbonate which has adverse effects for human health such as damaging the respiratory tract.[2] It is now well accepted and acknowledged that air pollution affects not just humans but a wide array of environmental and ecological components; (i) Wildlife: Air pollutants can directly harm animals by causing health problems such as respiratory issues, heart disease, and even cancer. Animals can also be affected indirectly through changes in their habitat and the availability of food and water. (ii) Plants and Forests: Toxic pollutants in the air can damage the leaves of plants and trees, hinder their growth, and reduce their ability to photosynthesize, which is vital for their survival and growth. This not only affects the plants themselves but also the entire ecosystem that depends on them. (iii) Water Bodies: Air pollution contributes to acid rain, which forms when pollutants from the air are deposited in water bodies, and on vegetation and soils. This can lead to drastic changes in the pH level of waterways, adversely affecting aquatic life and water quality. (iv) Soil Quality: Deposits of pollutants like heavy metals in the soil can alter its composition and health, affecting plant growth and the organisms that depend on the soil, potentially disrupting entire terrestrial ecosystems. (v) Climate Change: Some air pollutants, particularly greenhouse gases like carbon dioxide and methane, contribute to global warming. Others, like sulfur dioxide, can create aerosols that reflect sunlight, affecting atmospheric temperatures and weather patterns. (vi) Visibility and Aesthetic Damage: Pollution can cause smog and haze, which reduce visibility. This not only affects the aesthetic enjoyment of natural landscapes but can also have economic implications for industries like tourism and real estate. (vii) Biodiversity: The cumulative impact of these effects can lead to reduced biodiversity as species that cannot adapt to the altered conditions die out or move to other areas. The interplay between air pollution and the environment is complex, influencing various natural cycles and life forms, and can lead to long-term ecological imbalances.[3]

5. Air pollution causes an estimated one in every nine deaths worldwide, making it the greatest environmental threat to human health. According to the World Health Organization ("WHO"), air pollution is responsible for an estimated seven million premature deaths worldwide every year.[4] Almost all air breathed by humans exceeds the WHO Guidelines limits. It is pertinent to mention here that no other location on the planet illustrates the stubborn nature of air pollution challenge more than South Asia, where pollution continued its upward trend in 2021. Bangladesh, India, Nepal and Pakistan - where 22.9 percent of the global population lives - are the top four most polluted countries in the world.[5] As per the World Air Quality Report (2023), Pakistan is the second most polluted country in the world with an annual average $PM_{2.5}$ concentration 14 times above the WHO guidelines, leading to a loss in life expectancy of 4.4 years.[6] The most serious issue of air quality in Pakistan is the presence of excessive suspended PM present in the air. The PM is not a single pollutant, but rather is a complex mixture of solids and aerosols composed of small droplets of liquid, dry solid fragments, and solid cores with liquid coatings.[7] These particles vary widely in size, shape and chemical composition and are defined by their diameter for air quality regulatory purposes. Those with a diameter of 10 microns or less $PM_{10}$ are inhalable into the lungs and can induce adverse health effects.[8] Fine PM is defined as particles that are 2.5 microns or less in diameter $PM_{2.5}$. A number of adverse health effects have been associated with both $PM_{2.5}$ and $PM_{10}$ including the worsening of respiratory diseases such as asthma, lung cancer and premature deaths in extreme circumstances. It is noted that the triple-planetary crisis, which comprises of interrelated urgent crisis of climate change, biodiversity loss, and widespread pollution must entrench environmental concerns as supreme constitutional norms.[9] This strand of demand often coined as "environmental constitutionalism" is a relatively recent phenomenon at the confluence of constitutional law, international law, human rights and environmental law and embodies the recognition that the environment is a proper subject for protection in constitutional texts and for vindication by constitutional courts worldwide.[10] By acting as a method of constitutionally entrenching environmental law and protection at a more enduring or "higher" consti-tutional level, environmental constitutionalism entails a transformative approach that relies on constitutions to provide for the architecture of environmental governance, whereupon it then acts to improve environmental protection through various constitutional features such as fundamental rights, recognized principles of environmental governance and the rule of law.[11]

6. Over the years, Pakistan's superior courts have expanded the scope of fundamental rights and judicially interpreted the text of the constitutional fundamental right to life (Article 9) which has been popularly dubbed as right to a clean and healthy environment.[12] Subsequently, the courts have also recognized the right to dignity (Article 14) in Imrana Tiwana[13] and Asghar Leghari[14] that the protection of environment also emerges from the right to dignity which is inviolable and such protection is an inalienable right and perhaps more fundamental than the other rights. It is in this context that right to life and dignity when read with constitutional principles of democracy, equality, social, economic and political justice include within their ambit and commitment, the international environmental principles of sustainable development, precautionary principle, environmental impact assessment, inter and intra-generational equity and public trust doctrine. This protection to environment is also accorded in other international legal instruments[15], which Pakistan has ratified, including the most recent United Nations

General Assembly Resolution[16] which recognized that everyone, everywhere, has the right to a clean and healthy environment.

7. Environmental constitutionalism as a concept also finds its ideological roots within Islamic environmentalism as environment and climate change have a strong linkage with our religion.[17] Approaching environmental constitutionalism through the lens of religion and spirituality can indeed be a powerful tool. Seyyed Hossein Nasr[18] criticizes the modern secular worldview for what he perceives as a harmful attitude towards nature. He believes that the current ecological crisis is a spiritual problem rooted in the forgetfulness of the sacred nature of the world. He argues that modernity has led to an exploitative and instrumentalist view of nature, contributing to environmental degradation.[19] Islam can provide a comprehensive and integrated approach to environmental issues, encompassing ethical, social, economic and political dimensions. This foundation, inter alia, includes; (i) Tawhid (Unity of God): The Quranic concept of Tawhid underscores the idea that all things come from one creator. This perspective encourages a holistic approach to the environment, viewing the Earth and all its inhabitants as interconnected and interdependent, (ii) Stewardship (Khalifa): The Holy Quran emphasizes that humans are stewards (khalifas) of the Earth. This concept promotes responsible management of the Earth's resources, (iii) Balance (Meezan): The Holy Quran speaks about balance (Meezan) in creation and warns against upsetting this balance. Climate change, which is driven by human activities, is disrupting the Earth's natural balance, (iv) Avoiding Waste (Israaf): Islam discourages wastefulness (Israaf). The current patterns of consumption and waste, especially in more developed countries, are contributing significantly to greenhouse gas emissions and climate change, (v) Justice (Adl); climate change is also a matter of justice, as it disproportionately affects the poor and vulnerable - people who often have contributed least to the problem and (vi) Hima (Protected Areas): The Islamic principle of Hima refers to a system of community-based management of resources, where certain areas are set aside for the conservation of natural resources, wildlife, and biodiversity.

8. At this juncture, it is important to underscore that environmental crisis pervades our lives. An overwhelming scientific consensus warns us that human-induced climate change is leading to rising sea levels, extreme weather events, and public health disasters.[20] Despite over thirty years of international agreements, global carbon dioxide emissions rose 70% between 1990 and 2020.[21] Biodiversity is collapsing at an unprecedented rate; one million animal and plant species face complete destruction within decades, because of human activities. Notwithstanding extensive domestic regulation, global standards of air, land and water pollution remain stubbornly high. It is in this perspective of environmental constitutionalism and Islamic environmentalism that we approach the current issue.

9. After hearing the chair of the Commission, the case was fixed today to provide an opportunity of hearing to the power crushers to explain whether they raise any objection on the said Report of the Commission or actual compliance as far as the environmental threats are concerned. We have heard Ch. Aitzaz Ahsan, learned

Sr. ASC and Ms. Zunaira Fayyaz, Advocate. At the very outset, they do not allege any mala fide to the Commission. However, they submitted that the respondents are fully complying with the NEQS, yet they could not refer to even a single document showing their compliance with the same. Learned counsel submits that one of the respondents has invested Rs. 150 Million and purchased equipment that curtail environmental pollution, however, no evidence has been placed on the record to substantiate this submission. He stated that the local villagers are adding to the pollution by burning various substances, to which Waqar Zakariya (HBP), member of the Commission pointed out that the readings of $PM_{10}$ and $PM_{2.5}$ were taken round the clock, therefore, this intermittent burning does not affect the overall reading.

10. The submissions of the learned counsel for the respondent power crushers are not satisfactory and the findings of the Report have gone unrebutted, in particular, the violation of the NEQS. Learned Advocate General, KPK supported the Report of the Commission and also urged the Court to shut down these plants unless they comply with the NEQS. In order to protect the human life and health of the residents of the area, who have been subjected to these plants for a number of years, we direct the Environmental Protection Agency, KPK ("EPA") to shut down and seal the operations of these stone crushing plants immediately. The respondent owners of the said plants can be allowed to re-operationalize their plants provided they make an appropriate application to this Court satisfying the Court that they now comply with the requirements of the NEQS, which the Court, after verifying this fact through a technical expert may allow. The local Police shall render full assistance to EPA to carry out the Order of this Court in shutting down the stone crushing plants immediately. A copy of this Order shall also be dispatched to the Inspector General Police, KPK for immediate compliance. The Advocate General, KPK shall submit a compliance report to this Court within a week thereof.

11. We also note that the NEQS were passed in 1993 and last updated in the year 2010 and the Federal and Provincial Governments have made no efforts to update the said standards. It is crucial to highlight that by limiting both the quality and quantity of anthropogenic pollutants in the environment, the NEQS serve as crucial frame-works which facilitate the transition towards a sustainable future. These standards do not only ensure the preservation of ecosystems and protection of public health through preventive measures but also play a significant role in fostering climate resilient development mechanisms by encouraging sustainable production processes in industries. Therefore, the Federal Government as well as the Provincial Governments are directed to update the NEQS within a period of three months from today and submit their updated/revised NEQS before this Court.

12. It is also pointed out that there are 900 other stone crushing plants operating in the province of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa. Let the Provincial EPA carry out detailed report regarding their environmental compliance and safe distance and submit their detailed report in this regard to this Court before the next date of hearing. In case the EPA finds that the said plants do not meet the NEQS or the safe distance requirement under the Rules, the EPA is free to take action against the said plants in accordance with the law.

&&13. Let these matters be relisted in the first week of November for the report of the Provincial Governments regarding the updating/ revision of the NEQS as well as the report on the environmental status of the 900 stone crushing plants. Copy of this Order be dispatched to all the Chief Secretaries of the four provinces and the Chief Commissioner, ICT for compliance regarding updating/ revision of the NEQS.

Schedule-A Excerpts from the Study on Environmental and Social Assessment of Mining and Crushing Activities in District Haripur, KP 6.1 Regulatory Compliance HKG and Niazi Crush Plants are operating without an Environmental Approval for operations from the KP EPA. Extensive deposition of dust was observed on trees, crops, the floor and furniture in houses in the Study Area. This indicates that the mitigation measures adopted by Plant owners until the time when monitoring was carried out as a part of this study are insufficient to control the dust emissions in the area and are therefore, non-compliant to conditions of the Environmental Approval for construction from KP EPA. High PM concentrations resulting from mining and crushing activities were measured at all the monitoring locations. The measured PM concentrations were not in compliance with the NEQS (24-hour) limits. Long term exposure to such high concentrations of $PM_{10}$ can cause several health effects ranging from coughing, asthma to high blood pressure, cardiac diseases among the residents as well as the staff of the stone crushing plants. PM10 is also known to affect animals by causing various respiratory problems and creating additional stress. The settling of limestone dust over a long period results in changes to soil composition and pH, which may affect agricultural output. High noise levels exceeding the NEQS especially the nighttime limits were measured. Although most of the measured noise levels were under 60 dBA, however, long term exposures to such noise levels may cause headaches, sleeplessness, high blood pressure, and multiple other health issues among the nearby residents and especially among the staff of the stone crushing plants. High noise levels are also associated with hearing loss and increased stress in animals which results in altered mating behaviors. 6.2 Distance to Safeguard Health, Safety and Life of Residents Blasting vibrations are not expected to result in long-term damage to structures at 300 m or beyond (see Section 5.1 for detailed assessment). A safe distance of 378 m should be considered (keeping in mind the potential impact of flyrocks) to ensure the safety of the local community residents and residential structures (see Section 5.2) for the assessment and Section 5.3 for the justification used to obtain this number). Increasing the safe distance should not be considered the only solution to ensure safety of the nearby residents and appropriate mitigation measures to reduce flyrock distance and mitigate flyrock generation should be undertaken (see Section 5.2 for possible mitigation measures.

Schedule B Excerpts from the Draft Report on Particulate Matter Sampling: Stone Crushing Plants, Khanpur The key conclusions that have been made under this Study include the following: • $PM_{10}$ concentrations at all the sampling locations substantially exceeded the limits prescribed in the NEQS. • Extensive deposition of dust was observed on trees, and crops in the Study Area (Exhibit 2.8). This indicates that the mitigation measures adopted by Plant owners until the time when sampling was carried out as a part of this Study are insufficient to control the dust emissions in the area. • The measured PM concentrations were above the 24-hours limit prescribed in the NEQS at all six monitoring locations. Long-term exposure to such high concentrations of PM can cause several health effects ranging from mild coughing to asthma to high blood pressure to cardiac diseases among the residents and the workers of the stone-crushing plants. $PM_{10}$ is also known to affect animals by causing various respiratory problems and creating additional stress. The implementation of appropriate dust control measures is essential to keep the emissions of particulate matter within the limit.

Schedule C CONSTITUTION OF POWER CRUSHERS COMMISSION 1. Dr. Pervez Hassan Chairman 2. Representative of Hagler Bailly Pakistan Member 3. Representative of WWF Member 4. Director, Mineral and Mines, Government of KP Member 5. Director, EPA, Government of KPK Member 6. Representatives of Stone Crushers Member 7. Ahmad Rafay Alam, Environmental Lawyer, Lahore Member 8. Zofeen T Ibrahim, Freelance Journalist. Member Terms of Reference: a) What is the safe distance for installation and operation of power crushers from human dwellings? b) What safety measures must be taken/installed by power crushers for blasting and stone crushing at site at all times? c) What National Environmental Quality Standards (NEQS) must be maintained by stone crushers to safeguard public health? d) What short term and long-term measures to be adopted by crushers in order to be EPA compliant? e) What measures or steps ought to be taken to continuously or regularly monitor the crushing and mining activities of power crushers to be EPA compliant? f) What measures to be taken by power crushers so as to convert from conventional quarrying to safe and smart quarrying which avoids flying rock and dust? g) What time frame to be fixed for to make their units EPA complaint? h) Recommend specification for cost-effective monitoring equipment with real-time monitoring of wind speed, wind direction, and dust emissions (specifically PM10) generated from operations of stone crushers and blasting activities. i) Draft guidelines to assist the power crushers to achieve effective management and operation of monitoring equipment with due consideration to existing technical capacity and costs. j) Develop a framework that can be used by the regulators to assess the environmental and social performance of stone crushers throughout the province and to share the information with the communities that may be at risk. k) Assess performance of stone crushing plants that have installed and operated equipment to control dust emissions and where applicable provide recommendations that the owners of crush plants may consider to further improve their environmental performance. l) Develop an action plan that considers a phased approach including appropriate safe distance (buffer zone) that will allow stone crushers to transition towards compliance with applicable legal laws in an appropriate time frame and eventually achieve internationally established benchmarks through continual improvement. m) Has the Government of KPK recently established a dedicated crushing zone in Khanpur, a few kilometers away from Suraj Gali; whether it is viable solution to shift/transfer the stone crushers to that zone. n) Any other issue as may be deemed appropriate or relevant to the above TORs or subject matter of crushing and environment.

Schedule D Excerpts from the Report of the Power Crushers Commission Conclusions of the Commission The Commission concludes that, as at 28 May 2024, the cut-off date determined by the Commission, the Suraj Gali Plants were not fully compliant with the existing applicable legal and regulatory regimes. This conclusion emerges from the following considerations: (1) The TOR of the Supreme Court required an assessment of the EPA compliance of the Plants; this meant the entire regulatory framework including "safe distance" and the "NEQS" (applicable to KPK) (2) importantly, the reference to compliance is to the "existing" regulatory framework, irrespective of its inadequacies. The Plants have not met, among others, the NEQS set out in Section 14. (3) it is acknowledged and recorded that the Plants do not comply with the "existing" 300 metre safe distance applicable in the KPK. That the Plants do not meet the applicable safe distance of 300 metres is borne out in the Report dated 10 August 2020 of Hagler Bailly Pakistan (Annexure A-1) and recorded in the Supreme Court Order dated 15 December 2021. (4) the Plants do not comply with the "existing" NEQS, however unsatisfactory they may be. There is a good case for a rationalization of the NEOS; the Commission can include that in its recommendations, which it has done, but it cannot base its recommendations on the NEOS as "they should be". The Commission commends the efforts and investments by the Plant Owners toward compliance with the support and guidance of the Commission but they could not accomplish satisfactory and full compliance leaving the villagers defenseless against pollution, noise, health hazards, environmental and eco-system degradation and with a continuing risk to the qualities of their lives protected particularly by Articles 9 and 14 of the Constitution. Recommendations of the Commission (1) Adopt, at the national level, a safe distance of 500 metres (Discussion in Section 13(2)(a)). (2) KPK to develop a plan for Crushing Zones and to shift all crushing plants including the Suraj Gali Plants to such zones within a maximum transition period of 3 years. The Commission recommends that the KP Government develop a holistic policy and plan for establishing zone(s) for mining and stone crushing plants. To support the development of policy and plan, the stone crushing plants should develop and submit a comprehensive report to the Industries Department that details: • Project information including maps that identify nearby communities, quantity of equipment in place, operating capacity and schedules, and transportation routes. • The daily production volumes and output, revenue numbers and operating costs. • In the event of relocation, a minimum cost of relocation, number of closure days and the number of employees that will be retained. • The mitigation and monitoring measures in place by the crush plant in-line with the requirements of their respective IEEs/EIAs and conditions included in the NOC issued by the KP EPA. The report will be submitted by the industries to the KP Industries Department and the KP EPA. The information will allow the KP Industries Department to make an informed decision on which crush plants can be relocated to dedicated crushing zones based on their environmental performance and opportunity costs involved in relocation to ensure that a sustainable approach that considers both the environment and industrial needs of the province is adopted. In the Balochistan Environmental Protection Act, there is space for District Environmental Protection Agency, there is no such provision in KP Environmental Protection Agency. It is suggested that the KP Environmental Protection Agency may be enabled legally to work closely with the Mining Authority under KP Mines and Mineral Act. The Local Government is empowered to notify land zoning where it would be important that land zoning for purposes of mining and crushing of stones should be in consultation with the Mining Authority and Environmental Protection Agency. (3) to amend and rationalize NEOS to incorporate recent technology and best practices. (4) KPK to resource and develop the capacity of its regulatory agencies to better enforce and implement the laws and regulations. (5) KPK to require crush plants to install effective monitoring equipment for ensuring compliance. (6) KPK to enforce a closure period for all crush plants during winter months notwithstanding compliance to NEOS and safe distance. (7) KPK to establish grievance redressal mechanisms including local governments to assist the affected workers, villagers and the adjoining areas, as per Annexure F-2. (8) KPK to ban the use of old and obsolete equipment for crush plants and require equipment and processes that are environment and people-friendly. (9) A Phased-Out Action Plan that sets out phased approach for compliance with law. (10) Short and long-term Measures for Legal Compliance: The Industries Department have defined the criteria and classified integrated mining and crushing operations respectively as Large, Medium, or Small. In some cases, the mining activity is separate from the crushing. These classifications and guidelines apply to both independent mining and integrated mining and crushing operations. The Commission recommends a phased approach segregated in three phases as provided below: Period Time Span Measures to be Followed by Crush Plants Short Within 1 year All crush plants designated as 'Large' will: Observe safe distances. Report daily production quantities to the KP Industries Department monthly. Carry out air quality monitoring against NEQS parameters as recommended and report to KP EPA on monthly basis. Adopt all mitigation measures adopted or planned to be adopted by the HKG facility inclusive of mining and crushing. Develop a Grievance Redress Mechanism (GRM) and implement it with involvement of all stakeholders. A framework is provided in Annexure F-2. Upgrade the EMP as included in the approved IEE or EIA of the facility in view of the recommendations of the Commission and submit it to the KP-EPA for review and approval. Where an EMP is not available, conduct an audit of the facility by engaging an independent consultant and prepare an EMP as advised by KP EPA. Cease operations between November and mid-February unless based on monitoring data the KP EPA determines that the facility has sufficient mitigations in place to safeguard the health and safety of communities. Medium Within 2 years All recommendations of the Commission for units designated as Large will also be applied on crush plants designated as Medium. Long Within 3 years All recommendations of the Commission for crush plants designated as Large will also be applied on crush plants designated as Small. In the meantime, no new licenses will be issued to any category of mining and crushing operations that do not obtain an environmental approval from KP EPA and do not comply with the recommendations of the Commission. (11) Specific Measures for Prevention of fly rock, noise, wastewater, and air emissions. Noise and wastewater are included in these mitigations in consideration of the grievances reported by the local community on these aspects. (a) Air Emissions • Dust collection systems: Use of dust collection systems such as baghouse filters as implemented by HKG. • Water Sprays: Use of water sprays to moisten materials and roadways to settle dust particles. • Enclosures and Sealing: Enclosure of conveyor systems and other equipment prevent dust from escaping. • Dust Suppressants: Addition of chemicals such as magnesium chloride or calcium chloride during the crushing can bind dust particles and reduce their airborne movement. • Vegetative Barriers: Strategic planting of trees and shrubs can act as natural barriers to dust. Measures employed by the HKG crush plant such as dust collection systems, closures around jaw crushers and water sprinkling systems can significantly reduce PM and dust related emissions. Section Error! Reference source not found. identifies the measures implemented by HKG. (b) Flyrock • Blasting Techniques: Precise drilling, accurate timing, and sequencing of blasts can reduce flyrock travel distance. Techniques such as pre-splitting can also help control the direction and limit the extent of flyrock. • Blast Mats or Covering Material: Use of blast mats or other durable covering materials over the blast area can significantly reduce the risk of flyrock by absorbing and containing the energy of the blast. • Protective Barriers: Constructing earthen berms or other types of barriers around the blasting site can physically block and contain flyrock, directing it back to the ground. • Charge and Firing Pattern Adjustment: Modifying the amount of explosive charge and changing the firing pattern can help control the force and direction of the blast, thereby reducing the risk of flyrock. (c) Noise • Acoustic Barriers: Erecting barriers or walls to block sound waves from machinery can mitigate noise impacts. • Equipment Modification: Using quieter machinery or retrofitting existing equipment with noise-dampening materials. • Operational Timing: Limiting the hours of operation, especially during early morning or late evening, to minimize noise impact on surrounding communities. • Distance: Placing noisy equipment as far as possible from community areas. (d) Wastewater Primary treatment: Suspended solids can be removed from effluent via simple gravity settling before discharge into drainage systems. The addition of inexpensive flocculants such as lime and alum facilitate effective settling and removal of suspended solids in addition to also allowing for the settling and removal of dissolved solids. • Reuse and recycling: The silt-containing runoff can be collected in stormwater collection system and reused for vehicle washing and in sanitary facilities. The KP EPA as part of its review and prior issuance of a No-ObjectionCertification will ensure that the crush plant owners submitting an EIA or IEE have included the above-mentioned mitigation measures in the documents and have included the relevant mechanisms to ensure implementation within the environmental monitoring and mitigation plans. Recommendations for Interim Orders of the Supreme Court The Court in its order of 25 April 2022 directs that: It is also underlined that only three power crushers are before us, and we have been informed that there are 950 power crushers operating in KPK. Any sustainable solution proposed by the Commission and eventually approved by this Court can go a long way in resolving this issue for the entire Province (paragraph 5). (1) The Commission recommends that the concerned government departments that have a mandate to regulate the power crusher industry should be directed to formulate policies, plans, and procedures to extend the implementation to the entire Province. Both the actions should be time bound as suggested by the Commission in this Report. For the interim, as the Crush Plants at Suraj Gali are non-compliant with the legal and regulatory framework as at 28 May 2024 (the cut-off date of the Commission), the Supreme Court may consider closing them in the public interest and, subject to the other recommendations of the Commission such as the establishment of Crushing Zones, allow their opening on any of them establishing compliance with a neutral third party appointed by the Supreme Court It is added that the Plant Owners particularly the Niazi Plant kept sending the Commission its progress reports after the cut-off date of 28 May 2024 which the Commission could not assess and leaves for the evaluation of the neutral third party requested to be appointed by the Supreme Court in case the Niazi Plant or any other Plant petitions the Supreme Court for the opening of the Plant. (a) Constitution of Pakistan---

----Arts. 12 & 142---Legislative powers of Parliament and Provincial Assemblies---Laws with retrospective effect---Apart from the specified exception under Article 12 of the Constitution, Parliament and Provincial Assemblies cannot enact criminal laws with retrospective effect; however, there is no restriction on their legislative powers to enact civil laws with retrospective effect---Nonetheless, neither prospective nor retrospective laws can be enacted to take away or abridge any of the fundamental rights guaranteed by Articles 9 to 28 of the Constitution or in contravention of any other provision of the Constitution---Constitution's prohibitions and requirements apply equally to both prospective and retrospective laws.

State of Gujarat v. Raman Lal (1983) 2 SCC 33 ref.

(b) Constitution of Pakistan---

----Art. 142---Legislative power to enact civil laws with retrospective effect---Principles---Legislature's power to legislate includes the power to legislate with retrospective effect---Legislature that is competent to make a law on a particular subject also has the power to legislate such a law with retrospective effect and can, by legislative fiat, even take away vested rights or affect past and closed transactions---Therefore, when a legislature gives retrospective effect to a law, either by express provision or by necessary implication, no protection can be afforded to vested rights contrary to that law---Similarly, when a legislature enacts a law with retrospective effect, the person affected cannot plead the imposition of a previously non-existent civil obligation as a ground for declaring the law invalid---Constitution only bars retrospective legislation concerning criminal liabilities, not civil rights and obligations---There is no such rule that even if a legislature has sought to take away a vested right, the courts must hold that such legislation is ineffective or strike down the legislation on the ground that it has retrospectively taken away a vested right---Law cannot be declared ineffective or struck down on the ground that it has taken away a vested right, nor can any protection be offered to vested rights contrary to it.

(c) Interpretation of statutes---

----Laws having retrospective effect---Principles for interpreting laws that have or appear to have retrospective effect stated.

When a law regulating certain affairs is introduced for the first time, it is presumed to apply to future affairs, not to alter the character of past transactions made under the law as it then existed. This principle is encapsulated in the maxim lex prospicit non respicit-the law looks forward, not backward. A retrospective law is an exception to this general principle; therefore, courts approach the interpretation of laws with a presumption in favour of the general principle that laws are intended to regulate future affairs, not to affect past transactions. Exceptions of retrospective effect are interpreted strictly, as are other exceptions to general principles. This presumption is rooted in the rule of fairness, as altering accrued rights and obligations retrospectively is often considered unfair. Since the legislature is not expected to act in an unfair manner, it becomes essential to closely scrutinize a law that appears to have such an effect, ensuring that this was indeed the legislature's intent. Thus, the legislature is presumed not to have intended to alter the law applicable to accrued rights and obligations or past events and transactions unless a clear contrary intention is expressed. The strength of this presumption varies with the degree of potential unfairness-the greater the unfairness, the more explicit the legislature's intent must be.

C.I.T. v. Vatika Township (2015) 1 SCC 1 (5MB); L'Office Cherifien v. Yamashita-Shinnihon Steamship Co (1994) 1 AC 486 and Secretary of State v. Tunnicliffe (1991) 2 All ER 712 ref.

Therefore, in our jurisdiction, the established principles for interpreting laws that have or appear to have retrospective effect are as follows. Every statute that relates to substantive rights and obligations should be deemed prospective unless, by express provision or necessary implication, it has been given retrospective effect. Courts must lean against giving a statute retrospective effect that affects vested rights and/or past and closed transactions by adhering to two rules: first, if two interpretations are reasonably possible, the one that saves vested rights and/or past and closed transactions should be adopted; and second, no statute should be construed to have retrospective effect to a greater extent than its language necessarily requires. Although vested rights may be affected and taken away by express provision or necessary implication, past and closed transactions can be disturbed and reopened only by express provision. This is because the greater the unfairness, the more explicit the legislature's intent must be.

----S. 6---Effect of repeal of a law---'Repeal' and 'amendment'---Synonymity---There is no difference in principle between repeal and amendment, as every amendment inherently involves a repeal, where the law in its previous form disappears and a new law takes its place---Whether the legislature states that a particular section will be amended in a certain way or declares that the section is repealed and replaced by a new one, the outcome is fundamentally the same---In its broader scope, the word 'repeal' as used in Section 6 of the General Clauses Act, 1897 includes amendment, as both processes ultimately achieve the same legislative result---While 'repeal' generally refers to the abrogation of an entire law and 'amendment' to changes within a statute, both carry the same effect, making it necessary to treat them similarly---Therefore, Section 6 of the General Clauses Act, 1897 also applies to the amendment of a law.

----Vested right under a law---Scope---Past and closed transaction---Scope---A right vests when all the facts required by law to establish that right have occurred---In other words, when all the facts necessary to create a right have occurred, the right is said to be "vested"---A right remains inchoate and contingent when some, but not all, of the investitive facts have occurred---A "vested right" is, therefore, one that is absolute, complete and unconditional, with no obstacles to its exercise---It is immediate and perfect in itself, not dependent upon any contingency---Vested right are thus free from contingencies, but ordinarily there are always specific occasions and circumstances under which such vested rights may be exercised---A vested right becomes a past and closed transaction when such right is exercised, or deemed to have been exercised by operation of law, at a specific occasion and under specific circumstances---Since such specific occasions and circumstances may vary under different laws, it is determined on the basis of the peculiar facts and legal position of each case whether a vested right has turned into a past and closed transaction.

(f) Income Tax Ordinance (XLIX of 2001)---

----S. 65B (as amended by the Finance Act, 2019)---Constitution of Pakistan, Art. 25---Amendments made to Section 65B of the Income Tax Ordinance, 2001 by the Finance Act, 2019 ("2019 amendments"), vires of---Tax credit---Purchase of plant and machinery for an industrial undertaking set up in Pakistan---Competency of legislature to modify or withdraw the benefit of tax credit through retrospective amendments---Past and closed transaction---Vested right---Scope---For purposes of present case there were two categories of taxpayer companies; the "first category" consisted of those companies who had both purchased and installed the plant and machinery by 30 June 2019, while the "second category" included those who had purchased the plant and machinery by 30 June 2019 but installed it after that date but before 30 June 2021---Provisions of subsection (1) of Section 65B of the Income Tax Ordinance, 2001 are to be read in conjunction with subsection (2)---When so read together, it becomes clear that to avail the benefit of the tax credit under Section 65B, taxpayer companies must fulfill two conditions: first, they have to purchase the plant and machinery; and second, they have to install the purchased plant and machinery in an industrial undertaking set up in Pakistan---Only when both of these conditions are fulfilled does a taxpayer company acquire a vested right to avail the benefit of the tax credit conferred by Section 65B---In the present case the second category of taxpayer companies had purchased the plant and machinery before 1 July 2019, when the 2019 amendments came into force, but had not yet installed it---Therefore, they had fulfilled only one of the two required conditions---As a result, they had not yet acquired any vested right to avail the benefit of the tax credit conferred by Section 65B, thus no question arose as to them being affected by the 2019 amendments---As for the first category of taxpayer companies, they had undoubtedly acquired a vested right to avail the benefit of the tax credit conferred by Section 65B---This was because they had fulfilled both of the required conditions by 1 July 2019, when the 2019 amendments came into force; they had both purchased and installed the plant and machinery by that date---Vested right of a taxpayer company to avail the benefit of the tax credit conferred by Section 65B matured into a past and closed transaction upon the filing of the claim by the taxpayer company, either separately as per the instructions of the Federal Board of Revenue (FBR), if such or similar instructions existed, or along with the income tax returns, as the case may be---In the present case, the second category of taxpayer companies had neither filed the claim separately, as per the FBR instructions, nor filed their income tax returns along with the claim by 1 July 2019, when the 2019 amendments came into force---Therefore, their vested right did not "crystallize" into a past and closed transaction---By way of the 2019 amendments the proviso added to subsection (1) of Section 65B of the Income Tax Ordinance, 2001, was in violation of the prohibition against discrimination and the guarantee of equal treatment provided by the fundamental right enshrined in Article 25 of the Constitution---This proviso reduced the rate of the tax credit for the tax year 2019 from 10% to 5% of the amount invested, whereas for all other tax years from 2010 to 2018, taxpayer companies were granted a tax credit at the rate of 10% of the amount invested---As a result, the first category of taxpayer companies had been discriminated against and had not been afforded the equal treatment that was given to other taxpayer companies for the tax years 2010 to 2018---As for the second category of taxpayer companies, their case was distinguishable from the first category, therefore, the amendment made to subsection (2) of Section 65B, which reversed the expiry date of availing the benefit of the tax credit from 30 June 2021 to 30 June 2019, did not fall within the scope of the constitutional prohibition contained in Article 8 read with Article 25 of the Constitution---Supreme Court declared that the proviso added to subsection (1) of Section 65B through the 2019 amendments infringed the fundamental right of the first category of taxpayer companies to protection against discrimination and the guarantee of equal treatment under Article 25 of the Constitution, and was therefore liable to be struck down; that the change made to subsection (2) of Section 65B through the 2019 amendments did not infringe any of the fundamental rights of the second category of taxpayer companies guaranteed by Articles 18, 23, 24 and 25 of the Constitution---Petitions were converted into appeals, which were partly allowed.

(g) Promissory estoppel, doctrine of---

----Doctrine of promissory estoppel does not operate against the legislature.

Army Welfare Sugar Mills v. Federation of Pakistan 1992 SCMR 1652 ref.

(h) Precedent---

----Earlier decision of a Bench of equal numeric strength---Precedential value---Earlier decision of a bench of a High Court, or of the Supreme Court, on a question of law is binding on another bench of equal numeric strength when dealing with the same question, in the sense that the latter bench cannot decide the same question contrary to the first decision---However, the latter bench is not precluded from examining the correctness of the earlier decision or forming a different view---In such a case, the proper course of action is to refer the matter to the Chief Justice of the High Court, or in the case of the Supreme Court to the Bench-Constitution Committee, with a request for the constitution of a larger bench to examine the correctness of the earlier decision and, if necessary, to reconsider and redecide the question.

Multiline Associates v. Ardeshir Cowasjee 1995 SCMR 362 ref.

(i) Judicial review---

----Economic matters and policies---In complex economic matters, the best solutions are often not easily discernible; the wisdom of any choice may be debated or criticized, but mere errors of policy judgment are not subject to judicial review---Only clear and definite violations of fundamental rights or other constitutional provisions warrant judicial intervention---Legislative and executive branches of the State are entitled to make pragmatic adjustments which may be called for by particular circumstances---Courts cannot strike down an economic policy decision taken by them merely because they feel that another policy decision would have been fairer, wiser, or more scientific or logical---It is for the legislature, not the courts, to balance the advantages and disadvantages of various economic concerns---Therefore, while examining the constitutionality of fiscal laws on the touchstone of fundamental rights, particularly the fundamental right to equality before the law, courts should exercise greater restraint and extend more deference to legislative judgment than they do with laws concerning civil and political rights---Legislature must be afforded some "play in its joints" because it is tasked with addressing complex economic problems that do not admit solutions through doctrinaire or rigid formulas.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---The constitutionality of the amendments made to Section 65B of the Income Tax Ordinance, 2001 ("ITO") by the Finance Act, 2019 is under challenge in the present case. Section 65B was introduced into the ITO by the Finance Act, 2010 as a tax incentive provision for local industry. It allowed taxpayer companies a tax credit at the rate of 10% of the amount invested in the purchase of plant and machinery for an industrial under- taking set up in Pakistan, provided that the plant and machinery were purchased and installed between 1 July 2010 and 30 June 2015. Subsections (1) and (2) of Section 65B are relevant to the questions involved in the present case. Some minor changes were made to subsection (1) by the Finance Act, 2012,[1] which are not important for the purposes of the present case. Therefore, the provisions of subsections (1) and (2), as amended in 2012, are reproduced here for ease of reference:

65B. Tax credit for investment.---(1) Where a taxpayer being a company invests any amount in the purchase of plant and machinery, for the purposes of extension, expansion, balancing, modernization and replacement of the plant and machinery, already installed therein, in an industrial undertaking set up in Pakistan and owned by it, credit equal to ten per cent of the amount so invested shall be allowed against the tax payable, including on account of minimum tax and final taxes payable under any of the provisions of this Ordinance, by it in the manner hereinafter provided.

(2) The provisions of subsection (1) shall apply if the plant and machinery is purchased and installed at any time between the first day of July, 2010, and the 30th day of June, 2015.

The ending year, 2015, mentioned in subsection (2) was changed to 2016 by the Finance Act, 2015; to 2019 by the Finance Act, 2016; and to 2021 by the Finance Act, 2018. However, the Finance Act, 2019 brought the ending year back from 2021 to 2019 and, by adding a proviso to subsection (1), reduced the rate of tax credit from 10% to 5% of the amount invested for the tax year 2019.[2] The said proviso is also reproduced here for ready reference:

Provided that for the tax year 2019 the rate of credit shall be equal to five percent of the amount so invested:

2. Aggrieved by the amendments made to Section 65B of the ITO by the Finance Act, 2019 ("2019 amendments"), some taxpayer companies ("respondents") challenged the constitutionality thereof by invoking the writ jurisdiction of the High Court of Sindh. By its order dated 7 February 2023 ("impugned order"), detailed reasons of which were released on 27 February 2023 ("impugned judgment"), the High Court concluded that two categories of taxpayer companies-firstly, those respondents which had both purchased and installed the plant and machinery by 30 June 2019, and secondly, those respondents which had purchased the plant and machinery by 30 June 2019 and installed the same after that date but by 30 June 2021-had protected vested rights that could not be vitiated by the 2019 amendments. Consequently, the High Court allowed the writ petitions, declaring that for these two categories of taxpayer companies, the amended provisions of subsection (2) of Section 65B should be "read to reflect that the provisions of subsection (1) shall apply if the plant and machinery was purchased before 30 June 2019 and installed before 30 June 2021". Furthermore, the High Court struck down the proviso added to subsection (1), which had reduced the rate of tax credit from 10% to 5% for the tax year 2019. Hence, the Commissioner Inland Revenue ("petitioner") has filed the present petitions for leave to appeal against the impugned order passed by the High Court.

3. The learned counsel for the petitioner challenged the validity of the impugned order, primarily arguing that the legislature is competent to modify or withdraw the benefit of tax credit through retrospective amendments to Section 65B of the ITO and can thereby take away the vested rights, if any, of the respondents. He contended that the High Court legally erred in holding that the vested rights of the respondents could not be vitiated by the 2019 amendments. On the other hand, the learned counsel for the respondents stated that, in the case of the first category of taxpayer companies which purchased and installed plant and machinery by 30 June 2019 ("first category of taxpayer companies"), the transaction of the tax credit benefit has become past and closed. As for the second category of taxpayer companies which purchased plant and machinery before 30 June 2019 ("second category of taxpayer companies"), such taxpayer companies have acquired a vested right to avail the benefit of the tax credit by installing the purchased plant and machinery by 30 June 2021.

They contended that retrospective legislation does not reopen past and closed transactions unless the legislature uses express and clear language to that effect, which, according to them, is not present in the 2019 amendments (the proviso). Thus, they argued, the first category of taxpayer companies is not affected by the said amendments. Regarding the second category of taxpayer companies, they argued that the amendment made to subsection (2), reverting the ending year of the tax credit benefit from 2021 to 2019, applies only to investments made after, not before, 30 June 2019. They further contended that the 2019 amendments infringe upon the respondents' fundamental rights to conduct lawful business, to acquire and hold property, and to equality before the law, as guaranteed by Articles 18, 23, 24 and 25 of the Constitution.

4. We have considered the arguments of the learned counsel for the parties, read their written submissions as well as the cases cited therein, and examined the record of the case.

5. The contentions of the learned counsel for the parties give rise to the following questions:

(i) Whether the High Court legally erred in holding that the vested rights of the respondents could not be vitiated by the 2019 amendments.

(ii) Whether the second category of taxpayer companies has acquired a vested right to avail the benefit of the tax credit and such right is not affected by the 2019 amendments.

(iii) Whether in the case of the first category of taxpayer companies, the transaction of the tax credit benefit has become past and closed and the same is not affected by the 2019 amendments.

(iv) Whether the 2019 amendments infringe upon the respondents' fundamental rights to conduct lawful business, to acquire and hold property and to equality before the law, as guaranteed by Articles 18, 23, 24 and 25 of the Constitution.

However, before addressing these questions, we find it appropriate to briefly outline the constitutional position regarding the legislative powers of Parliament and Provincial Assemblies, as well as the settled principles of law concerning the legislature's power to enact laws with retrospective effect and the established principles for interpreting laws that have or appear to have retrospective effect. This will facilitate the decision on the questions.

Constitutional position regarding the legislative powers of Parliament and Provincial Assemblies

6. In our country, Article 142 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan ("Constitution") is the fountainhead of legislative powers. In addition to other specific provisions in the Constitution, the legislative powers of the Federal Legislature (Parliament) and the Provincial Legislatures (Provincial Assemblies) stem from the general provisions of this Article. It confers on Parliament the power to make laws with respect to any matter in the Federal Legislative List and on Provincial Assemblies the power to make laws with respect to any matter not enumerated in the Federal Legislative List, while also conferring on both the concurrent power to make laws with respect to criminal law, criminal procedure and evidence. There is no restriction on the legislative powers conferred by this Article on Parliament and Provincial Assemblies regarding the enactment of laws with retrospective effect, except that it makes this conferment of legislative powers "subject to the Constitution".

7. The phrase "Subject to the Constitution" used in Article 142 indicates that where the Constitution itself imposes a restriction on the exercise of legislative power in a particular manner or prescribes a specific manner for the exercise of legislative power, then the legislative power conferred by this Article cannot be exercised in the prohibited manner or can only be exercised in accordance with the manner specifically prescribed by the Constitution, as the case may be.[3] Since Article 8 of the Constitution imposes a restriction on the legislative powers of Parliament and Provincial Assemblies with respect to making any law that takes away or abridges the rights conferred by Articles 9 to 28, neither Parliament nor Provincial Assemblies can exercise their legislative powers in a manner prohibited by this Article.[4] Article 12 bars the enactment of retrospective laws concerning criminal liabilities, except for acts of abrogation or subversion of the Constitution. Therefore, apart from the specified exception, Parliament and Provincial Assemblies cannot enact criminal laws with retrospective effect; however, there is no restriction on their legislative powers to enact civil laws with retrospective effect. Nonetheless, neither prospective nor retrospective laws can be enacted to take away or abridge any of the fundamental rights guaranteed by Articles 9 to 28 of the Constitution or in contravention of any other provision of the Constitution. The Constitution's prohibitions and requirements apply equally to both prospective and retrospective laws.[5]

Principles of law concerning the legislature's power to enact laws with retrospective effect

8. Given the above constitutional position, which imposes no restriction on enacting civil laws either prospectively or retrospectively within constitutional limits, the settled principles of law regarding the legislature's power to enact civil laws with retrospective effect are as follows. The legislature's power to legislate includes the power to legislate with retrospective effect.[6] A legislature that is competent to make a law on a particular subject also has the power to legislate such a law with retrospective effect and can, by legislative fiat, even take away vested rights or affect past and closed transactions.[7] Therefore, when a legislature gives retrospective effect to a law, either by express provision or by necessary implication, no protection can be afforded to vested rights contrary to that law.[8] Similarly, when a legislature enacts a law with retrospective effect, the person affected cannot plead the imposition of a previously non-existent civil obligation as a ground for declaring the law invalid.[9] The Constitution only bars retrospective legislation concerning criminal liabilities, not civil rights and obligations.[10] There is no such rule that even if a legislature has sought to take away a vested right, the courts must hold that such legislation is ineffective or strike down the legislation on the ground that it has retrospectively taken away a vested right.[11]

Principles for interpreting laws that have or appear to have retrospective effect

9. As for the principles for interpreting laws that have or appear to have retrospective effect, it is axiomatic that every person is presumed to know the law currently in force and is expected to arrange their affairs accordingly-current law governs current affairs. If a person acts today, he does so with the knowledge of today's law, not with knowledge of future laws. Therefore, when a law regulating certain affairs is introduced for the first time, it is presumed to apply to future affairs, not to alter the character of past transactions made under the law as it then existed. This principle is encapsulated in the maxim lex prospicit non respicit-the law looks forward, not backward. A retrospective law is an exception to this general principle; therefore, courts approach the interpretation of laws with a presumption in favour of the general principle that laws are intended to regulate future affairs, not to affect past transactions. Exceptions of retrospective effect are interpreted strictly, as are other exceptions to general principles. This presumption is rooted in the rule of fairness, as altering accrued rights and obligations retrospectively is often considered unfair. Since the legislature is not expected to act in an unfair manner, it becomes essential to closely scrutinize a law that appears to have such an effect, ensuring that this was indeed the legislature's intent. Thus, the legislature is presumed not to have intended to alter the law applicable to accrued rights and obligations or past events and transactions unless a clear contrary intention is expressed. The strength of this presumption varies with the degree of potential unfairness-the greater the unfairness, the more explicit the legislature's intent must be.[12]

10. Therefore, in our jurisdiction, the established principles for interpreting laws that have or appear to have retrospective effect are as follows. Every statute that relates to substantive rights and obligations should be deemed prospective unless, by express provision or necessary implication, it has been given retrospective effect. Courts must lean against giving a statute retrospective effect that affects vested rights and/or past and closed transactions by adhering to two rules: first, if two interpretations are reasonably possible, the one that saves vested rights and/or past and closed transactions should be adopted; and second, no statute should be construed to have retrospective effect to a greater extent than its language necessarily requires.[13] Although vested rights may be affected and taken away by express provision or necessary implication, past and closed transactions can be disturbed and reopened only by express provision.[14] This is because, as noted above, the greater the unfairness, the more explicit the legislature's intent must be.

11. It is pertinent to mention that the above principles are also statutorily underpinned by the provisions of Section 6 of the General Clauses Act, 1897, which inter alia provides that where any Act repeals an enactment, then, unless a different intention appears, the repeal shall not affect the previous operation of the repealed enactment or anything duly done or suffered thereunder (past and closed transactions), nor shall it affect any right, privilege, obligation or liability acquired, accrued or incurred under the repealed enactment (vested rights). We may also underscore, as held by this Court in Saeed Ahmad,[15] that there is no difference in principle between repeal and amendment, as every amendment inherently involves a repeal, where the law in its previous form disappears and a new law takes its place. Whether the legislature states that a particular section will be amended in a certain way or declares that the section is repealed and replaced by a new one, the outcome is fundamentally the same. In its broader scope, the word 'repeal' as used in Section 6 of the General Clauses Act, 1897 includes amendment, as both processes ultimately achieve the same legislative result. While 'repeal' generally refers to the abrogation of an entire law and 'amendment' to changes within a statute, both carry the same effect, making it necessary to treat them similarly. Therefore, Section 6 of the General Clauses Act, 1897 also applies to the amendment of a law.

Legal position as to retrospective law, vested right, and past and closed transaction

12. To have a clear and complete understanding of the questions at hand, it is also necessary to briefly state the legal position as to which statute is considered a retrospective law, how a right becomes vested and when a vested right turns into a past and closed transaction.

13. A statute is considered retrospective if it takes away or impairs any vested right already acquired under the then existing law or creates a new obligation or disability in respect of a transaction that is already past and closed.[16] In other words, a statute that does not affect vested rights or create new obligations regarding past and closed transactions cannot be said to be retrospective.[17] Similarly, a statute that extinguishes, by repeal of an existing law, a bare, abstract, inchoate or contingent right is not deemed to be retrospective, and such rights do not survive the repeal of the law under which they existed.[18]

14. As for vested rights, the legal position is also well settled. A right vests when all the facts required by law to establish that right have occurred. In other words, when all the facts necessary to create a right have occurred, the right is said to be "vested". A right remains inchoate and contingent when some, but not all, of the investitive facts have occurred. A "vested right" is, therefore, one that is absolute, complete and unconditional, with no obstacles to its exercise. It is immediate and perfect in itself, not dependent upon any contingency.[19] Vested right are thus free from contingencies, but ordinarily there are always specific occasions and circumstances under which such vested rights may be exercised.[20]

15. The last sentence of the above paragraph indicates how a vested right becomes a past and closed transaction: this occurs when such right is exercised, or deemed to have been exercised by operation of law, at a specific occasion and under specific circumstances. Since such specific occasions and circumstances may vary under different laws, it is determined on the basis of the peculiar facts and legal position of each case whether a vested right has turned into a past and closed transaction[21]. Accordingly, this question has been addressed differently in several cases, each with its own peculiar facts and legal context. For example, In EFU Insurance Co.,[22] it was held that once the four-year period prescribed under the then-existing law for the assessment or reassessment of tax on profits that had either escaped assessment or were under-assessed had expired, the assessment for the year concerned became a past and closed transaction; in Ghulam Hyder Shah,[23] it was held that since the Land Commissioner had exercised his power to scrutinize the disputed gifts and affirmed them under the provisions of the then-existing law, the transaction of gifts had become past and closed. In Molasses Trading,[24] it was held that when the petitioners had presented the bills of entry for the quantification of customs duty payable on the imported goods and thereby exercised their vested right to avail exemption under the then-existing law, the transaction had become past and closed. In Muhammad Hussain,[25] the suits filed within the limitation period prescribed under the then-existing law were treated as past and closed transactions with respect to the right to file suits within the prescribed limitation period. In Zila Council Jehlum,[26] it was held that since the respondents' goods had passed through the terminal of the appellant without payment of the 'goods exit tax' in accordance with the then-existing law, the transaction of exiting the goods had become past and closed; and, in Shahnawaz,[27] it was determined that the deemed assessment order under Section 120 of the ITO becomes a past and closed transaction for the purpose of audit once it is selected for audit and the audit is conducted or abandoned in accordance with Section 177 of the ITO as applicable to the tax year concerned.

16. Having thus laid down the constitutional and legal position on the key points concerning the questions raised, we can now conveniently address those questions.

(i) Whether the High Court legally erred in holding that the vested rights of the respondents could not be vitiated by the 2019 amendments.

17. In the impugned judgment, the High Court observed that 'the curtailing of the benefit extended in section 65B of the Ordinance [ITO], consequent upon the amendment made via [the] Finance Act 2019, amounted to impermissible vitiation of vested rights/past and closed transactions'[28] (para 14); that 'the amendment to section 65B of the Ordinance [ITO] via the Finance Act 2019 amounted to impermissible vitiation of vested rights' (para 22); that 'notwithstanding the curtailment of the expiration date, protected vested rights had been created in favor of the persons having purchased the pertinent plant and machinery prior to 30th June 2019' (para 24); that 'the Proviso is determined to be an unjustified attempt to vitiate protected vested rights' (para 26). With the said observations, the High Court concluded that the 'two category identified were found to have protected vested rights and it was our much deliberated view that such rights could not be vitiated in the manner intended by the amendment to section 65B of the Ordinance [ITO] by the Finance Act 2019' (para 35).[29]

18. We are completely at a loss to understand the constitutional and legal basis of the above observations and conclusion of the High Court. As afore noted, a legislature that is competent to make a law on a particular subject also has the power to legislate such a law with retrospective effect and can, by legislative fiat, even take away vested rights. Therefore, when a legislature gives retrospective effect to a law, either by express provision or by necessary implication, no protection can be afforded to vested rights contrary to that law.

19. It is evident from the above-cited observations and conclusion of the High Court that it recognized the legislature's intent through the 2019 amendments was to vitiate the vested rights, if any, of the taxpayer companies. However, the High Court found this to be "impermissible" and "unjustified", and regarded the rights of the taxpayer companies vested in them under Section 65B, before the amendments, as "protected vested rights". Therefore, in essence, it declined to give effect to the 2019 amendments through the impugned judgment. This approach of the High Court in determining the constitutionality of a law that has or appears to have a retrospective effect clearly contradicts the statements and principles of law enunciated by this Court in several cases, which are binding on all courts of the country, including the High Courts, under Article 189 of the Constitution. Some of these statements and principles, most relevant to the question under discussion, are cited here for ready reference:

Haider Automobile v. Pakistan PLD 1969 SC 623 (5MB)

There is no such rule that even if the Legislature has, by the use of clear and unambiguous language, sought to take away a vested right yet the Courts, must hold that such a legislation is ineffective or strike down the legislation on the ground that it has retrospectively taken away a vested right.

Molasses Trading v. Federation of Pakistan 1993 SCMR 1905 (5MB)

It also cannot be disputed that the legislature, which is competent to make a law, has full plenary powers within its sphere of operation to legislate retrospectively or retroactively. Therefore vested rights can be taken away by such a legislation and it cannot be struck down on that ground.

Jamshaid Gulzar v. Federation of Pakistan 2014 SCMR 1504

[W]hen the legislature has given the amending enactment retrospective effect with clear intendment spelt out from its language, than no protection to the alleged vested rights of appellants can be offered contrary to it.

It is more than evident from the above pronouncements that a law cannot be declared ineffective or struck down on the ground that it has taken away a vested right, nor can any protection be offered to vested rights contrary to it. Therefore, the High Court legally erred in holding that the vested rights of the respondents could not be vitiated by the 2019 amendments. Vested rights, if any, of the respondents can be vitiated by the 2019 amendments if such legislative intent appears either from the express provisions or by necessary implication of the amendments. Question (i) is answered accordingly.

20. However, whether the respondents have any vested rights and whether the 2019 amendments indeed affect such rights will be addressed in the following questions.

(ii) Whether the second category of taxpayer companies has acquired a vested right to avail the benefit of the tax credit and such right is not affected by the 2019 amendments.

21. As above noted, the first category of taxpayer companies consists of those respondents who had both purchased and installed the plant and machinery by 30 June 2019, while the second category includes those who had purchased the plant and machinery by 30 June 2019 but installed it after that date but before 30 June 2021. Although the High Court classified the respondents into these categories for discussion, it granted both categories the same relief that was available to them before the 2019 amendments, i.e., a tax credit at the rate of 10% of the amount invested in the purchase of plant and machinery.

22. It is not clear from the impugned judgment which category's claimed right was treated as a past and closed transaction and which was considered only a vested right. This lack of clarity in the impugned judgment suggests that, despite citing extensive extracts from Shahnawaz[30] that elaborate on the distinction between vested rights and past and closed transactions, as earlier expounded in Ghulam Hyder Shah[31] and Molasses Trading,[32] the High Court did not fully comprehend this distinction. The conclusion recorded in paragraph 35 of the impugned judgment suggests that the High Court perhaps treated the claimed rights of both categories as vested rights. Nonetheless, since the learned counsel for the respondents have argued before us that the vested rights of the first category of respondents have become past and closed transactions while those of the second category remain vested rights, we have opted to discuss and decide the matter on that basis for the sake of clarity.

23. It was argued on behalf of the petitioner before the High Court, and also before us, that to avail the benefit of the tax credit under Section 65B, the taxpayer companies must fulfill two conditions: first, they must purchase the plant and machinery; and second, they must install the purchased plant and machinery in an industrial undertaking set up in Pakistan. Only once both of these conditions are fulfilled by a taxpayer company does it acquire a vested right to avail the benefit of the tax credit. On the other hand, the stance of the respondents before the High Court, as well as before us, was that the only condition to avail the benefit of the tax credit is the purchase of the plant and machinery for an industrial undertaking set up in Pakistan, as prescribed in subsection (1) of Section 65B, which grants such a benefit.

24. Relying on its earlier decision in Gulshan Spinning,[33] the High Court accepted the stance of the respondent and held that the right to claim the tax credit comes into existence with the purchase of the plant and machinery, while the installation is material only in respect of the tax year when the credit is to be claimed.[34]

25. We find that the High Court's reliance on Gulshan Spinning is misplaced, and it erred in accepting the respondents' stance that the sole condition to avail the benefit of the tax credit under subsection (1) of Section 65B is the purchase of plant and machinery. The provisions of subsection (2) of Section 65B make it clear that subsection (1) is not to be read in isolation, but rather in conjunction with subsection (2). To clarify this point, the provisions of subsection (2), as they were before the 2019 amendments, are reproduced here:

(2) The provisions of subsection (1) shall apply if the plant and machinery is purchased and installed at any time between the first day of July, 2010, and the 30th day of June, 2021.

The language of the above-cited provisions of subsection (2) could not be clearer and more explicit in expressing the legislative intent. It is hard to understand how these provisions could be interpreted differently from what they plainly state: "The provisions of subsection (1) shall apply if the plant and machinery is purchased and installed at any time between the first day of July, 2010, and the 30th day of June, 2021." The expression "purchased and installed" used in subsection (2) leaves little room for doubt that to avail the benefit of the tax credit provided in subsection (1), both the conditions of purchase and installation of the plant and machinery must be fulfilled. In fact and effect, subsection (2) operates like a proviso to subsection (1). As is well known, a proviso, in its classic sense, limits or qualifies what precedes it. Subsection (2) performs this very function by qualifying the application of the provisions of subsection (1), making them subject to the conditions of purchase and installation made between the first day of July 2010 and the 30th day of June 2021. The High Court itself read the provisions of subsection (2) as a proviso in the very first sentence of paragraph 2 of the impugned judgment, stating that "section 65B was inserted into the Ordinance [ITO] via the Finance Act 2010 and it conferred a tax credit of ten percent upon qualifying companies for investment, provided that the requisite investment and installation of the pertinent plant and machinery took place within a specified time."[35] However, in the latter part of the impugned judgment, the High Court overlooked this crucial aspect of subsection (2) and misplaced its reliance on Gulshan Spinning, where no provision similar to subsection (2) was under consideration.

26. As the High Court placed much reliance in the impugned judgment on Gulshan Spinning, we feel constrained to observe that in that case also, the High Court failed to appreciate the necessary implication of subsection (2) of Section 107 of the Income Tax Ordinance, 1979, which was similar to subsection (3) of Section 65B of the Income Tax Ordinance, 2001. To clarify this point, the provisions of both subsections are reproduced:

Section 107 of the Income Tax Ordinance, 1979

(2) The amount of credit admissible under this section shall be deducted from the tax payable by the assessee in respect of the income year in which the machinery or plant in the purchase of which the amount referred to in subsection (1) is invested is installed.

Section 65B of the Income Tax Ordinance, 2001

(3) The amount of credit admissible under this section shall be deducted from the tax payable by the taxpayer in respect of the tax year in which the plant or machinery in the purchase of which the amount referred to in subsection (1) is invested and [sic-is][36] installed.

A plain reading of the above-cited provisions of subsection (2) of Section 107 of the Income Tax Ordinance, 1979, makes it evident that the amount of credit admissible under that section was to be deducted from the tax payable by the assessee (taxpayer) in the income year (tax year) in which the purchased machinery or plant was installed. The necessary implication of these provisions was that the amount of credit could neither be claimed nor deducted from the tax payable unless the purchased machinery or plant was installed. Only once the assesse (taxpayer) had installed the machinery or plant, could the amount of credit be claimed by it and deducted by the assessing officer (income tax officer) from the tax payable in respect of the income year (tax year) in which the installment took place. If the purchased machinery or plant was not installed, the question of claiming and deducting the amount of credit from the tax payable did not arise. Therefore, the installation of the purchased machinery or plant was a necessary condition, along with the purchase, to avail the benefit of the credit allowed by subsection (1) of Section 107 of the Income Tax Ordinance, 1979. The same is the effect of the similar provisions of subsection (3) of Section 65B of the Income Tax Ordinance, 2001.

27. However, since Gulshan Spinning had held otherwise in 2005, the legislature---presumed to be aware of the interpretation of the law made by constitutional courts---provided this time the clear and explicit provisions of subsection (2) of Section 65B while inserting it into the Income Tax Ordinance, 2001, in 2010. This was done by the legislature to express its intent unequivocally, leaving no room for further interpretation. Unfortunately, in the impugned judgment, the High Court failed to appreciate this legislative move and did not give due effect to it, but rather stuck to the interpretation made in Gulshan Spinning.

28. The correct legal position, as held above, is that the provisions of subsection (1) of Section 65B are to be read in conjunction with subsection (2). When so read together, it becomes clear that to avail the benefit of the tax credit under Section 65B, taxpayer companies must fulfill two conditions: first, they have to purchase the plant and machinery; and second, they have to install the purchased plant and machinery in an industrial undertaking set up in Pakistan. Only when both of these conditions are fulfilled does a taxpayer company acquire a vested right to avail the benefit of the tax credit conferred by Section 65B.

29. The second category of taxpayer companies had purchased the plant and machinery before 1 July 2019, when the 2019 amendments came into force, but had not yet installed it. Therefore, they had fulfilled only one of the two required conditions. As a result, they had not yet acquired any vested right to avail the benefit of the tax credit conferred by Section 65B. Their right was inchoate and contingent upon fulfilling the second condition, i.e., installing the purchased plant and machinery in an industrial undertaking set up in Pakistan. As above expounded, a right vests when all the facts required by law to establish that right have occurred. In other words, when all the investitive facts necessary to create a right have occurred, the right is said to be "vested". A right remains inchoate and contingent when some, but not all, of the investitive facts have occurred. Therefore, we conclude and answer question (ii) accordingly: the second category of taxpayer companies has not acquired a vested right to avail the benefit of the tax credit conferred by Section 65B; thus, no question arises as to its being affected by the 2019 amendments.

30. We may observe in passing that the alteration of their position by the taxpayer companies through the fulfillment of one of the two conditions might have attracted the doctrine of promissory estoppel if the benefit of the tax credit had been extended and amended by an executive action.[37] However, in the present case, the benefit of the tax credit was conferred by legislative action, and the amendment thereto has also been made by legislative action. Therefore, the doctrine of promissory estoppel is of no avail to the taxpayer companies, as like the doctrine of vested rights it also does not operate against the legislature.[38]

(iii) Whether in the case of the first category of taxpayer companies, the transaction of the tax credit benefit has become past and closed and the same is not affected by the 2019 amendments.

31. As for the first category of taxpayer companies, they have undoubtedly acquired a vested right to avail the benefit of the tax credit conferred by Section 65B. This is because they had fulfilled both of the required conditions by 1 July 2019, when the 2019 amendments came into force; they had both purchased and installed the plant and machinery by that date. The question, therefore, arises as to whether such right has become a past and closed transaction and the same is not affected by the 2019 amendments. If it is found that the right has not become a past and closed transaction but remains a vested right, then it will require determination whether such vested right is affected by the 2019 amendments.

32. In the impugned judgment, although the High Court did not explicitly hold that the right of the first category of taxpayer companies had become a past and closed transaction, it did mention, by referring to Gulshan Spinning, that "the tax credit crystallized upon making the relevant investment".[39] The word "crystallized" was perhaps first used by this Court in Molasses Trading[40] in the context of a retrospective law that affected vested rights, to distinguish vested rights from past and closed transactions. In that case, the Court held that the retrospective amendment made to the Customs Act, 1869, by inserting Section 31A therein, though took away vested rights, it did not have the effect of reopening past and closed transactions where the liability of customs duty had "crystallized" upon the presentation of bills of entry, as there was no express provision to that effect in Section 31A. This term was later also used, in the same sense, in Gulshan Spinning and Shahnawaz[41] to refer to those vested rights that move forward and become past and closed transactions. Therefore, as we understand, the High Court, by relying on Gulshan Spinning, treated the vested rights of the first category of taxpayer companies as having become past and closed transactions.

33. As the High Court decided this point in the impugned judgment by simply relying on Gulshan Spinning, we are constrained to examine the correctness of the decision made in Gulshan Spinning on this point as well.

34. In Gulshan Spinning, the High Court accepted the contention of the taxpayer companies and held that the right to claim a tax credit under Section 107 of the Income Tax Ordinance, 1979---which was similar to Section 65B of the ITO---accrued with the investment made in the purchase of plant and machinery and, at the same time, became a past and closed transaction. The High Court reasoned that the right to claim any allowance, deduction or exemption is crystallized and matured with finalization of assessment proceedings culminating into an assessment order, because anything in the nature of exemption, allowance or deduction forms part of the assessment order and thus, is an integral part of the assessment process. However, the tax credit, the High Court held, is not in the nature of an exemption, allowance or deduction for the purpose of computing income under the head of business or profession, and therefore, it is not part of the assessment process/ assessment order. To support its view that the tax credit is not part of the assessment process/assessment order, the High Court also cited the following extract from the instructions issued by the C.B.R. (now F.B.R.) via Circular No.13(ii)/IT-1/80, dated 27 March 1984:

(i) a separate claim can be filed by a tax payer within the specified period of two years.

(ii) a separate order under section 107 should be passed on the claim made by the assessee.

In light of the distinction between an exemption and a tax credit as explained by this Court in H.M. Extraction,[42] we have no cavil with the statement made in Gulshan Spinning that an exemption forms part of the assessment process, whereas a tax credit does not. However, this does not imply that a taxpayer company need do nothing to exercise its vested right to avail the benefit of a tax credit, nor that such vested right automatically matures (crystalizes) into a past and closed transaction. As is evident from the instructions of the FBR cited by the High Court in Gulshan Spinning, a taxpayer company having a vested right to avail the benefit of the tax credit must file a claim separate from its filing of income tax returns, and a separate order is to be passed on this claim. We understand that the vested right of a taxpayer company cannot remain in a state of uncertainty or be jeopardized by delays in passing an appropriate order on the claim by the public functionary-the income tax officer. Therefore, such vested right must be considered to have "crystallized" into a past and closed transaction upon filing of the claim by the taxpayer company, as held by this Court in Molasses Trading regarding the presentation of a bill of entry for exercising the vested right to avail an exemption in customs duty. However, the statement that the right to claim a tax credit accrues with the investment made in the purchase of plant and machinery and simultaneously matures into a past and closed transaction is not legally correct.

35. As above noted, a vested right becomes a past and closed transaction when such right is exercised at a specific occasion and under specific circumstances. It has also been clarified that since such specific occasions and circumstances may vary under different laws, it is determined on the basis of the peculiar facts and legal position of each case whether a vested right has turned into a past and closed transaction. In the peculiar facts and legal position of the present case, we hold that the vested right of a taxpayer company to avail the benefit of the tax credit conferred by Section 65B matures into a past and closed transaction upon the filing of the claim by the taxpayer company, either separately as per the above-cited instructions of the FBR, if such or similar instructions exist, or along with the income tax returns, as the case may be. In the present case, the second category of taxpayer companies had neither filed the claim separately, as per the above-cited FBR instructions, nor filed their income tax returns along with the claim by 1 July 2019, when the 2019 amendments came into force. Therefore, their vested right did not "crystallize" into a past and closed transaction. The High Court erred in the impugned judgment by treating their vested right as having "crystallized" into a past and closed transaction. Since the vested right of the second category of taxpayer companies did not become a past and closed transaction, the question of it being unaffected by the 2019 amendments does not arise. Question (iii) is answered accordingly.

36. However, that answer to question (iii) does not conclude the discussion on the status of the vested right of the first category of taxpayer companies. Rather, it necessitates determining of an ancillary point: whether such vested right is affected by the 2019 amendments. For ease of reference, the proviso added to subsection (1) of Section 65B by the 2019 amendments, which pertains to this point, is cited again here:

Although it was argued before us that this proviso could be interpreted in a manner that would preserve the vested rights of the first category of taxpayer companies, we find it impossible to do so without distorting the language of the proviso. The language of the proviso clearly expresses the legislative intent to reduce the rate of the tax credit for the tax year 2019 from 10% to 5% of the amount invested. It is incomprehensible how anyone could reasonably interpret it to mean anything else. The proviso, by its explicit terms, affects the vested right of the first category of taxpayer companies to avail the benefit of the tax credit at the rate of 10% for the tax year 2019 on the amount invested in the purchase of plant and machinery. The point ancillary to the answer to question (iii) is decided accordingly.

37. Before parting with this portion of the judgment, we feel constrained to address another incidental point. A reading of the impugned judgment shows that the Division Bench of the High Court, which decided the present case, considered itself to be "absolutely" bound by the decision of an earlier bench of equal strength in Gulshan Spinning and referred to the case of Multiline Associates[43] to support this understanding. No doubt, the earlier decision of a bench of a High Court, or of this Court, on a question of law is binding on another bench of equal numeric strength when dealing with the same question, in the sense that the latter bench cannot decide the same question contrary to the first decision. However, the latter bench is not precluded from examining the correctness of the earlier decision or forming a different view. In such a case, the proper course of action is to refer the matter to the Chief Justice of the High Court, or in the case of this Court to the Bench-Constitution Committee, with a request for the constitution of a larger bench to examine the correctness of the earlier decision and, if necessary, to reconsider and redecide the question.[44] The Division Bench of the High Court that decided this case should, therefore, have appreciated the respective contentions of the parties with an open and objective judicial mind, without considering itself to be "absolutely" bound by the decision in Gulshan Spinning, which, on the two points discussed above,[45] has been found to have been incorrectly decided. For the sake of removing any ambiguity in future cases, we expressly disapprove of Gulshan Spinning on those two points.

(iv) Whether the 2019 amendments infringe upon the respondents' fundamental rights to conduct lawful business, to acquire and hold property and to equality before the law, as guaranteed by Articles 18, 23, 24 and 25 of the Constitution.

38. This is the last question involved in the case, and before embarking on its discussion, we find it appropriate to make some preliminary remarks pertaining to this question. In economic matters, most legislative and executive decisions are essentially empirical, based on experimentation or what might be called the "trial and error method".[46] "The problems of government"[47] are practical and may sometimes justify rough accommodations based on unscientific formulas. In complex economic matters, the best solutions are often not easily discernible; the wisdom of any choice may be debated or criticized, but mere errors of policy judgment are not subject to judicial review. Only clear and definite violations of fundamental rights or other constitutional provisions warrant judicial intervention. The legislative and executive branches of the State are entitled to make pragmatic adjustments which may be called for by particular circumstances. Courts cannot strike down an economic policy decision taken by them merely because they feel that another policy decision would have been fairer, wiser, or more scientific or logical. It is for the legislature, not the courts, to balance the advantages and disadvantages of various economic concerns. Therefore, while examining the constitutionality of fiscal laws on the touchstone of fundamental rights, particularly the fundamental right to equality before the law, courts should exercise greater restraint and extend more deference to legislative judgment than they do with laws concerning civil and political rights.[48] The legislature must be afforded some "play in its joints"[49] because it is tasked with addressing complex economic problems that do not admit solutions through doctrinaire or rigid formulas.

39. While describing the constitutional position regarding the legislative powers of Parliament and Provincial Assemblies, we have observed above that since Article 8 of the Constitution imposes a restriction on the legislative powers of Parliament and Provincial Assemblies with respect to making any law that takes away or abridges the rights conferred by Articles 9 to 28, neither Parliament nor Provincial Assemblies can exercise their legislative powers in a manner prohibited by this Article. Neither prospective nor retrospective laws can be enacted to take away or abridge any of the fundamental rights guaranteed by Articles 9 to 28 of the Constitution or in contravention of any other provision of the Constitution. The Constitution's prohibitions and requirements apply equally to both prospective and retrospective laws.

40. In light of the above constitutional position, when we examine the proviso added to subsection (1) of Section 65B, we find it to be in violation of the prohibition against discrimination and the guarantee of equal treatment provided by the fundamental right enshrined in Article 25 of the Constitution. This proviso reduces the rate of the tax credit for the tax year 2019 from 10% to 5% of the amount invested, whereas for all other tax years from 2010 to 2018, taxpayer companies were granted a tax credit at the rate of 10% of the amount invested. As a result, the first category of taxpayer companies has been discriminated against and has not been afforded the equal treatment that was given to other taxpayer companies for the tax years 2010 to 2018.

41. We are fully cognizant of the constitutional position that Article 25 does not bar reasonable classification, provided it is based on intelligible differentia with a rational nexus to the object sought to be achieved. In the context of Article 25, courts generally afford relatively greater latitude to the State in matters of fiscal legislation. However, as held by this Court in Tariq Mehmood,[50] this latitude is not infinitely elastic and the fiscal legislation is not entirely beyond the scope of Article 25. Therefore, having carefully considered the impact of the proviso on the first category of taxpayer companies, we find that there are no intelligible differentiae distinguishing these taxpayer companies in respect of tax credit for the tax year 2019 from the other taxpayer companies that were granted a tax credit at the rate of 10% of the amount invested for the tax years 2010 to 2018. The differentiation created by the proviso lacks any rational nexus with the object sought to be achieved. Consequently, the proviso is clearly in violation of the constitutional prohibition contained in Article 8, read with Article 25 of the Constitution.

42. We clarify that we have examined Section 65B in its entirety as it stood on 1 July 2019, when the 2019 amendments came into force, treating it as a unified provision applicable to all taxpayer companies and all tax years from 2010 to 2019. We have not dissected Section 65B into before and after the 2019 amendments, as any amendment made to a law becomes an integral part of it. A law that, if enacted today, would be invalid due to the infringement of a fundamental right or any other constitutional provision cannot gain validity simply because its different parts were enacted at different times.

43. Moreover, we clarify that we are not inclined to examine the constitutionality of the proviso against the fundamental rights guaranteed by Articles 18, 23 and 24, because of the principle that "if it is not necessary to decide more, it is necessary not to decide more."[51] Even otherwise, we have serious reservations about the relevance of the cases[52] cited regarding the point of alleged infringement of the fundamental rights guaranteed by Articles 18, 23 and 24 to the present case involving the matter of an income tax credit, as those cases dealt with retrospective amendments in sales tax laws where the tax could not be recovered by the taxpayer (seller) from the purchasers of goods sold in the past, we leave this point to be addressed in some other appropriate case.

44. As for the second category of taxpayer companies, their case is distinguishable from those taxpayer companies that have both purchased and installed plant and machinery between 1 July 2010 and 30 June 2019. Their situation is not at par with that of the latter category of taxpayer companies, which forms a separate class for the purpose of availing the benefit of the tax credit granted by Section 65B. Therefore, the amendment made to subsection (2) of Section 65B, which reversed the expiry date of availing the benefit of the tax credit from 30 June 2021 to 30 June 2019, does not fall within the scope of the constitutional prohibition contained in Article 8 read with Article 25 of the Constitution. As for the issue of the alleged infringement of the fundamental rights of this category of taxpayer companies guaranteed by Articles 18, 23, and 24, the same does not even arise for consideration, as they did not acquire any vested right regarding the benefit of the tax credit that might have become their property.

45. In view of the above findings, we hold and answer question (iv) as follows: (i) the proviso added to subsection (1) of Section 65B through the 2019 amendments infringes the fundamental right of the first category of taxpayer companies to protection against discrimination and the guarantee of equal treatment under Article 25 of the Constitution, and is therefore liable to be struck down; and (ii) the change made to subsection (2) of Section 65B through the 2019 amendments does not infringe any of the fundamental rights of the second category of taxpayer companies guaranteed by Articles 18, 23, 24 and 25 of the Constitution.

Relief

46. Given the above answers to the four questions, the present petitions are converted into appeals, which are partly allowed: the impugned order and judgment of the High Court are set aside to the extent of the interpretation of the amendment made to subsection (2) of Section 65B and are upheld to the extent of striking down the proviso added to subsection (1) of Section 65B of the ITO by the 2019 amendments, but for the reasons recorded in this judgment and the answer to question (iv). As the appeals have been partly allowed, the parties shall bear their own costs.

MWA/C-19/SC Order accordingly.

Civil Review Petitions Nos. 988 to 1001 of 2023 in Civil Appeals Nos. 94 to 106 of 2008 and 550 of 2011, decided on 28th November, 2024.

(For review of the judgment of this Court dated 08.09.2023).

----Art. 188---Supreme Court Rules, 1980, O.XXVI, R. 1---Review petition before the Supreme Court---Principles upon which a judgment may be reviewed stated.

A petition for review is neither an appeal nor a revision petition to a superior court but rather a request made to the same court to reconsider its decision on the limited grounds prescribed for review. It does not entail a rehearing or re-argument of the case adjudicated in the judgment under review.

For purposes of a review petition the settled principles governing the ground of "error apparent on the face of the record" are that the error, whether of fact or law, must be self-evident and readily discernible on the face of the record. It should not require meticulous examination or detailed analysis to uncover, nor should it need to be demonstrated through extensive or intricate arguments, or established through a lengthy process of reasoning on points where reasonable divergence of opinion may exist. Established instances falling within the scope of "error apparent on the face of the record" include judgments passed on an erroneous assumption of material facts or by overlooking a material question of fact or law or an important aspect of the matter, which, if noticed and considered earlier, would have direct bearing on the conclusions reached by the Court.

----Ss. 107 & 133(1)---Income Tax Ordinance (XXXI of 1979) (since repealed), Ss. 163 & 136(1)---Convention Between the Kingdom of the Netherlands and the Islamic Republic of Pakistan for the Avoidance of Double Taxation and the Prevention of Fiscal Evasion with respect to Taxes on Income, 1982, Arts. 7, 12, paras. 3(a), 3(b), 22, 23 & 24---Concept of "Royalties"---Scope---Business profits---Non-resident foreign company---Exemption from income tax---Income/royalties earned by the non-resident company in Pakistan for the lease of certain software---Whether such income was business profits and thus exempt from payment of income tax in Pakistan under Article 7 of the Convention Between the Kingdom of the Netherlands and the Islamic Republic of Pakistan for the Avoidance of Double Taxation and the Prevention of Fiscal Evasion with respect to Taxes on Income ('the Convention'), or the same constituted "royalties" as defined in paragraph 3 of Article 12 of the Convention and was liable to tax.

Petitioner (foreign incorporated company), in its tax returns, declared the receipts under the software lease agreements ('Agreements') as "business profits" and sought exemption from income tax in Pakistan under Article 7 of the Convention Between the Kingdom of the Netherlands and the Islamic Republic of Pakistan for the Avoidance of Double Taxation and the Prevention of Fiscal Evasion with respect to Taxes on Income, 1982 ("the Convention"). However, the tax department treated these receipts as "royalties" under Article 12 of the Convention and subjected them to income tax at the rate of fifteen percent. The Income Tax Officer, Commissioner of Income Tax (Appeals) and the Tribunal concluded that the payments received by the petitioner fell within the definition of "royalties" under paragraph 3(a) and (b) of Article 12 of the Convention and were therefore liable to income tax in Pakistan. The petitioner challenged the assessment orders, appellate orders and Tribunal judgments before the High Court through references. The High Court ruled in favour of the petitioner, holding that the amounts received by the petitioner for leasing FLIC tapes (software programs) under the Agreements did not qualify as "royalties" under the Convention and were not subject to income tax in Pakistan. The respondent appealed to the Supreme Court and the majority judgment under review allowed the appeals, setting aside the High Court's judgments and restoring the Tribunal's judgments as well as the original and appellate orders of the Income Tax Officers.

By the majority judgment under review the Court decided the matter against the petitioner mainly for the following reasons: (i) it would not really matter to the petitioner if, under Article 12 of the Convention, it had to pay income tax in Pakistan, because the petitioner could, with the tax authority of the Netherlands, claim an adjustment of the tax amount paid in Pakistan; (ii) the High Court did not note that the petitioner had an alternative remedy under Article 24 of the Convention to present its case to the competent authority of its own country, the Netherlands, which, if agreed with the respondent's stance, could take up the matter with the competent authority of Pakistan; (iii) the petitioner did not explain and prove the nature of the receipts for which it claims tax exemption before the Income Tax Officer, the Commissioner (Appeals) and the Tribunal- the fact-finding forums-and it was unwarranted for the High Court to have delved into the nature of the receipts; (iv) the High Court incorrectly assumed the applicability of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development Model Convention' ('OECD MC'), as Article 12 of the Convention adheres to Article 12 of the 'United Nations Model Double Taxation Convention between Developed and Developing Countries' ('UN MC') and not to Article 12 of the OECD MC; and (v) the full definition of "royalties" in paragraph 3(a) of Article 12 of the Convention included payments for "information concerning industrial, commercial, or scientific experience".

As to grounds (i) and (ii), in the majority judgment under review there is an error which is apparent on the face of the record. The possibility of adjustment of tax paid by the petitioner in Pakistan by the competent authority in the Netherlands or the availability of an alternate remedy before the competent authority in the Netherlands, was no ground for the High Court to decline to answer the questions of law referred to it in the reference application filed by the petitioner. In this regard, the Supreme Court mistakenly regarded the two different jurisdictions of the High Court to be interchangeable: one under Article 199 of the Constitution and the other exercised in the present case, the reference jurisdiction under the Income Tax Ordinance. Under Article 199, the High Court may decline to exercise its jurisdiction if it finds that the petitioner has an alternate adequate remedy. However, it escaped notice of the Supreme Court that a reference application is akin to an appeal and the reference jurisdiction is similar to appellate jurisdiction. Therefore, neither a reference application can be dismissed, nor can the exercise of reference jurisdiction be declined, on the ground of availability of some alternate remedy.

Messrs Squibb Pakistan v. CIT 2017 SCMR 1006 and CIR v. Rafeh Limited PLD 2020 SC 518 ref.

So far as ground (iii) is concerned, the petitioner contended that this is the result of an erroneous assumption of a material fact. There was substance in this contention, as the error in this regard is also apparent on the face of the record. The nature of the receipts was explained by the petitioner in its tax returns, and there was no dispute regarding this fact before the Income Tax Officer, the Commissioner (Appeals) or the Tribunal. It was, and remains, an admitted fact that the receipts were rentals received by the petitioner for the lease of FLIC tapes containing computer software programs. The nature of the receipts was an admitted fact, and the questions referred were questions of law. Therefore, the observations made by the Supreme Court in the majority judgment, that it was unwarranted for the High Court to have delved into the nature of the receipts, appear to have overlooked the said orders of the Tribunal. The High Court only dealt with and answered the questions of law and did not determine the nature of the receipts, which was an admitted fact.

As for ground (iv), it has been contended on behalf of the petitioner that, in the majority judgment, it escaped the notice of the Supreme Court that there is no significant difference in the definition of "royalties" provided in Article 12 of the UN MC and Article 12 of the OECD MC; therefore, the reference to Article 12 of the OECD MC, instead of Article 12 of the UN MC, by the High Court was inconsequential. This contention is supported by a plain reading of the two definitions. The only material difference between the definitions of "royalties" in the UN MC and the OECD MC is that the former includes payments received as consideration "for the use of, or the right to use, industrial, commercial or scientific equipment" in its definition. However, since neither the Income Tax Officer, the Commissioner (Appeals), the Tribunal, nor the respondent before the Supreme Court relied upon this clause of the definition of "royalties" as FLIC tapes containing computer software programs are admittedly not "equipment", this difference was immaterial to the decision of the case.

As to ground (v), it has been contended on behalf of the petitioner that, in the majority judgment, the Supreme Court totally overlooked the question of law that was referred by the Tribunal to the High Court and decided in favour of the petitioner; that, instead, the majority judgment only cursorily observed that the full definition of "royalties" in paragraph 3(a) of Article 12 of the Convention included payments for "information concerning industrial, commercial or scientific experience", but did not clearly and decisively hold that the receipts received by the petitioner for the lease of FLIC tapes containing computer software programs involved in the present case are covered by that clause of the definition of "royalties". The majority judgment cursorily observed that the full definition of "royalties" in paragraph 3(a) of Article 12 of the Convention includes payments for "information concerning industrial, commercial or scientific experience". However, it did not clearly or decisively hold that the receipts received by the petitioner for the lease of FLIC tapes containing computer software programs, as involved in the present case, are covered by that clause of the definition of "royalties".

If a payment is in respect of rights to use the copyrights in a program, (e.g. by reproducing it and distributing it) then such a payment would be considered as a royalty. Other payments, however, only give a user the right to operate the program, where a consumer pays for a copy of computer program to use, this is not royalty payment. The Tribunal was not correct, and the High Court was correct, in determining that the receipts received by the petitioner for the lease of FLIC tapes containing computer software programs were not income from "royalties" but were "business profits", as claimed by the petitioner in its tax returns.

Lynne Oats and Emer Mulligaan-Principles of International Taxation, 7th edition. Bloomsbury Professional Tax. P.141 ref.

The majority judgment under review suffers from errors apparent on the face of the record. It proceeded on an erroneous assumption of a material fact and overlooked the material question of law and important aspects of the matter involved. The majority judgment under review was recalled and the appeals of the respondent were dismissed, upholding the judgments of the High Court. Review petitions were accepted accordingly with the observations that Double Taxation Treaties (DTTs) provide a crucial framework for fostering international economic cooperation, facilitating cross-border investments, and avoiding the dual taxation of income that can impede global commerce; that these treaties serve as "bridges between nations," designed to encourage economic collaboration while preventing conflicts over taxing rights; that they achieve this by allocating taxing authority between the source and resident states, promoting predictability for businesses and individuals engaged in international activities; that Courts in developing countries must interpret these treaties as dynamic instruments that balance the need for economic growth with the protection of their tax base, and that treaties should not be interpreted rigidly but should reflect their "object and purpose," ensuring they serve the broader goal of equitable economic development globally.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J. ---Through the present petitions, the petitioner seeks a review of the majority judgment (authored by Mr. Justice Qazi Faez Isa and concurred by the Hon'ble Chief Justice Mr. Justice Umar Ata Bandial) dated 8 September 2023 ("majority judgment"). By the majority judgment, the civil appeals filed by the respondent with leave of the Court against the judgments of the Sindh High Court, dated 12 October 2007 and 11 November 2010, were allowed. Consequently, the said judgments were set aside and the decision of the Income Tax Appellate Tribunal ("Tribunal") was restored. In disagreement, the minority judgment authored by one of us (Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J.) dismissed the appeals of the respondent and upheld the judgments of the Sindh High Court. Both the majority and minority judgments have been reported as CIT v. Inter Quest Informatics Services (2023 SCMR 1803).

2. As two members of the Bench that delivered the majority judgment under review have since retired, two of us (Athar Minallah and Aqeel Ahmed Abbasi, JJ.) now form part of the Bench. We are fully cognizant that we sit in review jurisdiction and that majority of us on this Bench were not part of the majority judgment under review. We are therefore not approaching this case influenced by our own perspective, which may not necessarily align with those who originally decided the case. But we have endeavoured to approach these review petitions with the utmost objectivity by adopting the perspective of the Judges who delivered the judgment under review, treating it as our own, and then carefully considering the grounds raised for its review. In our view, one of the most effective ways to ensure an objective approach in this regard is to first identify the settled principles upon which a judgment may be reviewed and then evaluate the grounds raised for review of the majority judgment in light of those principles.

3. A petition for review is neither an appeal nor a revision petition to a superior court but rather a request made to the same court to reconsider its decision on the limited grounds prescribed for review. It does not entail a rehearing or re-argument of the case adjudicated in the judgment under review. Since in the present review petitions the petitioner has invoked the ground of "error apparent on the face of the record" for the review of the majority judgment, it is essential to outline the settled principles governing this ground. The error, whether of fact or law, must be self-evident and readily discernible on the face of the record. it should not require meticulous examination or detailed analysis to uncover, nor should it need to be demonstrated through extensive or intricate arguments, or established through a lengthy process of reasoning on points where reasonable divergence of opinion may exist. Established instances falling within the scope of "error apparent on the face of the record" include judgments passed on an erroneous assumption of material facts or by overlooking a material question of fact or law or an important aspect of the matter, which, if noticed and considered earlier, would have direct bearing on the conclusions reached by the Court.

4. Since the judgment under review, encompassing the facts of the case, the arguments advanced by learned counsel for the parties and the questions of law involved, has already been reported, their reiteration is unnecessary. We shall, however, briefly state them to the extent required for the decision of the present review petitions.

5. The petitioner, a company incorporated in the Netherlands and thus a non-resident for income tax purposes in Pakistan, entered into two agreements with Schlumberger Seaco, Inc., a company operating in Pakistan. These agreements were titled the "Agreement for Lease of FLIC Tapes", dated 1 February 1986, and the "Software Rental Agreement" dated 1 January 1995 ("the Agreements"). The petitioner, in its tax returns, declared the receipts under the Agreements as "business profits" and sought exemption from income tax in Pakistan under Article 7 of the Convention Between the Kingdom of the Netherlands and the Islamic Republic of Pakistan for the Avoidance of Double Taxation and the Prevention of Fiscal Evasion with respect to Taxes on Income ("the Convention"). However, the tax department treated these receipts "royalties" under Article 12 of the Convention and subjected them to income tax at the rate of fifteen percent. The Income Tax Officer, Commissioner of Income Tax (Appeals) and the Tribunal concluded that the payments received by the petitioner fell within the definition of "royalties" under paragraph 3(a) and (b) of Article 12 of the Convention and were therefore liable to income tax in Pakistan. The petitioner challenged the assessment orders, appellate orders and Tribunal judgments before the High Court through references. The High Court ruled in favour of the petitioner, holding that the amounts received by the petitioner for leasing FLIC tapes (software programs) under the Agreements did not qualify as "royalties" under the Convention and were not subject to income tax in Pakistan. The respondent appealed to this Court and the majority judgment under review allowed the appeals, setting aside the High Court's judgments and restoring the Tribunal's judgments as well as the original and appellate orders of the Income Tax Officers. The minority judgment, however, dismissed the respondent's appeals and upheld the High Court's judgments. Hence, these review petitions.

6. Having heard the arguments of the learned counsel for the parties and examining the available record of the case, we find that by the majority judgment under review the Court decided the matter against the petitioner mainly for the following reasons: (i) it would not really matter to the petitioner if, under Article 12 of the Convention, it had to pay income tax in Pakistan, because the petitioner could, with the tax authority of the Netherlands, claim an adjustment of the tax amount paid in Pakistan; (ii) the High Court did not note that the petitioner had an alternative remedy under Article 24 of the Convention to present its case to the competent authority of its own country, the Netherlands, which, if agreed with the respondent's stance, could take up the matter with the competent authority of Pakistan; (iii) the petitioner did not explain and prove the nature of the receipts for which it claims tax exemption before the Income Tax Officer, the Commissioner (Appeals) and the Tribunal-the fact-finding forums-and it was unwarranted for the High Court to have delved into the nature of the receipts; (iv) the High Court incorrectly assumed the applicability of the OECD MC, as Article 12 of the Convention adheres to Article 12 of the UN MC and not to Article 12 of the OECD MC; and (v) the full definition of "royalties" in paragraph 3(a) of Article 12 of the Convention included payments for "information concerning industrial, commercial, or scientific experience".

7. As to grounds (i) and (ii), we find an error which is apparent on the face of the record. The possibility of adjustment of tax paid by the petitioner in Pakistan by the competent authority in the Netherlands or the availability of an alternate remedy before the competent authority in -the Netherlands, was no ground for the High Court to decline to answer the questions of law referred to it in the reference application filed by the petitioner. In this regard, this Court mistakenly regarded the two different jurisdictions of the High Court to be interchangeable: one under Article 199 of the Constitution and the other exercised in the present case, the reference jurisdiction under the Income Tax Ordinance. Under Article 199, the High Court may decline to exercise its jurisdiction if it finds that the petitioner has an alternate adequate remedy. However, it escaped notice of this Court that a reference application is akin to an appeal and the reference jurisdiction is similar to appellate jurisdiction, as held by this Court in M/s Squibb Pakistan v. CIT (2017 SCMR 1006). Therefore, neither a reference application can be dismissed, nor can the exercise of reference jurisdiction be declined, on the ground of availability of some alternate remedy.

8. So far as ground (iii) is concerned, it has been contended on behalf of the petitioner that this is the result of an erroneous assumption of a material fact. We find substance in this contention, as the error in this regard is also apparent on the face of the record. The nature of the receipts was explained by the petitioner in its tax returns, and there was no dispute regarding this fact before the Income Tax Officer, the Commissioner (Appeals) or the Tribunal. It was, and remains, an admitted fact that the receipts were rentals received by the petitioner for the lease of FLIC tapes containing computer software programs. The Tribunal, in its well-reasoned and considered orders, referred the following questions of law to the High Court:

i. Whether the Tribunal was right in holding that receipts of the applicant [petitioner] from the leasing FLIC Tapes were not "business profits".

ii. Whether the learned Appellate Tribunal was right in holding that receipts of the Applicant [petitioner] from leasing FLIC Tapes were income from "Royalty" and were not business profits.

It is self-evident from reading the above questions referred to the High Court by the Tribunal that the nature of the receipts was an admitted fact, and the questions referred were questions of law. Therefore the observations made by this Court in the majority judgment, that it was unwarranted for the High Court to have delved into the nature of the receipts, appear to have overlooked the said orders of the Tribunal. The High Court only dealt with and answered the aforementioned questions of law and did not determine the nature of the receipts, which was an admitted fact.

9. As for ground (iv), it has been contended on behalf of the petitioner that, in the majority judgment, it escaped the notice of this Court that there is no significant difference in the definition of "royalties" provided in Article 12 of the UN MC and Article 12 of the OECD MC; therefore, the reference to Article 12 of the OECD MC, instead of Article 12 of the UN MC, by the High Court was inconsequential. This contention, we find, is supported by a plain reading of the two definitions. The only material difference between the definitions of "royalties" in the UN MC and the OECD MC is that the former includes payments received as consideration "for the use of, or the right to use, industrial, commercial or scientific equipment" in its definition. However, since neither the Income Tax Officer, the Commissioner (Appeals), the Tribunal, nor the respondent before this Court relied upon this clause of the definition of "royalties" as FLIC tapes containing computer software programs are admittedly not "equipment", this difference was immaterial to the decision of the case.

10. As to ground (v), it has been contended on behalf of the petitioner that, in the majority judgment, this Court totally overlooked the question of law that was referred by the Tribunal to the High Court and decided in favour of the petitioner. Instead, the majority judgment only cursorily observed that the full definition of "royalties" in paragraph 3(a) of Article 12 of the Convention included payments for "information concerning industrial, commercial or scientific experience", but did not clearly and decisively hold that the receipts received by the petitioner for the lease of FLIC tapes containing computer software programs involved in the present case are covered by that clause of the definition of "royalties". In contrast, it has been contended that the minority judgment, after a detailed discussion, rightly held that the receipts involved in the present case do not fall within the scope of the said clause of the definition of "royalties".

11. Since this was, to our understanding, the most significant ground for review, we carefully read the majority judgment to evaluate its substance. We find that in the majority judgment this Court failed to determine whether the questions of law referred to and decided by the High Court were correctly resolved and whether the receipts received by the petitioner fall within the definition of "royalties", and if so, under which clause of the definition. We find the contention to be correct that the majority judgment cursorily observed that the full definition of "royalties" in paragraph 3(a) of Article 12 of the Convention includes payments for "information concerning industrial, commercial or scientific experience". However, it did not clearly or decisively hold that the receipts received by the petitioner for the lease of FLIC tapes containing computer software programs, as involved in the present case, are covered by that clause of the definition of "royalties".

12. The minority judgment, after a detailed examination of all clauses of the definition of "royalties" that could possibly bring the receipts received by the petitioner within the scope of "royalties" and thereby taxable in Pakistan, concluded that the receipts received by the petitioner for the lease of FLIC tapes containing computer software programs fall neither within the clause "information concerning industrial, commercial or scientific experience" nor within any other clause of the definition of "royalties". It is reiterated that if a payment is in respect of rights to use the copyrights in a program, (e.g. by reproducing it and distributing it) en such a payment would be considered as a royalty. Other payments, however, only give a user the right to operate the program, where a consumer pays for a copy of computer program to use, this is not royalty payment. Since both the majority and minority judgments have already been reported as CIT v. Inter Quest Informatics Services (2023 SCMR 1803), we find it unnecessary to reiterate all the discussions made in the minority judgment, especially when we fully agree with it and endorse the same. We are sure that had this Court considered the aspects of the definition of "royalties" as discussed in the minority judgment, it would not have rendered the majority judgment under review. For the same reasons as recorded in the minority judgment, we hold that the Tribunal was not correct, and the High Court was correct, in determining that the receipts received by the petitioner for the lease of FLIC tapes containing computer software programs were not income from "royalties" but were "business profits", as claimed by the petitioner in its tax returns.

13. For the above reasons, we find that the majority judgment under review suffers from errors apparent on the face of the record. It proceeded on an erroneous assumption of a material fact and overlooked the material question of law and important aspects of the matter involved. Had this Court noticed and considered them earlier, it would not have passed the majority judgment under review. Therefore, we accept the present review petitions, recall the majority judgment under review and dismiss the appeals of the respondent, upholding the judgments of the High Court.

14. Before parting with the judgement, we wish to reiterate that Double Taxation Treaties (DTTs) provide a crucial framework for fostering international economic cooperation, facilitating cross-border investments, and avoiding the dual taxation of income that can impede global commerce. Klaus Vogel emphasizes that these treaties serve as "bridges between nations," designed to encourage economic collaboration while preventing conflicts over taxing rights. They achieve this by allocating taxing authority between the source and resident states, promoting predictability for businesses and individuals engaged in international activities. Courts in developing countries must interpret these treaties as dynamic instruments that balance the need for economic growth with the protection of their tax base. Vogel argues that treaties should not be interpreted rigidly but should reflect their "object and purpose," ensuring they serve the broader goal of equitable economic development globally.

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---The judgment under review dated 12.5.2022 addresses the solitary question whether the first and second provisos to section 45B(2) of the Sales Tax Act, 1990 ("Act") are mandatory or directory provisions. The Court held that they were mandatory provisions and any order passed by the Commissioner (Appeals) under section 45B(2) beyond the maximum period of 180 days is an "invalid decision."

2. The department seeks review of the said judgment. It has been argued that the first and second provisos to section 45B(2) when considered as mandatory provisions, not only deprive the taxpayer of his right to appeal for no fault of the taxpayer, but are also adverse to the interest of the department because the consequence of the delay results in the acceptance of the appeal of the taxpayer, as held by the Appellate Tribunal Inland Revenue ("Tribunal"). It is argued that mandatory reading of the two provisos to section 45B(2) deprives both the parties to get their claims adjudicated on merits. He, therefore, argues that the statutory timeframe provided in the first and second provisos to section 45B(2) must be read as directory provisions. It is also pointed out that the impugned judgement proceeds on an erroneous and a mistaken assumption that there is no difference between the appellate and the original adjudication under the Act. Original adjudication is on the basis of the show cause notice initiated by the tax department against a taxpayer, while the appellate adjudication is when the taxpayer challenges the order-in-original passed against him in an appeal. The scheme of appellate adjudication cannot be treated at par with the original adjudication under section 36(3) of the Act or with a similar provision under section 179 of the Customs Act, 1969. He adds that reliance by this Court in the judgment under review on Mujahid Soap and Super Asia in holding first and second provisos to section 45B(2) to be mandatory provisions is an error apparent on the record as these cases deal with the scheme of original adjudication under the respective laws and not with the concept of appellate adjudication. Learned counsel also relied on a recent judgment of a three member bench of this Court in A.J. Traders, which has disagreed with the view expressed in the judgment under review considering similar provisions, as the first and second provisos to section 45B(2), under the Customs Act, 1969 to be a directory provision. It is noted for completion of record that the interest of the respondent taxpayer is no different than that of the petitioner as both stand equally aggrieved of the interpretation rendered by the judgment under review to section 45B(2) of the Act. Hence the arguments of the learned counsel for the petitioner have been considered to be on behalf of both the parties.

3. The background giving rise to the instant petition is that the taxpayer was issued a show cause notice for violation of section 25 of the Act on 18.1.2011 and thereafter an order-in-original was passed against the taxpayer on 22.2.2011. The taxpayer filed an appeal before the Commissioner (Appeals), which was dismissed on merits. Thereafter the taxpayer approached the Appellate Tribunal Inland Revenue, Islamabad and vide order dated 05.9.2012 the appeal of the respondent taxpayer was accepted on the ground that the Commissioner (Appeals) had to decide the matter within the statutory timeframe of a maximum of 180 days under section 45B(2) of the Act and as the same was decided beyond the said period, hence the order passed by the Commissioner (Appeals) was declared to be "void ab initio nullity in the eyes of law." It further held that "it will be deemed that no order has been passed by the appellate authority and resultantly the appeal filed before that forum will stand accepted." The said order was challenged in a tax reference by the tax department before the Lahore High Court and vide order dated 0 1. 6.2021, the matter was decided against the tax department by holding that the first and second provisos to section 45B(2) of the Act were mandatory provisions, hence the order passed by the Commissioner (Appeals) was void. This Court upheld the view of the High Court in the impugned judgment under review and declared the first and second provisos to section 45B(2) of the Act to be mandatory provisions and thus the decision of the Commissioner (Appeals) to be "invalid."

4. We have heard the learned counsel for the petitioner, examined the law and the afore-cited case law relied upon in the judgment under review. Following provisions of law under the Act and the Customs Act, 1969 are relevant for the purpose of understanding the distinction between original and appellate adjudication.

Original Adjudication:

Section 36 of the Act.

36. Recovery of tax not levied or short-levied or erroneously refunded.-(1)...

(3) The officer of Inland Revenue empowered in this behalf shall, after considering the objections of the person served with a notice to show cause under subsection (1) or subsection (2), determine the amount of tax or charge payable by him and such person shall pay the amount so determined. Provided that order under this section shall be made within one and twenty hundred days of issuance of show cause notice or within such extended period as the Commissioner may, for reasons to be recorded in writing, fix, provided that such extended period shall in no case exceed sixty days:

Provided further that any period during which the proceedings are adjourned on account of a stay order or Alternative Dispute Resolution proceedings or the time taken through adjournment by the petitioner not exceeding thirty days shall be excluded from the computation of the periods specified in the first proviso.

Section 179, Customs Act, 1969.

179. Power of adjudication.- (1) ...

(2) ...

(3) The cases shall be decided within one hundred and twenty days of the issuance of show cause notice or within such period extended by the Collector for which reasons shall be recorded in writing, but such extended period shall in no case exceed sixty days:

Provided that any period during which the proceedings are adjourned on account of a stay order or alternative dispute resolution proceedings or the time taken through adjournment by the petitioner not exceeding thirty days, shall be excluded for the computation of aforesaid periods.

Appellate Adjudication:

Section 45B(2) of the Act.

45B. Appeals.- (1) ...

(2) The Commissioner Inland Revenue (Appeals) may, after giving both parties to the appeal an opportunity of being heard, pass such order as he thinks fit, confirming, varying, altering, setting aside or annulling the decision or order appealed against:

Provided that such order shall be passed not later than one hundred and twenty days from the date of filing of appeal or within such extended period as the Commissioner (Appeals) may, for reasons to be recorded in writing fix:

Provided further that such extended period shall, in no case, exceed sixty days:

Provided further that any period during which the proceedings are adjourned on account of a stay order or Alternative Dispute Resolution proceedings or the time taken through adjournment by the petitioner not exceeding thirty days shall be excluded from the computation of aforesaid periods.

Section 194-B, Customs Act, 1969

194-B. Orders of Appellate Tribunal.- (1) ...

Provided that the appeal shall be decided within sixty days of filing the appeal or within such extended period as the Tribunal may, for reasons to be recorded in writing, fix:

Review of the above provisions show that section 179 of the Customs Act, 1969 deals with original adjudication and is in pari materia with the erstwhile section 36(3) of the Sales Tax Act, 1990 and not with section 45B(2) as held by the judgement under review while discussing the importance of Mujahid Soap to the instant case in the following manner:

A similar view has already been taken in the case of Messers Mujahid Soap and Chemical Industries (Pvt) Limited v. Customs Appellate Tribunal, Bench-I, Islamabad and others (2019 SCMR 1735) where the provision under consideration was Section 179 of the Customs Act, 1969, which is pari materia to the provisions under consideration under the Act, which reads as follows:

"S. 179(3) The cases shall be decided within one hundred and twenty days of the issuance of show cause notice or within such period extended by the Collector for which reasons shall be recorded in writing, but such extended period shall in no case exceed sixty days."

Second, the reliance placed by the judgment under review on Mujahid Soap and Super Asia is misplaced as both these case deal with original adjudication which has a different object, purpose and scheme as discussed later in the judgment.

5. Recently, a three member bench of this Court in A.J.Traders has held that the timeframe in section 194-B of the Customs Act, 1969 (which deals with appellate adjudication under Customs Act, 1969) is directory and disagreed with the view taken in the impugned judgement under review in the following manner:

8. If a taxpayer's appeal is not decided within the stipulated period his appeal cannot be negated and the taxpayer non-suited on this score. To hold otherwise would be eminently unfair and give the State a premium for its own functionary's non-compliance with the law. Article 4 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan ('the Constitution') accords the protection of law and to be treated in accordance with law to be the inalienable right of every citizen and also of every other person for the time being in Pakistan. The right to be dealt with in accordance with the law is further fortified by Article 10A of the Constitution which stipulates a fair trial and due process as a Fundamental Right. These rights cannot be negated or diluted by statute, and if any law purports to do so it shall to such extent be void, as stipulated in Article 8(1) and (2) of the Constitution. Therefore, it cannot be stated that an order belatedly passed on a taxpayer's appeal is a void order and/or a nullity.

9. In the case of Mujahid Soap and Chemical Industries (Pvt.) Ltd v Customs Appellate Tribunal section 179 of the Customs Act, 1969, which attends to initial adjudication, and not an appeal, was considered and this Court concluded that since adjudication 'was beyond time as prescribed in section 179(3) of the Act. Therefore, the said decision is invalid.' The material distinguishing point in this case was that the initial adjudication with regard to the show cause notice was delayed. In other words the State's functionary, that is, the Deputy Collector (Adjudication), had delayed in deciding the show cause notice. Belatedly adjudicating a show cause notice is not the same as belatedly deciding an appeal preferred against a purported liability, because then the appellate authority's tardiness, whether intentional or otherwise, will frustrate the taxpayer's appeal, which is not the intention of the law, nor could it be as it would violate Articles 4 and 10A of the Constitution.

10. That as regards the view expressed in the Sarwaq Traders case by a two-member Bench we, with the greatest of respect, cannot bring ourselves to agree therewith to the extent that the said decision contradicts with what has been held in the cited precedents and by us. We also cannot, with profound respect, accept the stated rationale for prescribing a time frame which, to use the words of the learned judges is, 'that the taxpayer satisfies its liability and the Department is able to collect revenue'. This rationale effectively presupposes that the taxpayer is liable which, in our humble opinion, is not what the statute says nor what can be implied therefrom. The Legislature in prescribing a period within which an appeal should, or must, be decided obligates the appellate authority. Therefore, if there are any consequences in deciding an appeal beyond the prescribed period the same may only be visited upon the State functionaries, and not on an appellant taxpayer.

6. It is important to underline that the test to ascertain whether a provision of a statute is directory or mandatory, the principle as laid down in Super Asia provides that "perhaps the clearest indicator is the object and purpose of the statute and the provision in question. It is the duty of the court to garner the real intent of the legislature as expressed in the law itself." The legislative intent can be drawn by consideration of the entire statute, its nature, its object and the consequences whether it will cause serious inconvenience or injustice to persons as a result of construing the provision in one way or the other. If by holding a provision mandatory serious general inconvenience will be created for innocent persons of the general public without furthering the object of the enactment, the same should be construed as directory.Purposive interpretation of a statute further helps assess and understand the real intent of the legislation. Under this interpretative tool, every statute has a purpose, without which it is meaningless. This purpose, or ratio legis, is made up of the objectives, the goals, the interests, the values, the policy, and the function that the statute is designed to actualize. The Court must give the statute's language a meaning that best realizes its purpose. With this understanding when we examine the relevant provisions of the Act. The object, policy and purpose of original adjudication under the erstwhile section 36(3) of the Act which requires that the order shall be made within a maximum statutory period of 180 days is to ensure that the show cause notice issued by the tax department is decided expeditiously so that tax recovery can be effected at the earliest and also the sword of alleged tax liability must not hang on the head of a taxpayer indefinitely. Therefore, if the tax department fails to decide the show cause notice within the maximum period provided under the law, the proceedings so initiated against a taxpayer come to an end. It is for this reason that section 36(3) of the Act has already be declared to be a mandatory provision by this Court in Super Asia.

7. The object, policy and purpose of the first and second provisos to section 45(B)(2) of the Act is totally different as it deals with the appellate adjudication. The said provision is invoked by a taxpayer by filing an appeal against the order-in-original. Appellate adjudication, as opposed to original adjudication, takes a different focus, as it deals with the right to appeal of a taxpayer. Right to appeal of a taxpayer is a right that flows from the constitutional rights of access to justice and fair trial guaranteed to a taxpayer under Articles 9 and 10-A of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973. It is axiomatic that no statute can muffle fundamental rights and must at all times advance public interest and remain Constitution compliant. While the action of the tax department against a citizen can be regulated through a timeframe, it is not permissible to do so when the citizen has approached the tax department in an appeal. The fundamental rights of the citizen stand invoked and come to his rescue which is not so in the case of a tax department. With these considerations in mind the statutory timeframe provided for the appellate adjudication under section 45(B)(2) can only be directory, and to conceive it otherwise, would cause injustice and irreparable harm to a taxpayer who is deprived of the right to appeal. We, therefore hold that the first and second provisos to section 45(B)(2) are directory provisions and lapse of the statutory timeframe will not affect the proceedings before the Commissioner (Appeals) who shall conclude the appeal in accordance with law by deciding the appeal on its merits. We also hold that inspite of the first and second provisos to section 45(B)(2) being directory provisions, the Commissioner (Appeals) must make reasonable effort to decide the appeal of the taxpayer within the maximum statutory timeframe, subject to the third proviso to section 45B(2). In case the taxpayer unduly delays the prosecution of the appeal without sufficient cause, the Commissioner (Appeals) is well within its power to proceed ex-parte against the taxpayer. Commissioner (Appeals) must also give reasons if the appeal is not decided within the statutory timeframe under the proviso to section 45(B)(2), so that the legislative aspiration to achieve effective and efficient tax governance is also realized even though such a timeframe is only directory in nature.

8. We also note that the argument that similar matters be marked to a larger bench in the light of WAK Limited has rightly been turned down by the judgment under review as the issue in the cited case is relating to original adjudication and therefore different and totally unrelated to the instant matter of appellate adjudication under the provision of law discussed in this case. Similar view has also been expressed in A.J.Traders.

9. Having considered the recent view of the Court in A.J. Traders and for the above reasons, the judgment under review, subject to para 7 above, is recalled and this review petition is partly allowed. It is declared that first and second provisos to section 45B(2) of the Act are directory provisions and do not deprive the taxpayer of his right to appeal or deny the tax department the right to adjudicate the matter on merits by virtue of lapse of the maximum statutory timeframe. The case is, therefore, remanded to the Tribunal, where the appeal of the taxpayer shall be deemed to be pending, with the direction to the Tribunal to expeditiously decide the appeal on merits.

it and have appended my opinion.

Judge

AYESHA A. MALIK, J.---I have read the opinion of Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J., however, I do not concur with the same.

2. The primary ground for filing the review is the argument that the adjournments taken by Respondent No. 1, taxpayer during the proceedings before the Commissioner (Appeals) should have been considered in terms of Section 45-B(2), third proviso of the Sales Tax Act, 1990 (Act). The Petitioners' case is that the appeal was filed on 22.03.2011 by the Taxpayer. They sought adjournments on 19.07.2011, 16.08.2011, 13.09.2011 and 20.09.2011 and the case was finally decided on 21.09.2011. That if the time taken over adjournments is excluded as per the third proviso of Section 45-B(2) of the Act then the appeal was decided within the prescribed time, as the delay is of three days.

3. The record shows that the given dates of adjournment were not considered while calculating the time period under Section 45-B of the Act by the Appellate Tribunal Inland Revenue, Islamabad Bench (Tribunal) or the High Court. Given that this is a factual matter, it is necessary for the Tribunal to consider the dates of adjournments for the purposes of calculating the delay in terms of Section 45-B of the Act. Under the circumstances, this review is allowed, the judgment dated 12.05.2022 is recalled and accordingly, the orders of the Lahore High Court, Rawalpindi Bench and the Tribunal are set aside. The case is remanded to the Tribunal where the appeal of the Taxpayer shall be deemed to be pending with the direction that the Tribunal decides afresh the issue of the timeframe as prescribed in Section 45-B of the Act with reference to the adjournments sought. Order accordingly.

OPINION OF THE REFEREE JUDGE

SYED HASAN AZHAR RIZVI, J.---The then Honorable Acting Chief Justice of Pakistan, vide order dated 21.05.2024, was pleased to direct that this matter be placed before me as a Referee Judge due to difference of opinion between a two-member bench of this Court. I have had the privilege of going through the scholarly opinions authored by my learned colleagues and have also heard the arguments of the learned counsel for the parties on 29.10.2024.

2. This review petition was heard by a two-member bench of this Court, comprising Justice Syed Mansoor Ali Shah and Justice Ayesha A. Malik. Justice Syed Mansoor Ali Shah partly allowed the petition and remanded the case to the Tribunal. However, Justice Ayesha A. Malik allowed the petition in its entirety and remanded the matter on the ground that the period of adjournments sought by the tax-payer was not considered by the Tribunal.

3. While partly accepting the review petition, the reasoning that prevailed with Justice Syed Mansoor Ali Shah was that the first and second provisos to Section 45-B(2) of the Sales Tax Act, 1990 ("the Act") are directory provisions. These provisos do not deprive the tax-payer of the right to appeal, nor do they prevent the tax department from adjudicating the matter on its merits due to the lapse of the maximum statutory timeframe. Whereas, Justice Ayesha A. Malik allowed the review petition and remanded the matter to the Tribunal on the ground that the adjournments sought by Respondent No. 1, the tax-payer, during the proceedings before the Commissioner (Appeals) should have been considered in accordance with Section 45-B(2) third proviso of the Act. These adjournments were not taken into account when calculating the time period under Section 45-B of the Act by the Tribunal.

4. I agree with understanding of Justice Mansoor Ali Shah qua the A.J. Traders case (2019 SCMR 1735), in which it was held that the timeframe specified in Section 194-B of the Customs Act, 1969, regarding appellate adjudication, is directory in nature. The rationale is that if a tax-payer's appeal is not resolved within the stipulated period, such a delay does not negate the appeal, nor can the tax-payer be non-suited on that basis. Thus, it cannot be asserted that an order passed belatedly on a tax-payer's appeal is void or a nullity.

5. I subscribe to the view taken by Justice Syed Mansoor Ali Shah that the first and second provisos to section 45(B)(2) of the Act should be treated as directory provisions. This interpretation effectively safeguards the taxpayer's constitutional rights while promoting efficient and fair tax governance. It serves the public interest by preventing procedural timelines from being used against tax-payers in a way that would compromise fairness and justice in the appellate system.

6. It is a settled legal principle that provisions should not be interpreted in a manner that imposes undue hardship on innocent members of the public or undermines the legislative intent. If holding a provision as mandatory would create significant inconvenience without furthering the objectives of the enactment, it should be construed as directory. Thus, provisions must not be interpreted in a way that limits or undermines fundamental rights. Strict enforcement of statutory timelines for tax-payer appeals could jeopardize these rights and potentially deny tax-payers a fair opportunity to seek redressal. Therefore, declaring these provisions as directory is crucial to maintain due process and uphold the constitutional principles of justice.

7. In view of the above legal position, I concur with the conclusion arrived at by my learned brother Justice Syed Mansoor Ali Shah and partly allow the Review petition.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---In enforcing an arbitration agreement, 'the courts' role is not to pre-empt the jurisdiction of the arbitrators but to support the arbitral process and ensure that the parties adhere to their agreement'. By prioritizing arbitration, courts uphold the principle of party autonomy and reinforce the parties' choice to resolve their disputes outside traditional litigation. This approach not only respects their agreement but also addresses the inefficiencies inherent in conventional judicial proceedings. Courts should adopt a resolute stance of non-interference, encouraging arbitration and other forms of alternative dispute resolution (ADR), such as mediation, as the preferred modes of resolving disputes. This judicial mindset is particularly vital for our country, where an overburdened judicial system and burgeoning case backlogs impose immense economic costs on both the judiciary and society. By respecting arbitration agreements and fostering an environment conducive to swift dispute resolution, courts can play a pivotal role in alleviating this crisis. Courts in Pakistan must therefore embrace this ethos, recognizing that promoting arbitration is not merely a legal necessity but also an economic and commercial imperative for ensuring the country's progress and prosperity. It is with this pro-arbitration approach that we proceed to address and decide the questions raised in the instant case.

2. Briefly, the relevant facts are that Qatar Lubricants Company W.L.L. (QALCO) and Fawad Naeem Rana ("respondents") filed a petition before the Lahore High Court, invoking its jurisdiction as a Company Bench under the Companies Act, 2017 ("Companies Act"). Through the said petition, they sought, inter alia, rectification of the register of sharers under Section 126 of the Companies Act and action against Atif Naeem Rana and Sameen Naeem Rana ("petitioners") under Section 127 of the Companies Act. The respondents alleged that the petitioners had fraudulently secured the transfer of the respondents' shares in Kausar Rana Resources (Pvt.) Ltd. (KRR) in the register of sharers, relying on an illegal and void agreement dated 12.04.2020 ("agreement"). The petitioners appeared before the Company Bench in the said petition and filed an application under Section 34 of the Arbitration Act, 1940 ("Arbitration Act"), seeking a stay of the proceedings on the respondents' petition and for referring the matter to arbitration by any retired Judge of a High Court or the Supreme Court, in accordance with clause (13) of the agreement. The respondents opposed the application by filing a written reply. Through a judgment dated 24.06.2024 ("impugned judgment"), the Company Bench dismissed the petitioners' application. Consequently, the petitioners have filed the present petition for leave to appeal.

3. A perusal of the impugned judgment reveals that the Company Bench dismissed the petitioners' application primarily on the ground that the petitioner Sameen Naeem Rana - one of the beneficiaries of the alleged fraudulent transfer of shares - was not a party to the agreement containing the arbitration clause. The Company Bench concluded that the right to arbitrate could not be enforced by a person who is not a party to the agreement. However, we find this reasoning unsustainable. Clause (1) of the agreement explicitly provides that "QALCO shall relinquish all its rights in KRR and transfer all of its existing shares in Kausar Rana Resources (Pvt.) Ltd. [KRR], including shares of nominee director, to Mr. Atif Naeem Rana - CEO or a nominee of the same". Pursuant to this clause, the shares were transferred to the petitioner Sameen Naeem Rana, who acted as the nominee of the petitioner Atif Naeem Rana - a party and signatory to the agreement containing the arbitration clause. Thus, Sameen Naeem Rana derives his rights and title in the transferred shares under and through Atif Naeem Rana. Accordingly, he is subject to all rights and obligations arising from the agreement signed by Atif Naeem Rana, including the right to enforce the arbitration clause contained therein.

4. In addition to our above finding, both learned counsel for the parties reached a consensus during arguments that the matter of the alleged fraudulent transfer of shares may be referred to an Arbitrator, to be appointed by this Court, with a direction to conclude the arbitral proceedings within a specified timeframe. Furthermore, they requested an order from this Court directing that the Award made by the Arbitrator be filed before the Company Bench, rather than the Civil Court, to ensure the matter is resolved more effectively and expeditiously.

5. In addition to the Court adopting a pro-arbitration approach, this stance is also bolstered by the framework of the Companies Act, which, through its preamble, affirmatively advocates for alternative mechanisms to ensure the expeditious resolution of corporate disputes. Furthermore, under Section 278, the Act explicitly encourages companies to refer any existing or future disputes, whether between companies or involving any other persons, to arbitration. Therefore, on the basis of the above finding, our pro-arbitration approach and the consensus of the learned counsel for the parties, we convert this petition into an appeal and allow the same. The impugned judgment is set aside, and the petitioners' application under Section 34 of the Arbitration Act is accepted. The dispute concerning the alleged fraudulent transfer of shares is referred to arbitration and meanwhile, the proceedings on the respondents' petition under Sections 126 and 127, etc., of the Companies Act before the Company Bench shall remain stayed.

6. Since the parties themselves could not arrive at a consensus on the name of an Arbitrator, we proposed the name of Mr. Justice (R) Maqbool Baqar as the Arbitrator, to which neither party raised any objection. Therefore, with the consent of the parties, the matter is referred to the said Arbitrator. We expect that the Arbitrator will conduct the arbitral proceedings as expeditiously as possible and endeavour to decide the matter preferably within a period of four months from the date of the submission of claims by the parties before him. In case the said learned Arbitrator declines to accept the assignment, the parties are free to approach the Company Bench through a proper application for the appointment of a new Arbitrator. So far as the seat and venue of the arbitration are concerned, it was suggested by the learned counsel for the petitioners that the seat and venue ought to be Lahore or Islamabad, whereas learned counsel for the respondents suggested that it could be Karachi or Dubai. We leave this question to the discretion and decision of the Arbitrator.

7. As for the request to make an order to file the Award before the Company Bench, rather than the Civil Court, it cannot be answered in the affirmative simply based on the consent of the parties; as it relates to the jurisdiction of the Company Bench, which cannot be conferred by consent of the parties or by an order of this Court. Therefore, we examine the legality of the same considering the relevant provisions of the Arbitration Act and the Companies Act.

8. As per Section 14(2) of the Arbitration Act, the award made by an arbitrator is to be filed in Court and the "Court", as defined in Section 2(c) of the Arbitration Act, means a Civil Court having jurisdiction to decide the question forming the subject-matter of the reference [to arbitration] if the same had been the subject-matter of a suit. The question of law before us, therefore, is: Whether the Court, i.e., a Company Bench of the High Court, established by the Companies Act qualifies as a Civil Court having jurisdiction to decide the question forming the subject matter of the reference to arbitration if the same had been the subject matter of a suit.

9. Generally, a civil court is a court that has jurisdiction to adjudicate disputes between individuals or entities concerning their civil rights and obligations, while a criminal court is a court that has jurisdiction to hear cases involving the commission of offences in order to determine the guilt or innocence of the accused. Although Article 175 of the Constitution, which authorises the establishment of courts and the conferment jurisdiction on them by law, does not explicitly name or label the courts established by law as general or special courts, it is common in legal parlance to distinguish between the two. Courts with general jurisdiction over a broad range of matters are referred to as courts of general jurisdiction or general courts, while courts with jurisdiction limited to specific matters are referred to as courts of special jurisdiction or special courts.

10. Accordingly, the Civil Courts established under the Civil Courts Ordinance, 1962 are referred to as general courts of civil jurisdiction or general civil courts, as they have been conferred jurisdiction under Section 9 of the Code of Civil Procedure 1908 to try all suits of a civil nature except those whose cognizance is expressly or impliedly barred. Similarly, the Criminal Courts established under the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898 are referred to as general courts of criminal jurisdiction or general criminal courts, as they have been conferred general jurisdiction under Sections 28 and 29 of the said Code to try all offences under the Pakistan Penal Code, 1860 or other criminal laws. Conversely, courts such as Banking Courts, Consumer Courts and Labour Courts, etc., established under different statutes and conferred jurisdiction by those statutes to deal with specific matters, are referred to as civil courts of special jurisdiction or special civil courts. Likewise, Anti-Terrorism Courts, Anti-Corruption Courts and Accountability Courts, etc., established under various criminal laws and conferred jurisdiction limited to specific offences, are referred to as criminal courts of special jurisdiction or special criminal courts.

11. The Court, i.e., a Company Bench of the High Court, established under Section 5 of the Companies Act, has been conferred specific jurisdiction to adjudicate disputes between individuals or entities concerning their civil rights and obligations relating to companies and matters connected therewith. Section 4 gives Companies Act an overriding effect over any other law. The jurisdiction conferred on the Court by the Companies Act is, therefore, civil in nature. Consequently, the Court established under the Companies Act qualifies as a civil court of special jurisdiction and may appropriately be referred to as a special civil court.

12. Since Section 2(c) of the Arbitration Act itself does not specify, it requires determination whether the term "Civil Court" mentioned therein refers exclusively to civil courts of general jurisdiction or also encompasses civil courts of special jurisdiction. If we hold that the term "Civil Court" refers exclusively to civil courts of general jurisdiction, it will amount to reading into the provisions of Section 2(c) of the Arbitration Act additional words that are not used by the legislature. We are cognizant of the lawful use of the interpretational tool of "reading into" the provisions of a law to give effect to the manifest legislative intent and purpose or to save the provisions from unconstitutionality by giving it a constitutionally compliant meaning, scope and effect. However, in this case, we find no justifiable reason to read anything additional into the provisions of Section 2(c) of the Arbitration Act. In fact, we find the position to be the converse: if we were to adopt such a restrictive interpretation, it would limit the scope of the Arbitration Act and frustrate the legislative intent and purpose, which is to provide an alternative dispute resolution mechanism for civil disputes. Such an interpretation would unnecessarily restrict its application to only those civil disputes that are adjudicable in civil courts of general jurisdiction. However, if it is held that the term "Civil Court" mentioned in Section 2(c) of the Arbitration Act also includes civil courts of special jurisdiction, it would give full effect to the legislative intent and purpose.

13. The latter view also aligns with the provisions of Section 20 of the Arbitration Act, which permits an application to file an arbitration agreement in a court having jurisdiction over the matter to which the arbitration agreement relates. Such a court may either be a civil court of general jurisdiction or a civil court with special jurisdiction over the relevant matter. It is quite common that the legislature, from time to time, carves out specific matters from the general jurisdiction of Civil Courts established under the Civil Courts Ordinance, 1962, either to ensure their expeditious resolution or to address the need for specialised expertise. Jurisdiction over such matters is conferred upon Special Courts established for this purpose. However, the fact that these matter are adjudicated by special civil courts established under special laws, rather than by general civil courts established under the general law, does not alter their classification as civil matters nor does it change the nature of the civil rights or obligations involved.

14. Similarly, the word "suit" used in Section 2(c) of the Arbitration Act cannot be given a narrow and restrictive meaning, as it refers to the usual mode of instituting a civil proceeding to enforce a civil right or obligation, and thus encompasses all such modes provided by law. It means the original proceeding in the court of first instance. While some laws provide for the initiation of proceedings through a suit, others allow for initiation through application, petition, reference or complaint. The name given to the document initiating the proceedings cannot be the determining factor in ascertaining either the nature of the jurisdiction exercised by the court or the classification of the court exercising such jurisdiction.

15. If the term "Civil Court" in Section 2(c) of the Arbitration Act were interpreted to refer exclusively to civil courts of general jurisdiction, all civil matters adjudicable by special courts under specific laws would fall outside the scope of the Arbitration Act. Such an interpretation would preclude applications for filing award or arbitration agreements in courts having special jurisdiction over the relevant matters, thereby frustrating the legislative intent and purpose of the Arbitration Act, which is to provide an alternative dispute resolution mechanism in civil matters. Section 2(c) of the Arbitration Act excludes from the definition of "Court" only one civil court of special jurisdiction, namely, the Small Cause Court, and no other civil court. Courts exercising civil jurisdiction in relation to specific matters, such as the Court established under the Companies Act, cannot be read into the exception clause of Section 2(c) of the Arbitration Act. Therefore, it is our considered view that the term "Civil Court" mentioned in Section 2(c) of the Arbitration Act does not refer exclusively to civil courts of general jurisdiction but also encompasses civil courts of special jurisdiction.

16. This conclusion aligns with the pro-arbitration bias firmly established in the enforcement of international arbitral awards, which, in our considered view, is equally applicable to domestic disputes. Where parties agree to take their disputes to arbitration, they expect the court to hold them to their bargain. It is underlined that the word "bias" used in the work "pro-arbitration bias" is not used in the negative or prejudicial sense. Instead, it reflects a judicial and a policy inclination towards supporting arbitration as a preferred method for resolving disputes. This tendency arises from recognizing arbitration's benefits, such as efficiency, flexibility and the ability to deliver tailored outcomes. Applying this pro-arbitration bias to domestic arbitration advances the overarching objectives of arbitration law, including efficiency, party autonomy and minimising judicial interference. Requiring a party to an arbitration agreement to first approach a civil court of general jurisdiction for enforcement of the arbitration agreement and then, if the arbitral proceedings fail, to revert to a civil court of special jurisdiction, introduces unnecessary delay, inconvenience and expense. Such a convoluted process undermines the purpose of arbitration as an expeditious and cost-effective mechanism for dispute resolution. Adopting a pro-arbitration bias in domestic disputes is also essential to addressing the challenges posed by the overwhelming backlog of cases in our judicial system, particularly at the level of courts of original jurisdiction (trial courts).

17. The dispute in the present case, as well as the subject matter of the reference to arbitration, pertains to the alleged fraudulent transfer of shares and the rectification of the register of members (shareholders), which falls exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Court established under the Companies Act. Accordingly, we accept the request of learned counsel for the parties and direct that the Award made by the Arbitrator be filed before the Company Bench for further proceedings in accordance with the Arbitration Act.

18. Before parting with this judgment, we wish to underscore the significant economic benefits of arbitration as a cost-effective, efficient and confidential means of resolving disputes. Arbitration alleviates the burden on national courts, enhances business productivity and provides a faster resolution process, thereby minimising disruptions to businesses. Furthermore, the ability to enforce international arbitration awards strengthens trade and commerce, while arbitration's stable and predictable dispute resolution mechanism promotes investor confidence, making the country an attractive destination for foreign investment. These factors collectively foster a favourable business environment, drive economic growth and enhance the country's competitiveness on the global stage. In this context, we are informed that a draft bill for a new Arbitration Act, prepared by the Law and Justice Commission of Pakistan, was submitted to the Federal Government through the Ministry of Law and Justice on 2 May 2024. This draft bill aims to modernise the out dated arbitral dispute resolution framework, which has remained largely unchanged since 1940. We are optimistic that the Federal Government will prioritise the larger economic interest of the nation and ensure the swift enactment of fresh arbitral legislation to provide an effective and contemporary dispute resolution mechanism for the people. The office is directed to dispatch a copy of this judgment to the Attorney-General of Pakistan for onward correspondence and as a reminder to the concerned Ministry.

MH/K-1/SC Order accordingly.

Date of hearing: 13th January, 2025.

ORDER

At the very outset, the learned counsel for the petitioners submitted that the present regular bench of the Court cannot hear these cases, as they involve a challenge to the constitutionality of a law, namely, subsection (2) of Section 221-A of the Customs Act, 1969. When asked why this bench cannot hear these cases, the learned counsel referred to the provisions of Article 191A, which was added to the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan through the 26th Constitutional Amendment. In response to the petitioners' objection regarding the lack of jurisdiction of the present bench of the Court, the learned counsel for the respondents contended that Article 191A, the basis of the objection regarding jurisdiction, is constitutionally invalid as it infringes upon the salient features of the Constitution, including the independence of the judiciary and the separation of powers among the three organs of the State. He further submitted that a constitutionally invalid amendment cannot oust the constitutionally valid conferment of jurisdiction on the regular benches of the Court.

2. When asked how the present bench of the Court can decide upon the constitutional validity of the newly added Article 191A, the learned counsel for the respondents took the position that since the objection raised and the basis thereof pertain to the jurisdiction of the present bench, it must be decided by it. In support of his stance, he referred to Sabir Shah v. Shad Muhammad Khan (PLD 1995 SC 66), Fazlul Quader Chowdhry v. Abdul Haque (PLD 1963 SC 486) and Marbury v. Madison (5 US 137 [ 1803]) and sought time to further assist the Court on this point.

3. Given the objection raised and the reply thereto, we find that it would be necessary to first decide upon the same before proceeding further in the matter at hand. Therefore, the learned counsel for the parties are granted time to prepare their arguments and assist the Court on the said points. The hearing for arguments on those points is adjourned to 16.01.2025.

Date of hearing: 31st January, 2025.

ORDER

Background

Land measuring 6,937 kanals was acquired by the Water and Sanitation Authority ("WASA"), an agency of the Lahore Development Authority ("LDA"), in three mauzajat of Tehsil and District Lahore - Babu Sabu, Jhuggian Nagra, and Niaz Beg - in 1991- 1992 through two awards dated 24.12.1991 and 23.02.1992. The land was acquired for the public purpose of setting up a Wastewater Treatment Plant ("WWTP") to treat the contaminated wastewater flowing into the River Ravi.

Funding Challenges and Revised Plans

2. Initially, the WWTP was to be funded by the World Bank, but negotiations did not materialize, and nearly three decades have passed without any progress on the ground. The Managing Director, WASA, and the Secretary, Housing and Urban Development, Punjab, submit that fresh loan negotiations are now being pursued with the French Development Agency ("AFD"). In this regard, it is submitted by MD, WASA, that Form PC-1[1] is being put up for approval before the Provincial Development Working Party ("PDWP"), Central Development Working Party ("CDWP"), and the Executive Committee of the National Economic Council ("ECNEC") - key bodies responsible for economic planning, infrastructure development, and public sector investments. It is further submitted that the ECNEC approval is expected by late August 2025, and, if granted, loan negotiations with AFD will commence in February 2026.

Environmental Significance of WWTP

3. It is important to underline that a WWTP is crucial for preventing contaminated water from entering River Ravi, ensuring environmental sustainability and public health. If left untreated, contaminated water introduces harmful pollutants, degrading water quality, harming aquatic life, and disrupting ecosystems. These effects, in turn, threaten biodiversity and essential river services, including drinking water, irrigation, and recreation. The WWTP will safeguard the river's ecological integrity and protect the livelihoods of communities dependent on it.

The Importance of River Ravi

4. The River Ravi, which flows through Lahore, Pakistan, holds immense ecological, cultural, and historical significance. As one of the five major rivers of the Punjab region, it has been a lifeline for agriculture, providing water for irrigation and supporting millions of livelihoods. However, urbanization, industrial pollution, and untreated wastewater have severely degraded its health, endangering both ecosystems and human communities. Protecting and restoring the River Ravi is not only essential for environmental sustainability but also for preserving Lahore's heritage, ensuring water security, and improving the overall quality of life for its residents.

Pakistan's Climate Vulnerability and WWTP's Role

5. According to the Global Climate Risk Index, Pakistan is the 8th most vulnerable country in the world. It's geographical location, socio-economic challenges, and heavy reliance on climate-sensitive sectors like agriculture and water make it highly susceptible to climate-related risks as it ranks 23rd out of 194 countries as per the 2024 Inform Risk Index.[2] Climate change exacerbates water pollution by increasing the frequency and intensity of rainfall, which can overwhelm wastewater treatment systems, leading to the discharge of untreated or partially treated wastewater into rivers. Investing in climate-resilient wastewater treatment infrastructure ensures that water flowing into the river is clean and safe, thereby protecting aquatic life, preserving biodiversity, and maintaining ecological balance. This aligns with several Sustainable Development Goals[3] ("SDGs"), including SDG 6 (Clean Water and Sanitation), which aims to improve water quality and reduce pollution; SDG 13 (Climate Action), which calls for taking urgent measures to combat climate change; and SDG 14 (Life Below Water), which focuses on conserving marine and freshwater ecosystems.

Delay and the Need for Alternative Funding

6. For three decades, the construction of a much-needed WWTP has been delayed due to WASA's inability to secure international financing, highlighting the limitations of relying solely on international financing. Given the urgency of ensuring River Ravi's sustainability, securing clean water access, and addressing the WWTP's links to climate adaptation, its timely construction is tied to the fundamental rights to life and dignity under Articles 9 and 14 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution"). In light of this grave and pressing background, it is imperative that WASA urgently explores alternative financing mechanisms and cost-effective, homegrown waste water treatment solutions in public interest.

Judicial Guidance without Encroachment on Policy-Making

7. While it is well established that policy-making falls within the domain of the executive, this Court, in exercising its constitutional duty to safeguard fundamental rights under Article 9 of the Constitution, has over the years developed a substantial knowledge base regarding environmental challenges. Therefore, without encroaching upon the policy-making prerogative of the executive, this Court deems it appropriate to suggest certain options that the executive authorities may consider while formulating its response to the challenge in hand, that is, the delay of three decades in setting up the WWTP. These recommendations, while not binding, are intended to assist the executive in discharging its obligations towards environmental protection and sustainable development.

Recommendations:

Islamic Climate Finance: A Sustainable Alternative

8. We find it important to underline that access to climate finance is essential for ensuring climate adaptation and resilience, particularly in vulnerable regions like Pakistan, where environmental degradation directly affects fundamental rights such as life, health and dignity. In this context, climate finance emerges as a viable, self-sustaining alternative that not only aligns with environmental responsibility and financial sustainability but also upholds fundamental rights under the Constitution. Islamic finance principles, particularly those emphasizing risk-sharing and ethical investment, offer a non-debt-based approach to financing critical infrastructure. WASA may consider leveraging Waqf (Endowments), Sukuk (Islamic bonds), and Public-private Partnerships rooted in Islamic finance. For instance, a Green Sukuk-a Shariah-compliant financial instrument-can be issued to raise funds specifically for the water treatment plant, attracting investors who seek both financial returns and environmental impact. Islamic finance has been a game changer in climate action, offering ethical and sustainable financial solutions for the Global South. Indonesia successfully launched a Green Sukuk in 2018, raising $1.25 billion to finance renewable energy and climate-resilient projects, demonstrating that Islamic financial instruments can effectively mobilize resources for environmental sustainability. Malaysia's Sustainable and Responsible Investment ("SRI") Sukuk, has funded water conservation, waste management, and solar energy initiatives. By integrating Islamic finance into climate strategies, particularly in Muslim-majority and climate-vulnerable countries like Pakistan, there is significant potential to mobilize resources and enhance the impact of global climate initiatives.

Wastewater Treatment Technologies: Exploring Cost-Effective Options and Homegrown Solutions

9. WASA may explore a range of WWTP technologies, including cost-effective and homegrown technological solutions to urgently provide sustainable water management for the people of Pakistan. The spectrum of technologies available can be broadly categorized into low-cost, intermediate, and advanced solutions. Low-cost, homegrown solutions, include: (a) Septic Tanks; which provides basic on-site sewage treatment by separating solids from liquids and enabling anaerobic digestion, (b) Constructed Wetlands; these use natural wetland processes to filter and treat wastewater, (c) Anaerobic Ponds and Lagoons; these rely on anaerobic processes for treatment, making them suitable or agricultural or low-resource settings, and (d) Sand and Gravel Filters; these offer a simple yet effective way to remove impurities through layered filtration. Intermediate or conventional technologies provide more efficient treatment. These include: (a) Activated Sludge Process; this uses aeration and biological floc to treat sewage, (b) Trickling Filters; this involves microorganisms breaking down contaminants as wastewater flows over filtration media, (c) Upflow Anaerobic Sludge Blanket Reactor; it facilitates anaerobic wastewater treatment by allowing the wastewater through a blanket of granular sludge, and (d) Membrane Bioreactors; these combine membrane filtration with biological treatment, resulting in high-quality effluent. Advanced wastewater treatment technologies offer cutting-edge solutions for complex contamination issues. These include: (a) Reverse Osmosis and Nanofiltration; these provide high-level purification, making them suitable for desalination and water treatment, (b) Advanced Oxidation Processes; these use hydroxyl radicals to break down pollutants, (c) Electrocoagulation; this removes contaminants like heavy metals through electrical currents, (d) Zero Liquid Discharge Systems; these ensure complete wastewater purification and recycling, eliminating discharge entirely, and (e) AI and IoT-based Smart Treatment; these technologies enhance real-time monitoring and efficiency in wastewater management.[4]

10. Additionally, the restriction on using 6,937 kanals of acquired land exclusively for the WWTP may also be reconsidered. Given that the project footprint does not require acres of land, WASA may repurpose the remaining land for other climate adaptation initiatives such as afforestation, renewable energy projects (solar or wind farms), or sustainable agriculture to combat soil degradation and improve food security. By diversifying adaptation projects in the same area, WASA not only maximizes land use but also strengthens resilience against climate change. This aligns with the Pakistan's National Adapation Plan (2023-2030) which prioritizes adaptation efforts and identifies several key sectors, e.g., (i) Water Security (ii) Agriculture and Food Security (iii) Disaster Risk Reduction (iv) Health (v) Urban Planning and Infrastructure (vi) Ecosystems and Biodiversity and (vii) Energy.[5] Our institutions must promote national adaptation strategies through indigenous financial tools and home grown solutions that align with sustainability, community well-being, and long-term economic stability.

11. Learned counsel for the respondent land owners, vehemently agitates, that the land was acquired from private landowners with the promise to set up WWTP that has not materialized over three decades. WASA's inaction over these years represents a serious failure in upholding its commitment to both public welfare and private rights. He submits that if there is no success reported in September 2025, the question would be open before this Court as to whether land acquired three decades ago for a public purpose, which has not been fulfilled, can result in the land being restored to its original owners as per Rule 14 of the Punjab Land Acquisition Rules, 1983.

12. Considering the importance of WWTP and its bearing on fundamental rights of the people, WASA may want to reconsider its financial and technological options while pursuing its negotiations with AFD. Let the PDWP through its Chair, Chairman Planning and Development Punjab, Civil Secretariat Lahore, CDWP through its Chair, Deputy Chairman Planning Commission, Pakistan Secretariat, Constitution Avenue Islamabad and ECNEC, Cabinet Block, Cabinet Secretariat, Red Zone Islamabad conclude the matter latest by end of August 2025. ECNEC is directed to submit its final report to the Court before the next date of hearing. A copy of this Order be dispatched to PDWP, CDWP and ECNEC for information and further action.

13. Let this case now come up in the last week of September 2025 to assess whether the relevant authorities have successfully concluded the matter after exploring all possible financial and technological alternatives.

MH/A-8/SC Order accordingly.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---The present case raises a short but important question of law: Is a disputed tenancy agreement required to be proved in a proceeding before the Rent Tribunal under the Punjab Rented Premises Act 2009, in accordance with the provisions of Articles 17(2)(a)[1] and 79[2] of the Qanun-e-Shahadat, 1984? This question arises from the following facts of the case.

2. The Petitioners, Zafar Iqbal and Abdul Aziz, filed a petition under Section 15 of the Punjab Rented Premises Act, 2009 ("the Act"), seeking the eviction of the Respondent, Syed Riaz Hussain Shah, from a shop - the alleged rented premises. In their eviction petition, the Petitioners asserted that they had rented out the shop to the Respondent through a tenancy agreement dated 21.03.2006 ("the tenancy agreement"). They required the shop for their personal use and, in accordance with the terms of the tenancy agreement, served a one-month notice upon the Respondent to vacate the premises. However, the Respondent refused to comply with the same. On the other hand, in his application for leave to defend, the Respondent contended that he is not a tenant of the Petitioners in the shop and that the tenancy agreement is false and fraudulent. Based on the pleadings of the parties, the Rent Tribunal framed the following issues:

(1) Whether the relationship of landlord and tenant exists between the parties? OPA

(2) Whether the petitioner is entitled qua eviction of the respondent, if the above-mentioned issue affirms in positive? OPA

(3) Whether the petition is not maintainable? OPR

(4) Relief.

After recording the evidence of both parties on the above issues, the Rent Tribunal answered Issue No. 1 in the negative, primarily on the ground that the Petitioners had failed to prove the execution of the tenancy agreement due to their failure to produce both attesting witnesses. Consequently, the Rent Tribunal dismissed the Petitioners' eviction petition. However, the Additional District Judge accepted the Petitioners' appeal, holding that the provisions of the Qanun-e-Shahadat do not apply to proceedings before the Rent Tribunal and, therefore, the mere non-production of both attesting witnesses could not be fatal to the Petitioners' case. Accordingly, he reversed the findings of the Rent Tribunal on Issue No. 1 and allowed the eviction petition. The Respondent then challenged the order of the Additional District Judge before the High Court in its writ jurisdiction. The High Court accepted the challenge and, in doing so, held as follows:

Petitioner [the Respondent before this Court] categorically denied the existence of relationship of landlord and tenant between the parties and also denied the execution of rent agreement. It was the duty of respondents [the Petitioners before this Court] Nos. 3 and 4 to produce both marginal witnesses to prove the rent agreement but they failed to produce the same, as such rent agreement is not proved by Respondents Nos. 3 and 4. As per Article 17 read with Article 79 of the Qanun-e-Shahadat Order, 1984, it is duty of Respondents Nos. 3 and 4/ejectment petitioner[s], to prove the alleged rent agreement by producing both the witnesses but here in this case admittedly both witnesses of the alleged rent agreement were not produced in evidence and even no convincing reasons have been expounded in this regard, which is a blatant non-compliance of the above mentioned mandatory provision of law and same leads to conveniently hold that Respondents Nos. 3 and 4 have failed to prove the valid execution of the alleged rent agreement as per law. The non-production of the required number of witnesses in evidence is blatant non-compliance of the aforesaid mandatory provisions of law which impress fatal impact on the case of Respondents Nos. 3 and 4. Reliance is placed on the cases cited as Hafiz Tassaduq Hussain v. Muhammad Din through legal heirs and others (PLD 2011 SC 241), Farzand Ali and another v. Khuda Bakhsh and others (PLD 2015 SC 187) and Farid Bakhsh v. Jind Wadda and others (2015 SCMR 1044).

Based on the above findings, the High Court allowed the writ petition, set aside the order of the Additional District Judge and restored the decision of the Rent Tribunal. Hence, the Petitioners have filed the present petition for leave to appeal, giving rise to the question of law set out in paragraph 1 above.

3. We have heard and considered the arguments of the learned counsel for the parties and, with their able assistance, have also examined the record of the case.

4. It may be noted at the outset that a Rent Tribunal under the Act, like the Rent Controller under the West Pakistan Urban Rent Restriction Ordinance, 1959, acts in a quasi-judicial capacity and does not function as a court of law in the strict sense of the term.[3] Similarly, although Article 1(2) of the Qanun-e-Shahadat provides that it applies to all judicial proceedings in or before any Court, including a court-martial, tribunal, or other authority exercising judicial or quasi-judicial powers or jurisdiction, its applicability to proceedings before a Rent Tribunal under the Act is expressly excluded by Section 34 of the Act.[4] Consequently, the provisions of the Qanun-e-Shahadat do not stricto sensu apply to proceedings before a Rent Tribunal under the Act, as the special law (the Act) prevails over the general law (the Qanun-e-Shahadat).[5]

5. We have deliberately used the adverbial phrase stricto sensu in the last sentence of the previous paragraph, for despite the non-applicability of the provisions of the Qanun-e-Shahadat to proceedings under the Act, a Rent Tribunal may, rather should, invoke the general principles of the law of evidence codified in the Qanun-e-Shahadat concerning relevancy, admissibility or weight of evidence when admitting and appraising evidence to decide disputed facts. Since a Rent Tribunal adjudicates upon civil rights and obligations in eviction proceedings, the parties thereto are entitled to a fair trial and due process under Article 10A of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan.

6. A fair trial and due process require that no material that does not constitute evidence should be relied upon. No fact in dispute may be established through material that is not testified by a competent witness. Likewise, where a document is produced in evidence, the fundamental question that arises is whether it is genuine. Therefore, even though the provisions of the Qanun-e-Shahadat may not strictly apply to proceedings under the Act, it will be unfair if a Rent Tribunal could rely on inadmissible material, such as hearsay, or base its decision on copies of documents without producing and satisfactorily proving the originals when they exist.[6] This underscores the necessity for a Rent Tribunal to invoke and apply the general principles of the law of evidence codified in the Qanun-e-Shahadat to ensure fairness and due process in determining the civil rights and obligations of the parties in eviction proceedings.[7]

7. However, applying the general principles of the law of evidence does not mean that a Rent Tribunal must enforce all the provisions of the Qanun-e-Shahadat, as doing so would render Section 34 of the Act redundant and frustrate the legislative objective[8] behind the very enactment of the Act-namely, the expeditious disposal of rent matters.[9] Therefore, a Rent Tribunal cannot be required to adhere strictly to all the principles of the law of evidence codified in the Qanun-e-Shahadat or to any special provisions introduced therein that amend general principles of the law of evidence. A distinction must be drawn between invoking and applying the general principles of the law of evidence codified in the Qanun-e-Shahadat and any special provisions enacted therein. Thus, while adjudicating upon civil rights and obligations in eviction proceedings, a Rent Tribunal should invoke and apply only those general principles of the law of evidence codified in the Qanun-e-Shahadat that are necessary to give effect to the fundamental right of the parties under Article 10A of the Constitution; it need not apply all the principles or any special provisions enacted in the Qanun-e-Shahadat. This distinction is rooted in the summary nature of rent proceedings, which are designed to resolve disputes expeditiously and without the procedural formalities of regular civil trials. The general principles of evidence-such as the burden of proof, relevance of evidence, and the right to cross-examine-must nevertheless apply to safeguard the constitutional right to a fair trial. However, the relaxation of detailed evidentiary rules, such as strict compliance with the formal proof of documents or the exclusion of hearsay evidence, is justified by the need to maintain the efficiency and accessibility of rent proceedings. This approach strikes a balance between upholding due process and preserving the summary character of rent proceedings.

8. From an economic and social perspective, relaxed evidentiary procedure serve critical public policy objectives. They reduce litigation costs, making the process more accessible to individuals who may lack the resources to comply with stringent evidentiary requirements. This, in turn, encourages investment in rental housing by providing landlords with a reliable mechanism to address disputes swiftly. At the same time, these rules protect tenants from unjust eviction and homelessness, thereby maintaining housing stability and social harmony. By addressing the inherent power imbalances between landlords and tenants, relaxed evidentiary rules promote equity and fairness, ensuring that the legal process does not become a tool for oppression or undue advantage. In sum, the relaxation of evidentiary procedure in rent proceedings is not merely a procedural convenience but a necessary measure to uphold the principles of justice, economic efficiency, and social welfare.

9. In light of the above principles of law, when we examine Articles 17(2)(a) and 79 of the Qanun-e-Shahadat, it becomes evident that they do not embody general principles of the law of evidence but rather enact special provisions therein. A Rent Tribunal was, therefore, in no way bound to invoke and apply these provisions for the purpose of determining the genuineness of the tenancy agreement. Accordingly, we answer the question in the terms that a disputed tenancy agreement is not required to be proved in a proceeding before the Rent Tribunal under the Act, in accordance with the provisions of Articles 17(2)(a) and 79 of the Qanun-e-Shahadat. The reliance of the High Court on three judgments of this Court is misplaced, as they pertain to civil suits, not eviction proceedings.

10. Having thus answered the question of law, we now proceed to examine whether the Petitioners have produced sufficient evidence to establish the genuineness of the tenancy agreement on the standard of preponderance of probability, which ordinarily applies to all civil cases, including rent matters.

11. To establish the genuineness of the tenancy agreement, the Petitioners tendered the original deed (Exh-P4) in evidence. One of the Petitioners, Zafar Iqbal, appeared as AW-1 and deposed regarding the due execution of the agreement. Two other witnesses, Abdul Aziz (AW-2) and Muhammad Sibtain (AW-3), corroborated the Petitioners' stance. Additionally, the Petitioners tendered the certified copy of the revenue record (Exh-A5) to prove their ownership of the shop. Conversely, the Respondent, Syed Riaz Hussain Shah (RW-1), merely made bald assertions denying both the genuineness of the tenancy agreement and the Petitioners' ownership of the shop. He did not file any application before the Rent Tribunal seeking a comparison of his purported signatures on the tenancy agreement with his admitted signatures by an expert to establish forgery, nor did he initiate any proceedings against the stamp vendor who recorded a note on the stamp paper of the tenancy agreement-bearing both his and the Respondent's signatures-stating that the Respondent had obtained the stamp paper for executing the tenancy agreement in favour of the Petitioners. Further, the Respondent's own witness, Muhammad Iqbal (RW-2), expressed in cross-examination his ignorance about the tenancy agreement between the parties. Such evidence of the parties on the crucial issue clearly tilts in favour of the Petitioners' stance and establishes the genuineness of the tenancy agreement on the standard of preponderance of probability.

12. As this Court has held in several cases,[10] in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, the owner of a property, by virtue of his title, is presumed to be the landlord, and the person in possession is presumed to be the tenant of that property. In the present case, this presumption is further strengthened by a written tenancy agreement, the genuineness of which, as stated above, is proven on the standard of preponderance of probability. Therefore, we find that the Rent Tribunal and the High Court legally erred in answering Issue No. 1 in the negative, whereas the Additional District Judge was correct in deciding the same in the affirmative and holding that the relationship of landlord and tenant exists between the parties.

13. As for Issue No. 2, we find that the tenancy agreement does not specify a fixed term. In such a situation, under Section 106 of the Transfer of Property Act 1882, the tenancy is deemed to be from month to month, terminable, on the part of either landlord (lessor) or the tenant (lessee), by fifteen days notice expiring with the end of a month of tenancy. Moreover, the tenancy agreement expressly provides that if the Respondent wishes to close the business in the shop, he may terminate the tenancy with one month's notice. Similarly, if the Petitioners require the shop for their personal use, they may also terminate the tenancy by serving one month's notice.

14. The Petitioners asserted in paragraph 4 of the eviction petition that they required the shop for their personal use and, accordingly, served a one-month notice upon the Respondent to vacate the premises. However, the Respondent refused to comply. In his application for leave to defend the eviction petition, the Respondent did not specifically dispute the Petitioners' assertion regarding the notice. The Petitioner, Zafar Iqbal (AW-1), reaffirmed this fact in his affidavit (Exh-A 1), and this statement remained unchallenged during his cross-examination. Furthermore, the Respondent did not contest the Petitioners' claim that they required the shop for their personal use.

15. As held by this Court in Jehangir Rustom,[11] the statement of a landlord on oath-if consistent with the averments made in the eviction petition and neither shaken in cross-examination nor disproved in rebuttal-is sufficient to establish that the landlord's requirement for personal use is bona fide. The Petitioners are, therefore, entitled to seek the Respondent's eviction from the shop not only under Section 106 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, but also pursuant to the express terms of the tenancy agreement, which provides for termination on the ground of personal use with one month's notice.

16. For the above reasons, we find that the Additional District Judge rightly accepted the Petitioners' eviction petition. In contrast, the Rent Tribunal legally erred in law by dismissing the petition, and the High Court similarly erred in restoring its decision through the impugned judgment. Accordingly, we convert this petition into an appeal and allow the same: the impugned judgment of the High Court is set aside, and the decision of the Additional District Judge is upheld.

MH/Z-1/SC Appeal allowed.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---Disciplinary proceedings were initiated against Muhammad Nasir Ismail ("petitioner"), employed as an Assistant at the Board of Intermediate and Secondary Education, Rawalpindi ("Respondent No. 3"), under Section 5 of the Punjab Employees Efficiency, Discipline and Accountability Act, 2006 ("PEEDA Act") vide order dated 27.02.2013. The charges framed against the petitioner pertained to wilful absence from duty, inefficiency, and misconduct. Pursuant to a regular inquiry, a recommendation was made for his removal from service; however, he was instead awarded the major penalty of compulsory retirement by the competent authority vide order dated 29.04.2013. Aggrieved, the petitioner preferred an appeal before the appellate authority[1], which was dismissed vide order dated 19.06.2013 ("impugned order"). Thereafter, the petitioner assailed the impugned order by invoking the constitutional jurisdiction of the Lahore High Court, Lahore, through a writ petition, which was dismissed vide judgment dated 30.05.2022 ("impugned judgment"). Hence, the instant petition for leave to appeal.

2. Learned counsel for the petitioner pressed into service a singular ground, contending that the interpretation of the second proviso to Section 13(5)(ii) of the PEEDA Act was misapplied. He argued that the said provision mandates the imposition of a major penalty-compulsory retirement, removal, or dismissal from service-only when the charge of absence from duty extends beyond one year. He submitted that, in the present case, the petitioner's absence from duty was for a period significantly shorter than one year (48 days in particular); therefore, the imposition of any of the aforementioned major penalties was legally untenable. Conversely, learned counsel for the respondent supported the impugned judgment, asserting that the second proviso to Section 13(5)(ii) of the PEEDA Act does not curtail the discretion of the competent authority to award one of the prescribed major penalties, even in cases where the absence from duty is less than one year.

3. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties at some length and gone through the impugned judgment of the High Court and the record of the case.

4. The civil service is the backbone of any government, ensuring continuity, stability, and efficiency in governance. It plays a crucial role in the implementation of policies, service delivery, and maintaining the institutional framework of the state. Unlike political leadership, which changes periodically, the civil service ensures uninterrupted functioning of government, providing institutional memory and stability. Civil servants are responsible for executing policies and programs formulated by elected representatives, ensuring that governance reaches the grassroots level. They also play a central role in public service delivery, providing essential services such as law enforcement, healthcare, and infrastructure development--all of which are critical to societal well-being. Moreover, the civil service contributes to institutional stability by preserving knowledge and expertise within the government, preventing abrupt policy reversals, and maintaining continuity in governance despite shifts in political leadership. A fundamental characteristic of an effective civil service is impartiality and meritocracy. A professional bureaucracy operates independently of political influence, ensuring that decisions are made based on merit rather than favoritism. This independence fosters efficiency, fairness, and public trust in government institutions.

5. Given these crucial functions, maintaining discipline, integrity, and accountability within the civil service is essential. This is where service laws and penalties play a significant role in upholding professional standards and deterring misconduct. Penalties under service laws serve multiple purposes in ensuring that civil servants adhere to ethical and professional standards. One of their primary functions is maintaining discipline and accountability. Civil servants hold positions of public trust, and disciplinary measures deter misconduct while reinforcing the importance of ethical conduct. Without accountability, the credibility and efficiency of the civil service could be severely compromised. Another key objective of enforcing penalties is to prevent the abuse of power. In the absence of strict disciplinary mechanisms, bureaucrats may misuse their authority, leading to corruption, inefficiency, and injustice. Such misconduct not only erodes public trust in institutions but also disrupts governance and service delivery.

6. Penalties also play a key role in ensuring efficiency and performance. The knowledge that disciplinary action may be taken in cases of negligence or misconduct incentivizes civil servants to fulfill their responsibilities diligently. Additionally, when the public sees that civil servants are held accountable for their actions, it helps in protecting public confidence in government institutions. A transparent and fair disciplinary system assures citizens that government officials are working in their best interest.

7. Courts play a critical role in ensuring that penalties imposed on civil servants are just, proportionate, and lawful. Judicial review of disciplinary actions is essential in preventing arbitrary or excessive punishments while maintaining the integrity of the civil service. A key principle in judicial review is proportionality--the penalty must not be excessively harsh in relation to the offense. Courts frequently set aside penalties that are disproportionately severe, ensuring fairness in disciplinary actions. Similarly, courts apply the principle of rationality and reasonableness, which requires that disciplinary decisions be based on objective evidence and not be arbitrary or politically motivated. Another essential principle is procedural fairness (due process). Affected civil servants must be granted a fair hearing, and disciplinary proceedings must adhere to legal requirements. Due process ensures that no officer is unjustly penalized without being given an opportunity to present their defense. At the same time, courts must exercise judicial restraint and avoid undue interference with executive discretion. While judicial review is necessary to prevent abuse of power, courts must respect the autonomy of the executive branch in managing its employees. Judicial intervention should be limited to cases involving clear illegality, arbitrariness, or mala fide intent. Finally, courts must balance individual rights with the larger public interest. While it is imperative to protect employees from unfair treatment, judicial decisions should not undermine the broader objectives of maintaining an efficient and disciplined civil service. A well-functioning disciplinary system is essential for governance, and courts must ensure that their rulings do not compromise the effectiveness of administrative oversight. With this background we approach the present case.

8. The petitioner was proceeded against under the PEEDA Act, which aims to regulate the efficiency, discipline, and accountability of employees serving in government and semi-governmental institutions. It provides mechanisms for initiating disciplinary proceedings, conducting inquiries, and imposing penalties on employees for misconduct, inefficiency, or corruption. The relevant provision for our purposes is Section 13 of the PEEDA Act, which is reproduced below for ready reference:

Section $13^{2}$. Order to be passed by the competent authority on receipt of report from the inquiry officer or inquiry committee. -

(4) ...

(5) After affording personal hearing to the accused or on receipt of the report of the hearing officer, the competent authority shall, keeping in view the findings and recommendations of the inquiry officer or inquiry committee, as the case may be, facts of the case and defence offered by the accused during personal hearing, by an order in writing-

(i)

(ii) Impose any one or more of the penalties specified in Section 4:

Provided that-

(i)

(ii) Where charge of absence from duty for a period of more than one year is proved against the accused, the penalty of compulsory retirement or removal or dismissal from service shall be imposed upon the accused. (emphasis supplied)

A plain reading of the aforementioned provisions establishes that the competent authority, under Section 13(5)(ii) of the PEEDA Act, has the discretion to choose from a specturm of penalites and impose any one or more of the penalties enumerated in Section 4. The said provision prescribes both major and minor penalites in the manner, as outlined below:

4. Penalties.- (1) The competent authority may, notwithstanding anything contained in any law or the terms and conditions of service of the accused, by an order in writing, impose one or more of the following penalties, namely:-

a) Minor penalties-

(i) censure;

(ii) withholding of increment or increments, for a specific period, subject to a maximum of five years;

(iii) fine not exceeding basic pay of one month;

(iv) reduction to a lower stage or stages in pay scale, subject to a maximum of five stages; and

(v) withholding of promotion for a specific period, subject to a maximum of five years; provided that this period shall be counted from the date when a person junior to the accused is considered for promotion and is promoted on regular basis for the first time;

(b) Major penalties-

(i) recovery from pay, pension or any other amount payable to the accused, the whole or a part of any pecuniary loss caused to the Government or the organization in which he was employed, and if the amount due from any such person cannot be wholly recovered from the pay, pension or any other amount payable to him, such amount shall be recovered under the law for the time being in force;

(ii) reduction to a lower post and pay scale from the substantive or regular post for a specific period subject to a maximum of five years;

(iii) forfeiture of past service for a specific period subject to a maximum of five years;

(iv) compulsory retirement;

(v) removal from service; and

(vi) dismissal from service; and

(c) ...

(2) ...

While the competent authority is generally free to impose any one or more of the penalties enumerated in Section 4, the second proviso to Section 13(5)(ii) provides that, where the charge of absence from a duty for a period exceeding one year is proved against the officer, the competent authority shall impose either of the three major penalties: compulsory retirement or removal or dismissal from service. This establishes that unauthorized absence from duty is a serious lapse in civil service, as it disrupts public service delivery, weakens institutional discipline, and undermines government efficiency. Civil servants hold positions of responsibility, and prolonged absence without authorization delays decision-making, burdens administrative resources, and erodes public confidence in governance. Hence the proviso classifies absence of more than one year as a major penalty, often leading to dismissal or compulsory retirement, as it is considered akin to abandonment of service.

9. What is therefore the effect of the "proviso" on the general discretion of the competent authority to impose any one or more of penalties under Section 4, including in cases of absence from duty for less than a year? A "proviso" serves to qualify, restrict, or except a particular case from the generality of the main provision.[3] Ordinarily, a proviso limits the scope of the principal provision.[4] The second proviso to Section 13(5)(ii) restricts discretion of the competent authority when imposing a penalty in cases of prolonged absence (exceeding one year). In such cases, the competent authority must impose one of the three major penalties i.e., compulsory retirement or removal or dismal from service--whichever it deems fit--if the charge stands proved against the officer. The proviso restricts and limits the general discretion of the competent authority under Section 13(5)(ii) only in case where there is a charge of absence from duty for a period of more than one year. The proviso has no application in other cases including cases of absence from duty for a period of less than one year, where the competent authority continues to enjoy its general discretion under Section 13(5)(ii) to impose any one or more of the penalties under Section 4 of PEEDA Act. Nonetheless, the exercise of such discretion must be structured, reasoned, and supported by cogent justification in accordance with the principles of proportionality and administrative fairness.

10. We, therefore, concur with the interpretation rendered by the High Court that the second proviso to Section 13(5)(ii) does not restrict the authority of the competent authority in imposing any of the three major penalties, even where the period of absence from duty is less than one year. However, where the competent authority elects to impose a major penalty in cases of absence from duty for less than a year, it must do so in accordance with the principle of proportionality.

11. The principle of proportionality, in the context of structured discretion, mandates that the exercise of discretionary power must be reasonable, balanced, and commensurate with the objectives sought to be achieved. It serves as a check against arbitrariness and excess, ensuring that disciplinary action remains fair, just, and legally sustainable. Proportionality is assessed through a structured three-pronged test[5]: First, whether the measure in question is suitable and bears a rational connection to the legitimate objective it seeks to achieve. Second, whether the measure is necessary, meaning no less restrictive or less onerous alternative exists to accomplish the same purpose. Third, whether the measure maintains a fair balance between the public interest and the rights of the individual, ensuring that the burden imposed is neither excessive nor oppressive in relation to the intended benefit.[6] Also see: Sabir Iqbal v. Cantonment Board PLD 2019 SC 189; Muhammad Iqbal Khan Noori v. NAB PLD 2021 SC 916 and Divisional Superintendent, Postal Services v. Nadeem Raza 2023 SCMR 803.

12. Applying the principle of proportionality to the present case, we note that the petitioner remained absent from duty for a total of 48 days. The imposition of a major penalty of compulsory retirement, in our considered view, fails to meet the test of proportionality, as it neither establishes a rational nexus between the misconduct and the severity of the penalty nor considers less restrictive alternatives. Accordingly, we set aside the impugned judgment to the extent of the penalty imposed. However, the petitioner's reinstatement shall be subject to a fresh determination by the competent authority. We, therefore, direct the competent authority i.e., Chairman BISE, Rawalpindi, to revisit the petitioner's case in light of the principles outlined above and impose a penalty commensurate with the gravity of the misconduct. To facilitate the expeditious disposal of this matter, let the petitioner appear before the competent authority at 11 am on 19.03.2025, who, after affording the petitioner an opportunity of hearing, shall decide the matter through a speaking order within a period of 07 days. A compliance report shall be submitted for the information of this Court. Office shall dispatch a copy of this order to the Competent Authority.

13. This petition is converted into appeal and allowed in the above terms.

Date of hearing: 19th May, 2025.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---The brief facts of the case are that the petitioner was serving as an Assistant Private Secretary (BS-16) in the office of the Accountant General, Khyber Pakhtunkhwa. During his service, he was assigned the current charge of the post of Private Secretary (BS-17). Despite being eligible, the petitioner was not promoted in the Departmental Promotion Committee ("DPC") meetings held on 27.09.2016, 03.08.2017, and 10.04.2018. He was finally promoted in the DPC meeting held on 03.10.2018 via notification dated 04.05.2018. Subsequently, he filed a departmental appeal challenging this notification contending that he ought to have been promoted with effect from 06.08.2015 when the post of Private Secretary (BS-17) initially fell vacant. The said departmental appeal was dismissed vide order dated 10.07.2018. Thereafter, he preferred a service appeal before the Federal Service Tribunal, Islamabad which was dismissed vide judgment dated 31.03.2023 ("impugned judgment"). Hence, the present appeal by leave of this Court.

2. Learned counsel for the petitioner submits that the petitioner fulfilled all the requisite criteria for promotion to BS-17 and was at the top of the seniority list following the promotion of Mr. Muhammad Yousaf. He argues that the petitioner was entitled to promotion with effect from 06.08.2015, and the denial thereof was based on arbitrary justifications and administrative inaction beyond the petitioner's control. Conversely, the learned Deputy Attorney General contends that promotion is not automatic upon the occurrence of a vacancy and must follow the recommendation of the DPC. He asserts that the petitioner's case was deferred due to deficiencies in his Performance Evaluation Reports ("PERs"). After rectification, his case was considered, and he was promoted in accordance with the rules.

3. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties at length and examined the impugned judgment of the Tribunal along with the record of the case.

4. It is an admitted position that the petitioner was the senior-most eligible officer in the relevant cadre and was performing the duties of the higher post in a current charge capacity. The justification for withholding his promotion appears to be based on alleged deficiencies in his PERs for the years 2014 to 2016, which, upon scrutiny, do not support the respondents' position. A review of the PER for the year 2014 reveals no adverse remarks. The 2015 and 2016 reports similarly describe his performance as "Good," and in the sections relating to suitability for promotion, the remarks are clearly favourable. Notably, the pen-picture in 2016 reads:

"The officer carries a lot of potential. He needs to improve his discipline and manners. He has a good command of rules and procedures."

This statement cannot, by any reasonable standard, be treated as adverse or disqualifying for promotion. The comments, if anything, reflect a routine suggestion for personal development, not professional incompetence.

5. Moreover, the record shows that the Accountant General i.e., the relevant authority did not write the PERs himself; instead, they were written by the Additional Accountant General, leading to questions about their procedural validity. These internal inconsistencies in the recording and assessment of the PERs ought not to have been held against the petitioner. It is also relevant that the petitioner's case was deferred multiple times without affording him an opportunity to respond or rectify any alleged shortcomings. This violates the principles of natural justice and procedural fairness, as required under the law governing civil servants and the broader principles of administrative justice.

6. When we examined the entire PER for the year 2016, we found nothing adverse that could lawfully justify withholding the petitioner's promotion. The report, on the whole, indicates a competent officer with a good command over rules and procedures, and no material deficiency that would disqualify him from advancement. The remarks concerning improvement in discipline and manners are suggestive at best and cannot be construed as adverse entries under the law. Most significantly, there appears to be no statutory rule, regulation, or promotion policy that authorized the DPC to withhold promotion of an eligible and senior officer solely on the basis of generalized or non-adverse remarks in PERs. In the absence of a clearly defined policy or objective criteria to guide such discretion, the DPC's action amounted to an arbitrary exercise of authority. It is a settled principle that where discretion is granted, it must be exercised fairly, reasonably, and in accordance with law.[1] To make exercise of discretionary power valid, it is necessary that apart from being legal it is also reasonable.[2] Discretion unguided by policy opens the door to discrimination, favouritism, and administrative injustice. In such cases, the Court is empowered to step in and correct the arbitrary denial of a lawful right.

7. It is also a well-established principle, both in local and foreign jurisprudence, that a civil servant's promotion must be considered from the date a vacancy in their quota becomes available, provided they are otherwise eligible at that time.[3] The competent authorities must apply their mind judiciously and cannot delay promotion on administrative pretexts once a substantive vacancy arises.[4] In the instant case, the post of Private Secretary (BS-17) fell vacant on 06.08.2015. The petitioner, being the senior-most eligible officer at that time, was entitled to be considered for promotion with effect from that date. The delay caused by the department in convening the DPC or in processing the petitioner's case due to procedural irregularities such as issues with the author of his PERs cannot be used to defeat his rightful claim. The competent authority was under a duty to act with a fine sense of judgment, which it failed to do. The moment the post became vacant and the petitioner met the required qualifications, a legitimate expectation arose in his favour that he would be considered for promotion in a fair and timely manner.[5] The failure to fulfil this expectation, without lawful justification, amounted to arbitrariness and procedural unfairness.

8. The delay in the petitioner's promotion, therefore, stems not from personal shortcoming but from systemic inefficiencies and administrative neglect. It is a firmly entrenched principle that a civil servant must not bear the consequences of internal procedural lapses.[6] Accountability lies with the department, not the employee, for ensuring timely and lawful processing of promotion cases. The arbitrary delay in the petitioner's promotion also raises concerns under Articles 4 and 25 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973, which guarantee the right to be treated in accordance with law and equality before the law. Denying the petitioner timely promotion while others with comparable or lesser credentials advanced through the same system reflects unequal treatment. Administrative discretion, if exercised unequally or irrationally, becomes discriminatory in effect.

9. It is a settled principle of public administration that every sanctioned post within a government department or public institution exists to serve a defined functional need and must be filled promptly upon falling vacant. So long as the post continues to exist and has not been formally abolished or frozen pursuant to a lawful policy decision such as due to budgetary constraints or other demonstrable administrative exigencies, it must be filled within a reasonable time. Unjustified delays in this regard not only disrupt the efficient functioning of the institution but also weaken its service delivery capacity. Vacancies, when left unattended, often lead to informal arrangements and ad hoc delegations of authority that foster opacity, enable nepotism, and corrode the principles of merit and transparency.

10. Public institutions must operate at their optimal level, with all sanctioned posts filled in a timely and lawful manner. The performance and credibility of any department is directly correlated with the adequacy of its human resources. Timely recruitment is thus not merely an administrative formality but a requirement grounded in the larger public interest. Public sector institutions are not private domains to be governed by the whims of a few; they are public trusts, created and maintained to serve the people in accordance with constitutional principles, statutory rules, and the highest standards of transparency. Government officers, as trustees of the public good, must discharge their duties in a manner that upholds this trust. The failure to fill vacancies without a cogent and lawful justification constitutes an abdication of this responsibility and undermines both institutional efficiency and public confidence.

11. Accordingly, we hold that the petitioner's promotion to the post of Private Secretary (BS-17) was unjustifiably withheld in 2016 due to reasons entirely attributable to internal administrative mismanagement. The original promotion order issued vide notification dated 04.05.2018 is, therefore, liable to be modified.

12. In this background, the promotion order is modified, and the petitioner is directed to be promoted to the post of Private Secretary (BS-17) with effect from 06.08.2015 the date on which the vacancy in his quota first became available. All consequential benefits, including seniority, arrears of pay, and service entitlements, shall follow from the backdated promotion. Resultantly, the impugned judgment is set aside.

13. The titled petition is converted into an appeal and allowed in the above terms. The respondents are directed to issue a fresh promotion notification and revise the petitioner's seniority and pay fixation within thirty (30) days from the date of this judgment. A compliance report shall be submitted to the Registrar within the stipulated period.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---Respondent's husband, an employee of the Income Tax Department, passed away while in service on 14.02.2006. Under the Prime Minister's Assistance Package for the Families of Deceased Government Employees[1] ("Prime Minister's Assistance Package") respondent was appointed as a Lower Division Clerk ("LDC") on a two-year contract on 26.05.2010. The said contract was extended on multiple occasions, however, vide order dated 04.01.2016 issued by the Secretary (MGT) IR-V, Federal Board of Revenue, (HRM), Islamabad, her services were terminated. Notably, this action was based on an Office Memorandum ("O.M.") dated 15.12.2015[2], which stipulated that upon remarriage, a widow becomes ineligible for any compassionate employment granted under the Prime Minister's Assistance Package and the same shall stand terminated from the date of such remarriage. The respondent filed a writ petition challenging the said order before the Lahore High Court. The petition was disposed of with a direction to the Member (Admin), Federal Board of Revenue to treat the same as a representation and to redress her grievance through a speaking order. In compliance, the Second Secretary, Board of Revenue, considered the matter and rejected her representation vide order dated 11.05.2017. The respondent filed a second writ petition before the Lahore High Court, challenging the above departmental orders, which was allowed vide judgment dated 21.12.2022 ("impugned judgment"), and the respondent was reinstated in service. Hence, the instant petition seeking leave to appeal against the impugned judgment.

2. We have heard the learned counsel for the petitioner at length and examined the impugned judgment of the High Court and the record of the case.

3. At the outset, it is pointed out for record that the O.M. dated 15.12.2015, which formed the basis of the respondent's termination from service has since been withdrawn vide O.M. dated 07.11.2024.[3] While the withdrawal of the earlier O.M. is a welcome corrective step, it has no bearing on the present case, which was decided when the O.M. was in existence. Hence, this Court finds it necessary to examine the broader constitutional and legal implications of the said O.M., particularly, in the context of the rights and entitlements of widows under public welfare frameworks.

4. The question before us is whether the right to compassionate employment extended to a widow (respondent) under the Prime Minister's Assistance Package can be withdrawn on the pretext that she has subsequently remarried?

5. This Court addressed a comparable issue in Zahida Parveen[4], where it struck down an executive clarification that excluded daughters, whether already married or married subsequent to the grant of the compasssionate employment as unconstitutional. We reaffirm that the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution"), secures fundamental rights for individuals as equal citizens, not as appendages of patriarchal roles or marital identities. Women are not defined by the men in their lives; they are autonomous and rights-bearing individuals. Denying a woman the right to employment on the basis of her remarriage is a blatant reinforcement of patriarchal control, seeking to subordinate her legal identity to societal expectations. Financial independence is not a concession to women, it is the foundation of their constitutional agency, dignity, and full participation in public life. The law must dismantle, not perpetuate, the structures that reduce women to secondary citizens in the eyes of society.

6. Turning to the O.M. dated 15.12.2015, it is manifestly discriminatory as it singles out widows, the female spouses of deceased government employees for disqualification from compassionate employment upon remarriage, without imposing a corresponding restriction on widowers, notwithstanding the Prime Minister's Assistance Package which offers compassionate employment to both a widow and a widower.[5] This gender-specific disqualification amounts to direct discrimination based on sex, contravening Articles 25(1) and 25(2) of the Constitution, which guarantee equality before the law and prohibit discrimination on the basis of sex.[6] The O.M.'s discriminatory nature is further underscored by its inapplicability to widowers in identical circumstances, rendering it inherently unequal, arbitrary, and devoid of constitutional justification. It therefore fails the test of reasonable classification and cannot be sustained in law.[7] It also offends the guarantees of non-discrimination in public service (Article 27)[8]. By conditioning continued employment on a widow's remarriage status, the O.M. reinforces outdated patriarchal assumptions, treating widows as passive dependents entitled to benefits only while they remain unmarried. This violates the fundamental rights to livelihood and dignity under Article 14 of the Constitution.[9] It penalizes a woman for choosing to remarry, a constitutionally protected liberty by extinguishing her employment rights.

7. The rights of widows should not be viewed as acts of state generosity, but as legal entitlements rooted in constitutional guarantees, statutory protections, and developing judicial principles. Furthermore, international human rights instruments[10] to which Pakistan is a party, including the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women ("CEDAW") impose obligations on the State to dismantle legal and social barriers to women's full economic participation.[11] Any policy that makes public employment contingent upon a woman's marital status not only entrenches dependency but effectively penalizes her for exercising a fundamental liberty. Widows, like all citizens, are entitled to employment, dignity, equality, and autonomy without discrimination or reprisal.[12] The law must serve as a shield against exclusion, not a tool for reinforcing outdated social hierarchies.

8. It is also critical to consider the social context in which such executive decisions operate. Widowhood, in its simplest sense, refers to the status of a woman whose spouse has died.[13] However, in many societies, including ours, it carries a layered social identity often accompanied by stigma, isolation, and a diminished sense of social worth.[14] Widows are too often viewed through the prism of loss and dependence, rather than as individuals with agency and resilience. This perception restricts their choices, particularly when it comes to remarriage or economic independence. The law must reject these harmful cultural narratives and affirm that widowhood is not a diminution of identity but a life circumstance deserving of dignity, protection, and equal opportunity. It is incumbent upon courts to ensure that public policy reflects this understanding and shields widows from both overt and covert forms of systemic discrimination.

9. For completeness of record, it is clarified that the judgment of this Court reported as General Post Office, Islamabad and others v. Muhammad Jalal (PLD 2024 SC 1276) has struck down the Prime Minister's Assistance Package as unconstitutional but has no application on appointments that have been already made.[15] It is well settled that the judgments of this Court operate prospectively, unless declared otherwise.[16] Therefore, the present case remains unaffected by the said judgment.

10. In this view of the matter, we see no reason to interfere in the impugned judgment. This petition is, therefore, dismissed. Leave is refused.

MH/C-9/SC Petition dismissed.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, ACJ.---Briefly, the petitioner while working as a Physical Education Teacher ("PET") (BS-09) in the Punjab Special Education Department ("Department") was considered for promotion for the post of Lecturer Physical Education (BS-17) under the Special Education Department (Directorate of Special Education) Service Rules, 2006[1] ("Rules"). Her case was recommended for promotion through a working paper submitted by the Department. However, on 07.03.2019, the Departmental Promotion Committee ("DPC") deferred the promotion of the petitioner on the pretext that the Rules required amendment, and promotions would be considered thereafter. The petitioner's representation against the decision of the DPC was rejected on 19.08.2019, while her departmental appeal was dismissed on 29.11.2019. Consequently, the petitioner challenged both these orders by filing a service appeal before the Punjab Service Tribunal, Lahore ("Tribunal"), which too was dismissed vide order dated 10.01.2022 ("impugned order"). Hence, the instant petition for leave to appeal.

2. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties, examined the impugned order, relevant laws and the record of the case.

3. As per the Rules, the promotion to the post of Lecturer Physical Education (BS-17) has the following requirement:

| Name of the post | Appointing Authority | Minimum Qualification for appointment for | | Method of Recruitment |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | | By Initial Recruitment | Promotion | |

| | | relating to Special Education | | maintained from the date of acquiring requisite qualification or from the date of joining in case of a person who hold the requisite qualification prior to appointment as such. If none is available for promotion then by initial recruitment. |

The working paper put up by the Department recommended the promotion of the petitioner in the following terms:

"She has more than 14 year's service to her credit. Her service record is satisfactory. No inquiry is pending against her and no penalty was ever awarded to her. Her character roll and synopsis are complete in all aspects. She is M.A. Physical Education in 1st Division so, she fulfills required criteria for promotion She is recommended for promotion as Physical Education /Lecturer (DPE)/Instructor Physical Education (BPS-17) on regular basis."

However, the DPC considered the case of the petitioner and deferred her promotion after recording the following in its Minutes dated 07.03.2019:

During the course of discussion, Deputy Secretary (Regulations), S&GAD pointed out that each post is to be filled as per provisions of the service rules and there were the following discrepancies in the Service Rules:

| Sr. | Services Rules for the post of | Deficiency |
|---|---|---|
| 3. | Lecturer Physical Education /Lecturer (DPE)/Instructor Physical Education (BS-17) | It was pointed out that 25% of the posts were to be filled by promotion from amongst PTI/PET/DPE having qualification prescribed for initial recruitment which was M.A Physical Education (1st Div), hence the persons having 2nd Div were not eligible. Moreover, The Note given at the end of the service rules provide that seniority of PTI / PET / DPE will be maintained from the date of acquiring requisite qualification or from the date of joining in case of person who holds the requisite qualification prior to appointment and in presence of this note all PTI / PET / DPE will be excluded from the seniority list who have not gained such qualification and no one could be excluded from the seniority once he or she stood appointed. |

7. Keeping in view the above observations, raised by the Deputy Secretary/ Representative of Regulations Wing, S&GAD, the Departmental Promotion Committee unanimously decided that the service rules of above-mentioned posts may be amended in first instance and meeting of the Departmental Promotion Committee for consideration of the above-mentioned agenda items may be held thereafter."

The above decision was challenged by the petitioner, however, the Department as well as the Tribunal maintained the view of the Department.

4. We have examined the Note appended to the Rules (reproduced above), which clearly stipulates that the seniority of PTIs, PETs, and DPEs is to be determined either from the date they acquire the requisite qualification, namely, an M.A. in Physical Education or, where the qualification was already held at the time of the appointment, from the date of joining service. Notably, the only requirement for promotion under the 25% quota from among PETs and others to the post of Lecturer Physical Education is possession of an M.A. in Physical Qualification (1st Division), as provided in the Rules. In this case, the petitioner had already acquired the requisite qualification at the time of the DPC meeting on 07.03.2019; thus, the exclusion under the Note (Rules) did not apply to her. There has also been no dispute between the parties regarding the accuracy of the revised seniority list. However, in the petitioner's case, the DPC, under serial No. 3 and paragraph No. 7 of its Minutes dated 07.03.2019 (reproduced above), recorded that seniority cannot be revised once an individual has been appointed to a post. This reasoning is misconceived and untenable. The DPC does not possess the mandate or the authority to question the Rules or refuse their enforcement. The Rules, including the Note, provide a clear mechanism for determining seniority from the date of acquiring the requisite qualification which had to be given effect by the DPC. The decision of the DPC that the Rules governing the posts of PTI, PET, and DPE needed to be amended first before considering promotions, leading to the deferment of the petitioner's case, is without any lawful authority. Parties aggrieved of the Note/Rules can challenge the Rules, if they are so advised, but the DPC cannot sit in judgment over the legality and enforceability of the Rules, which are duly framed under the law. The DPC is to examine the candidature of the officers under the law and process their cases for promotion, it lacks the authority to question the legality of the law or the Rules, which it is bound to enforce. Therefore, any proposed future amendments of the Rules proposed by a Deputy Secretary/ Representative of Regulations Wing, S&GAD, cannot bind the DPC to lay their hands off and defer promotions on this pretext. The DPC is bound to follow the law as it exists. It is axiomatic that the promotion of a civil servant cannot be withheld merely because amendments to the Rules are being contemplated.

5. Members of the DPC in this case ought to be reminded that while a civil servant does not have a vested right to promotion[2], he or she certainly has an enforceable right to be considered for promotion in accordance with law[3]. This right also finds its ideological roots in the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution"). Article 9 of the Constitution guarantees the right to life, which, through consistent judicial interpretation, has evolved beyond mere animal existence[4] to encompass the right to live with dignity and purpose.[5] Integral to this dignified existence is the right to livelihood[6], a concept that extends mere employment to include the genuine opportunity for growth, progress, and advancement in one's career in accordance with law. The right to a dignified livelihood transcends the mere possession of a job; it includes the essential opportunity for professional advancement and rise in one's career on basis of merit, experience, and adherence to established criteria.[7] A livelihood stripped of progression, stagnated by arbitrary or opaque service practices, renders the constitutional guarantee hollow and illusory. It is thus axiomatic that fair, transparent, and merit-based consideration for promotion forms an essential facet of the right to livelihood, and thus, of the right to life itself. Further, where a civil servant meets the prescribed qualifications and conditions for promotion, the lawful and transparent consideration of their case creates a legitimate expectation that such progression will materialize, unless cogent reasons to the contrary exist.[8] Denial or indefinite deferral of such consideration, particularly when based on arbitrary, opaque, or shifting grounds violates this expectation and reduces constitutional guarantees to mere rhetoric.

6. It is not out of place to reietrate and underscore that the civil bureaucracy is meant to be the steel frame of the State, not the rubber stamp of the political party in power. The civil bureaucracy serves as the backbone of the State, entrusted with ensuring continuity, stability, and efficiency in governance.[9] Unlike political leadership, which changes with electoral cycles, the civil service provides the institutional memory and administrative steadiness required for uninterrupted government functioning. It plays a vital role in implementing policies, delivering services, and upholding the institutional framework of the State. A fundamental characteristic of an effective civil service is impartiality and meritocracy.[10] In order to perform this role effectively, the civil service must remain free from political interference. It's independence, integrity, and intellectual honesty are essential to sustaining the rule of law and the constitution. Its allegiance lies with the Constitution and the law, not with shifting political winds. According to Professor Lorne Sossin, civil servants are the guardians of public trust and their duty of loyalty to the public interest must in some circumstances be a higher obligation than the duty of loyalty owed to the government of the day.[11] They should not be penalized for opposing government policies, especially in cases of illegal acts or threats to public safety.

7. Max Weber's classic theory[12] of bureaucracy reminds us that only a professional, merit-based, and politically neutral[13] civil service can sustain the rational-legal authority of a modern constitutional State. E.N. Gladden consistently stresses that the civil servant's loyalty is to the state and its institutions, not to transient political leaders or parties.[14] In the end we draw strength from the words of our founding father, Quaid-e-Azam Muhammad Ali Jinnah, who said: "Civil officers should have no hand in supporting this political party or that political party, this political leader or that political leader-this is not [their] business. Whichever government is formed according to the constitution, and whoever happens to be the Prime Minister or Minister coming into power in the ordinary constitutional course, [their] duty is not only to serve that government loyally and faithfully, but at the same time, fearlessly, maintaining [their] high reputation."[15]

8. We underline that arbitrary obstruction, unwarranted delay, capricious interference, unjustified hindrance, manipulation or undue delay in the career progression of a civil servant erode the independence and morale of the civil bureaucracy, transforming it into an instrument of political patronage, a phenomenon that is antithetical to the ethos of constitutional democracy and democratic governance. Such interference fosters networks of favoritism and erodes the impartiality and credibility of the civil service. It is therefore imperative that service laws must, therefore, be transparent, predictable, and uniformly applied, to ensure equal treatment. Purity of service can be obtained only if promotions are made on merit without favouritism or nepotism.[16]

9. For the above reasons we are of the view that decision of the DPC of withholding the promotion till such time that the Rules are suitably amended is not sustainable. We therefore direct the DPC to consider the case of the petitioner for promotion to the post of Lecturer Physical Education on merits and decide the same within one month from the receipt of this judgment.

10. In this background of the matter, we set aside the impugned order. Resultantly, this petition is converted into an appeal and allowed in the above terms.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---The petitioner seeks leave to appeal against the order dated 18.02.2025 whereby post-arrest bail was granted to respondent No.1 in case FIR No. 203/2023 dated 22.02.2023 registered at Police Station Bhalwal City, District Sargodha in respect of offences under Sections 302/427/109/34-P.P.C. The petitioner seeks cancellation of the same through the instant petition.

2. Briefly stated, the contents of the crime report reveal that the petitioner is alleged to have, on 22.02.2023 at approximately 11:00 a.m., acted in concert with a co-accused, both armed with weapons, and fired five shots, resulting in the murder of Asad Ahmad, the brother of the complainant.

3. The precise facts that formed the basis for grant of post-arrest bail to Respondent No. 1 are that the test identification parade was held on 25.09.2023 after a period of seven months of occurrence, therefore, the value of such a test identification parade can best be determined during trial and the recovery of Kalashnikov is at best a corroborative piece of evidence which cannot be singularly used to decline bail.

4. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties and gone through the record with their able assistance. The scope of the interference to be made by this Court in its appellate jurisdiction, in matters of cancellation of bail are well settled and hardly need reiteration. Bail, though a concession granted to ensure the liberty of an accused pending trial, is not an unqualified right and can be withdrawn, if misused. The law recognizes that bail may be cancelled if the accused, after securing release, engages in conduct that undermines the administration of justice. Such grounds include attempts to influence or intimidate witnesses, tampering with evidence, committing another offence while on bail, or violating conditions imposed by the court. Furthermore, if the accused fails to appear before the court without just cause, or if new facts come to light that materially alter the basis on which bail was granted, the court may justifiably revoke the concession. The guiding principle remains that the liberty of an individual must be balanced against the need to ensure a fair trial and uphold public confidence in the justice system.

5. Other than the above, the principles evolved for examining a bail granting order for the purpose of cancellation, the court usually interferes on two grounds: (i) when the impugned order is perverse on the face of it, or (ii) when the impugned order has been made in clear disregard of some principle of the law of bail.[1] A perverse order is the one that has been passed against the weight of the material on the record or by ignoring such material or without giving reasons;[2] such order is also termed as arbitrary, whimsical and capricious. While it is one of the elementary principles of the law of bail that courts are not to indulge in the exercise of a deeper appreciation of material available on record at the bail stage and are only to determine tentatively, by looking at such material, whether or not there exist any reasonable grounds for believing that the accused person is guilty of the alleged offence.[3] None of these grounds for cancellation of bail are attracted in the present case. Consequently, we are not inclined to interfere in the impugned order of the High Court. Accordingly, leave to appeal is declined and this petition is dismissed.

MH/R-2/SC Petition dismissed.

Civil Appeals Nos. 256 and 257 of 2024 and C.M.As. Nos. 3039 and 3042 of 2024, decided on 6th November, 2024.

(On appeal against the judgment dated 06.01.2024 passed by the Lahore High Court, Lahore in R.F.As. Nos. 43092 and 37623 of 2022).

(a) Alternate Dispute Resolution Act (XX of 2017)---

----S. 2(i)---Punjab Alternate Dispute Resolution Act (XVII of 2019), S. 2(b)---Balochistan Alternate Dispute Resolution Act (XXXI of 2022), S. 2(i)---Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Alternate Dispute Resolution Act (XLVIII of 2020), S. 2(a)---Civil Procedure Code (V of 1908) [as amended by the Code of Civil Procedure (Sindh Amendment) Act, 2018], S. 89-A(1)---Alternative Dispute Resolution ("ADR")---Mediation---Mediation is not merely an alternative to litigation but a complementary and necessary component of the justice system---Significance of mediation stated.

Mediation is evolving as a powerful mechanism for conflict resolution, bridging divides with creativity and fostering harmonious solutions. It is a testament to the potential of dialogue over confrontation. Mediation (and other mechanisms of Alternative Dispute Resolution (ADR)) can be philosophically framed as essential tools to ensure access to justice in a country where millions of cases are pending. This approach aligns with a broader understanding of justice as being not only about achieving outcomes but also about the process itself being fair, efficient, and accessible. Traditional court system is adversarial and often resource-intensive, leading to delays and alienation of marginalized groups. Mediation embodies a collaborative model of justice that prioritizes dialogue and empowerment, ensuring parties are active participants in resolving their disputes. The sheer volume of pending cases often renders justice delayed, and as the saying goes, "Justice delayed is justice denied." Mediation offers a timely and context-sensitive resolution that addresses the substance of disputes without being bogged down by procedural complexities. Philosophically, mediation reflects the relational nature of human beings. It prioritizes restoring relationships, preserving dignity, and finding mutually beneficial solutions over the zero-sum outcomes of litigation. Mediation accommodates the cultural, social, and economic diversity of disputing parties. It aligns with justice as capability enhancing, allowing parties to exercise their agency and reach solutions that reflect their lived realities. Mediation bridges modern legal systems with indigenous practices, thereby strengthening communal harmony while maintaining legal validity.

Mediation must be increasingly seen as a right of the parties within the litigation process. Access to justice includes the right to have disputes resolved in a timely and efficient manner. Mediation, as a faster and cost-effective alternative, satisfies this fundamental aspect of justice. Mediation respects the autonomy of the parties by giving them control over the process and outcome, unlike litigation, where outcomes are imposed by judges. Litigants have the right to avoid the adversarial consequences of litigation, such as financial strain, emotional distress, and reputational harm. Mediation provides a non-confrontational environment that mitigates these risks. Procedural justice emphasizes the fairness of the process, and mediation upholds this by ensuring participation, neutrality, and respect - core elements of a fair process. In contexts where economic inequalities limit access to legal representation, mediation ensures that the justice system remains accessible to the underprivileged. Many societies have strong traditions of community-led dispute resolution. Mediation builds on these traditions, ensuring justice remains culturally relevant. Mediation is at the heart of access to justice. Courts must embrace it as an essential tool for efficient and humane dispute resolution. In conclusion, mediation is not merely an alternative to litigation but a complementary and necessary component of the justice system.

Chief Justice Sundaresh Menon's speech titled "International Mediation and the Role of Courts" at the Supreme Court of Indonesia, November 2023 ref.

The reasons which make mediation a compelling choice for an appropriate avenue to resolve disputes efficiently and effectively, inter alia, include: (i) Cost-effectiveness; mediation incurs lower legal fees and expenses due to shorter and less formal processes; (ii) Time efficiency; resolutions can often be reached much faster through mediation than through court proceedings, which can take years to conclude, (iii) Flexibility; the procedures in mediation are flexible, allowing parties to tailor the specific processes to their specific needs, including choosing their mediator and deciding the rules for the proceedings, (iv) Confidentiality; unlike trials in courts which are generally public, mediation processes are private. This confidentiality can be crucial for preserving personal relationships, protecting trade secrets or avoiding negative publicity, (v) Preservation of relationships; mediation encourages cooperation and communication, which can help maintain or even improve relationships between parties, a key consideration in business context or family disputes, (vi) Control over the outcome; parties have more control over the resolution as they are directly involved in negotiating the settlement, (vii) Expertise; parties can choose an expert in the field relevant to their dispute to act as the mediator, which can lead to more informed decisions and (viii) Reduced hostility; mediation tends to be less adversarial than court litigation, which can reduce tensions and hostility between parties.

The courts should not only encourage mediating more and litigating less but also exhibit a promediation bias which connotes a pre-disposition within the legal system for resolution of disputes through mediation rather than through litigation or other forms of dispute resolution. Such bias does not favor one party over another but rather prioritizes mediation as the preferred method of dispute resolution. It is grounded in the belief that settlements are generally more efficient and satisfactory for all parties involved compared to outcomes determined by a court. Mediation offers the best chance of a solution where both parties leave with dignity and satisfaction, as opposed to the all-or-nothing results of litigation.

Encouraging mediation aligns with the broader goals of justice systems worldwide: to resolve disputes in a manner that is fair, efficient, and conducive to the longterm well-being of all parties involved.

From a global perspective, the value of mediation as a method of amicably resolving disputes has been recognized in various international legal instruments including the United Nations Convention on International Settlement Agreements Resulting from Mediation, known as, the "Singapore Convention on Mediation", ("Singapore Convention"). The Convention provides a uniform and efficient framework for the recognition and enforcement of mediated settlement agreements that resolve international, commercial disputes - akin to the framework that the 1958 New York Convention provides for arbitral awards. To date, the Convention has 57 signatories, while only 12 states have ratified the same. To promote efficiency and align with the principle that 'in the future, it is likely that the traditional trial will be the exception rather than the rule' it is recommended that Pakistan becomes a signatory to the Convention. This will not only reduce the alarming backlog statistics through enhancing faster access to justice but will also serve as a turning point towards a comprehensive and profound transformation of the legal and judicial system.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---The brief facts giving rise to the instant appeals are that Messrs Mughals Pakistan (Pvt.) Limited ("appellant"), a private limited construction company was engaged by Employees Old Age Benefits Institution and its wholly owned subsidiary, Messrs Pakistan Real Estate Investment and Management Company (Pvt.) Ltd., (collectively referred to as the "respondents") for a construction project. Following the initiation of the project, disputes arose between the appellant and the respondents regarding the extension of time and the encashment of Mobilization Advance Guarantees. Subsequently, the appellant filed petitions under Section 20 of the Arbitration Act, 1940 ("Act") along with an application under Section 41 read along with Second Schedule to the Act, seeking injunctive relief as well as invoking the remedy of arbitration before the learned Civil Court, Lahore. Thereafter, a two-member arbitral tribunal was constituted which, after hearing both the parties unanimously passed the arbitral award which was made the Rule of Court by the learned Civil Court vide its judgment and decree dated 18.05.2022, as provided under Sections 14 and 17 of the Act. An appeal was filed against the said judgment by the respondents before the Lahore High Court, Lahore which was allowed vide judgment dated 06.01.2024 and the unanimous arbitral award was rendered a nullity. Hence, the instant appeal.

2. During the last hearing1, it was deemed appropriate by the Court to suggest mediation of the dispute between the parties given the nature of the dispute. The parties were given appropriate time to seek instructions and explore the possibility of an out of court settlement. Today, the respondents after initially expressing their unease with out of court settlement or alternative dispute resolution ("ADR") finally agreed to resolve their dispute through mediation in both the appeals. The respondents, however, reserved their right to expand the scope of their dispute before the mediator, provided both the parties mutually agree to such a change.

3. "The courts of this country should not be the places where resolution of disputes begins. They should be the places where the disputes end after alternative methods of resolving disputes have been considered and tried."2 It is significant to underline that there are around 2.22 million (2,221,512) cases pending before all the courts in Pakistan.3 Out of these, 0.35 million (347,173) cases are pending in the Constitutional Courts (Supreme Court of Pakistan and the High Courts) while the bulk of the pendency is in the District Courts which constitutes 82% of these cases, translating into a backlog of 1.82 million (1,815,783) cases. This voluminous and chronic pendency necessitates exploration of new and out-of-box dispute resolution solutions. ADR is therefore the way head.

4. Mediation is evolving as a powerful mechanism for conflict resolution, bridging divides with creativity and fostering harmonious solutions. It is a testament to the potential of dialogue over confrontation. Mediation (and other mechanisms of ADR) can be philosophically framed as essential tools to ensure access to justice in a country where millions of cases are pending. This approach aligns with a broader understanding of justice as being not only about achieving outcomes but also about the process itself being fair, efficient, and accessible. Traditional court system is adversarial and often resource-intensive, leading to delays and alienation of marginalized groups. "Mediation is at the heart of access to justice. 6. The reasons which make mediation a compelling choice for an appropriate avenue to resolve disputes efficiently and effectively, inter alia, include: (i) Cost-effectiveness; mediation incurs lower legal fees and expenses due to shorter and less formal processes; (ii) Time efficiency; resolutions can often be reached much faster through mediation than through court proceedings, which can take years to conclude, (iii) Flexibility; the procedures in mediation are flexible, allowing parties to tailor the specific processes to their specific needs, including choosing their mediator and deciding the rules for the proceedings, (iv) Confidentiality; unlike trials in courts which are generally public, mediation processes are private. 7. It needs to be reiterated that "an ounce of mediation is worth a pound of arbitration and a ton of litigation."5 Our courts, more recently, have encouraged ADR.6 The courts should not only encourage "mediating more and litigating less7" but also exhibit a pro-mediation bias which connotes a pre-disposition within the legal system for resolution of disputes through mediation rather than through litigation or other forms of dispute resolution. Such bias does not favor one party over another but rather prioritizes mediation as the preferred method of dispute resolution. It is grounded in the belief that settlements are generally more efficient and satisfactory for all parties involved compared to outcomes determined by a court.8 Mediation offers the best chance of a solution where both parties leave with dignity and satisfaction, as opposed to the all-or-nothing results of litigation.

8. The introduction of a robust legal landscape i.e., The Alternate Dispute Resolution Act, 2017 ("2017 Act") and the provincial legislations9 in each respective province allows courts to exercise this pro-mediation bias. These laws accord the courts the power to refer a case to ADR with the consent of the parties. Similarly, ADR has been defined very broadly 'as a process in which parties' resort to resolving a dispute other than by adjudication by courts and includes, but is not limited to, arbitration, mediation, conciliation and neutral evaluation.' The 2017 Act along with the Balochistan Alternate Dispute Resolution Act, 2022 separately define mediation 'as a process in which a mediator facilitates dispute resolution by encouraging communication and negotiation between the parties, in order for them to arrive at a mutually satisfactory agreement.'10 Similarly, the Code of Civil Procedure (Sindh Amendment) Act, 2018 offers the most holistic definition of mediation by defining it as 'a process which is conducted confidentially in which a neutral person (mediator) actively assists parties in working towards a negotiated agreement of a dispute or difference, with the parties in ultimate control of the decision to settle the terms of the resolution, the mediator having no decision-making power or authority to impose solutions on the parties or force settlement between the parties.'11 To ensure inexpensive and expeditious justice by means of an alternate dispute resolution system, these legislations also provide for referral of cases to ADR centers. Further, various other laws12 also encourage the use of out of court settlement, in particular mediation. More recently, the ADR Mediation Accreditation (Eligibility) Rules, 202313 which provide for the eligibility requirements for any such center providing mediation services and Mediation Practice Direction (Civil) Rules, 202314 which provide for the practice to be followed by the courts in cases involving mediation, have been notified. Therefore, by using this legal framework as a means to foster a pro-mediation bias, courts, in particular the District Courts can contribute to a more harmonious and efficient dispute resolution landscape, where parties are empowered to resolve conflicts collaboratively and constructively. Encouraging mediation aligns with the broader goals of justice systems worldwide: to resolve disputes in a manner that is fair, efficient, and conducive to the longterm well-being of all parties involved.

9. In actualizing the true spirit of these legislations, various mediation centers15 including the Islamabad High Court-Annexed Mediation Center have been introduced, marking a significant initiative to reduce case backlog and prioritize mediation for dispute resolution. This idea of a court-annexed mediation through judges is highly encouraged and should extend to all Provinces as it will increase the likelihood of a settlement because litigating parties respect both the bench and the mantle of the judge. At the same time, private centers are also encouraged to adopt mediation as an efficient means to foster timely access to justice to all.

10. From a global perspective, the value of mediation as a method of amicably resolving disputes has been recognized in various international legal instruments including the United Nations Convention on International Settlement Agreements Resulting from Mediation, known as, the "Singapore Convention on Mediation", ("Singapore Convention").16 The Convention provides a uniform and efficient framework for the recognition and enforcement of mediated settlement agreements that resolve international, commercial disputes - akin to the framework that the 1958 New York Convention provides for arbitral awards. To date, the Convention has 57 signatories, while only 12 states have ratified the same. To promote efficiency and align with the principle that 'in the future, it is likely that the traditional trial will be the exception rather than the rule'17 it is recommended that Pakistan becomes a signatory to the Convention. This will not only reduce the alarming backlog statistics through enhancing faster access to justice but will also serve as a turning point towards a comprehensive and profound transformation of the legal and judicial system.

11. In view of the aforesaid, these appeals are disposed of as being sent out for mediation. In case mediation or any other mode of ADR is unsuccessful, the parties may approach this Court and apply for the refixation of these appeals. These appeals are, therefore consigned to the record.

12. Copy of this Order be dispatched to the Attorney-General for Pakistan for considering the recommendation in paragraph 7 of this Order regarding the ratification of the Singapore Convention with the relevant quarters.

(a) Constitution of Pakistan---

----Arts. 51(6)(d), 51(6)(e), 106(3)(c) & 63---Elections Act (XXXIII of 2017), Ss. 66, 104 & 215(5)---Seats reserved for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies, allocation of---Eligible political parties---Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI") [a political party] denied its election symbol by the Election Commission of Pakistan for failing to conduct its intra-party election---Whether Sunni Ittehad Council ("SIC") [a political party] which was joined by 80 independent returned candidates, who were backed by PTI, was eligible for the allocation of reserved seats---Whether Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI") was eligible for the allocation of reserved seats---Reasons for disagreeing with the majority decision in the present case listed.

i. Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI") was not before the Supreme Court nor before the High Court nor even before the ECP;

ii. The joining of 80 independent returned candidates with Sunni Ittehad Council ("SIC") was never disputed by anyone;

iii. The said 39 plus 41 persons as mentioned in the majority's short order did not come before the Supreme Court nor were they heard. The majority short order decided about their rights or lack thereof without their consent or even hearing them. Their joining of SIC has been undone without such prayer raised by anyone before the Supreme Court, or before the High Court;

iv. Not only the appeals filed by the SIC have been dismissed by the majority order, as no relief has been granted to SIC but independent members who joined the SIC have also been snatched from the SIC and that too without hearing the above said 39 plus 41 persons;

v. Unless Articles 51, 106 and 63 of Constitution are suspended and in their place new articles in consonance with the relief granted through the majority order are inserted in the Constitution, the relief which has been granted to the PTI cannot be granted;

vi. Article 175 of the Constitution has been ignored;
vii. The constitutional limits of jurisdiction under Article 185 of the Constitution have been ignored;
viii. All substantive as well as procedural law with regard to parties to lis have been ignored;
ix. The relief granted to PTI is self-created and has been carved out by the majority, without anyone claiming this relief in these proceedings;
x. Not only SIC has been denied relief claimed by it but all those who have joined it have been taken off and for the rest of the tenure of the National as well as Provincial assemblies. Thus, SIC has been kicked out from the assemblies;
xi. For a specific date i.e. 06.05.2024 the notification of returned candidates for special seats has been quashed, however before that date their notification and acts are held to be valid. It is incomprehensible how can this be done, as it is without any backing of Constitution;
xii. The majority short judgment virtually declares that said 80 persons are not honest and ameen in accordance with Article 62(1)(f) of the Constitution;
xiii. All the returned candidates for the reserved seats of other parties who have been notified were not issued notices and provided an opportunity of hearing;
xiv. Forty-one (41) candidates mentioned in Annexure-B (of the majority short judgment) have been given the choice of joining any other Political Party;
xv. The issue was simply the matter of post general elections directly related to the reserved seats for both women and non-Muslims on the basis of proportional representation system of political parties' lists of candidates under Articles 51 and 106 of the Constitution. The majority's short order in effect created a new parliamentary party in the National Assembly and three Provincial Assemblies and since this related to the pre-election process, it is clearly and unequivocally not an issue before the Supreme Court. In the process of the general elections all events are scheduled and timebound and the same cannot be reversed;
xvi. The judgment of the full Bench of the Peshawar High Court has been set aside by the majority's short order to the extent, that it is or may be inconsistent with the majority's short order. This is incomprehensible as none of the rights which have now been created in favour of PTI by the majority's short order were in issue before the High Court, nor had been adjudicated upon. The High Court had simply dismissed SIC's claim to the reserved seats, which was the lis before the High Court.

If an independent candidate joins a party, though it may be listed as a political party with ECP, it does not make that party entitled for the reserved seats. The joining of independent candidates only enhances the proportion of right in the reserved seats of that party if that party has won seats. Joining of independent candidates with any political party does not create a right in favour of that political party to become eligible for reserved seats only on the basis of the joining of independent candidates.

The majority judgment ignores all rules of procedure, substantive provisions of law and the Constitution. Relief cannot be granted to the PTI as PTI was not before the Court nor tried to become a party before the ECP, High Court and before the Supreme Court nor was claiming the reserved seats, which were in issue in the instant litigation. If the said 39 plus 41 persons take any step on the basis of majority's short judgment, which is not in accordance with the Constitution, they may lose their seats as returned candidates on the basis of violation of the Constitution. Any other constitutional body cannot be asked to take any steps or decisions which are not permissible under the Constitution. If the said 80 persons change their stance on the basis of the majority short judgment, they will be guilty of violating their oath for the members of the National Assembly.

For creating and carving out relief in these proceedings for PTI, the Court would have to travel beyond the jurisdiction conferred by Articles 175 and 185 of the Constitution and would also have to suspend Articles 51, 106 and 63 of the Constitution and section 104 of the Elections Act, 2017 along with the relevant rules. All the rules of procedures of proceedings before the Supreme Court and the Supreme Court Rules, 1980 would also have to be ignored as no party before the Court asked in writing or orally for the relief which has been granted to PTI. Therefore, any affidavit contrary to the provisions of the affidavits already filed will entail the penal consequences of non-seating such members of National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies if he/she files a fresh affidavit in contradiction to his/her previous affidavit and joins any other party. Any order of the Court which is not in consonance with the constitutional provisions is not binding upon any other constitutional organ of the State.

In conclusion, it is clear that the superstructure created by the majority's short order, does not in any way come within the ambit of the jurisdiction vested in the Supreme Court or in the Constitution.

(b) Constitution of Pakistan---

----Arts. 218 & 187(1)---Election Commission of Pakistan, duty of---Scope---Electoral justice and integrity---Power of the Supreme Court to do complete justice for protection of democracy---Election authorities, as "electoral management bodies", are the "guarantor institutions" of democratic processes and are critical to democratic governance, akin to a "fourth branch of government"---Their constitutional role is to ensure the conduct of elections by providing an equal and fair competitive field for all political entities and protect citizens' rights to vote---As an impartial steward of the electoral process, the Election Commission of Pakistan is not only an administrative body but also a guardian of electoral integrity and democracy's legitimacy---When election authorities engage in actions that undermine these principles, such as unlawfully denying the recognition of a major political party and treating its nominated candidates as independents, they not only compromise the rights of these candidates but also significantly infringe upon the rights of the electorate and corrode their own institutional legitimacy---When the Election Commission errs or makes significant mistakes impacting the electoral process, judicial intervention becomes necessary to rectify them and ensure electoral justice---Electoral justice is vital to protecting political and electoral rights and is intertwined with electoral integrity---Role of the Supreme Court of Pakistan in overseeing electoral integrity is crucial for sustaining public trust in the democratic process, and the Court's power to do "complete justice" is a critical tool in the constitutional arsenal of the Supreme Court, enabling it to prevent democratic backsliding, and protect democracy effectively with a focus on the electorate's rights---Denying electoral justice and compromising electoral integrity would undermine the very legitimacy of democracy.

(c) Constitution of Pakistan---

----Art. 185---Appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court---Election dispute---Judicial inquiry not limited to pleadings of the parties---A case before the Supreme Court involving an election dispute cannot be treated as an ordinary civil case and the judicial inquiry into such a case cannot be limited to the pleadings of the parties. Elections are a crucial part of the democratic process, and the public has a major stake in ensuring that they are held free and fair, unmarred by corrupt or illegal practices. Therefore, unlike ordinary civil cases, election cases involve substantial public interest. An election dispute is fundamentally different from other civil disputes, as it is not solely a dispute between two contesting parties but a proceeding where the constituency itself is the principal interested party. These cases involve not just the rights of the contesting candidates or political parties but also the rights of the voters, constituencies and the public. Election cases aim to fill public offices by properly qualified and duly elected candidates and to maintain the purity of elections, ensuring that no one takes charge of a public office through flagrant breaches of election laws or corrupt practices. The proceedings in election cases thus have unique characteristics because they serve the interests of the entire constituency, differentiating them from ordinary civil proceedings. This distinction clearly demonstrates the flaw in treating an election case as an ordinary civil case and limiting the judicial inquiry to the pleadings of the parties as it is in adversarial proceedings.

In adjudicating election controversies, courts must therefore play an active role in an inquisitorial manner, defending the rights of the constituency and the values and principles of democracy. They must act as guardians of the fundamental rights of the people against any misuse of power or illegal action in the electoral process.

----Part II, Chap. 1---Fundamental Rights---Progressive, and dynamic interpretation---Fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution, an organic instrument, are not capable of precise or permanent definition delineating their meaning and scope for all times to come---With the passage of time, changes occur in the political, social and economic conditions of the society, which requires re-evaluation of their meaning and scope in consonance with the changed conditions---Therefore, keeping in view the prevailing socioeconomic and politico-cultural values and ideals of the society, the courts construe the fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution with a progressive, liberal and dynamic approach---This approach ensures that the fundamental rights remain a vibrant and effective guarantee of citizens' rights, liberties and freedoms, adapting to the evolving needs and aspirations of society---With this approach, the courts expound the fundamental rights to give them life and substance that are true to the reality of the changing times.

----Ss. 215(5), 209 & 210---Constitution of Pakistan, Art. 17(2)---Political party---Failure to conduct intra-party elections---Non-allocation of election symbol---No further penalty beyond the specified non-allocation of an election symbol---It is unequivocal that Section 215(5) of the Elections Act, 2017 prescribes a penal consequence for a political party's failure to comply with the provisions of Section 209 (regarding intra-party elections) or Section 210 (regarding the sources of the party's funds)---The specified penalty of non-allocation of an election symbol curtails the political party's fundamental right to function and operate as a political party-a right implicit in the right to form a political party guaranteed by Article 17(2) of the Constitution---Therefore, Section 215(5) must be construed strictly -- No further penalty or consequence beyond the specified non-allocation of an election symbol can be inferred or assumed from Section 215(5)---Additionally, no other constitutional or statutory right of the political party can be denied on the basis of the non-allocation of an election symbol under this provision.

(g) Election Rules, 2017---

----R. 94, Explanation---Elections Act (XXXIII of 2017), S. 215(5)---Constitution of Pakistan, Arts. 51(6)(d), 51(6)(e) & 106(3)(c)---Explanation to Rule 94 of the Election Rules, 2017, vires of---Seats reserved for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies, allocation of---Eligible political parties---Explanation to Rule 94 of the Election Rules, 2017 being beyond the scope of Section 215(5) of the Elections Act, 2017 and inconsistent with the provisions of Articles 51(6)(d), 51(6)(e) and 106(3)(c) of the Constitution, was ultra vires the Elections Act, 2017 and the Constitution, thus void and invalid.

Rule 94 of the Election Rules, 2017 provides the procedure for the calculation, allocation and notification of the share of proportional representation of political parties in the seats reserved for women and non-Muslims. Its Explanation stipulates that '[f]or the purpose of this rule, the expression "political party" means a political party to which a symbol has been allocated by the Commission.' By defining a political party in this manner, the Explanation excludes a political party that has not been allotted a symbol by the Commission from being allocated a share of proportional representation in the reserved seats. No such exclusion of a political party, as created by the Explanation to Rule 94, is provided in Articles 51(6)(d), 51(6)(e) and 106(3)(c) of the Constitution, nor is any such consequence of non-allocation of the election symbol provided in Section 215(5) of the Elections Act, 2017 or any other provision of the said Act. In effect, it has introduced an additional penal consequence of declaring a political party ineligible to obtain an election symbol under Section 215(5) of the Elections Act, 2017 and it has also infringed the constitutional right of a political party, conferred by Articles 51(6)(d), 51(6)(e) and 106(3)(c) of the Constitution, to have its due share of proportional representation in the seats reserved for women and non-Muslims on the basis of general seats secured by such a political party. This Explanation has thus clearly gone beyond and against the provisions of the Elections Act, 2017 and the Constitution.

The Explanation to Rule 94 of the Election Rules, 2017 being beyond the scope of Section 215(5) of the Elections Act, 2017 and inconsistent with the provisions of Articles 51(6)(d), 51(6)(e) and 106(3)(c) of the Constitution, is declared ultra vires the Elections Act, 2017 and the Constitution, thus void and invalid.

(h) Elections Act (XXXIII of 2017)---

----Ss. 215(5), 98 & 67(3)---Constitution of Pakistan, Art. 17(2)---Whether a candidate nominated by a political party ineligible to obtain an election symbol be mentioned as an independent candidate in the list of contesting candidates (Form-33), and can such a returned candidate be notified as an independent returned candidate in the Section 98 Notification?---Right to participate in and contest elections as a political party through its nominated candidates is a fundamental right guaranteed by Article 17(2) of the Constitution---This right is not, nor can it be, extinguished by any provision of the Elections Act, 2017 including Section 215(5) thereof---Depriving a political party of participating in and contesting elections through its nominated candidates, destroys the political existence of the party and is tantamount to its political extermination and virtual dissolution, which cannot be done except by the procedure and on the grounds provided in Article 17(2) of the Constitution---Similar would be the position if the candidates nominated by a political party are denied the status of being the candidates of that political party and are mentioned as independent candidates in the list of contesting candidates (Form-33), or such returned candidates are notified as independent returned candidates in the Notification under section 98 of the Elections Act, 2017---Such actions of the Returning Officers and the Election Commission of Pakistan would also be ultra vires Article 17(2) of the Constitution, as they effectively nullify the party's right to participate in and contest elections---Notwithstanding that a political party has been declared ineligible to obtain an election symbol, its nominated candidates cannot be mentioned as independent candidates in the list of contesting candidates (Form 33), despite allotment of different election symbols to them under Section 67(3) of the Elections Act, 2017 nor can they be notified as independent returned candidates in the Section-98 Notification.

(i) Constitution of Pakistan---

----Arts. 51(6)(d) & 51(6)(e) & 106(3)(c)---Seats reserved for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies, allocation of---Eligible political parties---Parties that contest and win general seats---Article 51(6)(d) of the Constitution refers to political parties that have contested for and won one or more general seats in the National Assembly from the Province concerned, and not to all enlisted political parties---Similarly, Article 51(6)(e) of the Constitution refers to political parties that have contested for and won one or more general seats in the National Assembly from the whole country, i.e., from any of the Provinces or the Federal Capital---Therefore, Articles 51(6)(d) & (e) and 106(3)(c) of the Constitution refer to political parties that have contested for and won general seats and not to all enlisted political parties---Political party which does not win (any) general seats, is not entitled to allocation of the reserved seats.

----Arts. 51(6)(d), 51(6)(e) & 106(3)(c)---Elections Act (XXXIII of 2017), Ss. 66, 98, 104 & 215(5)---Election Rules, 2017, R. 94, Explanation---Seats reserved for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies, allocation of---Eligible political parties---Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI") [a political party] denied its election symbol by the Election Commission of Pakistan for failing to conduct its intra-party election---Whether Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI")was eligible for the allocation of reserved seats---Held, that lack or denial of an election symbol does not in any manner affect the constitutional and legal rights of a political party to participate in an election---Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI") was and is a political party, which secured or won general seats in the National and Provincial Assemblies in the General Elections of 2024---Directions issued by the Supreme Court regarding the procedure and methodology for allocation of reserved seats for women and minorities to PTI in the National and Provincial Assemblies stated.

(i) The lack or denial of an election symbol does not in any manner affect the constitutional and legal rights of a political party to participate in an election (whether general or bye) and to field candidates and the Election Commission of Pakistan ("Commission') is under a constitutional duty to act, and construe and apply all statutory provisions, accordingly.

(ii) For the purposes, and within the meaning, of paragraphs (d) and (e) of clause (6) of Article 51 ("Article 51 Provisions") and paragraph (c) of clause (3) of Article 106 ("Article 106 Provisions") of the Constitution, the Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI") was and is a political party, which secured or won (the two terms being interchangeable) general seats in the National and Provincial Assemblies in the General Elections of 2024 as herein after provided.

(iii) During the course of the hearing of the instant appeals, counsel for the Commission placed before the Court a list ("the List") of 80 returned candidates for the National Assembly (now MNAs), setting out in tabular form particulars relating to their election. Counsel made a categorical statement that the Commission stood by the data so provided to the Court. In particular, the List contained three columns marked as follows: (i) "Statement (on nomination form) given in declaration and oath by the person nominated (i.e., 'I belong to')"; (ii) "Certificate of party affiliation under Section 66 of the Elections Act, 2017"; and (iii) "Statutory Declaration/affidavit accompanying section 66 certificate". In the peculiar facts and circumstances of the General Election of 2024, it is declared that out of the aforesaid 80 returned candidates (now MNAs) those (being 39 in all and whose particulars are set out in Annex A to this Order) in respect of whom the Commission has shown "PTI" in any one of the aforesaid columns in the List, were and are the returned candidates whose seats were and have been secured by the PTIwithin the meaning, and for purposes of, para (ii) above in relation to the Article 51 Provisions.

(iv) In the peculiar facts and circumstances of the General Election of 2024, it is further ordered that any of the remaining 41 returned candidates out of the aforesaid 80 (whose particulars are set out in Annex B to this Order) may, within 15 working days of this Order file a statement duly signed and notarized stating that he or she contested the General Election as a candidate of the political party specified therein. If any such statement(s) is/are filed, the Commission shall forthwith but in any case within 7 days thereafter give notice to the political party concerned to file, within 15 working days, a confirmation that the candidate contested the General Election as its candidate. A political party may in any case, at any time after the filing of a statement asaforesaid, of its own motion file its confirmation. If such a statement is filed, and is confirmed by the political party concerned, then the seat secured by such candidate shall be forthwith deemed to be a seat secured by that political party for the purposes of para (ii) above in relation to the Article 51 Provisions. The Commission shall also forthwith issue, and post on its website, a list of the retuned candidates (now MNAs) and seats to which this para applies within 7 days after the last date on which a political party may file its confirmation and shall simultaneously file a compliance report in the Court.

(v) For the purposes of para (ii) of this Order in relation to the Article 51 Provisions, the number of general seats secured by PTI shall be the total of the seats declared in terms of para (iii) and those, if any, to which para (iv)applies. The PTI shall be entitled to reserved seats for women and minorities in the National Assembly accordingly. PTI shall, within 15working days of this Order file its lists of candidates for the said reserved seats and the provisions of the Elections Act, 2017 ("Act") (including in particular S. 104) and the Elections Rules, 2017 ("Rules") shall be applied to such lists in such manner as gives effect to this Order in full measure. The Commission shall, out of the reserved seats for women and minorities in the National Assembly to which para (vii) of this Order applies, notify as elected in terms of the Article 51 Provisions, that number of candidates from the lists filed (or, as the case may be, to be filed) by the PTI as is proportionate to the general seats secured by it in terms of paras (iii) and (iv) of this Order.

(vi) The order of the Election Commission of Pakistan ("Commission") dated 01.03.2024 ("Impugned Order") is declared to be ultra vires the Constitution, without lawful authority and of no legal effect.

(vii) The notifications (of various dates) whereby the persons respectively mentioned therein (being the persons identified in the Election Commission's notification No.F.5(1)/2024-Cord. dated 13.05.2024) have been declared to be returned candidates for reserved seats for women and minorities in the National and Provincial Assemblies are declared to be ultra vires the Constitution, without lawful authority and of no legal effect, and are quashed from 06.05.2024 onwards, being the date an interim order was made by the Court.

(viii) The foregoing paras shall apply mutatis mutandis for purposes of the Article 106 Provisions in relation to PTI (as set out in para (ii) herein above) for the reserved seats for women and minorities in the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab and Sindh Provincial Assemblies to which para (vii) of this Order applies. In case the Commission or PTI need any clarification or order so as to give effect to this para in full measure, it shall forthwith apply to the Court by making an appropriate application, which shall be put up before the Judges constituting the majority in chambers for such orders and directions as may be deemed appropriate.

----Arts. 51(6)(d), 51(6)(e) & 106(3)(c)---Elections Act (XXXIII of 2017), Ss. 66, 104 & 215(5)---Election Rules, 2017, R. 92---Seats reserved for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies, allocation of---Eligible political parties---Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI") [a political party] denied its election symbol by the Election Commission of Pakistan for failing to conduct its intra-party election---Whether Sunni Ittehad Council ("SIC") [a political party] which was joined by 80 independent returned candidates, who were backed by PTI, was eligible for the allocation of reserved seats---Whether Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI") was eligible for the allocation of reserved seats---Sunni Ittehad Council does not fulfil the conditions prescribed for a political party under the enabling provisions of the Constitution and the law to be allowed/allocated reserved seats for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly or the Provincial Assemblies---However, Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI") did fulfil the conditions prescribed for a political party under the enabling provisions of the Constitution and the law to be allowed/allocated reserved seats for women and non-Muslims---Procedure and methodology for allocation of reserved seats for women and minorities to PTI in the National and Provincial Assemblies stated.

A fundamental prerequisite for a political party to qualify for reserved seats is the winning of at least one general seat in the elections. Consequently, the entitlement of a political party to reserved seats is inextricably linked to its success on at least one general seat. Similarly, a political party must win a general seat to benefit from the inclusion of independent candidates, so as to become a part of its numerical strength for the purpose of allocation of reserved seats.

Sunni Ittehad Council ("SIC") is a registered political party, but it did not field any candidate for a seat in the National Assembly or Provincial Assemblies in the General Election, 2024. Thus, having won no seat in the houses, it cannot seek to include the independent returned members of the respective houses to enhance its strength for the allocation of reserved seats within the contemplation of Articles 51 and 106 of the Constitution. Further, SIC had not submitted any list of candidates for reserved seats for women or for non-Muslims within the period fixed by Election Commission of Pakistan ('ECP'), as reflected in the Schedule of Election notified in the official gazette. SIC does not fulfil the conditions prescribed for a political party under the enabling provisions of the Constitution and the law to be allocated reserved seats for women and non- Muslims in the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies.

Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI") fulfils the conditions prescribed for a political party under the enabling provisions of the Constitution and the law to be allowed/allocated reserved seats for women and non-Muslims, in terms that:

i. A candidate for a seat in the National Assembly or the Provincial Assembly, who in his/her nomination paper has declared on oath to belong to Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI") and duly submitted a certificate of the same political party confirming that he/she is the nominated candidate of PTI for the respective constituency, shall remain so, and cannot be declared independent, unless he/she submitted a written declaration to the Election Commission of Pakistan or Returning Officer to be treated as the candidate of another political party or as an independent candidate;

ii. A returned candidate to the National Assembly or the Provincial Assembly, who in his/her nomination paper has declared on oath to belong to PTI and duly submitted a certificate of the same political party confirming that he/she is the nominated candidate of PTI for the respective constituency, shall remain so, and this consistent position maintained by a returned candidate throughout the electoral process should be legally recognized by the Election Commission of Pakistan and such returned candidate cannot be treated as the returned candidate of another political party or as an independent returned candidate, and thus, the reserved seats for women and non- Muslims are to be allowed/ allocated to PTI, accordingly;

iii. A candidate nominated by PTI for a constituency of the National Assembly or the Provincial Assembly who, after being declared returned, joined another political party or sought to be treated as independent, raises serious concerns about disregarding the trust reposed in him/her by the voters, thus undermining the will of the people; and

iv. The legal implications, effects and consequences of the determinations made above in paragraphs (ii) and (iii), as well as the actions or inactions of the Election Commission of Pakistan thereon, although deeply concerning, have not been challenged in the present appeals and petitions; and the persons who would be affected or aggrieved are not parties before the Supreme Court. Therefore, issuing definitive directions to the Election Commission of Pakistan qua the allocation of specific number of reserved seats for women and non-Muslims to a political party in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies would not be legally appropriate.

Accordingly, the Election Commission of Pakistan is directed to decide the allocation of reserved seats for women and non- Muslims to political parties in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies in the light of the determinations made hereinabove after providing an opportunity of hearing to the parties concerned, and if required revisit its earlier decisions on the matter.

----Art. 187(1)---Power of the Supreme Court to do complete justice---Scope---While the undeniable power of the Supreme Court to do complete justice under Article 187 of the Constitution is recognized, exercising this power in the absence of an aggrieved party directly approaching the Court could set a dangerous and far-reaching precedent---Such a course risks undermining the principles of due process and judicial restraint, potentially leading to an overreach of judicial authority---Exercise of this power must, therefore, be reserved for exceptional circumstances, where there is a clear and compelling need to intervene to bolster the rights of the aggrieved petitioner, and prevent a miscarriage of justice.

column in the nomination papers/declaration and were elected shall be considered to be independents---All those who joined the SIC are presumed to have done so out of their own free will---None of them claimed to have joined SIC because of any misunderstanding of any judgment, the law, compulsion, coercion or undue influence and it is not for the Supreme Court to presume otherwise---They are now members of SIC---Neither the Constitution nor the Elections Act, 2017 permits the Supreme Court to issue direction or provide an opportunity or additional avenue to them to join another political party and that too, within a period of fifteen days.

----Arts. 51(3), 51(6)(d) & (e), 106(3)(c) & 224(6)---Seats reserved for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies---Whether reserved seats could be left vacant---Held, that under Article 51(3) of the Constitution, the total number of seats in the National Assembly shall be 326, out of which 60 seats are reserved for women and 10 seats for non-Muslims---Such right of women and non-Muslims has been guaranteed by the Constitution---They shall be elected in accordance with the law through proportional representation system of political parties' list of candidates on the basis of total number of general seats secured by each political party from the Province concerned in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies, as provided by Article 51(6) (d) and (e) of the Constitution---Therefore, they cannot be deprived of this right of theirs by leaving these seats vacant, and all reserved seats must be filled in, as provided by Article 224(6) of the Constitution.

----Arts. 51(6)(d), 51(6)(e), 106(3)(c) & 10A---Elections Act (XXXIII of 2017), Ss. 66, 104 & 215(5)---Seats reserved for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies, allocation of---Eligible political parties---Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI") [a political party] denied its election symbol by the Election Commission of Pakistan for failing to conduct its intra-party election---Whether Sunni Ittehad Council ("SIC") [a political party] which was joined by 80 independent returned candidates, who were backed by PTI, was eligible for the allocation of reserved seats---Whether Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI") was eligible for the allocation of reserved seats---Constitutional violations and illegalities in the majority's short order of 12 July 2024, the majority's detailed judgment of 23 September 2024, the order/clarification of 14 September 2024 and the clarification of 18 October 2024 highlighted.

Present appeals were heard by a thirteen-member Bench of the Supreme Court, comprising of all judges of the Supreme Court. The majority's short order concluded by permitting the Election Commission of Pakistan ('ECP') and Pakistan Tehreek-i-Insaf ('PTI') to, 'apply to the Court by making an appropriate application, which shall be put up before the Judges constituting the majority in chambers for such orders and directions as may be deemed appropriate'. This deviated from how courts have always functioned, was novel and unprecedented. The majority of eight judges decided to part ways with the Court, comprising of thirteen judges, which had heard the appeals. The majority set up its own virtual court, permitted the making of 'an appropriate application' by the ECP and PTI, and directed that such appropriate application would only be heard by them whilst cloistered in Chambers. In doing this the majority of the Judges effectively legislated, because neither the Constitution nor any law permits what they did. Incidentally no party or counsel during the hearing ever suggested the course of action which the majority adopted, and neither the majority's short order nor the majority's detailed judgment offers an explanation to justify it.

The majority disregarded the precedents of the Supreme Court, and they not only carved out a separate eight-member 'court' from the thirteen-member Court, but also innovated further by not finally concluding the hearing of the appeals, because they permitted appropriate application to be filed, introduced timelines and changed what the Constitution provided. The timelines that were introduced were as under:

(i) 41 returned candidates to file a statement within 15 days;

(ii) Upon receipt of the above statements the ECP to give notice to the political party concerned;

(iii) Then within 15 days the political party to submit its 'confirmation that the candidates contesting the General Elections as its candidates'; and

(iv) The ECP within 7 days to issue and post on its website 'the list of candidates now MNAs'.

Judges may decide or dispose of a case as per their understanding of the Constitution and the law but it is critical that the case must be decided or disposed of. Permitting appropriate application to be filed by the ECP or the PTI meant that the case was not decided or disposed of. This coupled with the stated timelines effectively kept the appeals pending. In civil cases after a judgment is pronounced the decree follows. In constitutional cases too a judgment can be executed, provided it is finally and conclusively decided. The majority's short order and the majority's detailed judgment did not conclude the appeals. The well trodden legal path was abandoned by the majority which created unnecessary and avoidable problems. Since the appeals were not finally decided there was no decision which could be stated to be binding, in terms of Article 189 of the Constitution. Similarly, contempt of court proceedings for any non-compliance of the 'order of the Court', under Article 204 of the Constitution, cannot be initiated. The right of review, which Article 188 of the Constitution grants, was also effectively negated.

The majority's short order was announced on 12 July 2024, following which the Judges had to issue their detailed reasons for the same. Instead something inexplicable happened. A purported order/clarification was uploaded on the Supreme Court's website on 14 September 2024, and this was done without informing the Chief Justice, the other Judges (in the minority), and bypassing the Registrar and the office of the Supreme Court. And, this was done on a Saturday, after the Registrar had left. The majority's order/clarification of 14th September was admittedly passed without first listing the cases, without issuing notices to the parties and without issuance of the requisite notice to the Attorney-General for Pakistan. The title of the 'order' stated - 'In Chambers'. However, not all of the said eight Judges (in majority) were in the Supreme Court premises and some were not even in Islamabad (principal seat of the Supreme Court). By not issuing notices, not granting an opportunity of hearing, and not conducting the hearing in open Court, the well-established rules of natural justice were transgressed, and Article 10A of the Constitution, which gives protection to procedural fairness and has elevated due process and fair trial to the status of a Fundamental Right, was contravened. The mandatory requirements of openness and transparency were also transgressed.

The majority's order/clarification of 14th September was followed by yet another; the majority's clarification of 18th October which, like the earlier one of 14 September 2024, was uploaded on the website of the Supreme Court in similar manner. This was done on Friday, 18 October 2024 at 3.59 pm. This time too the cause list was not issued, parties were not informed, and an opportunity of hearing was not provided. Where and when the Judges (in majority) had met also remains a mystery. The majority's orders/clarifications of 14th September, 2024 and 18th October, 2024 cannot be stated to have been issued by a 'Court'; the forum which issued them was coram non judice. Moreover, such forum did not comply with the rudimentary principles of natural justice, of due process and of fair trial. Therefore, the same do not constitute legal orders, and are of no legal effect. They also cannot be categorized as a 'decision' of the Supreme Court (in terms of Article 189 of the Constitution), resultantly, they need not be followed or acted upon.

ORDER[*]

Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, Munib Akhtar, Muhammad Ali Mazhar, Ayesha A. Malik, Athar Minallah, Syed Hasan Azhar Rizvi, Shahid Waheed and Irfan Saadat Khan, JJ.: For detailed reasons to be recorded later and subject to what is set out therein by way of amplification and/or explanation or otherwise, these appeals are decided in the following terms:

1. The impugned judgment dated 25.03.2024 of the learned Full Bench of the High Court is set aside to the extent it is or may be inconsistent with this Order or the detailed reasons.

2. The order of the Election Commission of Pakistan ("Commission") dated 01.03.2024 ("Impugned Order") is declared to be ultra vires the Constitution, without lawful authority and of no legal effect.

3. The notifications (of various dates) whereby the persons respectively mentioned therein (being the persons identified in the Commission's notification No.F.5(1)/2024-Cord. dated 13.05.2024) have been declared to be returned candidates for reserved seats for women and minorities in the National and Provincial Assemblies are declared to be ultra vires the Constitution, without lawful authority and of no legal effect, and are quashed from 06.05.2024 onwards, being the date an interim order was made by the Court in CPLA Nos. 1328-9 of 2024, the leave petitions out of which the instant appeals arise.

4. It is declared that the lack or denial of an election symbol does not in any manner affect the constitutional and legal rights of a political party to participate in an election (whether general or bye) and to field candidates and the Commission is under a constitutional duty to act, and construe and apply all statutory provisions, accordingly.

5. It is declared that for the purposes, and within the meaning, of paragraphs (d) and (e) of clause (6) of Article 51 ("Article 51 Provisions") and paragraph (c) of clause (3) of Article 106 ("Article 106 Provisions") of the Constitution, the Pakistan Tehreek e Insaf ("PTI") was and is a political party, which secured or won (the two terms being interchangeable) general seats in the National and Provincial Assemblies in the General Elections of 2024 as herein after provided.

6. During the course of the hearing of the instant appeals, on 27.06.2024, learned counsel for the Commission placed before the Court a list ("the List") of 80 returned candidates for the National Assembly (now MNAs), setting out in tabular form particulars relating to their election. Learned counsel made a categorical statement that the Commission stood by the data so provided to the Court. In particular, the List contained three columns marked as follows: (i) "Statement (on nomination form) given in declaration and oath by the person nominated (i.e., 'I belong to')"; (ii) "Certificate of party affiliation under Section 66 of the Elections Act, 2017"; and (iii) "Statutory Declaration/ affidavit accompanying section 66 certificate".

7. In the peculiar facts and circumstances of the General Election of 2024, it is declared that out of the aforesaid 80 returned candidates (now MNAs) those (being 39 in all and whose particulars are set out in Annex A to this Order) in respect of whom the Commission has shown "PTI" in any one of the aforesaid columns in the List, were and are the returned candidates whose seats were and have been secured by the PTI within the meaning, and for purposes of, para 5 above in relation to the Article 51 Provisions.

8. In the peculiar facts and circumstances of the General Election of 2024, it is further ordered that any of the remaining 41 returned candidates out of the aforesaid 80 (whose particulars are set out in Annex B to this Order) may, within 15 working days of this Order file a statement duly signed and notarized stating that he or she contested the General Election as a candidate of the political party specified therein. If any such statement(s) is/are filed, the Commission shall forthwith but in any case within 7 days thereafter give notice to the political party concerned to file, within 15 working days, a confirmation that the candidate contested the General Election as its candidate. A political party may in any case, at any time after the filing of a statement as aforesaid, of its own motion file its confirmation. If such a statement is filed, and is confirmed by the political party concerned, then the seat secured by such candidate shall be forthwith deemed to be a seat secured by that political party for the purposes of para 5 above in relation to the Article 51 Provisions. The Commission shall also forthwith issue, and post on its website, a list of the retuned candidates (now MNAs) and seats to which this para applies within 7 days after the last date on which a political party may file its confirmation and shall simultaneously file a compliance report in the Court.

9. For the purposes of para 5 of this Order in relation to the Article 51 Provisions, the number of general seats secured by PTI shall be the total of the seats declared in terms of para 7 and those, if any, to which para 8 applies. The PTI shall be entitled to reserved seats for women and minorities in the National Assembly accordingly. PTI shall, within 15 working days of this Order file its lists of candidates for the said reserved seats and the provisions of the Elections Act, 2017 ("Act") (including in particular section 104) and the Elections Rules, 2017 ("Rules") shall be applied to such lists in such manner as gives effect to this Order in full measure. The Commission shall, out of the reserved seats for women and minorities in the National Assembly to which para 3 of this Order applies, notify as elected in terms of the Article 51 Provisions, that number of candidates from the lists filed (or, as the case may be, to be filed) by the PTI as is proportionate to the general seats secured by it in terms of paras 7 and 8 of this Order.

10. The foregoing paras shall apply mutatis mutandis for purposes of the Article 106 Provisions in relation to PTI (as set out in para 5 herein above) for the reserved seats for women and minorities in the Khyber Pakhtunkwa, Punjab and Sindh Provincial Assemblies to which para 3 of this Order applies. In case the Commission or PTI need any clarification or order so as to give effect to this para in full measure, it shall forthwith apply to the Court by making an appropriate application, which shall be put up before the Judges constituting the majority in chambers for such orders and directions as may be deemed appropriate.

YAHYA AFRIDI, J.[*]---For reasons to be recorded later, Civil Appeals Nos. 333 and 334 of 2024, C.M.A. No. 2920 of 2024 in Civil Appeal No. 333 of 2024, Civil Petitions Nos. 1612, 1613, 1614, 1615, 1616 and 1617 of 2024 and C.M.A. No. 3554 of 2024 in C.P. Nil of 2024 are dismissed in terms that:

1. Sunni Ittehad Council does not fulfil the conditions prescribed for a political party under the enabling provisions of the Constitution of Islamic Republic of Pakistan ("Constitution") and the law to be allowed/allocated reserved seats for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly or the Provincial Assemblies.

2. Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI") fulfils the conditions prescribed for a political party under the enabling provisions of the Constitution and the law to be allowed/allocated reserved seats for women and non-Muslims, in terms that:

i. A candidate for a seat in the National Assembly or the Provincial Assembly, who in his/her nomination paper has declared on oath to belong to PTI and duly submitted a certificate of the same political party confirming that he/she is the nominated candidate of PTI for the respective constituency, shall remain so, and cannot be declared independent, unless he/she submitted a written declaration to the Election Commission of Pakistan or Returning Officer to be treated as the candidate of another political party or as an independent candidate;

ii. A returned candidate to the National Assembly or the Provincial Assembly, who in his/her nomination paper has declared on oath to belong to PTI and duly submitted a certificate of the same political party confirming that he/she is the nominated candidate of PTI for the respective constituency, shall remain so, and this consistent position maintained by a returned candidate throughout the electoral process should be legally recognized by the Election Commission of Pakistan and such returned candidate cannot be treated as the returned candidate of another political party or as an independent returned candidate, and thus, the reserved seats for women and non-Muslims are to be allowed/ allocated to PTI, accordingly;

iii. A candidate nominated by PTI for a constituency of the National Assembly or the Provincial Assembly who, after being declared returned, joined another political party or sought to be treated as independent, raises serious concerns about disregarding the trust reposed in him/her by the voters, thus undermining the will of the people; and

iv. The legal implications, effects and consequences of the determinations made above in paragraphs 2(ii) and 2(iii), as well as the actions or inactions of the Election Commission of Pakistan thereon, although deeply concerning, have not been challenged in the present appeals and petitions; and the persons who would be affected or aggrieved are not parties before this Court. Therefore, issuing definitive directions to the Election Commission of Pakistan qua the allocation of specific number of reserved seats for women and non-Muslims to a political party in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies would not be legally appropriate.

3. Accordingly, the Election Commission of Pakistan is directed to decide the allocation of reserved seats for women and non-Muslims to political parties in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies in the light of the determinations made hereinabove after providing an opportunity of hearing to the parties concerned, and if required revisit its earlier decisions on the matter. The needful be done within seven days of the receipt of this order.

ORDER[*]

JAMAL KHAN MANDOKHAIL, J.---For reasons to be recorded later, we dispose of these appeals, petitions and miscellaneous applications through a short order as under:

1. These matters involve a controversy regarding the allocation of seats reserved for women and non-Muslims. The Sunni Itehad Council ("SIC") did not contest the General Elections of the year 2024. SIC, which demands allocation of reserved seats on account of inclusion of independent parliamentarians in it, did not secure a single seat in the National Assembly or any of the Provincial Assemblies nor submitted a list of its candidates for seats reserved for women and non-Muslims. Thus, it is not entitled to any of the reserved seats in the National Assembly and in the Provincial Assemblies. The impugned judgment and the order dated 1 March 2024 of the Election Commission of Pakistan ("ECP") to such extent is upheld.

2. Under Article 51(3) of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution"), the total number of seats in the National Assembly shall be 326, out of which 60 seats are reserved for women and 10 seats for non-Muslims. Such right of women and non-Muslims has been guaranteed by the Constitution. They shall be elected in accordance with the law through proportional representation system of political parties' list of candidates on the basis of total number of general seats secured by each political party from the Province concerned in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies, as provided by Article 51(6) (d) and (e) of the Constitution. Therefore, they cannot be deprived of this right of theirs by leaving these seats vacant, and all reserved seats must be filled in, as provided by Article 224(6) of the Constitution.

3. The impugned judgment of the High Court and the said order of the ECP to the extent of the proportional representation distribution of seats amongst the political parties which won and secured seats is also maintained, however, since the ECP calculated and allocated the seats to the parties by the exclusion of the Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI") candidates, therefore, to such extent, the impugned judgment of the High Court and the order of the ECP are set aside.

4. During the hearing, it transpired that a number of candidates had submitted their nomination papers declaring on Oath that they belonged to PTI supported by an affiliation certificate of the said party, though some did not submit affiliation certificates of PTI, however, since they stated on Oath that they belonged to PTI, and did not contradict themselves, they should be considered to be members of PTI in the National and the Provincial Assemblies. The ECP by misinterpreting the judgment of this Court dated 13 January 2024, which was regarding non-holding intra-party elections in PTI, wrongly mentioned the said candidates of the PTI as independents in Form 33 of the Election Rules. The ECP had no authority to declare validly nominated candidates of a political party to be independent candidates. Similarly, a candidate once declared himself/herself as a candidate of a political party, could not subsequently resile from his/her candidature of a particular party, after the last date of withdrawal of the nomination papers.

5. It is important to mention here that neither the PTI nor any candidate affiliated with PTI approached either this Court before or during the hearing of these proceedings, or the High Court to challenge the decision of the ECP, declaring them as independents. However, in view of the fact that the appeal and the petition are a continuation of election proceedings before the ECP, we can look into the vires of the decision of the ECP in the light of the provisions of Article 51(1)(d) and (e) of the Constitution read with sections 66, 67 and 104 of the Elections Act, 2017 to safeguard the interest of women and non-Muslims. As a consequence whereof, the candidates who had submitted their nomination papers declaring that they belonged to PTI and had not filed a document showing affiliation with another political party before the last date of withdrawal of the nomination papers, should have been treated as the Parliamentary Party of PTI, but the needful was not done by the ECP. Consequently, the PTI as a Parliamentary Party is entitled to the reserved seats. The ECP should recalculate and reallocate the reserved seats amongst the political parties, including the PTI, as provided by Article 51(6)(d) and (e) of the Constitution.

6. The candidates who had submitted their nomination papers by 24 December 2023, which was the last date of submission of nomi-nation papers, and had declared themselves either as independent candidates or had left blank the relevant column in the nomination papers/declaration and were elected shall be considered to be independents. SIC is a registered political party and every indepen-dent member of the National Assembly and of the Provincial Assemblies has a right to join it. All those who joined the SIC are presumed to have done so out of their own free will. None of them claimed to have joined SIC because of any misunderstanding of any judgment, the law, compulsion, coercion or undue influence and it is not for this Court to presume otherwise.

7. We must ensure that words are not read into the Constitution nor to ascribe artificial meaning to commonly understood words. We must also abide by validly enacted laws and must not do anything either to hinder or facilitate a political party by ignoring the laws mandate.

JUDGMENT

DETAILED REASONS OF THE SHORT ORDER ANNOUNCED ON 12.7.2024 IN CIVIL APPEAL NO. 333/2024, CMA NO. 2920/2024 IN CIVIL APPEAL NO.333/ 2024, CIVIL APPEAL NO. 334/2024, CIVIL PETITIONS NOS. 1612 TO 1617 OF 2024 AND CMA NO.3554 OF 2024 IN C.P. NIL OF 2024.

AMIN-UD-DIN KHAN, J.

NAEEM AKHTAR AFGHAN, J.

The matter in issue relates to seats reserved for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly as well as Provincial Assemblies in accordance with Articles 51 and 106 of the Constitution of Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ('the Constitution') after the general elections which were held on 08.02.2024. After the elections, Sunni Ittehad Council ('SIC')[1] wrote four letters, all dated 21.2.2024 to the Election Commission of Pakistan ('ECP') claiming that after the General Elections held on 8.2.2024, independent candidates whose notifications as returned candidates to the National Assembly/or any one of three Provincial Assemblies i.e. Punjab, KPK and Sindh were issued by the ECP on different dates, joined SIC as a Political Party, accordingly their consent forms/affidavits were filed by the SIC and received in the Commission vide receipt diary numbers mentioned in the letters. The last paragraph of the letters states as follows:

"we look forward to hearing from you at your earliest convenience so that we may submit our priority list to the Commission for notifications of our MNAs (MPAs) on these reserved seats".

These four letters are scanned here for convenience and to consider the admitted position between the parties to the lis with regard to joining of independent returned candidates to SI

2. A significant fact and an admitted position is that SIC did not participate in the said General Elections as a political party. Not a single candidate participated as a party candidate and even the Chairman of SIC/appellant No.2 participated as an independent candidate in the general elections and was declared a returned candidate as such. For the distribution of reserved seats for women and non-Muslims claimed by various political parties on the basis of proportional representation system of political parties, list of candidates, the matter was fixed by the ECP for hearing before the Full Election Commission comprising of the Chairman as well as four members and was heard and decided by the Commission through its order announced on 1.3.2024. They held that SIC was not entitled to claim the quota for reserved seats for women and non-Muslims. The said order was challenged by the appellants through two Writ Petitions bearing Nos. 1272-P of 2024 and 1339-P of 2024. Both the writ petitions were heard and dismissed vide the consolidated judgment announced on 14.3.2024 as well as the judgment prepared and signed on 25.3.2024. Against the said judgment, two petitions for leave to appeal i.e. C.P. No. 1328 of 2024 as well as C.P.No.1329 of 2024 were filed, which were fixed before the learned three member bench of this Court on 6.5.2024 in which leave was granted as well as it was referred to the Committee constituted under section 4 of the Supreme Court (Practice and Procedure) Act, 2023 for constitution of a larger bench to hear the appeals which were ordered to be fixed for hearing on 03.06.2024.

3. A larger bench of 13 members was constituted by the Committee and the matter was heard by the learned 13 members bench on various dates i.e. 03.06.2024, 04.06.2024, 24.06.2024, 25.06.2024, 27.06.2024, 01.07.2024, 02.07.2024 and the last hearing was on 09.7.2024. The short order was announced on 12.07.2024, the majority's order is reproduced:

"Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, Munib Akhtar, Muhammad Ali Mazhar, Ayesha A. Malik, Athar Minallah, Syed Hasan Azhar Rizvi, Shahid Waheed and Irfan Saadat Khan, JJ.: For detailed reasons to be recorded later and subject to what is set out therein by way of amplification and/or explanation or otherwise, these appeals are decided in the following terms:

1. The impugned judgment dated 25.03.2024 of the learned Full Bench of the High Court is set aside to the extent it is or may be inconsistent with this Order or the detailed reasons.

2. The order of the Election Commission of Pakistan ("Commission") dated 01.03.2024 ("Impugned Order") is declared to be ultra vires the Constitution, without lawful authority and of no legal effect.

3. The notifications (of various dates) whereby the persons respectively mentioned therein (being the persons identified in the Commission's notification No.F.5(1)/2024-Cord. dated 13.05.2024) have been declared to be returned candidates for reserved seats for women and minorities in the National and Provincial Assemblies are declared to be ultra vires the Constitution, without lawful authority and of no legal effect, and are quashed from 06.05.2024 onwards, being the date an interim order was made by the Court in CPLA Nos. 1328-9 of 2024, the leave petitions out of which the instant appeals arise.

4. It is declared that the lack or denial of an election symbol does not in any manner affect the constitutional and legal rights of a political party to participate in an election (whether general or bye) and to field candidates and the Commission is under a constitutional duty to act, and construe and apply all statutory provisions, accordingly.

5. It is declared that for the purposes, and within the meaning, of paragraphs (d) and (e) of clause (6) of Article 51 ("Article 51 Provisions") and paragraph (c) of clause (3) of Article 106 ("Article 106 Provisions") of the Constitution, the Pakistan Tehreek e Insaf ("PTI") was and is a political party, which secured or won (the two terms being interchangeable) general seats in the National and Provincial Assemblies in the General Elections of 2024 as herein after provided.

6. During the course of the hearing of the instant appeals, on 27.06.2024, learned counsel for the Commission placed before the Court a list ("the List") of 80 returned candidates for the National Assembly (now MNAs), setting out in tabular form particulars relating to their election. Learned counsel made a categorical statement that the Commission stood by the data so provided to the Court. In particular, the List contained three columns marked as follows: (i) "Statement (on nomination form) given in declaration and oath by the person nominated (i.e., 'I belong to')"; (ii) "Certificate of party affiliation under Section 66 of the Elections Act, 2017"; and (iii) "Statutory Declaration/ affidavit accompanying section 66 certificate".

7. In the peculiar facts and circumstances of the General Election of 2024, it is declared that out of the aforesaid 80 returned candidates (now MNAs) those (being 39 in all and whose particulars are set out in Annex A to this Order) in respect of whom the Commission has shown "PTI" in any one of the aforesaid columns in the List, were and are the returned candidates whose seats were and have been secured by the PTI within the meaning, and for purposes of, para 5 above in relation to the Article 51 Provisions.

8. In the peculiar facts and circumstances of the General Election of 2024, it is further ordered that any of the remaining 41 returned candidates out of the aforesaid 80 (whose particulars are set out in Annex B to this Order) may, within 15 working days of this Order file a statement duly signed and notarized stating that he or she contested the General Election as a candidate of the political party specified therein. If any such statement(s) is/are filed, the Commission shall forthwith but in any case within 7 days thereafter give notice to the political party concerned to file, within 15 working days, a confirmation that the candidate contested the General Election as its candidate. A political party may in any case, at any time after the filing of a statement as aforesaid, of its own motion file its confirmation. If such a statement is filed, and is confirmed by the political party concerned, then the seat secured by such candidate shall be forthwith deemed to be a seat secured by that political party for the purposes of para 5 above in relation to the Article 51 Provisions. The Commission shall also forthwith issue, and post on its website, a list of the retuned candidates (now MNAs) and seats to which this para applies within 7 days after the last date on which a political party may file its confirmation and shall simultaneously file a compliance report in the Court.

9. For the purposes of para 5 of this Order in relation to the Article 51 Provisions, the number of general seats secured by PTI shall be the total of the seats declared in terms of para 7 and those, if any, to which para 8 applies. The PTI shall be entitled to reserved seats for women and minorities in the National Assembly accordingly. PTI shall, within 15 working days of this Order file its lists of candidates for the said reserved seats and the provisions of the Elections Act, 2017 ("Act") (including in particular section 104) and the Elections Rules, 2017 ("Rules") shall be applied to such lists in such manner as gives effect to this Order in full measure. The Commission shall, out of the reserved seats for women and minorities in the National Assembly to which para 3 of this Order applies, notify as elected in terms of the Article 51 Provisions, that number of candidates from the lists filed (or, as the case may be, to be filed) by the PTI as is proportionate to the general seats secured by it in terms of paras 7 and 8 of this Order.

10. The foregoing paras shall apply mutatis mutandis for purposes of the Article 106 Provisions in relation to PTI (as set out in para 5 herein above) for the reserved seats for women and minorities in the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab and Sindh Provincial Assemblies to which para 3 of this Order applies. In case the Commission or PTI need any clarification or order so as to give effect to this para in full measure, it shall forthwith apply to the Court by making an appropriate application, which shall be put up before the Judges constituting the majority in chambers for such orders and directions as may be deemed appropriate.

5. The detailed majority judgment has not yet come to surface, despite the expiry of the 15 days mentioned therein. The delay may render infructuous, the review petition filed against the order of the court. Therefore, on the basis of the short order we have been compelled to record our findings, which are in two parts. The first part states why we are unable to agree with the majority decision and the second part states our decision on the appeals based on the merits of the case.

6. The admitted position is that the subject matter in the instant litigation before this Court was petitions filed under Article 185(3) of the Constitution against the judgment of the five member bench of the Peshawar High Court whereby writ petitions filed by the appellants were dismissed. Leave was granted by this Court vide order dated 6.5.2024, which is reproduced:

"Learned counsel for the petitioners submits that allocation of the reserved seats for women and non-Muslims to the political parties other than the petitioner, Sunni Ittehad Council ("SIC"), is in violation of Article 51(6) (d) & (e) of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan ("Constitution") which provides for proportional representation system on the basis of total number of general seats secured by each political party from the Province concerned in the National Assembly. Once a political party has been allocated the reserved seats on the basis of proportional representation system, the remaining seats cannot be re-allocated to the same political party. As per Letter issued by the Election Commission of Pakistan dated 25.04.2024, he submits, it has been acknowledged that SIC is a parliamentary party having 82 general seats in the National Assembly. Therefore, SIC is entitled to reserved seats as per the proportional representation system in terms of Articles 51(6) (d) & (e) and 106(2) (c) (sic) of the Constitution.

2. On the other hand, Mr. Sikandar Bashir Mohmand, learned counsel for the Election Commission of Pakistan ("ECP"), submits that according to Articles 51 and 106 of the Constitution the reserved seats have to be allocated on the proportional representation system only to those political parties who have contested the general elections and won atleast one seat in the said elections. Since SIC did not contest the elections and did not win even a single seat in the general elections, it cannot be considered as a political party in terms of Articles 51(6) (d) and (e) and 106(2)(c) (sic) of the Constitution, for the purpose of allocating the reserved seats. Learned Attorney-General for Pakistan ("AGP") supports the contentions of the learned counsel for the ECP. Both the learned counsel for ECP and the learned AGP frankly concede that this is a case of first impression involving questions of constitutional law that have not been addressed by the Court earlier.

3. The above questions of allocation of reserved seats in the National and Provincial Assemblies touch upon the foundational constitutional concept of a parliamentary democracy that the voice of the electorate is truly reflected in the composition of the assemblies. Democratic mandate necessitates that the allocation of reserved seats enhances the representativeness of the electorate in the assemblies and upholds the principles of fairness and transparency in the electoral process. It is paramount to prioritize the integrity of the elections so that the Parliament remains a true reflection of the will of the people.

4. Therefore, leave to appeal is granted to consider, amongst others, the said questions. The appeals are to be posted for hearing on 03.06.2024. The appeal arising out of these petitions will be heard on the basis of available record; however, both sides are at liberty to file any additional documents, which were part of the record before the fora below but have not been filed with instant petitions.

5. Notices under Order XXVII-A, C.P.C. be issued to the learned AGP as well as the Advocates-General of the Provinces.

C.M.A. 2920 of 2024:

6. Notice for the same date. In the meanwhile, operation of the impugned judgment of the Peshawar High Court dated 25.03.2024, as well as, the order of the Election Commission of Pakistan dated 01.03.2024 is suspended. It is, however, clarified that this interim order relates to the disputed seats only, i.e., the reserved seats allocated over and above the initially allocated reserved seats to the political parties. It is also clarified that this order is to operate prospectively, w.e.f., from today.

C.M.A. 3554/2024:

7. Notice. To be heard along with CPLA No.1328/2024 on 03.06.2024.

8. Since the questions under consideration require constitutional interpretation, the matter be placed before the Committee under Section 4 of the Supreme Court (Practice and Procedure) Act, 2023 for constitution of a larger bench to hear the appeals."

7. The independent returned candidates joined the appellant, and their joining was duly processed, accepted and notified by the ECP with regard to the National Assembly as well as the three Provincial Assemblies. None has ever disputed the joining to SIC of the 39 and 41 persons mentioned in Annexures A & B of the majority short order within three days, as prescribed by the Constitution. Notifications as the returned independent candidates in the general elections were issued and their submitting affidavit and requisite documents etc. for joining SIC. The other contesting political parties, who were parties before the ECP as well as the High Court and before this Court also did not dispute their joining SIC. SIC does not dispute their joining SIC. The said persons have also never disputed their joining the SIC. Furthermore, PTI was not a party to these proceedings starting from the ECP, then before the High Court nor before this Court. Even at the time of the announcement of the short order neither any person from PTI nor PTI joined the proceedings. Not a single one of said 80 persons, mentioned in the short order, were parties before this Court collectively or in their individual capacity. They were never heard. The claim of the SIC before the ECP was that SIC was entitled to the reserved seats on the basis of the said persons joining SIC.

8. To appreciate the arguments advanced before the Court and for giving clear picture and understanding to a person reading this judgment, it will be appropriate that most relevant portions of Articles of the Constitution i.e. Article 51(6) (d) & (e) and Article 106 and section 104 of the Elections Act, 2017 are reproduced:

"Article 51

"Section 104. Party lists for reserved seats.-(1) For the purpose of election to seats reserved for women and non-Muslims in an Assembly, the political parties contesting election for such seats shall, within the period fixed by the Commission for submission of nomination papers, file separate lists of their candidates in order to priority for seats reserved for women and non-Muslims with the Commission or, as it may direct, with the Provincial Election Commissioner or other authorized officer of the Commission, who shall forthwith cause such lists to be published for information of the public:

Provided that the list submitted by a political party shall not be subject to change or alteration either in the order of priority or through addition of new names in the list or omission of any name after expiry of the date of submission of nomination papers.

(2). The parties' lists referred to in subsection (1) may contain as many names of additional candidates as a political party may deem necessary for contesting seats reserved for women and non-Muslims, to provide for any disqualification of candidates during scrutiny of nomination papers or for filling of any vacant seats during the term of an Assembly.

(3). A candidate to a seat reserved for women or non-Muslims shall file the nomination papers on the Form on or before the last date fixed for filing of nomination papers for the election and the nomination papers shall, as nearly as possible, be scrutinized in the same manner as nomination papers of candidates on general seats are scrutinized under section 62.

(4). If, at any time, the party list is exhausted, the political party may submit a name for any vacancy which may occur thereafter and the provisions of subsections (1), (2) and (3) shall, as nearly as possible, apply to fill such vacancy.

(5). Where a seat reserved for women or non-Muslims in an Assembly falls vacant as a result of death, resignation or disqualification of a Member, it shall be filled in by the next person in order of precedence from the party's list of candidates submitted to the Commission under subsection (1).

(6). Before notifying the name of the next person in order of priority from the party list, such person shall submit a declaration on oath that since the filing of his nomination paper, he has not become subject to any disqualification contained in Article 63.

(a). a copy of the party list of the candidate's political party for such seats;

(b). declarations and statements in support of the nomination; and

(c). proof of deposit of the fee required for filing nomination papers.

(8). Where there is equality of share on a reserved seat between two or more political parties, the Returning Officer shall declare the returned candidate by drawing of lots."

9. During the hearing of the appeals before this Court on the above-said eight dates of hearing by the thirteen member Bench of this Court, most of the time was consumed by the queries made by various members of the Bench to the learned counsel for the appellant as well as to Mr. Salman Akram Raja, who moved C.M.A. No. 3554 of 2024 on behalf of Kanwal Shauzab for permission to file CPLA, and in paragraph No. 2 of C.P.L.A. No.NIL of 2024 it was pleaded that:

"the petitioner expected to be considered, and to be nominated as candidate of the Sunni Ittehad Council for seats reserved for women in the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Provincial Assembly as well as the National Assembly of Pakistan."

She also sought leave against the judgment of the five member bench of the Peshawar High Court (wrongly mentioned as Division Bench).

On query by some members of the Bench, whether the reserved seats can be given to PTI in the peculiar circumstances of this case, none of the counsels agreed to this, though the suggestion was made by some of the members of the Bench repeatedly to the learned counsel for the appellant as well as to Mr. Salman Akram Raja. I recall that Mr. Salman Akram Raja replied that he will not press that the seats be given to PTI, but the Court has the power to do so. In these circumstances, we have thoroughly considered the hurdles before us which forced us to disagree with the majority decision and these are listed hereunder:

i. PTI was not before this Court nor before the High Court nor even before the ECP;

ii. The joining of 80 independent returned candidates to SIC was never disputed by anyone;

iii. The said 39 plus 41 persons as mentioned in the majority's short order did not come before this Court nor were they heard. The majority short order decides about their rights or lack thereof without their consent or even hearing them. Their joining of SIC has been undone without such prayer of anyone before this Court, or before the High Court.

iv. Not only the appeals filed by the SIC have been dismissed by the majority order, as no relief has been granted to SIC but independent members who joined the SIC have also been snatched from the SIC and that too without hearing the above said 39 plus 41 persons.

v. Unless Articles 51, 106 and 63 of Constitution are suspended and in their place new articles in consonance with the relief granted through the majority order are inserted in the Constitution, the relief which has been granted to the PTI cannot be granted.

vi. Article 175 of the Constitution has been ignored.

vii. The constitutional limits of jurisdiction under Article 185 of the Constitution have been ignored.

viii. All substantive as well as procedural law with regard to parties to lis have been ignored.

ix. The relief granted to PTI will be self-created and has been carved out relief by the majority, as none has claimed this relief in these proceedings.

x. Not only SIC has not been granted relief claimed by it but all those who have joined it have been taken off and for the rest of the tenure of the National as well as Provincial assemblies SIC has been kicked out from the assemblies.

xi. For a specific date i.e. 6.5.2024 the notification of returned candidates for special seats has been quashed, however before that date their notification and acts are held to be valid. It is incomprehensible how can this be done, as it is without any backing of Constitution.

xii. The majority judgment virtually declares that said 80 persons are not honest and ameen in accordance with Article 62 (1) (f) of the Constitution.

xiii. All the returned candidates for the reserved seats of other parties who have been notified were not issued notices and provided an opportunity of hearing.

xiv. 41 candidates mentioned in Annexure-B have been given the choice of joining any other Political Party.

xv. The issue was simply the matter of post general elections directly related to the reserved seats for both women and non-Muslims on the basis of proportional representation system of political parties' lists of candidates under Articles 51 and 106 of the Constitution. The majority's short order in effect created a new parliamentary party in the National Assembly and three Provincial Assemblies and since this related to the pre election process, it is clearly and unequivocally not an issue before this Court. In the process of the general elections all events are scheduled and time-bound and the same cannot be reversed.

xvi. The judgment of the full Bench of the Peshawar High Court has been set aside by the majority's short order to the extent, that it is or may be inconsistent of the majority's short order. This is incomprehensible as none of the rights which have now been created in favour of PTI by the majority's short order were in issue before the High Court, nor had been adjudicated upon. The High Court had simply dismissed SIC's claim to the reserved seats, which was the lis before the High Court.

In conclusion, it is clear that the superstructure created by the majority's short order, does not in any way come within the ambit of the jurisdiction vested in this Court or in the Constitution.

10. Vires of section 104 of the Elections Act, 2017 was initially challenged before the High Court. Even in the pleadings before this Court the vires was challenged, but at the time of the hearing by the thirteen member bench, the learned counsel for the appellant categorically stated more than once before the Court and when the court inquired from him whether the appellants still press their challenge to the vires of section 104 of the Act and the learned counsel categorically stated that he does not challenge the vires of section 104 and he will instead submit his arguments with regard to the interpretation of section 104 of the Elections Act, 2017. Unless Section 104 as well as the relevant rules are also suspended and new sections/rules are substituted, the majority order cannot be passed.

11. We are always conscious of our jurisdiction before hearing a matter fixed before us whether as a Judge of the High Court or that of this Court. In the instant matter, we are conscious that we are sitting in a jurisdiction vested in this Court under Article 185 of the Constitution and can exercise jurisdiction under Article 175 of the Constitution, but cannot exercise any other jurisdiction as this is not conferred upon this Court, therefore, it cannot be exercised. In this matter only the appellate jurisdiction of the Court was invoked by filing petitions under Article 185(3) of the Constitution whereafter leave was granted. The matters alien to the jurisdiction vested in this Court cannot be considered nor decided by this Court. The majority judgment ignores all rules of procedure, substantive provisions of law and the Constitution. Relief cannot be granted to the PTI as PTI was not before the Court nor tried to become a party before the ECP, High Court and before this Court nor was claiming the reserved seats, which were in issue in the instant litigation. If the said 39 plus 41 persons take any step on the basis of this judgment which is not in accordance with the Constitution they may lose their seats as returned candidates on the basis of violation of the Constitution. We are also of the firm view that any other constitutional body cannot be asked to take any steps or decisions which are not permissible under the Constitution. If the said 80 persons change their stance on the basis of the majority judgment, they will be guilty of violating their oath, which is provided under Article 65 (Third Schedule), being the Oath for the members of the National Assembly. The first paragraph is relevant, which is reproduced and which is similar to the Provincial Assembly oath with some modification:

"That, as a member of the National Assembly (or Senate), I will perform my functions honestly, to the best of my ability, faithfully, in accordance with the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, and the law, and the rules of the Assembly (or Senate), and always in the interest of the sovereignty, integrity, solidarity, well-being and prosperity of Pakistan."

(bold and underlying by us)

12. For creating and carving out relief in these proceedings for PTI, we would have to travel beyond the jurisdiction conferred by Articles 175 and 185 of the Constitution and would also have to suspend Articles 51, 106 and 63 of the Constitution and section 104 of the Elections Act, 2017 along with the relevant rules. We would also have to insert instead of Articles 51, 106 and section 104 (mentioned supra). Such articles and sections therein in substitution and in consonance with the relief granted through the majority judgment. Previously there was a term used which was "reading in to the Constitution" or "reading down the Constitution" but now a new phrase has been introduced that of "inserting new Articles in consonance with the relief to be granted in the peculiar circumstances of the case" in the Constitution. We do not have the courage to go to such an extent to give relief to a party who is not before the Court or who did not join the proceedings and pray for such relief. All the rules of procedures of proceedings before the Supreme Court and the Supreme Court Rules, 1980 would also have to be ignored as neither any party before the Court asked in writing nor orally for the relief which has been granted to PTI.

13. Regarding joining of 80 persons no one has denied that they have joined SIC, ECP does not deny this nor any other contesting party denies it. Even PTI does not deny this, who then are we to undo all these things and reverse the same and create a new process plus create a new and arbitrary time limit for joining any party of their choice by disregarding the mandate of the Constitution. In our view neither Articles 62(2), 63 and 63-A have been suspended nor can be suspended, therefore, any affidavit contrary to the provisions of the affidavits already filed will entail the penal consequences of non-seating such members of National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies if he/she files a fresh affidavit in contradiction to his/her previous affidavit and joins any other party. Any order of the Court which is not in consonance with the constitutional provisions is not binding upon any other constitutional organ of the State.

14. Now we proceed to record some more facts, arguments and our reasons for dismissing the appeals, petitions and the applications.

15. We heard thorough arguments of learned counsel for the appellants Mr. Asad Jan Durrani, ASC KPK along with Malik Khawas, Assistant Law Officer, KPK Assembly, Mr. Salman Akram Raja, ASC (who moved C.M.A. No. 3554 of 2024 in C.P. No. NIL of 2024), Mr. Makhdoom Ali Khan, ASC, who represented respondent Nos.15 to 19, 21 and 22, who were the returned candidates for the reserved seats belonging to PML(N), JUI(P), PPPP and Mr. Sikandar Bashir Mohmand, learned counsel for ECP. Learned counsel for JUI adopted the arguments of learned counsel for ECP. Learned counsel for PML(N), Mr.Shehzad Shaukat adopted the arguments of Mr. Makhdoom Ali Khan and, learned counsel for respondent No.20 adopted the arguments of ECP. Maulvi Iqbal Haider also adopted the arguments of learned counsel for ECP. We have also heard the learned Attorney- General for Pakistan Mr. Mansoor Usman Awan, who submitted the formula for entitlement of reserved seats proportionately for the Political Parties with reference to his written submissions submitted through CMA No.5911 of 2024. Learned counsel for the parties produced record through CMAs as well as their written submissions and the case law also. There were four major counsels/set of counsels who pleaded the case before this Court. On one side there was counsel for the appellants who gets support from the learned Advocate General, KPK as well as learned Mr. Salman Akram Raja. On the other side was the learned Attorney-General as well as the learned counsel for the ECP and learned Mr. Makhdoom Ali Khan, representing the returned candidates for the reserved seats of various Political Parties. The appellant side attacked the order of the ECP as well as that of the learned five member Bench of the Peshawar High Court, and argued that the reserved seats for women and non-Muslims in accordance with the proportionate representation are the right of SIC. Whereas the learned Attorney- General for Pakistan as well as the learned counsel for ECP and the learned Mr. Makhdoom Ali Khan have supported the decision of the ECP to be absolutely correct and in accordance with the Constitution and the law. Learned Mr. Makhdoom Ali Khan has argued with reference to Section 57 of the Elections Act, 2017 as well as its section 206 and Rule 94 of the Election Rules and Article 226 of the Constitution. Rule 94 with regard to powers of the Commission to declare seats won by each Political Party and supported the judgment of the High Court and prayed for dismissal of the appeals.

16. The premise of the arguments of learned counsel for the appellants seems to be on the questions, mainly question No.3 and question No.4 as framed by the learned counsel for the appellant submitted through CMA No. 5273 of 2024, Part 2, which are reproduced:

"3. Whether any Political Party could be allocated reserved seats disproportionate to their representation based on the total number of general seats secured by them?

4. Whether there is constitutional absence or silence about a situation, in which there are left over reserved seats which cannot be allocated to any party either because of disentitlement or disproportionality? If so, how can this be resolved?"

The arguments of the learned counsel for the appellant mainly revolved upon these two questions and the stance of the learned counsel was that on the basis of interpretation, as per the understanding of the learned counsel for the appellant, when a Political Party is a listed party in the ECP even if that party has not participated in the General Elections and after the notification of the independent returned candidates the joining of independent candidates makes the political party eligible for the reserved seats for women and non-Muslims, we are afraid that this interpretation is absolutely against the wording of Article 51 and of Article 106 of the Constitution. By interpretation no one can read into nor read down the Constitution. It is clearly mentioned that the political party which won in the General Elections and the independent candidates joining such political party can enhance the proportion of such party. We are clear in our mind that if an independent candidate joins a party, though it may be listed as a political party with ECP, does not make that party entitled for the reserved seats. The joining of independent candidates only enhances the proportion of right in the reserved seats of that party if that party has won seats. By the joining of independent candidates with any political party does not create a right in favour of that political party to become eligible for reserved seats only on the basis of the joining of independent candidates. Question Nos.3 and 4 noted supra are absolutely misconceived. There is no question of disproportionate allocation of reserved seats as the seats are for the political parties entitled to the same. A political party which is not entitled for the same cannot claim proportionate allocation in the reserved seats, therefore, there is no question of disproportionate allocation of seats to political parties not entitled for the seats, in accordance with the formula of distribution of seats presented by the learned Attorney-General. The seats were given to the political parties which were entitled for the same. The formula of the distribution has not been specifically challenged by the appellants. If the appellants are not entitled to the special seats then the formula presented by the learned Attorney-General for Pakistan remains undisputed. Even the majority judgment of this Court as well as our other learned brothers are unanimous on the point that SIC is not entitled to the reserved seats.

17. Mr. Faisal Siddiqi further argued on the basis of what he stated was the doctrine of progressive interpretation of the Constitution and on the basis of said interpretation has tried to analyze Article 51(6)(d)&(e) and Article 106(3) (c) of the Constitution as well as section 104 of the Elections Act, 2017 and rules 92 and 96 of the Election Rules, 2017. We absolutely do not agree with the understanding of learned counsel for the appellants with regard to the said doctrine of progressive interpretation of the Constitution and of the provisions of Elections Act, 2017 and the Rules as his understanding is absolutely misconceived, that there is a constitutional absence or silence about the situation or with regard to disentitlement or disproportionately. There is absolutely no silence about the situation in the Constitution. The Constitution is absolutely clear and which has rightly been held so by the learned five member Bench of the Peshawar High Court through the impugned judgment.

18. As we have noted, by the majority's order virtually all the persons who joined the SIC and their joining of SIC has been undone. Further positions in the process of working of the proportional representation system of political parties is affected through the majority's order. For instance, at Sr.No.39 of Annexure-A Ms. Zartaj Gul from NA-185 (D.G.Khan-II) was appointed by the SIC as the Party Leader of SIC in the National Assembly, and her notification was issued by the Secretary General of the Assembly bearing No.F.1(1)/ 2024-N.O, Islamabad dated 23 June 2024, which was produced by the learned counsel for the appellants in CMA No. 5944 at Page 7. By the majority judgment her position and the other positions given to the SIC also go.

19. As we have noted in the start of this order that the matter of the allocation of reserved seats for women and non-Muslims on the basis of proportional representation system of political parties arose before the ECP when the appellant informed the ECP that the independent candidates from National Assembly as well as Provincial Assemblies have joined them, and by stating that they did not participate in the General Elections as a political party, even though SIC was a registered political party in the List of Political Parties maintained by the ECP. The valid joining of the independent members was recognized by the ECP as well as by the other contesting parties who also joined the proceedings, when all the concerned matters were fixed for hearing before the ECP comprising of the entire Commission, of the Chairman and the four Members. Para-1 of the order of ECP dated 1.3.2024 is reproduced to correctly appreciate the undisputed factual position:

"Brief facts of the matter are that all the above mentioned petitioners have filed petitions before the Commission in respect of the allocation of reserved seats for women and non-Muslims in the National and Provincial Assemblies constituted as a result of General Elections 2024, held on 08.02.2024. The Commission issued notification in which the independent candidates were notified as Returned Candidates in the National and Provincial Assemblies. Subsequent to the notifications some of the independent candidates joined Political Party Sunni Ittehad Council (SIC) and their affidavits were forwarded to the Commission by the said Political Party in respect of National Assembly, Provincial Assembly Punjab and Provincial Assembly KP and Provincial Assembly of Sindh. Sunni Ittehad Council requested for allocation of share in the seats reserved for women and non-Muslim in the National Assembly and three Provincial Assemblies mentioned above. Different applications were filed by the major Political Parties including MQM-P, PPPP and PML(N) and also some individuals for allocation of reserved seats as per their share in the Assemblies. The petitioners also agitated that Sunni Ittehad Council is not eligible to obtain the quota/share in reserved seats for women and non-Muslim. Matters were placed in the meetings of the Commission and decided to fix the same for hearing before full Commission."

20. The ECP on the basis of admitted facts and in accordance with Article 51(6) (d) and Article 106(3) allocated seats in accordance with law through the proportional representation system of political parties' lists of candidates on the basis of the total number of seats secured by each political party. Admittedly, the SIC did not participate in the elections as a political party and, therefore, it did not file any list of candidates in accordance with section 104 of the Elections Act, 2017. None of the parties before the court or anyone else disputed the election program issued by the ECP for the elections held on 8.2.2024. Learned counsel for the SIC wants to take benefit of the proviso to Clause (d) of sub-clause (6) of Article 51 that the interpretation that even when a party has not participated in the elections and has not won a single seat, if the independent candidates join it then such party is entitled to the reserved seats for women and non-Muslims, we are afraid that by no stretch of the imagination this interpretation of the proviso can be as learned counsel for the appellants wants the interpretation to be. The proviso only enables adding to the seats won by a political party in the elections as is clearly mentioned, that the total number of general seats won by a political party shall include the independent returned candidate or candidates who may duly join such political party. Such political party means a party which has won seats and is in parliament and not a party who has not participated in the elections and filed not a single nomination paper by any candidate of the said party. Even if all the independent candidates join the said party they would not be entitled to reserved seats. In this view of the matter, the view taken by the ECP as well as by the learned five member bench of the Peshawar High Court is absolutely correct and in accordance with the Constitution. Even none of us i.e. thirteen members, has given relief to SIC who challenged the judgment of the Peshawar High Court, claim of the SIC has been discarded including the majority judgment.

21. In view of what has been discussed above, the learned High Court had rightly dismissed the writ petitions filed by the appellants, and the appeals are liable to be dismissed as there is no defect in the impugned judgment.

These are the detailed reasons for dismissing the appeals. In the connected CPs leave has been sought against the judgment passed by the Peshawar High Court, however, as the appeals have been dismissed on merits, therefore, there is no need to further dilate upon the said CPs and the CMAs and the same are also dismissed.

22. These are the reasons of our short order dated 12.7.2024 which is also reproduced:

"For reasons to be recorded later, we dismiss the appeals, petitions as well as CMAs and the judgment of the Peshawar High Court is upheld."

ORDER

Through C.M.A. 7540/2024, and in terms of the short order dated 12.07.2024 whereby these appeals were decided by majority ("Short Order") the Election Commission of Pakistan ("Commission") purports to seek guidance on the point that "[i]n absence of a valid organizational structure of Pakistan Tehreek-i-Insaf (PTI), who will confirm the political affiliation of the returned candidates (MNAs and MPAs) on behalf of PTI, who have filed their statements in light of the Supreme Court Order [dated 12 July 2024]." We may note that other than a copy of the Short Order the application is bereft of any other documentation.

2. In reply to the above application, the PTI has filed C.M.A. 8139/2024, to which have been annexed a number of documents, including correspondence between the PTI and the Commission. We have considered the material that has been placed before us.

3. By way of brief recapitulation, in paragraphs 4 and 5 of the Short Order it has been categorically declared that the lack or denial of an election symbol does not in any manner affect the constitutional and legal rights of a political party to participate in an election (whether general or bye) and to field candidates, and that for the purposes, and within the meaning, of paragraphs (d) and (e) of clause (6) of Article 51 and paragraph (c) of clause (3) of Article 106 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, PTI was and is a political party, which secured or won (the two terms being interchangeable) general seats in the National and Provincial

Assemblies in the General Elections of 2024 as provided in that Order. These paragraphs, and the preceding paragraph 3 of the Short Order, sound on the constitutional plane, being the proper interpretation and understanding of the relevant constitutional provisions. The other paragraphs of the Short Order, including in particular paragraphs 8 and 10, are consequential upon what has been held and declared in the paragraphs just noted, and flow and emanate from, and give effect to, constitutional conclusions. All of these points will be explicated in the detailed reasons for the decision of the majority (i.e., the Short Order), which is the binding judgment of the Court.

4. Turning now to the specific clarification purportedly sought, the PTI in its reply has annexed a number of notices issued by the Commission to the PTI through Barrister Gohar Ali Khan, in which it has itself identified the latter as the Chairman of PTI. Furthermore, the certifications required to be issued by a political party (here the PTI) and filed with the Commission in terms of paragraphs 8 and 10 of the Short Order have, as per the record placed before us in relation to the returned candidates (now respectively MNAs and MPAs) in the National and the Sindh, Punjab and Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Provincial Assemblies, been issued under the signatures of Barrister Gohar Ali Khan and Mr. Omar Ayub Khan, who are identified therein as being, respectively, the Chairman and Secretary General of the PTI. These certifications are dated 18.07.2024, 24.07.2024 and 25.07.2024 and list, in each case, the particulars of the relevant returned candidate (now MNA or MPA as the case may be) and in particular the dates on which the declaration required of the candidate (again, in terms of paragraphs 8 and 10 of the Short Order) was filed with the Commission. These dates obviously all precede the respective dates of certification.

5. Putting together the record placed before us, and considering the same in the light of the Short Order, leaves in little doubt that the clarification sought by the Commission in terms of the CMA 7540/2024 is nothing more than a contrived device and the adoption of dilatory tactics, adopted to delay, defeat and obstruct implementation of the decision of the Court. This cannot be countenanced. Even on the application of elementary principles of law, the application filed by the Commission is misconceived. Having itself recognized Barrister Gohar Ali Khan as the Chairman of PTI, the Commission cannot now turn around and purport to seek guidance from the Court with regard to how the certifications are to be dealt with. The Commission cannot approbate and reprobate, taking whatever (shifting) stance as it desires and as may seem to suit its immediate purposes for the moment. Furthermore, the Commission, even if one were to consider the application in the most sympathetic light, has apparently forgotten the well known de facto doctrine or rule, in terms of which the acts of a person who holds an office are protected even if there may be (and no such conclusion is reached here in relation to the PTI) any issue with the position de jure. It sufficed and the Commission was duty bound in terms of the Constitution to keep in mind that the admitted position (as stated before the Court during the hearing of the appeals) is that the PTI was, and is, an enlisted political party. This position was not only accepted and relied upon by us (eight Judges) but also by our three learned colleagues in minority (Hon'ble the Chief Justice, Justice Yahya Afridi and Justice Jamal Khan Mandokhail). Their lordship appear to have also accepted the validity of the party certificates (party tickets) issued by Barrister Gohar Ali Khan and thus his capacity to act for PTI as its Chairman. Furthermore, having itself issued notices to the PTI through Barrister Gohar Ali Khan as its Chairman, the Commission gave recognition to both the party and the office holder. That sufficed absolutely for purposes of the Short Order. It would be completely illogical to assume that a political party, a juristic person, is fully functional yet there are no natural persons who are either de facto or de jure performing its functions or running its affairs. Saying (as the Commission now in effect does through C.M.A. 7540/2024) that a political party is an enlisted political party, fully functional for the purposes of its formation, yet there is no one that can perform its functions and run its affairs, amounts to blowing hot and cold in the same breath or, as noted, approbating and reprobating one and the same fact. There could have been no conceivable doubt that the certifications referred to above were correct and valid in terms of the Short Order and the continued denial and refusal of the Commission to accept the same, as and when filed, is constitutionally and legally incorrect and may expose the Commission to such further or other action as may be warranted in terms of the Constitution and the law.

6. But there is another, and more fundamental, aspect that must also be alluded to. It was categorically declared in paragraph 8 of the Short Order that on filing the requisite statement and its confirmation by the political party concerned, the seat secured by such candidate shall be forthwith deemed to be a seat secured by that political party. Therefore, upon submission of the declarations and certifications referred to above, the position of the returned candidates (now respectively MNAs and MPAs) immediately and ipso facto stood determined and fixed as a matter of law as on those dates and no subsequent act can alter what became, on the respective dates, past and closed transactions. As per the position so determined, the said returned candidates were and are the returned candidates of PTI and thus members of the parliamentary party of PTI in the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies concerned, for all constitutional and legal purposes. The attempt by the Commission to confuse and cloud what is otherwise absolutely clear as a matter of the Constitution and the law must therefore be strongly deprecated. The list required to be issued by the Commission in terms of paragraph 8 (read with paragraph 10) of the Short Order is nothing more than a ministerial act, for the information and convenience of all concerned, and has no substantive effect. Nonetheless, the continued failure of, and refusal by, the Commission to perform this legally binding obligation may, as noted, have consequences. This obligation must be discharged forthwith.

7. With the above clarifications, the present application is disposed of. Office shall dispatch a copy of this order to the respective parties.

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH J.---

Preface

At the core of our democratic Constitution lies the will of the people of Pakistan, with free and fair elections being fundamental to democracy. The principle that 'the most important political office is that of the private citizen'[1] underscores the crucial role of the people, whose right to vote is the lifeblood of democratic governance. Democracy thrives on the belief that authority inherently resides in the people, a principle enshrined in the Constitution of every democratic nation, including ours. Our Constitution is not merely a governmental blueprint but a covenant affirming the supreme role of the people in shaping their destiny.

2. Under our Constitution, while the sovereignty of the entire Universe belongs to Almighty Allah alone, the authority is to be exercised by the people of Pakistan as a "sacred trust" within the limits prescribed by Him. It posits that people are entrusted with the responsibility of governance, which is to be exercised through their chosen representatives. The notion of a "sacred trust" elevates the responsibility of both the government and the judiciary in our Islamic republic. It embeds a moral dimension into the practice of democracy, where the fidelity to this trust is seen as paramount. In the context of elections, this "sacred trust" implies that all the actors in the electoral process must adhere to a higher standard of fair and honest conduct ensuring electoral integrity.

3. Election authorities, as "electoral management bodies", are the "guarantor institutions" of democratic processes and are critical to democratic governance, akin to a "fourth branch of government". Their constitutional role is to ensure the conduct of elections by providing an equal and fair competitive field for all political entities and protect citizens' rights to vote. As an impartial steward of the electoral process, the Election Commission of Pakistan is not only an administrative body but also a guardian of electoral integrity and democracy's legitimacy. When election authorities engage in actions that undermine these principles, such as unlawfully denying the recognition of a major political party and treating its nominated candidates as independents, they not only compromise the rights of these candidates but also significantly infringe upon the rights of the electorate and corrode their own institutional legitimacy.

4. Political parties play a crucial role in representative democracies, acting as intermediaries between the state and its citizens. They are uniquely positioned to shape and structure electoral choices, organize public opinion, and integrate diverse interests into coherent platforms, thereby making electoral decisions meaningful and ensuring the proper functioning of democracy.[2] Moreover, political parties contribute to stable governance by facilitating consistent lawmaking and ensuring regular accountability. As such, they are essential to electoral competition and are key to the legitimacy, efficiency, and accountability of state institutions. This central role of political parties in the constitutional process is referred to as "constitutional particracy", meaning a system in which political parties serve as the primary foundation of governance.[3] For democracy to endure, political parties must be supported and strengthened, not eliminated. A democracy without political parties is unlikely to sustain itself for long.

5. When the Election Commission errs or makes significant mistakes impacting the electoral process, judicial intervention becomes necessary to rectify them and ensure electoral justice. The judiciary, tasked with ensuring electoral justice, must foremost preserve the will of the people. Election disputes are viewed through this lens, emphasizing electoral integrity and democracy's legitimacy to maintain public confidence in governance. Electoral justice is vital to protecting political and electoral rights and is intertwined with electoral integrity. The role of the Supreme Court of Pakistan in overseeing electoral integrity is crucial for sustaining public trust in the democratic process, and the Court's power to do "complete justice" is a critical tool in the constitutional arsenal of this Court, enabling it to prevent democratic backsliding,[4] and protect democracy effectively with a focus on the electorate's rights. Denying electoral justice and compromising electoral integrity would undermine the very legitimacy of democracy.

6. When static interpretation fails to preserve the vitality of the Constitution's text and principles, judges have typically rejected it in favor of constitutional fidelity.[5] Constitutional fidelity as a concept embodies that to be faithful to the Constitution is to interpret its words and to apply its principles in ways that preserve the Constitution's meaning and democratic legitimacy over time. Constitutional fidelity and legitimacy both are framed in a means-end relationship; legitimacy as the end and constitutional fidelity as a means to that end.[6] We must remember that Constitutions are not ephemeral enactments, designed to meet passing situations but are 'designed to approach immortality as nearly as human institutions can approach it.'[7]

7. With this understanding of the importance of the will of the people, fair conduct of elections, role of the Election Commission as a guarantor institution, centrality of political parties to the electoral process, electoral justice, electoral integrity and rights of the electorate in a democracy, we approach this case.

Nature of election disputes and responsibility of courts

8. Before proceeding to the relevant facts of the case and the issues arising therefrom, it is necessary to underscore the nature of election disputes and the responsibility of courts and other judicial and quasi-judicial bodies in adjudicating such disputes. During the hearing of these appeals, when certain facts and points of law were questioned by some members of the Bench, the learned counsel for the respondents submitted that those facts were not in the pleadings and that those points of law did not arise from the facts presented in the pleadings.

They contended that in exercising its appellate jurisdiction under Article 185 of the Constitution, this Court cannot go beyond the pleadings. We are afraid, this contention is misconceived. It results from a misunderstanding of treating election disputes as mere civil disputes between two private parties, similar to other civil disputes.

9. Such a contention based on analogizing a petition on an election dispute to a civil suit was repelled by Morris J. as far back as 1875 in the Tipperary Election Case,[8] with the observation:

I consider this is a fallacious analogy, because a petition [on an election dispute] is not a suit between two persons, but is a proceeding in which the constituency itself is the principal party interested.

This legal position was further elucidated the next year in 1876 by Grove J. in Aldridge[9] as follows:

Numerous provisions of the Act have reference not merely to the individual interests or rights of petitioners or respondents, but to rights of electors, of constituencies, and of the public, in purity of election and in having the member seated who is duly returned by a majority of proper votes. ...

This English jurisprudence on the nature of election disputes was adopted in India and Pakistan. In Sreenivasan,[10] Aiyar J. of the Madras High Court also repelled such a contention of treating an election petition similar to a civil suit. He elaborated on the difference in the nature of proceedings of a civil suit and an election petition and eloquently enunciated the legal position thus:

This view proceeds principally on the basis that an election petition is in all essential respects similar to an ordinary civil suit; but that is not quite so. An election petition is not a matter in which the only persons interested are candidates who strove against each other at the elections. The public also are substantially interested in it and this is not merely in the sense that an election has news value. An election is an essential part of the democratic process. The citizens at large have an interest in seeing and they are justified in insisting that all elections are fair and free and not vitiated by corrupt or illegal practices. ... In view of the manifest difference between a civil suit and an election petition it will not be right, it seems to me, to press the analogy founded on the basis of a civil suit very far when we have to deal with an election petition.

Similarly, speaking for the Supreme Court of India in Inamati,[11] Bhagwati J. observed:

It is this interest of the constituency as a whole which invests the proceedings before the Election Tribunals with a characteristic of their own and differentiates them from ordinary civil proceedings.

An election contest as aforesaid would result in the declaration of the properly qualified candidate as duly elected and the maintenance of the purity of the elections in which the constituency as a whole is vitally interested and no person would get elected by flagrant breaches of the election law or by corrupt practices.

Again, in Mohinder Singh,[12] Krishna Iyer J. adeptly rearticulated the legal position as follows:

[A]n election dispute is not like an ordinary lis between private parties. The entire electorate is vicariously, not inertly, before the court. ... We may, perhaps, call this species of cases collective litigation where judicial activism assures justice to the constituency, guardians the purity of the system and decides the rights of the candidates. ... Therefore, it is essential that courts, adjudicating upon election controversies, must play a verily active role, conscious all the time that every decision rendered by the Judge transcends private rights and defends the constituency and the democracy of the country.

In his inimitable style, he underscored the duty of courts to exercise "vigilant monitoring" of the election process, to call to order "lawless behaviour", and to function as "the bodyguards of the People against bumptious power, official or other" in election disputes thus:

[T]he periodical process of free and fair elections, uninfluenced by the caprice, cowardices or partisanship of hierarchical authority holding it and unintimidated by the threat, tantrum or vandalism of strong-arm tactics, exacts the embarrassing price of vigilant monitoring. Democracy digs its grave where passions, tensions and violence, on an overpowering spree, upset results of peaceful polls, and the law of elections is guilty of sharp practice if it hastens to legitimate the fruits of lawlessness. The judicial branch has a sensitive responsibility here to call to order lawless behaviour. Forensic non-action may boomerang, for the court and the law are functionally the bodyguards of the People against bumptious power, official or other.

In Pakistan, the above legal position was reiterated by Syed Jamshed Ali, J. in Dilshad Khan[13] and Irshad Hussain,[14] respectively, as follows:

An election dispute is not stricto senso a dispute inter-parties because it affects the entire constituency, who have a right to insist that they are represented by a person who commands the will of the majority of electorate. Therefore, it is in the public interest that the election disputes are expeditiously resolved and parties are not put to a protracted trial.

[A]n election dispute is not necessarily a lis inter se parties because it involves the entire constituency, therefore, all efforts are required to be made to expeditiously dispose of an election petition and an election petition is not to be treated like a civil suit.

We may respectfully say that the above cases correctly enunciate the nature of election disputes and the responsibility of courts and other judicial and quasi-judicial bodies in adjudicating such disputes. While we agree with these statements and principles of law, we think it would also be apposite to summarise our understanding as well.

10. Elections are a crucial part of the democratic process, and the public has a major stake in ensuring that they are held free and fair, unmarred by corrupt or illegal practices. Therefore, unlike ordinary civil cases, election cases involve substantial public interest. An election dispute is fundamentally different from other civil disputes, as it is not solely a dispute between two contesting parties but a proceeding where the constituency itself is the principal interested party. These cases involve not just the rights of the contesting candidates or political parties but also the rights of the voters, constituencies and the public. Election cases aim to fill public offices by properly qualified and duly elected candidates and to maintain the purity of elections, ensuring that no one takes charge of a public office through flagrant breaches of election laws or corrupt practices. The proceedings in election cases thus have unique characteristics because they serve the interests of the entire constituency, differentiating them from ordinary civil proceedings. This distinction clearly demonstrates the flaw in treating an election case as an ordinary civil case and limiting the judicial inquiry to the pleadings of the parties as it is in adversarial proceedings.

11. Since election cases are a species of collective or public interest litigation, the proceedings therein are inquisitorial in nature. In these cases, any judicial intervention is to ensure justice for the constituency and to safeguard the integrity of the electoral system. The process of free and fair elections requires vigilant judicial monitoring to check the influence of any capricious or partisan election or executive authority. In this regard, courts have a critical responsibility to address lawless behaviou`r in the electoral process, as their inaction or delay could undermine the legitimacy and credibility of the whole election. In adjudicating election controversies, courts must therefore play an active role in an inquisitorial manner, defending the rights of the constituency and the values and principles of democracy. They must act as guardians of the fundamental rights of the people against any misuse of power or illegal action in the electoral process.

12. In handling election disputes, the primary obligation of courts is to protect the electorate's right to fair representation, ensuring that only candidates who have legitimately won the support of the electorate through fair processes assume office. Courts must rise above political biases and interests, focusing solely on legal and evidential matters to safeguard the electorate's interests. Their approach to election disputes reflects the judiciary's overarching responsibility to uphold the integrity of the electoral process. As the highest court in the judicial hierarchy, this Court bears a profound duty to prioritize and protect the rights of the electorate, ensuring that their voice and representation in elected bodies are not compromised by procedural failings or errors in the electoral process. This duty underscores the Court's unique and expansive constitutional mandate to oversee the electoral cycle comprehensively. Such a judicial approach not only reinforces the legitimacy of the electoral system but also strengthens the foundations of democratic governance by ensuring that the will of the electorate is accurately and fairly represented.

13. Unfortunately, the above legal position regarding the nature of election disputes and the responsibility of courts was not brought to the notice of the Bench by the learned counsel for the parties while making their arguments. However, eleven members of the Bench, being themselves aware of the above legal position, proceeded to inquire into the facts and points of law that were not presented before the court below, that is, the Peshawar High Court. Although these eleven members of the Bench disagreed to some extent on granting the eventual relief, their awareness of the true legal position as to the nature of election disputes and the responsibility of courts led them to a broader and more comprehensive judicial inquiry into all the relevant facts and law points concerning the election dispute involved in the present case, as set out next.

Relevant facts of the case

14. On 15 December 2023, the Election Commission of Pakistan ("Commission") announced the election programme for the General Elections-2024 to the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies. According to this programme, the last date for candidates to file nomination papers with the Returning Officers was 22 December 2023, which was extended on that day to 24 December 2023. On 22 December 2023, the Commission also decided the then-pending matter of intraparty elections of the political party, Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI"). The Commission determined that PTI had not conducted its intra-party elections in accordance with its constitution and election laws. As a result, the Commission declined to recognize PTI's intra-party elections and declared PTI ineligible to obtain its election symbol. Although this decision was initially suspended on 26 December 2023 and subsequently set aside on 10 January 2024 by the Peshawar High Court, this Court restored the Commission's decision on 13 January 2024. PTI candidates were thus not allotted the party symbol of PTI but instead were allotted various different symbols that had been prescribed by the Commission for independent candidates.

15. In the course of the election programme, when the Returning Officers published the lists of contesting candidates (Form-33)[15], they mentioned PTI candidates as independent candidates. One of the PTI candidates, Mr. Salman Akram Raja, challenged this action by the Returning Officer of his constituency before the Commission. By its order dated 2 February 2024, the Commission rejected his challenge and declared him an independent candidate. The poll for the elections was then held on 8 February 2024, and PTI candidates were notified by the Commission as independent returned candidates in the notification published in the official Gazette under Section 98 of the Elections Act 2017 ("Section-98 Notification").

16. After the publication of Section-98 Notification, a substantial number of independent returned candidates (86 for the National Assembly; 107 for the Punjab Assembly; 90 for the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Assembly; and 9 for the Sindh Assembly) joined a political party, Sunni Ittehad Council ("SIC"), to obtain the share of proportional representation in the seats reserved for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab and Sindh. SIC then informed the Commission of the joining of these returned candidates and requested the Commission, through four separate applications (letters) dated 21 February 2024, to allocate to it its due share in the seats reserved for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly and the said three Provincial Assemblies.

17. Certain other political parties, such as Pakistan Muslim League (Nawaz) (PML(N)) and Muttahida Qaumi Movement (Pakistan) (MQM(P)), filed applications opposing SIC's request for reserved seats and prayed for the allocation of the reserved seats to them and other eligible political parties. Some individuals also filed applications opposing the SIC's request and praying that SIC should not be treated as a parliamentary party. The political party, Pakistan People's Party Parliamentarians (PPPP), appeared before the Commission as a proforma respondent in the application filed by MQM(P), while the political parties, Jamiat Ulema-e-Islam Pakistan (JUIP) and Pakistan Muslim League (PML), appeared in response to the Commission's notice and opposed SIC's request.

18. By its order dated 1 March 2024, the Commission rejected SIC's applications and decided that the reserved seats for women and non-Muslims, which had been requested by SIC but declined, would be allocated to other political parties as per the proportional representation system of political parties. Accordingly, those reserved seats (19 for women and 3 for non-Muslims in the National Assembly; 21 for women and 4 for non-Muslims in the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Assembly; 24 for women and 3 for non-Muslims in the Punjab Assembly; and 2 for women and 1 for non-Muslims in the Sindh Assembly - 78 in total - hereinafter referred to as the "disputed reserved seats") were allocated to other political parties. SIC challenged the Commission's order before the Peshawar High Court in writ jurisdiction. By its judgment dated 25 March 2024 ("impugned judgment"), the Peshawar High Court dismissed the SIC's challenge and upheld the Commission's order. Hence, these appeals were filed by SIC with leave of the Court.

19. During the pendency of these appeals, PTI filed an application seeking its impleadment in these appeals and submitting therein the facts and circumstances under which its returned candidates joined SIC. PTI submitted in its application, inter alia, that PTI issued party tickets to its candidates, which were to be filed with the respective Returning Officers by 4 pm on 13 January 2024, the day fixed for the allotment of election symbols. The Supreme Court took up the Commission's appeal against the judgment of the Peshawar High Court in the matter of PTI's intra-party elections and its election symbol on 12 January 2024 for hearing, which continued until late evening on 13 January 2024.

19.1. Faced with the possibility of an adverse decision by the Supreme Court after 4 pm that day, PTI entered into an arrangement with another political party, PTI-Nazriati, under which party tickets were issued to PTI candidates by that party to obtain a common symbol for PTI candidates to prevent the disenfranchisement of a large part of the electorate. However, the same day, the Chairman of PTI-Nazriati appeared on national television channels and disavowed the tickets issued. At about the same time, the Commission also issued an order dated 13 January 2024 directing the Returning Officers not to accept a political party's tickets for candidates who belonged to another political party. Therefore, most of PTI candidates withdrew the tickets of PTI-Nazriati and presented PTI's tickets to the Returning Officers. Some of the Returning Officers placed the same on file while others refused to receive the same pending the decision of the Supreme Court.

19.2. Awaiting the decision of the Supreme Court, the Commission extended the time for submitting the party tickets and the allotment of election symbols till 12 pm that day. The Supreme Court announced its short order at about 11 pm on 13 January 2024, whereupon the Returning Officers rejected PTI's tickets and, by treating PTI candidates as independent candidates, allotted them different election symbols. The poll was held on 8 February 2024, and PTI candidates won a large number of seats in the National and Provincial Assemblies. These candidates were notified as independent returned candidates by the Commission by relying upon Rule 94 of the Elections Rules 2017 and the judgment of the Supreme Court dated 13 January 2024.

19.3. The Commission had earlier accepted in 2018 a political party, Balochistan Awami Party, which had not contested for general seats, eligible for the allocation of reserved seats. Therefore, PTI-backed returned candidates joined SIC, with which PTI had an ongoing alliance/ relationship, within three days of being so notified, in order to become entitled to the allocation of the reserved seats. In its application, PTI also made the following contentions:

A primary purpose of [Articles 51(6)(d) & (e) and 106(3)(c) of] the Constitution is the establishment of a representative National Assembly and representative Provincial Assemblies. Denial of reserved seats to PTI would create an entirely unrepresented National Assembly as well as Provincial Assemblies that do not reflect the will of the people.

[T]he denial of reserved seats to SIC/PTI and the allocation of a disproportionate number of reserved seats to other political parties would deepen the denial of the will of the people.

As per these contentions and the arguments made during the hearing, PTI claimed the allocation of the disputed reserved seats either to SIC or to itself (PTI).

Claim for allocating reserved seats to SIC or to PTI

20. It may also be pertinent to mention here that in the course of his arguments, the learned counsel for SIC also attempted to explain the above circumstances under which the returned candidates, who according to him were PTI candidates, joined SIC. However, some honourable members of the Bench reproved him, questioning how he could make conflicting arguments as he was supposed to plead the case of SIC, not of PTI. With respect, we say that both SIC and PTI took the same stance on the peculiar circumstances that led the returned candidates to join SIC; in no way did they make any conflicting assertions. Both emphasized that it is the right of the people who had voted for the returned candidates that their mandate should be reflected in allocating the disputed reserved seats to SIC or to PTI.

Questions of law

21. On the above facts and the contentions made by learned counsel for the parties, the following questions of law fall for determination:

i. What is the consequence of declaring a political party ineligible to obtain an election symbol under Section 215(5) of the Elections Act 2017? Does such a declaration affect the political party's other constitutional and statutory rights?

ii. Can a candidate nominated by a political party ineligible to obtain an election symbol be mentioned as an independent candidate in the list of contesting candidates (Form 33), and can such a returned candidate be notified as an independent returned candidate in the Section-98 Notification?

iii. Do Articles 51(6) (d) & (e) and 106(3) (c) of the Constitution refer to political parties that have contested for and won general seats or to all enlisted political parties? and

iv. How is the proportional representation of a political party to be calculated for the allocation of reserved seats under Articles 51(6) (d) & (e) and 106(3) (c) of the Constitution?

We shall discuss and decide the above questions seriatim. However, before doing so, we want to briefly state the scope of the fundamental right guaranteed by Articles 17(2) and 19 of the Constitution, as the whole case hinges upon it and the answer of all the above questions are rooted in it.

Scope of fundamental right guaranteed by Article 17(2) of the Constitution

22. The provisions of Article 17(2) of the Constitution are cited here for ease of reference and reading:

Article 17(2) of the Constitution:

Every citizen, not being in the service of Pakistan, shall have the right to form or be a member of a political party, subject to any reasonable restrictions imposed by law in the interest of the sovereignty or integrity of Pakistan, and such law shall provide that where the Federal Government declares that any political party has been formed or is operating in a manner prejudicial to the sovereignty or integrity of Pakistan, the Federal Government shall, within fifteen days of such declaration, refer the matter to the Supreme Court, whose decision on such reference shall be final.

A bare reading of the provisions of Article 17(2) of the Constitution shows that it guarantees to every citizen of Pakistan who is not in the service of Pakistan, the right to form or be a member of a political party. As per this Article, any reasonable restrictions can be imposed on this right by law only in the interest of sovereignty or integrity of Pakistan. This right has been regarded so important by the constitution makers that the adjudication of the matter of its restriction on the specified two grounds has been entrusted to the apex court of the country-the Supreme Court of Pakistan-and not to any other court. The protection of this right is so essential for ensuring democracy and representative government that its significance cannot be overstated. Although all courts and tribunals are mandated to enforce the right guaranteed by this Article, this Court (the Supreme Court of Pakistan) is the ultimate guardian of it. Therefore, it is also because of the constitutional obligation of this Court to protect the right guaranteed by this Article, as specifically entrusted to it, that we decided to make a broader and comprehensive judicial inquiry into all the relevant facts and law points concerning enforcement of the fundamental rights of both the voters and the political parties.

23. As held by this Court in Nawaz Sharif,[16] the fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution, an organic instrument, are not capable of precise or permanent definition delineating their meaning and scope for all times to come. With the passage of time, changes occur in the political, social and economic conditions of the society, which requires re-evaluation of their meaning and scope in consonance with the changed conditions. Therefore, keeping in view the prevailing socio-economic and politico-cultural values and ideals of the society, the courts construe the fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution with a progressive, liberal and dynamic approach. This approach ensures that the fundamental rights remain a vibrant and effective guarantee of citizens' rights, liberties and freedoms, adapting to the evolving needs and aspirations of society. With this approach, the courts expound the fundamental rights to give them "life and substance"[17] that are true to the reality of the changing times.

24. In view of the above principles of interpreting fundamental rights, this Court has expounded in several cases the scope of the "right to form or be a member of a political party" guaranteed by Article 17(2) and held that it includes the right to function and operate as a political party,[18] the right to participate in and contest an election as a political party,[19] the right to form the Government and complete the prescribed tenure if the members of the political party constitute the requisite majority,[20] the right to contest an election in his individual capacity or as a member of a political party,[21] the right to be governed by chosen representatives[22] and the right to vote.[23] This bouquet of political fundamental rights ensures a functional and a workable democracy and a representative government. It is underlined that 'representation in fact is democracy'.[24] Therefore, the right guaranteed by Article 17(2) is essential for actualizing the constitutional objective of establishing an order wherein the State exercises its powers and authority through the chosen representatives of the people.[25]

Right to vote and the freedom of expression guaranteed under Article 19

25. Furthermore, as a form of expression, the right to vote is part of the fundamental right to freedom of expression guaranteed by Article 19 of the Constitution,[26] which is cited here for ease of reference:

Article 19: Every citizen shall have the right to freedom of speech and expression... subject to any reasonable restrictions imposed by law in the interest of the glory of Islam or the integrity, security, or defence of Pakistan or any part thereof, friendly relations with foreign states, public order, decency, morality, or in relation to contempt of court, commission of or incitement to an offence.

The right to freedom of speech and expression is considered "preservative of all rights".[27] The act of voting for a candidate of a political party or an independent candidate is a form of expression and an inherent concept within the Constitution, fundamental to the democratic legitimacy and validity of the legislature. When individuals cast their votes, they express their opinions on how they believe their society should be governed, who should govern it, and what policies should be prioritized. This form of expression is crucial because it encapsulates the will of the electorate, conveying messages about public preferences.

26. In a democratic context, freedom of expression extends beyond individual speech to encompass the collective expression of a community's or nation's political will through their elected representatives. In essence, freedom of expression and representativeness are deeply interlinked, each reinforcing the other. A truly representative government not only exemplifies the collective expression of its people but also ensures that this expression influences governance. The right to form political parties, the right to contest elections and the right to vote are therefore pivotal extensions of representativeness and freedom of expression, essential for cultivating a socially just environment.

27. The fundamental rights enshrined in Articles 17(2) and 19 of the Constitution thus underscore the significance of political participation and freedom of expression, both of which are essential to the functioning of a representative democracy. Article 17(2) guarantees the right to form or join political parties, highlighting the vital role of political participation in safeguarding democracy, while Article 19 upholds the freedom of expression, which is integral to the electorate's ability to influence the formation of government by expressing their choices through their votes. Together, these Articles emphasize the importance of electoral integrity and political justice, ensuring that every citizen's voice and choice are heard and represented in the political process.

28. Having so briefly stated the scope of the rights guaranteed by Articles 17(2) and 19 of the Constitution, we will next discuss the questions and examine the implications of this right further.

(i) What is the consequence of declaring a political party ineligible to obtain an election symbol under Section 215(5) of the Elections Act 2017? Does such a declaration affect the political party's other constitutional and statutory rights?

29. The fundamental right to form a political party guaranteed by Article 17(2) of the Constitution is regulated by the Elections Act 2017 ("Elections Act"). Section 2(xxviii) of the Elections Act defines a "political party" to mean an association of citizens or a combination or group of such associations formed with a view to propagating or influencing political opinion and participating in elections for any elective public office or for membership of a legislative body, including an Assembly, the Senate, or local government. Chapter XI of the Elections Act, comprising Sections 200 to 213, contains the detailed provisions, inter alia, on the subjects of formation, enlistment, membership, functioning, intra-party elections, sources of funds, and dissolution of political parties, etc.

30. Section 202 makes it obligatory for the Commission to enlist a political party if the application for its enlistment is accompanied by (i) a copy of the constitution of the political party, (ii) the certificate and the information required to be submitted under Sections 201 and 209, (iii) a copy of consolidated statement of its accounts under Section 210, (iv) a list of at least two thousand members with their signatures or thumb impressions along with copies of their National Identity Cards, and (v) the deposit of two hundred thousand rupees in favour of the Commission in the Government Treasury as enlistment fee. A political party which has been refused enlistment by the Commission can file an appeal before the Supreme Court. This provision aligns with the constitutional mandate entrusted to the Supreme Court under Article 17(2) of the Constitution as the ultimate guardian of the right guaranteed by that Article. It is also notable that a political party once enlisted under the Elections Act cannot be delisted; the Commission's power to cancel the enlistment of a political party under subsection (5) of Section 202 relates only to the political parties enlisted before the commencement of the Elections Act, i.e., under earlier law. Whereas Section 212 contains the provisions on the matter of dissolution of political parties, which are similar to those contained in Article 17(2) of the Constitution.

31. The provisions that are more relevant to the present case are those contained in Sections 208 and 209, concerning the intra-party elections of political parties. As per Section 208, the office-bearers of a political party are to be elected periodically in accordance with the constitution of the political party, provided that a period, not exceeding five years, intervenes between any two elections. Once the intra-party elections are conducted, the political party concerned is to publish the updated list of its central office-bearers on its website and also to send such list to the Commission. Similarly, under Section 209, within seven days from completion of its intra-party elections, a political party is to submit a certificate signed by an office-bearer authorized by the Party Head, to the Commission to the effect that the elections were held in accordance with the constitution of the political party. Such certificate should contain the following information: (a) the date of the last intra-party elections; (b) the names, designations, and addresses of office-bearers elected at the Federal, Provincial, and local levels, wherever applicable; (c) the election results; and (d) a copy of the political party's notifications declaring the results of the election. Within seven days from the receipt of such certificate of a political party, the Commission is to publish the certificate on its website. It is notable that under Section 208(5), where a political party fails to conduct intra-party elections as per the given time frame in its constitution (but not exceeding the statutory period of five years) despite a notice issued by the Commission to do so, then the Commission can impose a fine which may extend to two hundred thousand rupees but not be less than one hundred thousand rupees. While the consequence of failure to comply with the provisions of Section 209, which relates to the submission of a certificate containing the specified information and signed by an office-bearer authorized by the Party Head, to the effect that the elections were held in accordance with the constitution of the political party, is provided in Section 215(5).

32. Section 215(5)[28] of the Elections Act provides that if a political party fails to comply with the provisions of Section 209 (regarding intraparty elections) or Section 210 (regarding sources of the party's funds), the Commission may, after affording it an opportunity of being heard, declare it ineligible to obtain an election symbol for election to Majlis-eShoora (Parliament), Provincial Assembly or a local government, and shall not allocate an election symbol to such political party in subsequent elections. The word "may" in Section 215(5) indicates the discretion of the Commission in making the declaration, which discretion, like all other discretionary powers vested in public functionaries, is to be exercised justly, fairly and reasonably, considering the peculiar facts and circumstances of each case. However, the consequence of making such a declaration is clearly specified and is not left to the discretion of the Commission. As stipulated in Section 215(5), the consequence of making the declaration is that the Commission is not to allocate an election symbol to such political party in subsequent elections.

Principle of strict construction of statutes providing penal consequence or curtailing fundamental rights

33. It is a cardinal principle of the construction of statutes that any provision entailing penal consequence, whether of criminal law[29] or of civil law,[30] must be construed strictly. This principle of strict construction of penal statutes is also called the principle against doubtful penalisation. It stresses that a person should not be penalised except under clear law and if, in construing the relevant provisions, there appears any reasonable doubt or ambiguity, it should be resolved in favour of the person who would be liable to the penalty. No penalty or penal consequence can be added to the one specified in law by inference or assumption. Penal actions can only be taken on the basis of express and clear provisions of law. The act attracting the penal consequence and the person responsible for it must fairly and squarely fall within the plain words of the law. Courts are not to strain or stretch the meaning of the words to bring the act or the subject within the ambit of penal provisions; in other words, the scope of penal provisions is not to be extended through liberal construction. Furthermore, if a penal provision is susceptible to two reasonable constructions, the one that does not extend the penalty is to be adopted. Any reasonable doubt or ambiguity is to be resolved in favour of the person who would be liable to the penalty, and the construction that avoids the penalty is to be adopted.[31]

34. Another well-established principle of constitutional and statutory construction is that while the fundamental rights guaranteed in the Constitution are to be construed progressively and liberally,[32] provisions in the Constitution or in any law that curtail the fundamental rights are to be construed restrictively and narrowly.[33] This principle owes its genesis to the broader principle of strict construction of statutes encroaching on rights, which applies to all fundamental rights recognized by common law, whether or not guaranteed in the Constitution. As per this principle, statutes that encroach on such rights of the subject are also subject to strict construction. They are to be construed, if possible, to protect such rights, and if there is any ambiguity, the construction that saves the right should be adopted.[34] In a constitutional democracy, laws are solicitous of the individual rights and liberties of citizens and interfere with them as little as possible in the public interest. By adopting a liberal and expansive interpretation of such laws, individual rights and liberties cannot be curtailed more than expressly provided by the legislature in the public interest. Therefore, laws that curtail individual rights and liberties, particularly the fundamental rights guaranteed in the Constitution, are to be construed strictly.[35]

35. These principles of statutory construction guide our analysis and interpretation of the provisions of Section 215(5) of the Elections Act. It is unequivocal that Section 215(5) prescribes a penal consequence for a political party's failure to comply with the provisions of Section 209 (regarding intra-party elections) or Section 210 (regarding the sources of the party's funds). The specified penalty of non-allocation of an election symbol curtails the political party's fundamental right to function and operate as a political party a right implicit in the right to form a political party guaranteed by Article 17(2) of the Constitution.[36] Therefore, Section 215(5) must be construed strictly. No further penalty or consequence beyond the specified non-allocation of an election symbol can be inferred or assumed from Section 215(5). Additionally, no other constitutional or statutory right of the political party can be denied on the basis of the non-allocation of an election symbol under this provision. Any interpretation of Section 215(5) that would impose further penalties beyond the expressly stipulated contravenes the principle of strict construction of laws that entail penal consequences or curtail fundamental rights. Thus, the scope of the penalty provided by Section 215(5) must remain confined to its express terms, ensuring that no other constitutional or statutory right of the political party is affected.

Answer to question (i) and its applicability to PTI

36. In light of the foregoing interpretation, we determine question (i) in the terms that the sole consequence of declaring a political party ineligible to obtain an election symbol under Section 215(5) of the Elections Act for failing to comply with the provisions of Section 209 regarding intra-party elections is the non-allocation of an election symbol to that party in subsequent elections-nothing more, nothing less. Furthermore, such a declaration does not affect the political party's other constitutional and statutory rights.

37. This was the effect of the Commission's order dated 22 December 2023 (upheld by this Court vide its order dated 13 January 2024), declaring PTI ineligible to obtain its election symbol under Section 215(5) of the Elections Act; other constitutional and statutory rights of PTI to function and operate as a political party were not thereby affected. With respect, it is observed that had this Court clarified this legal position in its order dated 13 January 2024, or had the Commission clarified it in its order dated 22 December 2023 or order dated 13 January 2024, the entire confusion regarding the status of PTI candidates or PTI's right to reserved seats would not have occurred.

38. We feel constrained to observe here that we have some doubts about whether the Commission has the power to reject the certificate of intra-party elections submitted by a political party under Section 209, and whether the Commission exercised its discretion under Section 215(5) justly, fairly and reasonably in PTI's case, particularly when the election programme had already been announced and the fundamental right of citizens to vote for the political party of their choice was at stake. Similarly, we have certain reservations about how the matter of intraparty elections-a matter of internal governance of party-can trump the fundamental rights of citizens to vote and of political parties to effectively participate in and contest elections through obtaining a common symbol for their candidates, guaranteed under Articles 17(2) and 19 of the Constitution. However, since these questions are sub judice in the review petition filed by PTI against this Court's judgment dated 13 January 2024, we abstain from examining and expressing our definitive view on them. (One of us, Justice Muhammed Ali Mazhar, does not want to make the observations made in this paragraph because review petition against this Court's judgment dated 13 January 2024 is pending. He also wishes to make clear that nothing in this paragraph is intended to or will impact upon the hearing of the review petition).

Explanation to Rule 94 of the Elections Rules 2017 is ultra vires the Elections Act and the Constitution

39. The discussion under this question would, however, be incomplete without determining the legal status of the Explanation to Rule 94 of the Election Rules 2017 ("Election Rules"). It is pertinent to mention that the Election Rules have been made by the Commission in the exercise of its rule-making power under Section 239 of the Elections Act, which authorises the Commission to make rules for carrying out the purposes of the Act.

40. Rule 94[37] provides the procedure for the calculation, allocation and notification of the share of proportional representation of political parties in the seats reserved for women and non-Muslims. Its Explanation stipulates that '[fJor the purpose of this rule, the expression "political party" means a political party to which a symbol has been allocated by the Commission.' By defining a political party in this manner, the Explanation excludes a political party that has not been allotted a symbol by the Commission from being allocated a share of proportional representation in the reserved seats. No such exclusion of a political party, as created by the Explanation to Rule 94, is provided in Articles 51(6) (d) & (e) and 106(3) (c) of the Constitution, nor is any such consequence of non-allocation of the election symbol provided in Section 215(5) or any other provision of the Elections Act. In effect, it has introduced an additional penal consequence of declaring a political party ineligible to obtain an election symbol under Section 215(5) of the Elections Act, and it has also infringed the constitutional right of a political party, conferred by Articles 51(6) (d) & (e) and 106(3) (c) of the Constitution, to have its due share of proportional representation in the seats reserved for women and non-Muslims on the basis of general seats secured by such a political party. This Explanation has thus clearly gone beyond and against the provisions of the Elections Act and the Constitution.

41. It is an established principle of law that rules made under the rule-making authority conferred by an Act ("parent statute") can neither enlarge nor go beyond the scope of the parent statute, nor can they override or conflict with its provisions. If the rules are repugnant to or inconsistent with the provisions of the parent statute, they are ultra vires and invalid. The rule-making authority is conferred to give effect to the provisions of the parent statute, not to neutralise or contradict them. The primary purpose of the rules is to provide procedural details for carrying out the purposes of the parent statute. They cannot militate against the substantive provisions of the parent statute.[38] Moreover, just as a provision in the parent statute that is inconsistent with any provision of the Constitution is ultra vires the Constitution and thus invalid,[39] so too are the rules made under its authority: the rules that are inconsistent with any provision of the Constitution are also ultra vires the Constitution and thus invalid. What cannot be done directly in the parent statute through primary legislation cannot be done indirectly in the rules through delegated legislation.

42. In view of the above, the Explanation to Rule 94 of the Election Rules, being beyond the scope of Section 215(5) of the Elections Act and inconsistent with the provisions of Articles 51(6) (d) & (e) and 106(3) (c) of the Constitution, is declared ultra vires the Elections Act and the Constitution, thus void and invalid.

(ii) Can a candidate nominated by a political party ineligible to obtain an election symbol be mentioned as an independent candidate in the list of contesting candidates (Form-33), and can such a returned candidate be notified as an independent returned candidate in the Section-98 Notification?

43. The answer to question (i) above, has made it easier to address this question. The only point that requires some discussion here is whether a political party has a constitutional and/or statutory right to nominate its candidates for an election to Majlis-e-Shoora (Parliament), Provincial Assembly or a local government. Fortunately, we need not grapple much with this point as it has already been discussed at some length and decided authoritatively by the Full Court Benches of this Court in the two cases of Benazir Bhutto decided in 1988.[40] Instead of burdening this judgment with extracts from those cases, we find it appropriate to state summarily what was decided therein on the point under consideration, with which we respectfully agree.

Right to contest elections as a political party through its nomi- nated candidates is a fundamental right under Article 17(2) of the Constitution

44. Article 17(2) of the Constitution guarantees the right to form or be a member of a political party. Because the formation of a political party necessarily implies the carrying on of all its activities, the right to form a political party extends to its functioning and operation. The functioning is implicit in the formation of a political party. Without the right to its functioning, the right to form a political party would be meaningless and of no avail. To participate in an election to Parliament or a Provincial Assembly and to nominate or put up candidates at any such election are the principal activities (functions) of a political party. Depriving a political party of these activities destroys the political existence of the party and is tantamount to its political extermination and virtual dissolution, which cannot be done otherwise than by the procedure and on the grounds provided in Article 17(2) of the Constitution. The right to participate in and contest an election as a political party is included in the right to form or be a member of a political party. Any provision of election law that fails to recognize the rights of political parties to participate in the elections is, therefore, ultra vires Article 17(2) of the Constitution.

45. The Nawaz Sharif case[41] decided in 1993 by a Full Court Bench of this Court not only endorsed the above scope of the right guaranteed by Article 17(2) of the Constitution but also advanced it further. The Court held that the right to form or be a member of a political party guaranteed by Article 17(2) includes not only the right to participate in and contest elections as a political party, as held in the Benazir Bhutto cases, but also the right to form the Government and complete the prescribed tenure if the members of the political party constitute the requisite majority.

46. Being in complete agreement with the above three decisions of the Full Court Benches of this Court on the scope of Article 17(2), we hold that the right to participate in and contest elections as a political party through its nominated candidates is a fundamental right guaranteed by Article 17(2) of the Constitution. The various sections of the Elections Act, including Sections 66 and 67, merely serve to give effect to this right as machinery provisions. This right is not, nor can it be, extinguished by any provision of the Elections Act, including Section 215(5) thereof. Depriving a political party of participating in and contesting elections through its nominated candidates, it is reiterated, destroys the political existence of the party and is tantamount to its political extermination and virtual dissolution, which cannot be done except by the procedure and on the grounds provided in Article 17(2) of the Constitution. Similar would be the position if the candidates nominated by a political party are denied the status of being the candidates of that political party and are mentioned as independent candidates in the list of contesting candidates (Form-33), or such returned candidates are notified as independent returned candidates in the Section-98 Notification. Such actions of the Returning Officers and the Commission would also be ultra vires Article 17(2) of the Constitution, as they effectively nullify the party's right to participate in and contest elections.

The order of the Commission, dated 2 February 2024, made on the application of Mr. Salman Akram Raja (a PTI candidate) was both unconstitutional and unlawful.

47. As the Commission's order dated 2 February 2024, passed on the application of Mr. Salman Akram Raja ("Mr. Raja"), a PTI candidate, pertains to question (ii) under discussion, we deem it necessary to examine the legality of that order alongside answering this question, in order to ensure a comprehensive understanding of the matter. As noted above, when the Returning Officers published the lists of contesting candidates (Form-33), PTI candidates were mentioned therein as independent candidates. Mr. Raja, one of such candidates, challenged this entry in the list of contesting candidates (Form-33) before the Commission. However, the Commission, by its order dated 2 February 2024, rejected his challenge and declared him an independent candidate. In its order, the Commission reasoned:

Notwithstanding, the affiliation of the petitioner with PTI and alleged party ticket including entries of party affiliation in the nomination papers of the petitioner, he cannot be treated as nominee of PTI nor his party (PTI) can be reflected in column 5 of Form 33 in absence of party symbol.

The petitioner has been allotted symbol from the chart available for independent candidates as the party to which he claims affiliation has not been allocated Election Symbol by the Commission. Allowing any entry in absence of party symbol in column 5 of Form 33 and entry [of] applicant's name as Candidate of PTI will contradict the symbol and identity of Party as the petitioner is declared as an independent candidate.

To further support its decision, the Commission also relied upon the following observation of this Court made in its order dated 13 January 2024:

Surprisingly, no declaration was sought, nor given, that intra party elections were held in PTI, let alone that the same were held in accordance with the law. If it had been established that elections had been held then ECP would have to justify if any legal benefit to such a political party was being withheld, but if intra party elections were not held the benefits accruing pursuant to the holding of elections could not be claimed.
(Emphasis supplied)

From the cited extracts of the Commission's order, it appears that the Commission rejected Mr. Raja's claim primarily because he had been allotted a symbol from the chart of symbols prescribed for independent candidates, and the party (PTI) whose candidature he sought to be mentioned in Form-33 had not been allocated an election symbol. The Commission's reliance on the cited observation of this Court indicates that it understood a political party's capacity to nominate candidates for an election as one of "the benefits accruing pursuant to the holding of [intra-party] elections."

48. In defending the Commission's order and the Returning Officers' act of mentioning PTI candidates as independent candidates in Form-33, the learned counsel for the Commission took pains to explain the provisions of Section 67[42] of the Elections Act. According to him, Section 67 classifies candidates for symbol allocation into two categories: (i) candidates nominated by a political party that has been allocated a symbol by the Commission under Chapter XII, who are allotted the party symbol under subsection (2) of Section 67, and (ii) candidates not nominated by any political party, who are treated as independent candidates and are allotted one of the symbols not allocated to any political party. He emphasised that Section 67 does not recognise any third category of candidates, such as candidates who are nominated by a political party (like PTI) that has not been allocated a symbol by the Commission under Chapter XII of the Elections Act.

49. We have given careful consideration to his arguments. We find that his focus has been solely on the express words of subsections (2) of Section 67, while overlooking its necessary implication. This necessary implication becomes clear when we invert the statement made in subsection (2) of Section 67. This subsection states that "[a] candidate nominated by a political party at an election in any constituency shall be allotted the symbol allocated by the Commission to that political party under the provisions of Chapter XII and no other symbol." By inverting this statement, we find as a necessary implication that a candidate nominated by a political party that has not been allocated a symbol by the Commission shall not be allotted the symbol declined by the Commission to that political party under Chapter XII, but rather any other symbol. Since any other symbol is allotted to candidates under subsection (3) of Section 67, a candidate nominated by a political party (such as PTI) that has not been allocated a symbol by the Commission is to be allotted, under that subsection, one of the symbols not allocated to any political party. However, the allocation of a symbol under subsection (3) does not alter the candidate's status as a nominee of the political party, which is determined under Section 66 on the basis of his declaration and the party certificate (party ticket) issued in his favour.

50. The construction of subsections (2) and (3) of Section 67 proposed by the learned counsel for the Commission, if accepted, would extinguish the fundamental right guaranteed by Article 17(2) of the Constitution to participate in and contest elections as a political party through its nominated candidates. As held above, the various sections of the Elections Act, including Sections 66 and 67, merely serve to give effect to this fundamental right as machinery provisions, which cannot be extinguished by any provision of the Elections Act, including Section 215(5) thereof.

51. In view of the above, the Commission's order dated 2 February 2024 and the Returning Officers' act of mentioning PTI candidates as independent candidates in Form-33 were both unconstitutional and unlawful, and they are hereby declared as such. It would also be appropriate to clarify that the Commission's reliance on the cited observation of this Court made in paragraph 11[43] of its order dated 13 January 2024 was misconceived and misplaced, as that observation pertained to Section 215(5) and not to Sections 66 and 67 of the Elections Act.

Difference between "interpretation" and "construction" of statutes

52. To explain how we have determined and declared the above legal position, despite it not being explicitly stated in subsections (2) and (3) of Section 67, as argued by the learned counsel for the Commission, we may underline a subtle difference between "interpretation" and "construction" of statutes. 'Strictly speaking, construction and interpreta-tion are not the same', as Crawford wrote and this Court approvingly cited it in Haider Zaidi,[44] 'although the two terms are often used interchangeably. Construction, however, to be technically correct, is the drawing of conclusions with respect to subjects that are beyond the direct expression of the text, from elements known and given in the text, while interpretation is the process of discovering the true meaning of the language used. ... The process to be used in any given case will depend upon the nature of the problem presented. And, as is apparent, both processes may be used in seeking the legislative intent in a given statute. If the legislative intent is not clear after the completion of interpretation, then the court will proceed to subject the statute to construction.'[45]

We have thus drawn the above conclusion by construction from the "elements known and given in the text" of the provisions of Sections 66, 67 and 215(5) of the Elections Act as a necessary implication thereof.

53. It may however be clarified, as Crawford also did, that since for most practical purposes it is sufficient to designate the whole process of ascertaining the legislative intent as either interpretation or construction, the said distinction between the two processes has little importance so far as the courts are concerned and is usually relegated to the realm of academic discussion. But, as Crawford emphasised and so we do for our present purpose, 'by breaking the process of finding the legislative intent into these two processes whose characters depend upon whether the court, strictly speaking, interprets or constructs the legislative enactment at hand, some light is shed upon how the courts exercise the judicial function of ascertaining the legislative intention.'[46]

Answer to question (ii) and its applicability to PTI

54. In view of the above, we answer question (ii) as follows: notwithstanding that a political party has been declared ineligible to obtain an election symbol, its nominated candidates cannot be mentioned as independent candidates in the list of contesting candidates (Form 33), despite allotment of different election symbols to them under Section 67(3) of the Elections Act, nor can they be notified as independent returned candidates in the Section 98 Notification.

55. Therefore, PTI's nominated candidates were wrongly shown independent candidates in the list of contesting candidates (Form 33) by the Returning Officers and were also wrongly notified as independent returned candidates in the Section-98 Notification by the Commission.

Validity of party tickets issued by Mr. Gohar Ali Khan as Chairman PTI

56. Before parting with this part of the judgment, it is necessary to address an ancillary point stated by the Commission in its order dated 2 February 2024 in rejecting Mr. Raja's claim. The Commission maintained that since the election of Mr. Gohar Ali Khan as Chairman of PTI had not been accepted by the Commission, he could not have issued the party ticket to Mr. Raja. We find that the Commission failed to recognise that its order dated 22 December 2023 regarding the intra-party elections of PTI was not in force from 26 December 2023 (when the Peshawar High Court suspended the Commission's order) to 13 January 2024 (when this Court restored the Commission's order). During this period, Mr. Gohar Ali Khan was holding the office of Chairman of PTI and had, therefore, validly issued party tickets to PTI candidates, including Mr. Raja.

57. We may also underline here that, notwithstanding a political party's failure to comply with the provisions of Section 209 of the Elections Act relating to its intra-party elections, the political party remains an enlisted political party, fully functional for the purposes of its formation, i.e., 'propagating or influencing political opinion and participating in elections for any elective public office or for membership of a legislative body, including an Assembly, the Senate, or local government.'[47] The only consequence of not complying with the said provisions of the Elections Act, as aforementioned, is that such a political party is not to be allocated an election symbol. It would be completely illogical to assume that a political party, a juristic person, is fully functional yet there are no natural persons who are either de facto or de jure performing its functions and running its affairs. We all know that juristic persons act through natural persons. An enlisted political party is a juristic person, and like other juristic persons, it acts through natural persons. Saying that a political party is an enlisted political party, fully functional for the purposes of its formation, yet there is no one that can perform its functions and run its affairs, amounts to blowing hot and cold in the same breath or approbating and reprobating one and the same fact. Therefore, after the intra-party elections (which were not later accepted by the Commission), Mr. Gohar Ali Khan had assumed at least de facto charge of PTI's functions and affairs as its Chairman. Consequently, the acts performed by him on behalf of PTI before 13 January 2024, when this Court restored the Commission's order dated 22 December 2023 declining to accept the intra-party elections, were fully valid and effective.

58. It is further clarified that when the office-bearers of a political party are elected under Section 208 of the Elections Act, in accordance with the party's constitution, and a certificate to that effect is submitted to the Commission under Section 209, the newly elected office-bearers de facto assume the functions of the party until the Commission accepts or rejects the elections. Upon acceptance, they also assume the functions of the party de jure. In the case of rejection of the intra-party elections, the previous office-bearers are reinstated, for no political party, as held above, can exist without either de facto or de jure office-bearers to perform its functions and manage its affairs. In this regard, the clarification dated 14 September 2024, passed by us on an application of the Commission, shall also be read as part of this judgment and is reproduced hereunder for the completion of the record:

Through C.M.A. 7540/2024, and in terms [para 10] of the short order dated 12.07.2024 whereby these appeals were decided by majority ("Short Order") the Election Commission of Pakistan ("Commission") purports to seek guidance on the point that "[i]n absence of a valid organizational structure of Pakistan Tehreek-i-Insaf (PTI), who will confirm the political affiliation of the returned candidates (MNAs and MPAs) on behalf of PTI, who have filed their statements in light of the Supreme Court Order [dated 12 July 2024]." We may note that other than a copy of the Short Order the application is bereft of any other documentation.

2. In reply to the above application, the PTI has filed C.M.A. 8139/2024, to which have been annexed a number of documents, including correspondence between the PTI and the Commission. We have considered the material that has been placed before us.

3. By way of brief recapitulation, in paragraphs 4 and 5 of the Short Order it has been categorically declared that the lack or denial of an election symbol does not in any manner affect the constitutional and legal rights of a political party to participate in an election (whether general or bye) and to field candidates, and that for the purposes, and within the meaning, of paragraphs (d) and (e) of clause (6) of Article 51 and paragraph (c) of clause (3) of Article 106 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, PTI was and is a political party, which secured or won (the two terms being interchangeable) general seats in the National and Provincial Assemblies in the General Elections of 2024 as provided in that Order. These paragraphs, and the preceding paragraph 3 of the Short Order, sound on the constitutional plane, being the proper interpretation and understanding of the relevant constitutional provisions. The other paragraphs of the Short Order, including in particular paragraphs 8 and 10, are consequential upon what has been held and declared in the paragraphs just noted, and flow and emanate from, and give effect to, constitutional conclusions. All of these points will be explicated in the detailed reasons for the decision of the majority (i.e., the Short Order), which is the binding judgment of the Court.

4. Turning now to the specific clarification purportedly sought, the PTI in its reply has annexed a number of notices issued by the Commission to the PTI through Barrister Gohar Ali Khan, in which it has itself identified the latter as the Chairman of PTI. Furthermore, the certifications required to be issued by a political party (here the PTI) and filed with the Commission in terms of paragraphs 8 and 10 of the Short Order have, as per the record placed before us in relation to the returned candidates (now respectively MNAs and MPAs) in the National and the Sindh, Punjab and Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Provincial Assemblies, been issued under the signatures of Barrister Gohar Ali Khan and Mr. Omar Ayub Khan, who are identified therein as being, respectively, the Chairman and Secretary General of the PTI. These certifications are dated 18.07.2024, 24.07.2024 and 25.07.2024 and list, in each case, the particulars of the relevant returned candidate (now MNA or MPA as the case may be) and in particular the dates on which the declaration required of the candidate (again, in terms of paragraphs 8 and 10 of the Short Order) was filed with the Commission. These dates obviously all precede the respective dates of certification.

5. Putting together the record placed before us, and considering the same in the light of the Short Order, leaves in little doubt that the clarification sought by the Commission in terms of the C.M.A. 7540/2024 is nothing more than a contrived device and the adoption of dilatory tactics, adopted to delay, defeat and obstruct implementation of the decision of the Court. This cannot be countenanced. Even on the application of elementary principles of law, the application filed by the Commission is misconceived. Having itself recognized Barrister Gohar Ali Khan as the Chairman of PTI, the Commission cannot now turn around and purport to seek guidance from the Court with regard to how the certifications are to be dealt with. The Commission cannot approbate and reprobate, taking whatever (shifting) stance as it desires and as may seem to suit its immediate purposes for the moment. Furthermore, the Commission, even if one were to consider the application in the most sympathetic light, has apparently forgotten the well known de facto doctrine or rule, in terms of which the acts of a person who holds an office are protected even if there may be (and no such conclusion is reached here in relation to the PTI) any issue with the position de jure. It sufficed and the Commission was duty bound in terms of the Constitution to keep in mind that the admitted position (as stated before the Court during the hearing of the appeals) is that the PTI was, and is, an enlisted political party. This position was not only accepted and relied upon by us (eight Judges) but also by our three learned colleagues in minority (Hon'ble the Chief Justice, Justice Yahya Afridi and Justice Jamal Khan Mandokhail). Their lordship appear to have also accepted the validity of the party certificates (party tickets) issued by Barrister Gohar Ali Khan and thus his capacity to act for PTI as its Chairman. Furthermore, having itself issued notices to the PTI through Barrister Gohar Ali Khan as its Chairman, the Commission gave recognition to both the party and the office holder. That sufficed absolutely for purposes of the Short Order. It would be completely illogical to assume that a political party, a juristic person, is fully functional yet there are no natural persons who are either de facto or de jure performing its functions or running its affairs. Saying (as the Commission now in effect does through CMA 7540/2024) that a political party is an enlisted political party, fully functional for the purposes of its formation, yet there is no one that can perform its functions and run its affairs, amounts to blowing hot and cold in the same breath or, as noted, approbating and reprobating one and the same fact. There could have been no conceivable doubt that the certifications referred to above were correct and valid in terms of the Short Order and the continued denial and refusal of the Commission to accept the same, as and when filed, is constitutionally and legally incorrect and may expose the Commission to such further or other action as may be warranted in terms of the Constitution and the law.

6. But there is another, and more fundamental, aspect that must also be alluded to. It was categorically declared in paragraph 8 of the Short Order that on filing the requisite statement and its confirmation by the political party concerned, the seat secured by such candidate shall be forthwith deemed to be a seat secured by that political party. Therefore, upon submission of the declarations and certifications referred to above, the position of the returned candidates (now respectively MNAs and MPAs) immediately and ipso facto stood determined and fixed as a matter of law as on those dates and no subsequent act can alter what became, on the respective dates, past and closed transactions. As per the position so determined, the said returned candidates were and are the returned candidates of PTI and thus members of the parliamentary party of PTI in the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies concerned, for all constitutional and legal purposes. The attempt by the Commission to confuse and cloud what is otherwise absolutely clear as a matter of the Constitution and the law must therefore be strongly deprecated. The list required to be issued by the Commission in terms of paragraph 8 (read with paragraph 10) of the Short Order is nothing more than a ministerial act, for the information and convenience of all concerned, and has no substantive effect. Nonetheless, the continued failure of, and refusal by, the Commission to perform this legally binding obligation may, as noted, have consequences. This obligation must be discharged forthwith.

7. With the above clarifications, the present application is disposed of. Office shall dispatch a copy of this order to the respective parties.

We may underline here that, as the Commission sought clarification of our short order dated 12 July 2024 in order to give effect to it, in terms of para 10 thereof, there was no legal requirement, nor did we find it necessary, to hear the parties before clarifying our own order on the point regarding which the Commission was unclear. Thus, we provided the above clarification without issuing notice to, or hearing, the parties on the Commission's application.

(iii) Do Articles 51(6)(d) & (e) and 106(3)(c) of the Constitution refer to political parties that have contested for and won general seats or to all enlisted political parties?

59. This question was much debated during the arguments presented by the learned counsel for the parties. It arises from their two rival contentions. The learned counsel for SIC contended that Articles 51(6) (d) & (e) and 106(3)(c) of the Constitution refer to all enlisted political parties that have "secured" general seats, either directly through their nominated candidates or through the joining of independent returned candidates. Conversely, the learned counsel for the Commission and other respondents argued that Articles 51(6) (d) & (e) and 106(3) (c) of the Constitution refer only to those political parties that have contested and won one or more general seats directly through their nominated candidates.

60. The provisions of Articles 51(6) (d) & (e) and 106(3) (c) of the Constitution are identical in their wording; the only difference is in their application. Article 51(6) (d) & (e) relates and applies to the seats reserved for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly, while Article 106(3)(c) relates and applies to such seats in the Provincial Assemblies. Therefore, we shall discuss and determine the meaning of the provisions of Article 51(6) (d) & (e), which shall also apply mutatis mutandis to Article 106(3) (c) of the Constitution. The provisions of Articles 51(6) (d) & (e), along with other relevant clauses of the same Article, are reproduced here for reading and reference:

51. (1) There shall be three hundred and thirty-six seats for members in the National Assembly, including seats reserved for women and non-Muslims.

(2) .....

(3) The seats in the National Assembly referred to in clause (1), except the seats mentioned in clause (4), shall be allocated to each Province and the Federal Capital as under: --

| | General Seats | Women Seats | Total Seats |
|---|---|---|---|
| Balochistan | 16 | 4 | 20 |
| Khyber Pakhtunkhwa | 45 | 10 | 55 |
| Punjab | 141 | 32 | 173 |
| Sindh | 61 | 14 | 75 |
| Federal Capital | 3 | - | 3 |
| Total | 266 | 60 | 326 |

(3A) .....

(4) In addition to the number of seats referred to in clause (3), there shall be, in the National Assembly, ten seats reserved for non-Muslims.

(5) .....

(6) For the purpose of election to the National Assembly, -

(a) .....

(b) each Province shall be a single constituency for all seats reserved for women which are allocated to the respective Provinces under clause (3);

(c) the constituency for all seats reserved for non-Muslims shall be the whole country;

(d) members to the seats reserved for women which are allocated to a Province under clause (3) shall be elected in accordance with law through proportional representation system of political parties' lists of candidates on the basis of total number of general seats secured by each political party from the Province concerned in the National Assembly:

Provided that for the purpose of this paragraph the total number of general seats won by a political party shall include the independent returned candidate or candidates who may duly join such political party within three days of the publication in the official Gazette of the names of the returned candidates; and

(e) members to the seats reserved for non-Muslims shall be elected in accordance with law through proportional representation system of political parties' lists of candidates on the basis of total number of general seats won by each political party in the National Assembly:

Provided that for the purpose of this paragraph the total number of general seats won by a political party shall include the independent returned candidate or candidates who may duly join such political party within three days of the publication in the official Gazette of the names of the returned candidates.

A plain, literal reading of the above provisions of Article 51 of the Constitution shows that there are three hundred and thirty-six (336) seats for members in the National Assembly, including sixty (60) seats reserved for women and ten (10) for non-Muslims. Each Province is a single and separate constituency for all seats reserved for women allocated to that Province in the National Assembly, while the constituency for all seats reserved for non-Muslims is the whole country. Members for both the seats reserved for women and non-Muslims are elected in accordance with the law through a proportional representation system of political parties from the lists of their candidates. However, because of the said difference in constituencies, members to the seats reserved for women are elected on the basis of the total number of general seats secured by each political party in the National Assembly from the Province concerned, while members to the seats reserved for non-Muslims are elected on the basis of the total number of general seats won by each political party in the whole National Assembly irrespective of the Province from which it wins such general seats. The total number of general seats won by a political party, for the purpose of determining its share in the proportional representation system, includes independent returned candidate(s) who may duly join such political party within three days of the publication of the names of the returned candidates in the official Gazette.

61. In support of his contention, the learned counsel for SIC argued that the proviso to Article 51(6) (d), which allows independent returned candidates to join a political party, makes it possible for a political party that has not contested and won any general seats directly through its nominated candidates to "secure" some general seats from the Province concerned through the joining of independent returned candidates. He emphasised the use of the word "secured" in Article 51(6) (d) rather than the word "won".

62. We have observed that the main provisions of paragraph (e) of Article 51(6) and the proviso thereof, which pertains to seats reserved for non-Muslims, both use the word "won" instead of "secured". This paragraph is to be interpreted in conjunction with paragraph (d) of Article 51(6), which relates to seats reserved for women, as no argument was presented to us from any of the learned counsel for the parties suggesting that paragraph (e) should be interpreted differently from paragraph (d). Nor do we find any reason or logic to interpret them differently. The only difference between them, as noted above, is with regard to the constituencies: for the election of members to seats reserved for women, each Province is a single and separate constituency, while for the election of members to seats reserved for non-Muslims, the whole country is the constituency. Furthermore, the term "won" is used in the provisos to both paragraphs (d) and (e) of Article 51(6). Considering both these closely related provisions conjunctively and harmoniously, we find that the words "secured" and "won" have been used interchangeably. Thus, nothing turns on the use of the word "secured" in paragraph (d) of Article 51(6).

Presumption that same words used in a statute carry same meaning and different words different meanings, is not absolute.

63. Although it is reasonable to presume that the same meaning is implied by the use of the same word in every part of a statute or a section thereof and that a change of word denotes a change in meaning, the presumption is neither absolute nor determinative in all cases. The context takes precedence over this presumption in ascertaining the meaning of words used in a statute, as even the statutory definitions of the words and expressions are subject to this consideration. Therefore, it is quite possible that the same word may be used in different meanings in a statute or in a section of the statute, or, conversely, different words may be used for the same meaning. The causes for this may be various, as pointed out by Maxwell and Bennion, including that the statute is a consolidating enactment where the words are derived from two or more earlier enactments, or the statute is compiled from different sources, or the statute is the product of many minds jointly, or the statute undergoes alterations and additions from various hands in the process of its enactment in the Legislature, etc.[48] Words "secured" and "won" carry the same meaning in paragraph (d) of Article 51(6) and have been used interchangeably in its main provisions and proviso.

64. We find that a similar circumstance might have caused the use of different words in the main provisions of Article 51(6) (d) and the proviso thereto for the same meaning-the word "secured" in the main provisions of paragraph (d) of Article 51(6) and the word "won" in the proviso thereto-either because both have been compiled from different sources or because different minds produced each of them. The legislative intention to mean "won" by both expressions is explicitly evident from the use of the word "won" both in the main provisions of the closely related paragraph (e) of Article 51(6) as well as in the proviso thereto. Even the drafter of the proviso to paragraph (d) of Article 51(6) appears to have assumed that the word "won" had been used in the main provisions, as he referred to them as such in the proviso. Therefore, it can be concluded with reasonable certainty that the words "secured" and "won" carry the same meaning in paragraph (d) of Article 51(6) and have been used interchangeably in its main provisions and proviso.

65. Once we have concluded that the words "secured" and "won" carry the same meaning in paragraph (d) of Article 51(6) and have been used interchangeably in its main provisions and proviso, the word "won" being specific and clearer than the word "secured" must be our guide in construing the provisions of the said Article. Because when a statute, or any other instrument, uses two different words for the same meaning and any ambiguity arises as to the meaning of one of those words, the word which is specific and clearer should guide the interpretation of the general and obscure word, not vice versa. So read, the main provisions of paragraph (d) of Article 51(6) clearly refer to political parties that have "won" general seats in the National Assembly from the Province concerned. The consequential point, which hardly requires extensive supporting arguments, emerges inevitably that political parties win general seats by contesting for such seats through their nominated candidates.

66. Learned counsel for SIC did not dispute that political parties win general seats by contesting for such seats through their nominated candidates. His argument was that the proviso equates a political party that secures general seats by the joining of independent returned candidates with one that wins such seats directly through its nominated candidates as mentioned in the main provisions of paragraph (d) of Article 51(d). We are not impressed by this argument as it misconceives the subject and object of the proviso.

The subject and object of the proviso to Article 51(6)(d)

67. The subject and focus of the proviso, as we understand it, is on the "general seats" i.e., "general seats won (secured) by a political party", and not on the political party winning (securing) such seats. Its object is to prescribe how the "total number of general seats won (secured) by a political party" is to be determined for the purpose of the paragraph, not to define or explain political parties for the purpose of the paragraph. Had the proviso stated that, for the purpose of this paragraph, the political party winning general seats shall include a political party securing general seats by the joining of independent returned candidates, the argument would have had some weight. But the language of the proviso is not to this effect. The proviso does not in any way extend or explain the meaning of the expression "political party" as used in the main provisions of the paragraph.

The proviso to Article 51(6)(d) is not a true proviso

68. A true proviso, as is well established, serves as an exception to the main provisions to which it is added. It excepts a particular case from the rule stated in the main provisions by limiting or qualifying the applicability of the main provisions. Its effect is generally described as being that, but for the proviso, the main provisions would have included the subject matter of the proviso.[49] However, since it is not the form but the substance that matters, the clear language of both the main provisions and the proviso may establish, as held by this Court in Hamdard Dawakhana,[50] that the proviso is not a limiting or qualifying clause of the main provisions but is, in itself, a substantive provision. Therefore, the best principle is that irrespective of the label, the contents of the main provisions and the proviso are to be read and construed together to ascertain the intention of the Legislature.

69. For determining the true character of the proviso presently under consideration, we find the Privy Council's case of Atwill[51] very enlightening. In that case, their Lordships of the Privy Council overturned the decision of the High Court of Australia, which had treated the proviso in its classic meaning, i.e., limiting or qualifying what precedes it. Their Lordships of the Privy Council did not agree and remarked:

While in many cases that is the function of a proviso, it is the substance and content of the enactment, not its form, which has to be considered, and that which is expressed to be a proviso may itself add to and not merely limit or qualify that which precedes it.

In a strict sense the use of the words "Provided that" in section 102(a) may also be disregarded as inapt. The meaning of that provision and the proviso would be the same if instead of the words "Provided that" there had appeared the word "and" ... and to ascertain the true effect of the provision, the second part, that is to say, the proviso, is complementary and necessary in order to ascertain the full intention of the Legislature.

To strengthen their opinion, their Lordships cited the following observation of Lord Loreburn, L.C., made in the case of Taff Vale Railway Company:[52]

But it is also true that the latter half of it, though in form a proviso, is in substance a fresh enactment, adding to and not merely qualifying that which goes before.

Their Lordships also cited extensively similar observations made by Viscount Maugham and Lord Wright in the case of Jennings,[53] on determining the true meaning of a proviso.

70. We find that the observations made by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Atwill fully apply to the proviso presently under consideration. In our opinion, the meaning of the main provisions of paragraph (d) of Article 51(6) and the proviso thereto would be the same if instead of the words "Provided that", there had appeared the word "and". In our considered opinion, to determine the true effect of the main provisions as per the intention of the Legislature, the second part, i.e., the proviso, is to be read as complementary to, not limiting or qualifying, the first part, i.e., the main provisions. This approach is also consistent with the principle stated above that irrespective of the label, the contents of the main provisions and the proviso are to be read and construed together to ascertain the intention of the Legislature.

71. We have determined above that the main provisions of para-graph (d) of Article 51(6) refer to political parties that have won general seats in the National Assembly from the Province concerned through their nominated candidates. The proviso stipulates that for the purpose of this paragraph, the total number of general seats won by a political party shall include any independent returned candidate or candidates who may duly join such political party. Without the proviso, the general seats won by independent returned candidates could not be considered as seats won by a political party. Therefore, the proviso, in the words of Lord Loreburn, 'is in substance a fresh enactment, adding to and not merely [limiting or] qualifying that which goes before' in the main provisions. Since the proviso does not except anything from the main provisions of paragraph (d) of Article 51(6) by limiting or qualifying them but rather adds to them, it is not a true proviso but a substantive provision that enacts a matter which would not otherwise have been covered by the main provisions of the paragraph.

72. However, the latter part of the proviso is, in the true sense, a proviso as it qualifies that which goes before, i.e., including the seats of independent returned candidates in the seats won by the political party to which they join, for the purpose of the paragraph. According to this part, for the joining to have the stipulated effect, it must occur within three days of the publication of the names of the returned candidates in the official Gazette. It thus excludes any joining of independent returned candidates made beyond that period from having effect for the purpose of the paragraph.

The effect of the use of the word "such" with "political party" in the latter part of the proviso

73. It is also a general rule of literal construction of statutes that 'a qualifying or relative word, phrase, or clause, such as "which", "said" and "such", is to be construed as applying to the word, phrase or clause next preceding, or as is frequently stated, to the next preceding antecedent, and not as extending to or including others more remote, unless a contrary intention appears.'[54]

74. The latter part of the proviso uses the qualifying term "such political party", to which the independent returned candidate or candidates may duly join. When we apply the above general rule to this qualifying term, it becomes evident that it refers to the term "a political party" next preceding, where the noun "political party" has been used to denote a political party that has won general seats. It thus inevitably follows that for the purpose of paragraph (d) of Article 51(6) and within the scope of the proviso, the independent returned candidate or candidates may duly join, or be allowed to join, only such a political party that has won one or more general seats through its nominated candidates in the National Assembly from the Province concerned.

Harmonious reading of Article 51(6(d) with Article 63A(2)

75. A constitution, as defined by Cooley, is 'the fundamental law of a state, containing the principles upon which the government is founded, regulating the division of the sovereign powers, and directing to what persons each of these powers is to be confined, and the manner in which it is to be exercised.'[55] Therefore, it is a fundamental principle of constitutional construction, well entrenched in our constitutional jurisprudence, that a constitution must be construed as an organic whole, harmonising its various parts, particularly those closely interlinked, and trying to give due effect to all of them, so as to make it an effective and efficacious instrument for the smooth and good governance of the state-one of the ultimate objectives sought to be achieved by it.[56]

76. In view of this principle of constitutional construction, the learned Attorney-General for Pakistan drew our attention to the provisions of clause (2) of Article 63A, which defines a member of a Parliamentary Party and also sheds light on how a political party constitutes a Parliamentary Party. Relying upon these provisions of Article 63A, he argued that only a political party whose nominated candidates become members of a House constitutes a Parliamentary Party. Therefore, he contended, the same meaning ought to be given to the expression 'political party' in clause (d) of Article 51(6), to harmonise both provisions with each other.

77. We have given anxious consideration to his contention and found it very persuasive and harmonious with the view which we are inclined to take on the meaning of the term "political party" used in Article 51(6)(d). The provisions of clause (2) of Article 63A are reproduced here for ready reference:

(2) A member of a House shall be deemed to be a member of a Parliamentary Party if he, having been elected as a candidate or nominee of a political party which constitutes the Parliamentary Party in the House or, having been elected otherwise than as a candidate or nominee of a political party, has become a member of such Parliamentary Party after such election by means of a declaration in writing.

A bare reading of the above provisions shows that a member of a House becomes a member of a Parliamentary Party in two cases: (i) if he has been elected as a candidate or nominee of a political party which constitutes the Parliamentary Party, he automatically becomes a member of such Parliamentary Party, or (ii) if he, having been elected as an independent candidate (i.e., otherwise than as a candidate or nominee of a political party), joins such Parliamentary Party by means of a declaration in writing.

78. The qualifying term "such Parliamentary Party", as discussed above, refers to the term "Parliamentary Party" next preceding, where the noun "Parliamentary Party" has been used to denote a political party whose candidate or nominee has been elected as a member of a House. It is thus evident that in the first case, one action of becoming a member of a House as a candidate or nominee of a political party produces two results: (i) it makes a political party, whose candidate or nominee is elected as a member of a House, a Parliamentary Party, and (ii) it makes that member of a House, a member of such Parliamentary Party. A member of a House elected as an independent candidate can become a member of a Parliamentary Party by joining only such a political party that constitutes a Parliamentary Party, not a political party that does not constitute a Parliamentary Party. Notwithstanding joining a political party of latter type, a member of a House shall not become a member of a Parliamentary Party and shall remain an independent member of a House for the purpose of all parliamentary proceedings.

Answer to question (iii) and its applicability to SIC and PTI

79. Thus, both the standalone reading of the provisions of Articles 51(6) (d) and (e), as well as their conjunctive and harmonious reading with the provisions of Article 63A(2), lead to one and only irresistible conclusion in terms of which this question is answered: Article 51(6) (d) of the Constitution refers to political parties that have contested for and won one or more general seats in the National Assembly from the Province concerned, not to all enlisted political parties. Similarly, Article 51(6) (e) of the Constitution refers to political parties that have contested for and won one or more general seats in the National Assembly from the whole country, i.e., from any of the Provinces or the Federal Capital.

80. Since SIC has not contested for and won one or more general seats in the National Assembly from the Provinces concerned or from anywhere in the country, it is not such a political party to which any of the independent returned candidates can join, for the purposes of paragraphs (d) and (e) of Article 51(6) of the Constitution. Therefore, the act of joining it by some returned candidates has not produced any result, and the legal status of such returned candidates remains the same as it was before such an act. As SIC has not won general seats, it is not entitled to allocation of the disputed reserved seats. However, as shall be mentioned later in detail, it has been determined by eleven members of the Bench with varying figures that PTI has contested for and won some general seats in the National Assembly from the Provinces concerned, and it is a political party entitled to allocation of the disputed reserved seats under paragraphs (d) and (e) of Article 51(6) of the Constitution.

(iv) How is the proportional representation of a political party to be calculated for the allocation of reserved seats under Articles 51(6)(d) & (e) and 106(3)(c) of the Constitution?

81. This was perhaps the most debated and, if we may say so, the most challenging question involved in the case. Because of the illegal mentioning of contesting candidates of a political party (PTI) in the list of contesting candidates (Form-33) and its returned candidates as independent returned candidates in the Section-98 Notification, as held above, an unusual situation has arisen in a parliamentary democracy. This situation seemingly pits one of the fundamental principles of democracy-that the voice of the electorate should be truly reflected in the composition of the legislative bodies-against the constitutional objective of ensuring adequate representation of women and minorities (non-Muslims) in such bodies.[57] However, with the answers provided to questions (i), (ii) and (iii) above, it has become evident that this conflict does not actually arise.

Position of political parties and independent members of Parliament in a parliamentary democracy

82. Our Constitution, as held by this Court in Benazir Bhutto,[58] establishes a parliamentary democracy with a cabinet form of government, which is primarily composed of the representatives of the political party in majority. Therefore, the cabinet form of government is essentially a government of the political party in majority, or of political parties in the case of a coalition government. The political party or parties that form the Government are the connecting link between the Government (Executive) and the people, and between the Parliament (Legislature) and the people. They are the effective instrumentalities by which the will of the people is made vocal, and the enactment of laws and the governance of the country in accordance therewith made possible. Political parties form the bedrock of representation in a parliamentary democracy and are fundamental, constitutive components of representation, not mere accessories.[59]

83. In the usual course of a parliamentary democracy, competing political parties, advocating for different manifestos, make the parliamentary election meaningful by giving voters a choice. They convert the results of a parliamentary election into a government The party or parties in the majority form the Government, while the party or parties in the minority serve as a fervent opposition. The opposition criticises the policies and actions of the Government and thus calls the Government to justify its policies and actions, thereby making it accountable to the people. Therefore, political parties are institutions of great importance in a parliamentary democracy and a vital feature of a representative government.[60]

84. On the other hand, persons elected as members of a House of Parliament (Legislature) in their personal capacities, as independent candidates, in the words of Nasim Hassan Shah, J., 'just toss around on the political scene, rudderless and without a destination'.[61] It is only when they join a political party that they become a force capable of exercising some influence through their activities for the welfare of the constituencies and the public they represent in Parliament. They, as members of a political party, and not as independent members of Parliament, can best achieve the objective of effectively representing their constituencies in Parliament---whether in legislative business and forming executive policies or taking executive actions if they become part of a party in government, or by holding the Government accountable for its policies and actions if they are part of a party in opposition.

85. The above position of political parties and that of the independent members of Parliament in a parliamentary democracy, such as ours, guides our understanding of the procedure prescribed for the allocation of the reserved seats.

86. As evident from the above-cited provisions of Article 51 of the Constitution, clause (3) thereof allocates the specific number of seats reserved for women to each Province and clause (6) (d) provides the procedure for electing the members to those seats. A joint reading of both clauses makes it clear that the members to all the reserved seats allocated to a Province under clause (3) are to be elected under clause (6) (d) of Article 51 as per the proportional representation system of political parties from the lists of their candidates on the basis of total number of general seats won by each political party, and no reserved seat shall ordinarily remain vacant. Although the arguments before us presented divergent contentions on the meaning of the expression "political party" used in clause (6)(d), none disputed the proposition that only political parties, not independent returned candidates, are entitled to the allocation of the reserved seats. Independent returned candidates can only be counted towards the proportional representation if they act in accordance with the proviso and join a political party, in which case their seats shall be counted as the seats of the political parties to which they join for the purpose of determining the proportional representation of political parties.

Proportional representation system of political parties is a composite expression

87. A composite expression, as Bennion writes,[62] must be construed as a whole. While a certain meaning can be collected by taking each word in turn and then combining their several meanings, but it does not follow that this is the true meaning of the whole phrase. Each word in the phrase may modify the meaning of the others, giving the whole its own meaning. It, therefore, certainly is not a satisfactory method of arriving at the meaning of a compound phrase to sever it into several parts, as observed by Lord Halsbury,[63] and to construe it by the separate meaning of each of such parts when severed. The intention of the Legislature is to be discovered by taking the words as they occur---in the combination in which they are placed---not by breaking up a compound expression and weighing the words separately.[64] If a composite expression is comprehensive, it is unnecessary to determine the dividing line between different terms used in the expression.

88. The provisions of paragraph (d) of Article 51(6), when read in light of the above principles of interpreting a composite expression, remove the confusion that dwelled in the minds of some of us regarding the meaning and scope of the "proportional representation system" envisaged by that paragraph. The complete and composite expression used in the said paragraph is "proportional representation system of political parties". The expression "lists of candidates", annexed to it with an apostrophe, only provides the mechanism for electing members to the reserved seats from the lists of candidates of the political parties. So read, the provisions of paragraph (d) of Article 51(6) become consistent with the above-stated legal position that the members to all the reserved seats allocated to a Province under clause (3) are to be elected under clause (6) (d) of Article 51 as per the proportional representation system of political parties from the lists of their candidates on the basis of total number of general seats won by each political party, ensuring that no reserved seat ordinarily remains vacant.

Constitutional objective of providing seats reserved for women and non-Muslims

89. The Principles of Policy provided in Chapter 2 of Part II of the Constitution, often referred to as the conscience of the Constitution,[65] require that steps be taken to ensure the full participation of women in all spheres of national life and to safeguard the legitimate rights and interests of minorities (non-Muslims), including their due representation in the Federal and Provincial services.[66] To actualise this constitutional objective, a certain number of seats have been reserved in the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies for women and non-Muslims (minorities). This constitutional affirmative action aims to promote gender and minority-inclusive representation in the legislative bodies, allowing for the voices of various segments of society to be heard and considered in the law-making process. It ensures that the legislative bodies reflect the diverse perspectives and interests of the population.

90. The principle of proportional representation of political parties, according to which the members to the reserved seats are elected, aims to reflect the electoral support for political parties in the composition of the legislative bodies. By distributing the reserved seats among political parties based on the general seats won by them, the legislative bodies remain representative of the electorate's choice. Adopting an interpretation of paragraphs (d) and (e) of Article 51(6) that would result in holding certain reserved seats vacant would lead to a form of disenfranchisement, where the electorate's mandate is not fully realised in terms of gender and minority representation, and thus frustrate the constitutional objective of providing for such reserved seats.

91. Rule 95(2) of the Elections Rules, which provides that the seats won by independent candidates, other than those who join a political party, shall be excluded for the purpose of determining the share of each political party, is thus found consistent with the constitutional provisions, as it ensures the constitutional objective that no reserved seat should ordinarily remain vacant.

Answer to question (iv), and its applicability to PTI and other political parties

92. In view of the above, question (iv) is answered as follows: for the purpose of allocating reserved seats under Articles 51(6) (d) & (e), the proportional representation of political parties is to be calculated on the basis of total number of general seats won by each political party, including the seats of independent returned candidates who join it, but excluding the seats of other independent returned candidates. The Commission is to calculate the share of proportional representation of PTI and other political parties in the reserved seats accordingly.

Denial of due share of proportional representation in the reserved seats violates the fundamental rights of the political party and the electorate guaranteed by Articles 17(2) and 19 of the Constitution.

93. Before parting with this part of the judgment, we want to underline that the aforementioned principle of holistic and harmonious reading of closely interlinked provisions of the Constitution requires that the provisions of paragraphs (d) and (e) of Article 51 are to be read not only in conjunction with Article 63A(2) but also with Article 17(2) of the Constitution, which is also closely related thereto. As aforementioned, this Court has held in the cases of Benazir Bhutto and Nawaz Sharif that the right to form a political party guaranteed by Article 17(2) includes the right to participate in and contest elections as a political party, and the right to form the Government and complete the prescribed tenure if the members of the political party constitute the requisite majority. We find that the right to so many of the reserved seats that are proportionate to the general seats won by a political party is also an integral part of the right to form a political party, as this right also gives the "life and substance" to the said named fundamental right. Therefore, denial of the right to reserved seats proportionate to the general seats won by it would violate the fundamental rights of a political party guaranteed by Article 17(2) as well as the fundamental right to vote of the electorate that have voted for such political party guaranteed by Article 19 of the Constitution.

What relief would serve the ends of justice?

94. Having thus answered the questions of law, we shall now examine what relief would serve the ends of justice in the peculiar facts and circumstances of this case. When we speak of justice, we have the intuitive sense of putting things aright and in their appropriate place, of re-establishing a lost harmony and equilibrium, of remaining true to the nature of things, of giving each his due.[67] In this regard, we are also guided by the following golden words of Kaikaus, J., written in Imtiaz Ahmad:[68]

Any [justice] system, which by giving effect to the form and not to the substance defeats substantive rights, is defective to that extent. The ideal must always be a [justice] system that gives to every person what is his.

His lordship further observed:

I am unable to place the mistakes committed by the Administration [public functionaries] on the same footing as mere accidents. The difference is that in one case the harm caused to a party being the result of a mistake committed by the Administration there is an obligation on our part to undo it as far as that is possible. ... In relation to Courts there is a well-known saying that the act of Court will not prejudice anybody. I do not see why the principle of this maxim does not apply to the whole machinery of the Administration [public functionaries] of which the Courts are only a part. No mistake committed by this machinery should prejudice any person as far as that can be helped. If the mistake of the election authorities is like a misfortune why are elections set aside on the ground of irregularities committed by the officers who conduct the elections? Why does not the law regard these irregularities like events, which have happened and cannot be helped? It cannot be the intention of the law that rights of persons should be affected by the mistakes committed by public officers. ... We must put the parties in the same position, as they would have been if no mistake had been committed by the administration as long as we can do that.

The above principle of law, though enunciated by his Lordship in a dissenting judgment, has appealed "to the brooding spirit of the law, to the intelligence of a future day" and has now become well established and well entrenched in our jurisprudence.[69]

95. We find that the said principle is not only premised on two maxims: (i) actus curiae neminem gravabit (an act of court [public functionary] shall prejudice no one) and (ii) ex debito justitiae (as a debt of justice), but are also rooted in the constitutional provisions of Article 4 of the Constitution. Under Article 4, it is an inalienable right of every citizen, and of every other person for the time being within Pakistan, to enjoy the protection of law and to be treated in accordance with law. This constitutional inalienable right casts a corresponding constitutional inalienable duty on all public functionaries of Pakistan to treat every citizen and every other person for the time being within Pakistan in accordance with law. From this constitutional right and the corresponding constitutional obligation, the principle emerges, in our opinion, that no person should be made to suffer or be prejudiced by an unlawful act or omission of public functionaries. If any person suffers the loss of any right or benefit because of an unlawful act or omission of a public functionary, he is entitled, by reason of an obligation of justice, to be restored to that right or benefit and put in the same position, insofar as is possible, as he would have been if such unlawful act or omission had not been made by the public functionary.

Unlawful acts and omissions of the Returning Officers and the Commission that caused prejudice to PTI

96. In the present case, as discussed and determined above, the unlawful acts and omissions of the Returning Officers and the Commission, which have caused confusion and prejudice to PTI, its candidates and the electorate who voted for PTI, are numerous and include the following:

(i) the wrong omission to clarify in its order dated 22 December 2023 by the Commission that PTI is an enlisted and functioning political party notwithstanding the rejection of its intra-party elections and non-allocation an election symbol;

(ii) the wrong omission to clarify in its order dated 13 January 2024 by the Commission that PTI is an enlisted and functioning political party notwithstanding that it has not been allocated an election symbol, and that the candidates nominated by it are to be treated and mentioned as PTI candidates, not as independent candidates in the whole election process;

(ii)(sic) the wrong mentioning of the status of PTI candidates by the Returning Officers as independent candidates in the list of contesting candidates (Form-33);

(iii) the wrong decision on the application of a PTI candidate (Mr. Raja) by the Commission in rejecting his claim to be mentioned as a PTI candidate in the list of contesting candidates (Form-33);

(iv) the wrong mentioning of PTI returned candidates by the Commission as independent returned candidates in the Section 98 Notification; and

(v) the wrong acceptance of the joining of some returned candidates to SIC by the Commission, despite that it was not such a political party to which an independent returned candidate could join under the proviso to paragraphs (d) & (e) of Article 51(6) and paragraph (c) of Article 106(3), or under clause (2) of Article 63A of the Constitution.

In addition to the above, the making of an unconstitutional rule, i.e., the Explanation to Rule 94 of the Elections Rules, by the Commission which disentitles a political party to which an election symbol is not allotted from the allocation of reserved seats despite its winning the general seats, also contributed to causing confusion and prejudice to PTI, its candidates and the electorate. Further, it is observed with respect, the decision by this Court on 13 January 2024 in the matter of intra-party elections of PTI on the very day that was fixed for submission of party certificates (party tickets) and allotment of the election symbols as per the Election Programme, and that too without clarifying that the said decision did not affect the electoral status of PTI and its candidates, also contributed in causing confusing and prejudice to PTI, its candidates and the electorate.

The scope of powers of the Commission under Article 218(3) and of the Supreme Court under Article 187(1) of the Constitution.

97. In view of the principle stated above, PTI, its candidates and the electorate should not be made to suffer or be prejudiced by the unlawful acts or omissions of public functionaries, namely the Returning Officers and the Commission. Given that they have been deprived of their constitutional right to proportional representation in the reserved seats due to these unlawful acts and omissions, they are entitled, by virtue of an obligation of justice (ex debito justitiae), to be restored to that right and placed, insofar as possible, in the same position they would have been if such unlawful acts and omissions had not occurred. However, there is no specific provision in the Constitution or the Elections Act to address this situation and rectify the wrong.

98. Since the Legislature, while enacting a law on a subject, cannot foresee and cover all unforeseen matters or issues that may arise in the administration of such law in practice, it often enacts a provision that confers upon a specified authority the general power to address such unforeseen matters or issues. In the Elections Act, such a general power is conferred upon the Commission by Sections 4 and 8(c).[70]

These statutory general powers are conferred upon the Commission, in addition to the similar constitutional general power vested in it under Article 218(3)[71] of the Constitution. Both these statutory and constitutional general powers are to be invoked and exercised by the Commission, as held by this Court in Zulfiqar Bhatti,[72] when there is no specific provision of law on the matter or issue that needs to be addressed.

99. Similar is the scope of the constitutional general power of the Supreme Court under Article 187(1)[73] of the Constitution: it is to be invoked and exercised by the Court to do complete justice in any case when there is no specific provision of law that covers or addresses the matter or issue involved.[74] While exercising such general powers, the Commission or the Court must, however, make an endeavour to adhere to the spirit and substance of the provisions of law that, although not covering the matter or issue, are closely related to it, so that the legislative intent may be given effect to the maximum extent possible.

100. In order to invoke and exercise the general power vested in this Court under Article 187(1) of the Constitution to address the matter involved in the present case, we have also been guided by the observations made by a six-member larger Bench of this Court in Saddaqat Khan.[75] After a detailed analysis of several previous cases, the larger Bench reached and announced the following conclusion:

The ultimate goal sought to be achieved by the courts was thus to do complete justice between the parties and to ensure that the rights were delivered to those to whom they belonged and no hurdles were ever considered strong enough to detract the Courts from reaching the said end. Incorporation of provisions such as section 151, C.P.C.; section 561-A in the Cr.P.C.; revisional powers of wide amplitude exercisable even suo-motu under section 115 of the C.P.C. and section 439 of the Cr.P.C.; various provisions of the like contained in Order XLI, rule 4 and Order XLI, rule 33 of the C.P.C.; the provisions of Order XXXIII, rule 5 of the Supreme Court Rules of 1980; suo motu powers exercisable under Article 184(3) of the Constitution and provisions of Article 187 of the Constitution, are some of the examples which could be quoted as having been made available to the Courts at all levels to surmount any impediments which a Court might confront in the path of doing complete justice.

The ultimate objective sought to be achieved by laws, the courts and the justice system, as observed by Kaikaus, J., and as declared by the larger Bench, is to dispense justice by ensuring that rights are delivered to those to whom they belong; let justice be done, though the heavens fall (fiat justitia, ruat caelum). Thus, the power under Article 187(1) of the Constitution is focused on achieving and prioritizing fairness to ensure complete justice in any case.

Point of divergence between eight Judges and three Judges

101. Up to this point, in invoking and exercising the general power of this Court vested in Article 187(1) of the Constitution, we (the eight Judges) and the three Judges (Hon'ble the Chief Justice, Justice Yahya Afridi, and Justice Jamal Khan Mandokhail) were largely aligned. Unfortunately, from this point onward, despite several mutual discussions on various aspects of the matter, we could not reach a consensus on what ultimate relief would be "necessary for doing complete justice" in the present case.

102. We may underscore here what Chief Justice Dickson said about the working of the Supreme Court of Canada: "The people of Canada are not entitled to nine separate votes [of the nine Supreme Court Justices]. They are entitled to nine votes after each Justice has listened to and sincerely considered the views of the other eight."[76] Similarly, we believe, the people of Pakistan are entitled to a decision from a Bench of this Court after each Judge on the Bench has listened to and sincerely considered the views of the others. Judges need not always see eye to eye and may ultimately disagree, but the possibility of disagreement does not absolve them from engaging in a free and frank discussion before rendering their final opinion. Their professional responsibility to deliver a well-considered decision requires them to lay out both their own position and the defects they see in their colleagues' positions with utter frankness. Egos may be bruised, tempers tempted, yet all must pursue the process with respect and civility.

103. Guided by the above principle, we, in fulfilling our professional responsibility to deliver a well-considered decision on the matter involved in the present case, laid out both our own position and, with respect, the defects we saw in our colleagues' positions. We did listen to and sincerely consider their views as well. Unfortunately, neither could we convince them of our view, nor could we bring ourselves to agree with theirs.

104. We all (us eight and our three colleagues) agreed that due to unlawful acts and omissions of the Returning Officers and the Commission, PTI, its candidates and the electorate have suffered the loss of some of their constitutional and statutory rights, particularly their right to proportional representation in the reserved seats. However, we differed on how we could, by virtue of an obligation of justice (ex debito justitiae), restore them to that right and place them, insofar as possible, in the same position they would have been if such unlawful acts and omissions had not occurred.

105. Our learned colleagues (Hon'ble the Chief Justice and Justice Jamal Khan Mandokhail) have formed the opinion that "the candidates who had submitted their nomination papers declaring that they belonged to PTI and had not filed a document showing affiliation with another political party before the last date of withdrawal of the nomination papers, should have been treated[77]" as PTI returned candidates. Whereas our learned colleague (Justice Yahya Afridi) is of the view that "[a] candidate for a seat in the National Assembly or the Provincial Assembly, who in his/her nomination paper has declared on oath to belong to PTI and duly submitted a certificate of the same political party confirming that he/she is the nominated candidate of PTI for the respective constituency, shall remain so ,... unless he/she submitted a written declaration to the Election Commission of Pakistan or Returning Officer to be treated as the candidate of another political party or as an independent candidate[78]". We respect their opinions but disagree.

106. '[T]he logic of words should yield to the logic of realities'.[79] With great respect, our learned colleagues have assumed and accepted that PTI candidates filed declarations of their affiliation with another political party (PTI-Nazriati), which were not even accepted by the Returning Officers under the order of the Commission, by their own free will uninfluenced by any constraint of the circumstances. Our conscience and understanding of the realities of the case do not allow us to assume and accept this position. We are completely at a loss to understand the logic, other than the constraint of the circumstances, as to why a candidate of a national-level political party (PTI), which had once formed the Federal Government and two Provincial Governments, would supersede his candidature of that party (PTI) with a party (PTI-Nazriati) whose name had not even been heard by most of the electorate, or why he would leave the candidature of that party (PTI) and become an independent candidate, by his own free will. Had it been a case of one or two candidates, we might have imagined some plausibility of free will in their actions. However, we cannot assume by any stretch of the imagination that hundreds of candidates for the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies would act in such a manner by their own free will, not under the constraints of the circumstances created by the unlawful acts and omissions of the public functionaries---the Returning Officers and the Commission. Therefore, we have found that notwithstanding their subsequent filing of a declaration to be treated as candidates of PTI-Nazriati or as independent candidates, 39 returned candidates, out of the list of 80 submitted by the Commission, who had either filed party certificates (party tickets) of PTI or declared their affiliation with PTI in their nomination forms or statutory declarations/ affidavits, are the returned candidates of PTI.

107. Similar is the position of those candidates whom our learned colleagues have treated as independent returned candidates because they had not mentioned themselves as belonging to PTI in their nomination papers. In respect of these candidates, who are 41 according to the record produced by the Commission, our learned colleagues have presumed that they were independent candidates, and that none of them has appeared before the Court to rebut that presumption.

108. We must say that we tried hard to understand how, in a parliamentary democracy based on a political parties system, as underlined by this Court in Benazir Bhutto, such a large number of candidates to the seats in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies could inspire and win the confidence of the electorate as independents. No satisfactory answer to this query was presented before us on behalf of the Commission and other respondents. The assertion of SIC and PTI that they were also PTI candidates and the electorate voted for them for their being PTI candidates though appears satisfactory but is not supported by the record presently before us. Therefore, it is the most challenging matter involved in the case where the scales of the requirements of law and of justice are to be justly, fairly and reasonably balanced.

109. We do not find any force in the argument that those returned candidates have not appeared before us to rebut the presumption accepted by our learned colleagues, because we find that they are before us speaking through SIC. What SIC says on facts is the version of those returned candidates---SIC speaks for them before us. Both SIC and PTI have narrated the same facts and circumstances that led to the mentioning of their status as independent candidates in the nomination papers. Both have claimed that they were also PTI candidates and that the electorate voted for them for being PTI candidates; they, in their individual capacities, did not have such voting support of the electorate.

110. As held above, while exercising their general powers under Article 218(3) and Article 187(1) of the Constitution respectively, the Commission and this Court must endeavour to adhere to the spirit and substance of the provisions of law that, although not explicitly covering the matter or issue, are closely related to it, so that the legislative intent may be given effect to the maximum extent possible. According to Section 66 of the Elections Act, two elements make a person the candidate of a political party: (i) the candidate's own declaration that he belongs to that party, and (ii) the party's certificate (party ticket) nominating him as its candidate. It is thus a matter between the candidate and the party to which he claims affiliation. No consent or authorisation from any third person or authority is required to establish their relationship and the candidate's status. This is the substance and spirit of Section 66 of the Elections Act.

111. Therefore, we find it more just, fair and reasonable that this fact should be verified and then acted upon by adhering to the substance and spirit of Section 66 of the Elections Act so that the legislative intent may be given effect to the maximum extent possible. Instead of deciding such an important matter, which essentially relates to the right and value of the votes of millions of voters, merely on assumptions, presumptions or oral statements, this fact should be determined with certain and concrete material: (i) the written statement (declaration) by the returned candidate concerned, and (ii) its written confirmation (certificate) by PTI. Upon submission of written statements by the returned candidates and written confirmations by PTI through its de facto or de jure Chairman, the status of the 41 returned candidates shall immediately and ipso facto stand determined as a matter of law, with no subsequent act altering what, upon submission of the statements and confirmations, will become a past and closed transaction. Neither the returned candidates nor PTI can later resile from this position. It is also emphasized that this verification process is solely to determine whether the said 41 returned candidates were indeed the returned candidates of PTI, and in no way does it amount to accepting them as independent returned candidates and granting them another opportunity to join a political party under the provisos to paragraphs (d) and (e) of Article 51(6) of the Constitution. Once their status is determined upon submission of the requisite statements and confirmations, they shall be deemed returned candidates of PTI from the date of the publication of their names as returned candidates in the official Gazette. Consequently, they will be considered members of the parliamentary party of PTI in the National Assembly from the date they took the oath of office as Members of the National Assembly (MNAs), for all constitutional and legal purposes.

112. As above held, the general power of the Commission under Article 218(3) of the Constitution read with Sections 4 and 8 of the Elections Act is similar to the general power of this Court under Article 187(1) of the Constitution. Therefore, in the present case the Commission should have, by the impugned order, in the words of Section 4(1), "issue[d] such directions or orders as may be necessary for the performance of its functions and duties, including an order for doing complete justice in any matter pending before it"; or, in the words of Section 8(c), "issue[d] such instructions, exercise[d] such powers and ma[d]e such consequential orders as may in its opinion, be necessary for ensuring that an election is conducted honestly, justly, fairly"; or, in the words of Article 218(3), "ma[d]e such arrangements as are necessary to ensure that the election is conducted honestly, justly, fairly". The Commission, however, again made an unlawful omission by failing to exercise its aforementioned general powers to undo the effects of its earlier unlawful acts and omissions and to restore PTI to its constitutional right as a Parliamentary Party and its entitlement to reserved seats proportionate to the won general seats, thereby placing PTI, insofar as possible, in the same position it would have been in if the said unlawful acts and omissions had not occurred. The previous unlawful acts and omissions, as well as the said unlawful omission, render the impugned order of the Commission ultra vires the Constitution, without lawful authority and of no legal effect.

The Commission has failed to perform its role as a "guarantor institution" of democratic processes

113. We find it important to emphasize that the Commission, as a constitutional "electoral management body", is not merely an administrative entity but a fundamental "guarantor institution" of democratic processes, with a constitutional status akin to a "fourth branch of government".[80] The Commission must therefore fully recognize its constitutional position and the critical role it plays in a democracy while performing its duty to conduct free and fair elections. As a central pillar of democratic electoral processes, the Commission, in its role as a guarantor institution and impartial steward, is tasked with ensuring the transparency and fairness of elections to maintain public trust in the electoral system. This is essential for the legitimacy of elected representatives and the stability of the political system. The Commission must uphold democratic principles and the integrity of electoral processes by ensuring that elections truly reflect the will of the people, thereby preserving the democratic fabric of the nation. Unfortunately, the circumstances of the present case indicate that the Commission has failed to fulfill this role in the General Elections of 2024.

114. Another matter that has surprised us during the proceedings of these appeals is the way the Commission participated in and contested the matter before us as a primary contesting party against SIC and PTI. We are cognizant that the Commission's prime function, under Article 218(3) of the Constitution, is to 'organize and conduct the election and to make such arrangements as are necessary to ensure that the election is conducted honestly, justly, fairly, and in accordance with law, and that corrupt practices are guarded against'. This function of the Commission, 'to organize and conduct the election', as held by this Court in Aam Log Itehad,[81] is primarily executive, not judicial or quasi-judicial. However, as found in the said case, the Commission also performs some quasi-judicial functions. In the present case, several political parties made counterclaims regarding their right to the disputed reserved seats, and the Commission decided these counterclaims as an adjudicatory body. The function performed by the Commission in the present case was, therefore, quasi-judicial. And, as held by this Court in Wafaqi Mohtasib[82] and A. Rahim Foods,[83] a body performing its quasi-judicial function in a matter between two rival parties cannot be treated as an aggrieved person if its decision is set aside or modified by a higher forum or by a court of competent jurisdiction. Such a body, therefore, does not have locus standi to challenge the decision of that higher forum or court. Nor, we may add, can such a body contest an appeal filed against its quasi-judicial decision by one of the rival parties as a primary contesting party. In the present case, the Commission was a proper party to assist the Court in effectually and completely adjudicating upon and settling all the questions involved in the case. It should have acted in this manner, not as a primary contesting party.

115. As for the impugned judgment of the Peshawar High Court, we know, as held by this Court in Dossani Travels,[84] that the ambit and scope of the power of the High Courts under Article 199 of the Constitution is not as wide as of the Supreme Court under Article 187 of the Constitution to issue such directions, orders or decrees as may be necessary for doing complete justice in any case or matter pending before it. Nor do the High Courts possess such general constitutional power which the Commission has under Article 218(3) to ensure that elections are conducted honestly, justly and fairly. Therefore, without PTI's petition, the High Court could not have passed an order like the one we have, or the one that the Commission could have passed, for doing complete justice and ensuring that the election is conducted honestly, justly and fairly. However, what the Peshawar High Court could have done, but failed to do, in the present case is to remand the matter to the Commission with a direction to do what the Commission was required to do under Article 218(3) of the Constitution, read with Sections 4 and 8 of the Elections Act.

116. So far as the proceedings in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies, wherein members elected on the disputed reserved seats under the impugned order of the Commission participated, are concerned, the same are protected under Articles 67 and 127 of the Constitution,[85] cannot be disputed in these collateral proceedings when no one has pointed out to us any proceedings of the National Assembly or Provincial Assemblies that could not have been successfully conducted if the members elected on the disputed reserved seats had not participated therein. Further, as held by this Court in Raja Amer,[86] acts done in accordance with the legal position prevailing at the time of their doing are generally protected under the doctrine of past and closed transactions. Therefore, to protect such acts and proceedings of the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies concerned, which could have been successfully conducted even if the members elected on the disputed reserved seats had not participated, the notifications of the Commission declaring such members as returned candidates on the disputed reserved seats are quashed with effect from 6 May 2024, the date on which this Court suspended the impugned order of the Commission.

117. Lastly, we want to say a few words to clarify that PTI, which has been granted relief in the present case, is before us with an application for its impleadment as a party to the case. In the normal course of procedure for civil cases, the application for impleadment is first decided and the applicant formally made a party to the case, before granting him any relief in the case. This case, as explained in the opening part of this judgment, is not an ordinary civil case but a lis of the highest order, where democracy---a salient feature of the Consti-tution---and the fundamental right of the people (the electorate) to choose their representatives for the legislative and executive organs of the State is to be preserved, protected and defended. The procedural formality of first accepting PTI's application and then granting it the relief does not carry much weight where the Court's concern is the protection of the right of vote of the people (the electorate) guaranteed under Articles 17(2) and 19 of the Constitution, more than the right of any political party-whether it be SIC or PTI or any other party. Indeed, more particularly for this kind of cases, where the rights of people are involved, not only of the parties before the Court, the words of Kaikaus, J., resound that 'the proper place of procedure in any system of administration of justice is to help and not thwart the grant to the several cases,[88] while doing complete justice in the exercise of its general power under Article 187(1) of the Constitution, this Court is not handicapped by any technicality or rule of practice or procedure, nor is the exercise of this power by the Court dependent on an application by a party.

118. So far as the application (C.M.A. 3554/2024) of Ms. Kanwal Shauzab, who claims to be a PTI candidate for the seats reserved for women in the National Assembly, is concerned, it also has little significance in the perspective we have approached and dealt with the present case. We may clarify that although we heard her counsel in the interest of justice, as important questions of interpretation of constitutional provisions were involved, she is not a necessary party to the case. We are of the considered view that a contesting candidate or a returned candidate to the seats reserved for women or non-Muslims is not a necessary party to a dispute where the matter to be decided is which political party and in what proportion is entitled to the reserved seats. The persons nominated by a political party for reserved seats or elected to such seats do not have a personal right to such seats. It is the right of the electorate guaranteed under Articles 17(2) and 19 of the Constitution, exercisable through political parties, to have proportional representation in the reserved seats, not of the person nominated for or elected to such seats.

Relief granted; short order reproduced

119. These are the detailed reasons for our short order dated 12 July 2024, which is reproduced here for completion of the record:

ORDER

Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, Munib Akhtar, Muhammad Ali Mazhar, Ayesha A. Malik, Athar Minallah, Syed Hasan Azhar Rizvi, Shahid Waheed and Irfan Saadat Khan, JJ.: For detailed reasons to be recorded later and subject to what is set out therein by way of amplification and/or explanation or otherwise, these appeals are decided in the following terms:

1. The impugned judgment dated 25.03.2024 of the learned Full Bench of the High Court is set aside to the extent it is or may be inconsistent with this Order or the detailed reasons.

2. The order of the Election Commission of Pakistan ("Commission") dated 01.03.2024 ("Impugned Order") is declared to be ultra vires the Constitution, without lawful authority and of no legal effect.

3. The notifications (of various dates) whereby the persons respectively mentioned therein (being the persons identified in the Commission's notification No.F.5(1)/2024-Cord. dated 13.05.2024) have been declared to be returned candidates for reserved seats for women and minorities in the National and Provincial Assemblies are declared to be ultra vires

the Constitution, without lawful authority and of no legal effect, and are quashed from 06.05.2024 onwards, being the date an interim order was made by the Court in CPLA Nos. 1328-9 of 2024, the leave petitions out of which the instant appeals arise.

4. It is declared that the lack or denial of an election symbol does not in any manner affect the constitutional and legal rights of a political party to participate in an election (whether general or bye) and to field candidates and the Commission is under a constitutional duty to act, and construe and apply all statutory provisions, accordingly.

5. It is declared that for the purposes, and within the meaning, of paragraphs (d) and (e) of clause (6) of Article 51 ("Article 51 Provisions") and paragraph (c) of clause (3) of Article 106 ("Article 106 Provisions") of the Constitution, the Pakistan Tehreek e Insaf ("PTI") was and is a political party, which secured or won (the two terms being interchangeable) general seats in the National and Provincial Assemblies in the General Elections of 2024 as herein after provided.

6. During the course of the hearing of the instant appeals, on 27.06.2024, learned counsel for the Commission placed before the Court a list ("the List") of 80 returned candidates for the National Assembly (now MNAs), setting out in tabular form particulars relating to their election. Learned counsel made a categorical statement that the Commission stood by the data so provided to the Court. In particular, the List contained three columns marked as follows: (i) "Statement (on nomination form) given in declaration and oath by the person nominated (i.e., 'I belong to')"; (ii) "Certificate of party affiliation under Section 66 of the Elections Act, 2017"; and (iii) "Statutory Declaration/affidavit accompanying section 66 certificate".

7. In the peculiar facts and circumstances of the General Election of 2024, it is declared that out of the aforesaid 80 returned candidates (now MNAs) those (being 39 in all and whose particulars are set out in Annex A to this Order) in respect of whom the Commission has shown "PTI" in any one of the aforesaid columns in the List, were and are the returned candidates whose seats were and have been secured by the PTI within the meaning, and for purposes of, para 5 above in relation to the Article 51 Provisions.

8. In the peculiar facts and circumstances of the General Election of 2024, it is further ordered that any of the remaining 41 returned candidates out of the aforesaid 80 (whose particulars are set out in Annex B to this Order) may, within 15 working days of this Order file a statement duly signed and notarized stating that he or she contested the General Election as a candidate of the political party specified therein. If any such statement(s) is/are filed, the Commission shall forthwith but in any case within 7 days thereafter give notice to the political party concerned to file, within 15 working days, a confirmation that the candidate contested the General Election as its candidate. A political party may in any case, at any time after the filing of a statement as aforesaid, of its own motion file its confirmation. If such a statement is filed, and is confirmed by the political party concerned, then the seat secured by such candidate shall be forthwith deemed to be a seat secured by that political party for the purposes of para 5 above in relation to the Article 51 Provisions. The Commission shall also forthwith issue, and post on its website, a list of the retuned candidates (now MNAs) and seats to which this para applies within 7 days after the last date on which a political party may file its confirmation and shall simultaneously file a compliance report in the Court.

9. For the purposes of para 5 of this Order in relation to the Article 51 Provisions, the number of general seats secured by PTI shall be the total of the seats declared in terms of para 7 and those, if any, to which para 8 applies. The PTI shall be entitled to reserved seats for women and minorities in the National Assembly accordingly. PTI shall, within 15 working days of this Order file its lists of candidates for the said reserved seats and the provisions of the Elections Act, 2017 ("Act") (including in particular section 104) and the Elections Rules, 2017 ("Rules") shall be applied to such lists in such manner as gives effect to this Order in full measure. The Commission shall, out of the reserved seats for women and minorities in the National Assembly to which para 3 of this Order applies, notify as elected in terms of the Article 51 Provisions, that number of candidates from the lists filed (or, as the case may be, to be filed) by the PTI as is proportionate to the general seats secured by it in terms of paras 7 and 8 of this Order.

10. The foregoing paras shall apply mutatis mutandis for purposes of the Article 106 Provisions in relation to PTI (as set out in para 5 herein above) for the reserved seats for women and minorities in the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, Punjab and Sindh Provincial Assemblies to which para 3 of this Order applies. In case the Commission or PTI need any clarification or order so as to give effect to this para in full measure, it shall forthwith apply to the Court by making an appropriate application, which shall be put up before the Judges constituting the majority in chambers for such orders and directions as may be deemed appropriate.

120. Before parting with the judgment, we feel constrained to observe, with a heavy heart, that our two learned colleagues in the minority (Justice Amin-ud-Din Khan and Justice Naeem Akhtar Afghan) have made certain observations in their dissenting judgment dated 3 August 2024, which do not behove Judges of the Supreme Court of Pakistan, the highest court of the land. After expressing their view that the order we passed on 12 July 2024 is not in accordance with the Constitution and that we ignored and disregarded its mandate, they observed that "[i]f the said 39 plus 41 persons take any step on the basis of this judgment which is not in accordance with the Constitution, they may lose their seats as returned candidates on the basis of violation of the Constitution",[90] and that "[a]ny order of the Court which is not in consonance with the constitutional provisions is not binding upon any other constitutional organ of the State."[91]

121. We take no issue with their having and expressing the view that, in their understanding, our order dated 12 July 2024 is not in accordance with the Constitution, as Members of a Bench of this Court, or any court, can legitimately differ on issues of fact and law. They may strongly express divergent opinions and make comments on each other's views, highlighting reasons why they believe other Members have erred. However, the manner in which they have expressed their disagreement falls short of the courtesy and restraint required of Judges of the Superior Courts. What is more disquieting is that, through the said observations, they appear to have gone beyond the parameters of propriety by warning the 39 plus 41 (80) returned candidates and urging the Commission not to comply with the majority order, which is the decision of a thirteen-member Full Court Bench of this Court. Such observations undermine the integrity of the highest institution of justice in the country and seem to constitute an attempt to obstruct the process of the Court and the administration of justice.

122. Considering the public importance of this judgment, the office is directed to ensure translation of this judgment into Urdu in order to enhance public access to its information, in accordance with Article 19A read with Article 251 of the Constitution. The Urdu version of the judgment shall be placed on the record of the case, uploaded on the Court's website and reported in the law journals alongside this official English version of the judgment.

C.M.A. No. 10247 of 2024 in Civil Appeals Nos. 333 and 334 of 2024 (Filed by ECP, seeking clarification)

AND

C.M.A. No. 10088 of 2024 in Civil Appeals Nos. 333 and 334 of 2024 (Filed by PTI, seeking clarification)

Clarification

In terms of paragraph 10 of this Court's order dated 12 July 2024 ("Short Order") passed in the Civil Appeals Nos. 333 and 334 of 2024, both the Election Commission of Pakistan ("Commission"), through CMA 10247/2024, and Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI"), through CMA 10088/2024, seek clarification regarding the effect of the Elections (Second Amendment) Act, 2024 ("Amendment Act") on the Short Order.

2. The ECP in its CMA, has submitted that the Short Order was based on the law which has since been altered by the amendments made to Sections 66 and 104 of the Elections Act, 2017 ("Elections Act") and a new Section, namely 104-A, has also been inserted with retrospective effect from the date of the commencement of the Elections Act.

3. On the other hand, PTI has submitted in its CMA that the Short Order passed by this Court is based on the interpretation and enforcement of constitutional provisions, therefore the amendments cannot supplant the effect of the Short Order.

4. We had already issued clarification before releasing the detailed reasons and the first clarification issued pursuant to the Short Order was also merged in our detailed reasons. The option given by us to seek clarification in the Short Order was in fact an intermediary window till the detailed reasons were assigned, so in case there arises any misunderstanding as to the spirit or implementation of the Short Order before the release of the detailed judgment, the parties may seek clarification. The detailed reasons have already been released and all legal and constitutional issues raised and argued by the parties have been dealt with eloquently and answered, therefore, no further clarification is required to be issued. The judgment of this Court has binding effect in terms of Article 189 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973, and should have been implemented.

5. Since the Commission and PTI both have asked for a second clarification, we want to simply clarify and reiterate the well- settled exposition of law that the effect of the amendment made in the Elections Act cannot undo our judgment with retrospective effect. The Court granted the relief in the Short Order to enforce the right of the electorate through political parties to have proportional representation in the reserved seats under paragraphs (d) and (e) of clause (6) of Article 51 and paragraph (c) of clause (3) of Article 106 of the Constitution, therefore, the amendments made in the Elections Act after the release of our Short Order will have no bearing and the Commission is bound to implement the judgment passed by the Supreme Court of Pakistan, in its letter and spirit, without seeking any further clarification.

6. Office is directed to send this clarification to the Commission and the representative of PTI who filed the application for clarification and also upload this clarification on the Supreme Court website. Both the Civil Misc. Applications are disposed of accordingly.

Dated 18th October, 2024.

YAHYA AFRIDI, J.---Sunni Ittehad Council ("SIC"), a registered political party, along with its Chairman, Sahibzada Muhammad Hamid Raza, moved the constitutional jurisdiction of the Peshawar High Court[1] seeking, inter alia, to challenge the refusal of the Election Commission of Pakistan ("ECP") to allocate reserved seats for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies to SIC, and to question the allocation of these reserved seats by ECP to other political parties in terms of Notification No. F.5(1)/2024-Cord and Notification No. F.5(4)/2024-Cord both dated 04.03.2024 ("Impugned Notifications"), and to declare Section 104 of the Elections Act, 2017 ("Act") to be ultra vires to the Constitution of Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution").

Impugned Judgment

2. A Full Bench of five worthy Judges of the Peshawar High Court dismissed the petition in terms: that SIC did not fulfill the condition precedent provided under Article 51(6) (d) and (e) of the Constitution to be allocated reserved seats for women and non-Muslims; that Section 104 of the Act was intra vires; that there was no basis to question the status of Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI") as a political party; and that PTI-backed independent candidates were returned to the Assemblies on the manifesto of PTI, however, nothing was produced before the High Court to show that ECP had declined the request of these candidates to contest elections on the ticket of PTI; and that the returned PTI-backed independent candidates were neither impleaded nor did they file any application before the High Court to be made a party to the petition pending before it.

Contentions of the Parties

3. Learned counsel for the appellants, at the very outset, submitted that he would not challenge the vires of Section 104 of the Act, since the stance taken by the appellants was supported by the constitutional provisions contained in Article 51 and Article 106 of the Constitution, and restricted the challenge to the findings recorded in the impugned judgment only to the entitlement of SIC to reserved seats for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies. The main thrust of the learned counsel for SIC was that Article 51(6)(d)[2] and (e)[3] and Article 106(3)(c)[4] of the Constitution did not expressly mandate that a political party was to contest General Elections to become entitled to reserved seats. Nor was it necessary, according to the learned counsel, to submit a list for reserved seats before the General Elections or within the period fixed by ECP for submission of nomination papers for the purpose of election to reserved seats to be entitled to reserved seats as the same could be allowed to be done by a political party even later. This, the learned counsel asserted, was the spirit of Article 51(6)(d) and (e) and Article 106(3)(c) of the Constitution. Finally, the learned counsel drew our attention to the Impugned Notifications, to show that reserved seats allocated to some of the political parties far exceeded their due share of reserved seats on the basis of their numerical strength in the respective assemblies. This, the learned counsel argued, was a blatant violation of the principle of proportional representation enshrined in Article 51(6)(d) and (e) and Article 106(3)(c) of the Constitution. Hence, the Impugned Notifications warranted annulment and SIC was to be allowed reserved seats for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies, as mandated under Article 51(6) (d) and (e) and Article 106(3)(c) of the Constitution.

4. The stance taken by the appellants before us was opposed by the Federation, ECP, women and non-Muslims elected to reserved seats in the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies beyond the share of their parties based on numerical strength in respective houses, Pakistan Muslim League (N), Muttahida Qaumi Movement (Pakistan), Pakistan Peoples Party Parliamentarians, and Jamiat Ulem-e-Islam Pakistan.

Issue for Determination

5. The core controversy requiring resolution relates to the allocation of reserved seats for women and non-Muslims to political parties in the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies in accordance with Article 51(6) (d) and (e) and Article 106(3)(c) of the Constitution, respectively. It will be appropriate to first review and discuss the legal provisions regarding the reserved seats for women in the National Assembly, as this will provide a foundation for understanding the allocation of other reserved seats provided under the Constitution.

Total Number of Reserved Seats for Women in the National Assembly

6. Clause 3 of Article 51 of the Constitution specifies the total number of seats in the National Assembly, including those reserved for women in each province, in terms that:

"(3) The seats in the National Assembly referred to in clause (1), except the seats mentioned in clause (4), shall be allocated to each Province and the Federal Capital as under: -

| | General Seats | Women Seats | Total Seats |
|---|---|---|---|
| Balochistan | 16 | 4 | 20 |
| Khyber Pakhtunkhwa | 45 | 10 | 55 |
| Punjab | 141 | 32 | 173 |
| Sindh | 61 | 14 | 75 |
| Federal Capital | 3 | - | 3 |
| Total | 266 | 60 | 326 |

Election for Reserved Seats for Women in the National Assembly

7. As for the election on reserved seats for women in the National Assembly, the numerical strength for each province has been set out in Article 51(3) (supra); the manner of allocation of the said reserved seats to the political parties is provided in clause (d) of sub-Article (6) of Article 51 of the Constitution. It provides in terms that:

"(d) members to the seats reserved for women which are allocated to a Province under clause (3) shall be elected in accordance with law through proportional representation system of political parties' lists of candidates on the basis of total number of general seats secured by each political party from the Province concerned in the National Assembly:

Provided that for the purpose of this paragraph the total number of general seats won by a political party shall include the independent returned candidate or candidates who may duly join such political party within three days of the publication in the official Gazette of the names of the returned candidates; and"

A careful reading of the above provision provides that for a political party to be allocated reserved seats for women, the following are the crucial issues to be considered:

i) Election in accordance with law:

The allocation of reserved seats for women has to pass through an electoral process; not only are the political parties mandated to take steps, but their nominee candidates are also to do so. And all this is to proceed in "accordance with the law"[5] - the Constitution, the Act and the Election Rules, 2017 ("Rules").

With the essentials provided in Article 51 of the Constitution, Section 104 of the Act sets out the mode and manner of allocation of the reserved seats to political parties in the National Assembly, in terms that:

104. Party lists for reserved seats. -

(1) For the purpose of election to seats reserved for women and non-Muslims in an Assembly, the political parties contesting election for such seats shall, within the period fixed by the Commission for submission of nomination papers, file separate lists of their candidates in order of priority for seats reserved for women and non-Muslims with the Commission or, as it may direct, with the Provincial Election Commissioner or other authorized officer of the Commission, who shall forthwith cause such lists to be published for information of the public:

Provided that the list submitted by a political party shall not be subject to change or alteration either in the order of priority or through addition of new names in the list or omission of any name after expiry of the date of submission of nomination papers.

(2) The parties' lists referred to in subsection (1) may contain as many names of additional candidates as a political party may deem necessary for contesting seats reserved for women and non-Muslims, to provide for any disqualification of candidates during scrutiny of nomination papers or for filling of any vacant seats during the term of an Assembly.

(3) A candidate to a seat reserved for women or non- Muslims shall file the nomination papers on the Form on or before the last date fixed for filing of nomination papers for the election and the nomination papers shall, as nearly as possible, be scrutinized in the same manner as nomination papers of candidates on general seats are scrutinized under Section 62.

(4) If, at any time, the party list is exhausted, the political party may submit a name for any vacancy which may occur thereafter and the provisions of subsections (1), (2) and (3) shall, as nearly as possible, apply to fill such vacancy.

(5) Where a seat reserved for women or non-Muslims in an Assembly falls vacant as a result of death, resignation or disqualification of a Member, it shall be filled in by the next person in order of precedence from the party's list of candidates submitted to the Commission under subsection (1).

(6) Before notifying the name of the next person in order of priority from the party list, such person shall submit a declaration on oath that since the filing of his nomination paper, he has not become subject to any disqualification contained in Article 63.

(7) A candidate contesting election on a seat reserved for women or non-Muslims shall, along with the nomination papers and its annexures, submit to the Returning Officer appointed by the Commission in this behalf-

(a) a copy of the party list of the candidate's political party for such seats;

(b) declarations and statements in support of the nomination; and

(c) proof of deposit of the fee required for filing nomination papers.

(8) Where there is equality of share on a reserved seat between two or more political parties, the Returning Officer shall declare the returned candidate by drawing of lots.

To further clarify, and elucidate the above procedure, we have Rule 92 of the Rules, framed under Section 239 of the Act. The said Rule reads:

92. Election to seats reserved for women and non-Muslims.--- (1) Election to the seats reserved for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies shall be held on the basis of proportional representation system of political parties' lists of candidates in accordance with the provisions of these Rules and the Act.

(2) The Members to fill seats reserved for women in the National Assembly allocated to a Province shall be elected through proportional representation system of political parties' lists of candidates submitted to the Commission on the basis of total number of general seats won by each political party from the Province concerned in the National Assembly.

(3) The Members to fill seats reserved for women allocated to a Province shall be elected through proportional representation system of political parties' lists of candidates on the basis of total number of general seats won by each political party in the Provincial Assembly.

(4) The Members to fill seats reserved for non-Muslims in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies shall be elected through proportional representation system of political parties' lists of candidates on the basis of total number of general seats won by each political party in the National Assembly, or, as the case may be, in the Provincial Assembly.

(5) If, at any time, the party list is exhausted, the political party may submit a name for any vacancy which may occur thereafter and the provisions of subsection (1) and subsection (2) of Section 104 shall, as nearly as possible, apply to fill such vacancy.

(6) For the purpose of this Rule, the expression "total number of general seats won by political party" shall include the independent returned candidate or candidates who may duly join such political party within three days of the publication in the official Gazette of the names of the returned candidates:

Provided that if the independent candidate applies to the leader of a political party for joining his party then the leader of that political party will forthwith inform the Commission of joining of such candidate through a letter to be delivered to the Commission along with consent of that candidate duly attested by a Notary appointed under the Notaries Ordinance, 1961 (XIX of 1961) or an Oath Commissioner appointed under the Oaths Act, 1873 (X of 1873) or a Government servant in basic pay scale 17 and above:

Provided that the consent of the independent candidate so delivered to the Commission shall, in no circumstances, be open to recall or cancellation.

(7) The political parties' lists of candidates to be submitted under this Rule to the Commission in connection with election to the reserved seats for women or non-Muslims in an assembly shall be on Form-66.

A combined reading of the above provisions of the Constitution, the Act and the Rules indicates that a political party seeking reserved seats for women in the National Assembly has to take the following concerted steps in order that its nominees be eligible to be elected as members of the National Assembly on the seats reserved for women:

Step No. 1

A political party desirous of contesting election for reserved seats has to submit before ECP, the list of its candidates, and that too, in order of priority. Such list is to be published for information of the public forthwith. But once the time fixed by ECP for filing of nomination papers has expired, the political party is prohibited from making any modifications to the submitted list. This includes changes to the order of candidates, adding new names, or removing existing ones.

Step No. 2

The listed nominee candidates of a political party, in turn, have to file their nomination papers along with all the requisite documents for contesting election on the reserved seats, and that too, within the prescribed time. The nomination papers of the said candidates are filed before the Returning Officer appointed by ECP. The scrutiny thereof shall, as nearly as possible, be in the same manner, as that of nomination papers of candidates on general seats under Section 62 of the Act, including the right to challenge any findings made by the Returning Officer appointed by ECP.

What is strikingly significant in the above stated procedure for election of reserved seats is that each step required of a political party and its listed nominee candidates is time bound.

ii) Basis of Allocation of Reserved Seats

For allocation of reserved seats, there has to be election not amongst the individual nominee candidates but between the political parties, who field their candidates, as per the list they submit to ECP; and that too, through proportional representation system of political parties' lists of candidates on the basis of total number of general seats secured by each political party from the provinces concerned in the National Assembly.

Forms of Elections under the Constitution - Proportional Representation System

There are under the Constitution, three distinct forms of elections: firstly, we have single member territorial constituencies for the general seats in the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies and the members to fill such seats are to be elected by direct and free vote in accordance with law[6]; secondly, there is single transferable vote or proportional ranked choice voting system for the elections to the Senate; and finally, we have proportional representation system of political parties' lists for the elections for the reserved seats for women and the non-Muslims. It follows that a first-past-the-post system is used for general seats in the National and Provincial Assemblies, while a proportional representation system based on single transferable vote is used for Senate elections, and a proportional representation system based on political parties' lists is used for reserved seats in the National and Provincial Assemblies.

As for the concept of the proportional representation system, it must be understood that it manifests in different ways across various jurisdictions globally. To better understand and appreciate the various systems, and in particular, the one applicable for reserved seats for women and non-Muslims, it would be appropriate to have an overview of some of the different systems of 'proportional representation'. Proportional representation systems are of following two basic types:

Single Transferable Vote or Proportional Ranked Choice Voting

Single Transferable Vote or Proportional Ranked Choice Voting is provided under clause (2) of Article 59 of the Constitution for elections to the Senate. It is a multi-winner electoral system, where each voter casts a single vote in the form of ranked-choice ballot. Voters have the option to rank candidates, and their votes may be transferred according to alternate preferences, if their preferred candidate is eliminated or elected with surplus votes, so that their votes are used to elect someone they prefer over others in the running.

Proportional Representation System of Political Parties' Lists

Proportional representation system of political parties' lists is a system for election for the reserved seats for women and the non-Muslims in the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies, as provided under Articles 51 and 106 of the Constitution. This system has its unique characteristics and modalities, as it provides each political party to 'showcase' to the public their listed candidates for the voters to make their valued choice at the time of casting their votes for the other candidates of the political party in the General Elections. In essence, it is to provide individual voters valuable information, about the political party and the candidates it is to field for elections, at the time they cast their vote, helping them make a more informed decision.

There is no cavil to the proposition that, all proportional representational systems, are neither intended to nor are to be applied in a disproportionate manner. But for a political party to avail any benefit thereof, it has to first fulfill the condition precedent set for first entering the electoral system. In the case of the proportional representation system of political parties' lists, used for electing reserved seats for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies, as outlined in Articles 51 and 106 of the Constitution, the political party has to cross the defined legal threshold; firstly, by filing the list of candidates within the period set by ECP, and secondly, by fielding their nominee candidates by submitting their nomination papers within the time set by ECP.

iii) Total number of General Seats secured by a Political Party

Article 51(6) (d) of the Constitution mandates that reserved seats for women in the National Assembly are to be allocated based on the total number of general seats secured by each political party from the province concerned in the National Assembly. Thus, the constituency for reserved seats for women is each of the four provinces. On the other hand, Article 51(6) (e) of the Constitution provides for reserved seats for non-Muslims in the National Assembly are to be allocated based on the total number of general seats won by each political party in the National Assembly. Here the constituency is not restricted to the provinces but is, in fact, the whole country. Similarly, for the reserved seats for women and non-Muslims in the Provincial Assembly, the constituency is the whole province.

A fundamental prerequisite for a political party to qualify for reserved seats is the winning of at least one general seat. This is evident from the proviso allowing independent candidates to join a political party within three days of election results, a process contingent on the existence of a political party with at least one elected member. The proviso to Article 51(6) (d) and (e) and Article 106(3) (c) provides that the total number of general seats won by a political party shall include the independent returned candidate or candidates who may duly join such political party within three days of the publication in the official Gazette of the names of the returned candidates. Notably, the proviso to the above-mentioned Articles is not a proviso in the strict sense of the term, since it neither creates an exception to the main provision nor qualifies it. Instead, it serves as an explanation that supplements the main provision by clarifying that independent returned candidates, who join a political party within three days of the publication of the names of the returned candidates are to be counted as part of the total number of general seats won by that party for the purpose of allocating reserved seats. It is but necessary that a candidate can only join a political party, if that political party already has a presence in the house - it already has secured or won a general seat. If the political party has not secured or won a general seat, it does not have any returned candidate in the house, for an independent returned candidate or candidates to join it. It shows that it is necessary that a political party at least wins one general seat to become entitled to reserved seats. Consequently, the entitlement of a political party to reserved seats is inextricably linked to its success on at least one general seat.

The word 'secured' used in Article 51(6) (d) and the word 'won' in Article 51(6) (e), have in essence, the same meaning and can be applied interchangeably. However, one can understand that by employing two different words having the same meaning was to highlight the constituencies of the reserved seats for women and the non-Muslims: for the former, a direct reference has been made to the seats secured from each province in the National Assembly; and for the latter, there is the stipulation of the total strength of the political party based on its returned candidates, who have won the elections in the National Assembly.

Even otherwise, one must be aware that the word "secured" is employed in the main provision of the above constitutional provision, while the inclusion of the independents being provided in the proviso to the said provision, and that being an explanation to the general statement of the law in the main provision, cannot be applied to those independents being referred to in the proviso. Moreso, when the two categories of returned candidates; one who belongs to a political party referred to in the main part of the provision, while the other being the independents joining the same political party stated in the proviso; are separately referred to in Article 51(6) (d) and cannot be considered as one category. And thus, are to be legally considered separately, each in accord with the letter of the law, as stated therein.

As for the contention of the learned counsel supporting the stance taken by SIC that this Court ought to render a progressive approach and endeavor to understand the intent behind the constitutional provision and not restrict the meaning of the words implied in a statute in a manner, so as to 'make a fortress out of the dictionary', I am afraid the approach of the learned counsel is rather miscued in the circumstances of the present case. In fact, when the letter of the statute is simple in meaning and does not lead to an absurd or unreasonable situation or for that matter, contradicts or come in conflict with any other provision of the Constitution, Courts are to read the letter of the law, and need not to surgically search for another meaning by taking refuge of the intent of the law-makers.

None can dispute the fundamental right of an independent member of a house to join a political party, as is ordained under Article 17 of the Constitution, but for this inclusion of an independent returned member of the house to strengthen the political party to seek the allotment of reserved seats, I am afraid the said right is conditional on the fulfillment of the legal requirements within the contemplation of Articles 51 and 106 of the Constitution. These conditions precedent - to contest and win at least a general seat and to submit the list of candidates for the reserved seats, whose antecedents have passed through the scrutiny provided under the law - have to be fulfilled by SIC.

iv) Inclusion of Independent Candidates - joining a Political Party

The general principle laid down in the substantive part of Article 51(6) (d) of the Constitution mandates the political party to be entitled to reserved seats, based on the total number of general seats secured by it from the province concerned in the National Assembly.

The proviso contained in Article 51(6) (d) of the Constitution vests an independent returned candidate, the right to join a political party of his choice, and none can take away this right from him. To render legal effect to the act of an independent returned candidate of joining a political party, requires the leader of the said political party[7] to intimate ECP in writing regarding joining of that political party by the independent returned candidate. This written intimation has to be accompanied by the written consent of the independent returned candidate. ECP on receipt of the said intimation accompanied by the written consent of the independent returned candidate, has no authority under the law to object to any independent returned candidate joining a political party within the stipulated period of three days. However, for independent candidates to contribute to the overall seat count of a political party for the purpose of its entitlement to reserved seats, the proviso mandates that these candidates must join such party that has already won at least one general seat. In essence, a political party must win a general seat to benefit from the inclusion of independent candidates, so as to become a part of its numerical strength for the purpose of allocation of reserved seats.

Candidates for election - National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies

What is crucial to note is that the Act read with the Rules envisages three different kinds of returned candidates, contesting elections for the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies:

Firstly, we have the candidates, who have submitted their nomination papers declaring themselves, as candidates belonging to a political party duly accompanied by a certificate from the said party, declaring the candidates to be their official candidates for election in the respective constituencies. Such a candidate cannot be denied the right to be a candidate of a political party. And similarly, in case the said candidate has won the seat of National Assembly or a Provincial Assembly in the General Elections and has been notified as returned candidate by ECP he would remain a member of the house, representing the said political party, and ECP has no authority under the law to declare him an independent or belonging to another political party or otherwise. The only exception to this principle is when the candidate of a political party contesting election for the National Assembly or Provincial Assembly submits a written declaration to ECP or the returning officer under his signatures stating that he is withdrawing from his position, as a candidate of a political party. Politics is not for the weak or fickle. Once a declaration has been rendered by a candidate to represent a political party, withdrawing the same, and that too, in writing would be estopped to revert back to his earlier stance of representing the said political party.

Secondly, we have candidates who submitted their nomination papers as candidates on the list of the political parties for reserved seats for women and non-Muslims.

Finally, we have those, who submitted their nomination papers, as independent candidates.

Reserved seats - Non-Muslims (National Assembly) Women and Non-Muslims (Provincial Assemblies)

Given the above legal position provided under the law for allocation of reserved seats for women in the National Assembly, we note that the same principles would also apply to allocation of reserved seats for non-Muslims in the National Assembly provided under Article 51(6) (e), and that of women and non-Muslims in the Provincial Assemblies under Article 106(3)(c) of the Constitution. Though there is a marked distinction between the reserved seats for women in the National Assembly and that of other reserved seats. It is notable that the constituency for the reserved seats for the non-Muslims in the National Assembly is the whole country and the reserved seats are to be allocated on the basis of the total number of seats secured by a political party in the National Assembly. Similarly, as far as the reserved seats for women and non-Muslims in the Provincial Assemblies are concerned, the constituency for the same is each province and the reserved seats are to be allocated on the basis of the total number of returned candidates of the political party in such Provincial Assembly. The mode and manner for a political party to avail the reserved seats remains the same in all cases.

A political party has to not only file the list of candidates for the reserved seats but also ensure that its nominee candidates have filed their nomination papers for election to the reserved seats within the time set by ECP. Failure on the part of a political party to fulfill any one of the two conditions stated above, and that too, within the prescribed time fixed by ECP under the law would disentitle them to be allocated the reserved seats within the enabling provisions of Articles 51 and 106 of the Constitution.

Case of Sunni Ittehad Council

8. Given the above exposition of the mandate of law, it is necessary to carefully examine the stance of the appellants, who seek reserved seats for women and non-Muslims in the National and Provincial Assemblies for SIC.

9. SIC is a registered political party, but it did not field any candidate for a seat in the National Assembly or Provincial Assemblies in the General Election, 2024. Thus, having won no seat in the houses, it cannot seek to include the independent returned members of the respective houses to enhance its strength for the allocation of reserved seats within the contemplation of Articles 51 and 106 of the Constitution. Further, SIC had not submitted any list of candidates for reserved seats for women or for non-Muslims within the period fixed by ECP, as reflected in the Schedule of Election notified in the official gazette. In fact, the Court was informed during the hearing of the present case that SIC had till the date of decision of the present appeal not submitted the requisite list of candidates. Needless to mention, the law mandates that with the filing of the list of candidates of the political party for the reserved seats for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies, the nominee candidates haveto also file their nomination papers for scrutiny, as any other candidate contesting election for the general seat.
Given the above legal infirmities and inactions in taking the requisite steps by SIC, the joining of independent returned candidates would be of no legal avail in respect of enhancing its numerical strength for allocation of reserved seats for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies under Articles 51 and 106 of the Constitution.

Sahibzada Muhammad Hamid Raza - Chairman of SIC

10. Sahibzada Muhammad Hamid Raza (appellant No.2) contested the election for a seat in the National Assembly (NA-104, Faisalabad). The nomination papers he submitted before the Retuning Officer were neither clear nor consistent with his stance taken in the present appeal before this Court. During the proceeding of the present case, the Court was provided copies of the nomination papers and the requests in writing submitted by Sahibzada Muhammad Hamid Raza to the Returning Officer and ECP, and a perusal thereof unfolded the inconsistent position he had taken, as regards his affiliation with a political party. Succinctly, his affiliation swayed from belonging to SIC (alliance with PTI) and finally to Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf Nazriati (PTI-N). To make the matter more complicated for the appellants, he submitted to the Returning Officer, a certificate of PTI, as its official candidate for elections to the seat of the National Assembly. With such wavering political position taken by Sahibzada Muhammad Hamid Raza, it would not be legally correct to declare him a returned candidate of SIC.

11. Since SIC does not fulfil the conditions prescribed for a political party under the enabling provisions of the Constitution and the law to be allocated reserved seats for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies, therefore, the appeals filed by SIC and its Chairman are dismissed.

Mst. Kanwal Shauzab

12. Mst. Kanwal Shauzab, purporting to be the President of women wing of PTI and also a nominated candidate of PTI in the list submitted by the PTI for reserved seats for women in the National Assembly, who was not a party before the Peshawar High Court, has moved a petition challenging the impugned judgment of the Peshawar High Court, Peshawar. The said petition was not numbered; however, the Court allowed the learned counsel to make his submissions on behalf of Mst Kanwal Shauzab challenging the impugned judgment.

13. As the main appeal filed by SIC (C.A. No. 333 of 2024) has been dismissed and the findings so recorded by the Peshawar High Court, Peshawar have been maintained, it would not be appropriate to pass any findings on locus standi of Mst. Kanwal Shauzab in agitating her grievance in support of SIC, lest it may prejudice her right to be elected as a member of the National Assembly, being on the list of candidates submitted by PTI for the reserved seats for women in the National Assembly.

Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf (PTI)

14. PTI, a registered political party, fielded its candidates for seats in the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies in the General Elections, 2024. But none was allowed or recognized by ECP to contest elections for the general or the reserved seats, as the candidate of PTI. And yet, for reasons not known, the matter has not been agitated by PTI before this Court. In fact, at the very end of the proceedings of the present appeals, that spanned over a month with eight long hearings commencing from the 3rd June, 2024 to the 12th July, 2024; to be precise on 26th June, 2024, an application (CMA No. 5913 of 2024) was filed by PTI and Barrister Gohar Ali Khan for their impleadment, as interveners, and that too, to assist this Court in the present appeals.

Interestingly, there was no specific prayer for a definite declaration in favour of PTI for allotment of reserved seats for women and non-Muslims. In essence, the application so made challenged the assertions of ECP with respect to PTI, seeking reserved seats for women and non-Muslims for both SIC and PTI, while contesting the allocation of these seats to other political parties.

15. Upon examining the record relating to the General Election, 2024 submitted by ECP, I found its actions and inactions deeply concerning. Regarding the issue raised in the present appeals, it is important to note that four candidates, namely; Mr. Gohar Ali Khan (NA-10), Mr. Umer Ayub (NA-12), Mr. Ali Asghar Khan (NA-16), and Shahzada Gastasab Khan (NA-15) not only declared themselves to be candidates representing PTI but also submitted certificates of PTI nominating them, as its candidates in their respective constituencies. It was also noted that they had not filed any application to ECP or their respective Returning Officers to be declared independent candidates or otherwise. Despite this, and for reasons known only to ECP, these four PTI candidates were not notified as returned candidates representing PTI. The Act and the Rules do not grant ECP the authority to declare such returned candidates, as independent candidates. Similarly, another list provided by ECP revealed returned candidates who, in their nomination papers, declared themselves to represent PTI, duly accompanied by certificates of the said party nominating them as their candidates for election of the respective constituencies. They did not file any application with ECP or the Returning Officer to be declared as independent candidates. Among these returned candidates, six were particularly notable: Mr. Sohail Sultan (NA4), Mr. Arbab Amir Ayub (NA-29), Mr. Sher Ali Arbab (NA-31), Mr. Naseem Ali Shah (NA-39), Mr. Rana Atif (NA-101) and Mr. Mumtaz Mustafa (NA-171). These returned candidates also fulfilled the condition of making declaration in their nomination forms and submitting certificates from PTI nominating them as their official candidates for election in their respective constituencies. Without there being any written declaration on their part to be declared as independent candidates, ECP had no authority under the law to declare them other than returned candidates representing PTI in the National Assembly.

16. At this stage, it is pertinent to mention, without naming them, certain candidates nominated by PTI for constituencies in the National or Provincial Assemblies who, after being declared returned, joined another political party or sought to be treated as independent. This behavior on their part, raises serious concerns about disregarding the trust reposed in such returned candidates by the voters, thus undermining the will of the people.

17. Articles 218 and 219 of the Constitution mandate ECP to conduct elections in a manner that ensures they are conducted honestly, justly, fairly, and in accordance with the law. The material which was brought to the attention of the Court during the proceedings of the present case, in particular, the manner in which retuned candidates of PTI were declared independent, clearly demonstrates that ECP was unable to perform its constitutional duty as mandated under the law. However, passing any definite finding regarding the exact number of seats won by PTI in the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies in the General Election, 2024 would not be legally appropriate for the reasons that:

Firstly, PTI has not approached this Court for any such direction. Passing a definite finding by this Court would amount to invoking suo motu jurisdiction under Article 184(3) of the Constitution, which in the circumstances of the present case, would be contrary to the ratio of the judgment rendered by this Court in SMC No.4/2021 (PLD 2022 SC 306), as partially modified by Section 3 of the Supreme Court (Practice and Procedure) Act, 2023.

Secondly, the information and record provided to the Court did not include the particulars of returned candidates in the four Provincial Assemblies. Similarly, with regard to the election results of the National Assembly, a thorough scrutiny is required before passing any definite finding that could deprive a returned candidate of their fundamental right of being member of a political party. Furthermore, passing such a finding on the conduct of returned candidates may expose them to adverse consequences under the law. Legal propriety demands that this matter be left to the returned candidates, their respective political parties, the Speakers of the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies, and ECP to address in accordance with the law. Any finding at this stage would prejudice their case, especially without affording them the right to a hearing.

Finally, while the undeniable power of this Court to do complete justice under Article 187 of the Constitution is recognized, exercising this power in the absence of an aggrieved party directly approaching the Court could set a dangerous and far-reaching precedent. Such a course risks undermining the principles of due process and judicial restraint, potentially leading to an overreach of judicial authority. The exercise of this power must, therefore, be reserved for exceptional circumstances, where there is a clear and compelling need to intervene to bolster the rights of the aggrieved petitioner, and prevent a miscarriage of justice. In the present case, however, the matters before the Court do not meet this threshold. Nevertheless, based on what has been presented before this Court, the role of ECP has fallen short of the constitutional obligations entrusted to it. However, the remedy for such shortcomings lies in the processes provided within the legal framework, not in judicial pronouncement of the apex Court, and that too, without providing hearing to all concerned parties. It is imperative to uphold the fundamental principle of due process and the sanctity of the due judicial process. This Court must, therefore, exercise caution to preserve the integrity of judicial proceedings and ensure that justice is administered within the boundaries set by the Constitution.

Conclusion

18. In all fairness, without disturbing the impugned judgment, ECP is directed to revisit its notification of returned candidates, keeping in view that a returned candidate, who declared himself to represent a political party and submitted the certificate of that political party, nominating the said candidate to be its official candidate for election for the respective constituency and has not withdrawn his declaration by any written intimation, has to be declared a returned candidate representing the said political party and not otherwise. The needful be done within seven days, if not earlier, after providing an opportunity of hearing to any affected party and, thus, the reserved seats for woman and non-Muslims are to be allotted to all deserving political parties, accordingly.

19. Consequently, civil appeals filed by SIC and its Chairman are dismissed in the above terms. As these appeals have been dismissed on merits, the connected civil petitions challenging the impugned judgment are also dismissed.

20. The above are the reasons for the short order dated 12th July, 2024 which read:

"For reasons to be recorded later, Civil Appeals Nos. 333 and 334 of 2024, C.M.A. No. 2920 of 2024 in Civil Appeal No. 333 of 2024, Civil Petitions Nos. 1612, 1613, 1614, 1615, 1616 and 1617 of 2024 and C.M.A. No. 3554 of 2024 in C.P. Nil of 2024 are dismissed in terms that:

1. Sunni Ittehad Council does not fulfil the conditions prescribed for a political party under the enabling provisions of the Constitution of Islamic Republic of Pakistan ("Constitution") and the law to be allowed/allocated reserved seats for women and non-Muslims in the National Assembly or the Provincial Assemblies.

2. Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI") fulfils the conditions prescribed for a political party under the enabling provisions of the Constitution and the law to be allowed/allocated reserved seats for women and non-Muslims, in terms that:

i. A candidate for a seat in the National Assembly or the Provincial Assembly, who in his/her nomination paper has declared on oath to belong to PTI and duly submitted a certificate of the same political party confirming that he/she is the nominated candidate of PTI for the respective constituency, shall remain so, and cannot be declared independent, unless he/ she submitted a written declaration to the Election Commission of Pakistan or Returning Officer to be treated as the candidate of another political party or as an independent candidate;

ii. A returned candidate to the National Assembly or the Provincial Assembly, who in his/her nomination paper has declared on oath to belong to PTI and duly submitted a certificate of the same political party confirming that he/she is the nominated candidate of PTI for the respective constituency, shall remain so, and this consistent position maintained by a returned candidate throughout the electoral process should be legally recognized by the Election Commission of Pakistan and such returned candidate cannot be treated as the returned candidate of another political party or as an independent returned candidate, and thus, the reserved seats for women and nonMuslims are to be allowed/allocated to PTI, accordingly;

iii. A candidate nominated by PTI for a constituency of the National Assembly or the Provincial Assembly who, after being declared returned, joined another political party or sought to be treated as independent, raises serious concerns about disregarding the trust reposed in him/her by the voters, thus undermining the will of the people; and

iv. The legal implications, effects and consequences of the determinations made above in paragraphs 2(ii) and 2(iii), as well as the actions or inactions of the Election Commission of Pakistan thereon, although deeply concerning, have not been challenged in the present appeals and petitions; and the persons who would be affected or aggrieved are not parties before this Court. Therefore, issuing definitive directions to the Election Commission of Pakistan qua the allocation of specific number of reserved seats for women and non-Muslims to a political party in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies would not be legally appropriate.

3. Accordingly, the Election Commission of Pakistan is directed to decide the allocation of reserved seats for women and non-Muslims to political parties in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies in the light of the determinations made hereinabove after providing an opportunity of hearing to the parties concerned, and if required revisit its earlier decisions on the matter. The needful be done within seven days of the receipt of this order."

JAMAL KHAN MANDOKHAIL, J.---We respectfully do not agree with the findings of the majority judgment with regard to providing an option to members of National and Provincial Assemblies to join Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI") within a period of fifteen days. These are the reasons for our short order dated 12.07.2024.

Conduct of Election:

2. Under Article 218 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ('Constitution'), it shall be the duty of the Election Commission of Pakistan ('ECP') to organize and conduct the elections honestly, justly, fairly and in accordance with law. Under section 66 of the Elections Act, 2017 ('the Act'), any person contesting elections from the platform of a particular political party, shall file a declaration in writing before the concerned Returning Officer ('RO') about his affiliation with a particular political party, if any, along with a certificate (commonly known as party ticket) from the political party showing that he is that party's candidate from the constituency. According to section 67(3) of the Act, a candidate not nominated by any political party, shall be called as "independent candidate". Thus, to be a nominated candidate of a particular political party, a declaration of affiliation from a candidate and a certificate from that party, showing his nomination is a condition precedent.

Role of ROs:

3. The role of ROs is the most significant. The Act assigns them the duty of receiving nomination papers, scrutinizing and deciding fate of them. The ROs have to allot symbols to contesting candidates, and thereafter, shall publish their names as provided by section 68(1) of the Act. The list shall contain name of the candidates, symbols allotted to them, their party affiliation, if any, according to their declarations. The ROs shall supply a copy of the list to each candidate and to exhibit it at a prominent place at each polling station on the day of the poll and to send a copy thereof to the ECP, which shall upload it for display on its website enabling each candidate and the general public to know about the detail mentioned in the list. According to rule 56(1) of the Election Rules, 2017 ('the Rules'), the list of contesting candidates shall be drawn up in Form 33, that has a set template. The ROs have no other option, but to fill-in the form on the basis of information given by a candidate in his nomination papers and declaration, in the following format:

Under section 90(10) of the Act, after close of poll, every Presiding Officer shall prepare a Result of the Count of votes in Form 45, as provided by rule 81 of the Rules. The ROs shall forthwith prepare and announce the provisional Consolidated Statement of Result of the Count in accordance with section 92 of the Act. The ROs shall prepare a final consolidated result in terms of section 95 of the Act, on the basis whereof, the ECP shall notify results of returned candidates of every constituency.

Election to Seats Reserved for Women and non-Muslims:

4. In order to ensure full participation of women and non-Muslims in all spheres of national life, Articles 51(3) and 4 and Article 106(3) of the Constitution has determined their due representation in National and Provincial Assemblies, respectively. Article 51(6)(d) of the Constitution provides a procedure and a formula for election to the seats reserved for women in National Assembly as under:

(6) For the purpose of election to the National Assembly,-

(a) .....

(b) .....

(c) .....

(d) members to the seats reserved for women which are allocated to a Province under clause (3) shall be elected in accordance with law through proportional representation system of political parties' lists of candidates on the basis of total number of general seats secured by each political party from the Province concerned in the National Assembly:

Article 51(6) (e) of the Constitution provides a procedure and a formula for election to the seats reserved for non-Muslims in National Assembly as under:

(e) members to the seats reserved for non-Muslims shall be elected in accordance with law through proportional representation system of political parties' lists of candidates on the basis of total number of general seats won by each political party in the National Assembly:

Article 106(3)(c) of the Constitution provides with the procedure and a formula for election to the seats reserved for women and non-Muslims in Provincial Assemblies as under:

(2) .....

(3) For the purpose of election to a Provincial Assembly,--

(a) .....

(b) .....

(c) the members to fill seats reserved for women and non-Muslims allocated to a Province under clause (1) shall be elected in accordance with law through proportional representation system of political parties' list of candidates on the basis of the total number of general seats secured by each political party in the Provincial Assembly."

Procedure to Contest Election to the Reserved Seats:

5. According to the above provisions of the Constitution, members to the seats reserved for women and non-Muslims shall be elected in accordance with law, through proportional representation system of political parties' lists of candidates. All matters relating to the conduct of election and matters connected therewith or ancillary thereto are enshrined in the Act. Section 104 thereof provides a complete procedure for the conduct of election to the reserved seats as under:

104. Party lists for reserved seats.---(1) For the purpose of election to seats reserved for women and non-Muslims in an Assembly, the political parties contesting election for such seats shall, within the period fixed by the Commission for submission of nomination papers, file separate lists of their candidates in order of priority for seats reserved for women and non-Muslims with the Commission or, as it may direct, with the Provincial Election Commissioner or other authorized officer of the Commission, who shall forthwith cause such lists to be published for information of the public:

Provided that the list submitted by a political party shall not be subject to change or alteration either in the order of priority or through addition of new names in the list or omission of any name after expiry of the date of submission of nomination papers.

(2) The parties' lists referred to in subsection (1) may contain as many names of additional candidates as a political party may deem necessary for contesting seats reserved for women and non-Muslims, to provide for any disqualification of candidates during scrutiny of nomination papers or for filling of any vacant seats during the term of an Assembly.

(3) A candidate to a seat reserved for women or non-Muslims shall file the nomination papers on the Form on or before the last date fixed for filing of nomination papers for the election and the nomination papers shall, as nearly as possible, be scrutinized in the same manner as nomination papers of candidates on general seats are scrutinized under section 62.

(7) ---"

Since Article 51(6)(d)&(e) and Article 106(3)(b)&(c) of the Constitution provide that members to the seats reserved for women and non-Muslims shall be elected in accordance with law, therefore, the procedure and method provided by the above provision of the Act must be acted upon in its letter and spirit, as it is a command of the Constitution. If a law requires an act has to be done in a particular manner, that is how it should be done. Thus, no party is entitled to file list of its candidates to the reserved seats contrary to the provisions of section 104 of the Act, after the period fixed by the ECP for submission of nomination papers.

Determination of Reserved Seats:

6. In the context of Article 51(6)(d)&(e) of the Constitution, a political party means a party that has won/secured at least a general seat in the National Assembly, and in the context of Article 106(3)(c) of the Constitution, a political party means a party that has won/ secured at least a general seat in a Provincial Assembly. The provisos to these Articles fixes three days' time for the independent returned candidates to join any political party, which won general seats in the election. After expiry of three days, the ECP shall publish a list of total number of general seats won by each political party, including the independent returned candidates, who joined that party. The seats reserved for women and non-Muslims shall be allocated through proportional representation system of political parties' lists of candidates on the basis of the total number of general seats secured by each political party.

7. A proportion is an equation in which two ratios are set equal to each other. There is no fixed number or ratio of general seats in the said provisions of the Constitution for the purpose of allocation of reserved seats. The only basis for allocation of reserved seats depends upon the total number of general seats secured by a political party, after induction of independent returned candidates, if any. In general elections, the number of the general seats won by political parties' nominated candidates and independents vary. It is for this reason, the ECP in every election sums up total general seats secured by all the political parties including the independents joining political party(ies) and thereafter divides them in the case of women by sixty seats reserved for women in order to determine the ratio on the basis whereof the reserved seats are to be allocated. This procedure has further been elaborated by rule 94 of the Rules. In this way, the share of each political party out of the seats reserved for women is determined. The same procedure is to be followed for the allocation of seats reserved for non-Muslims in the National Assembly. This formula also applies for the allocation of reserved seats in the Provincial Assemblies, keeping in view total number of general seats fixed by the Constitution for each Provincial Assembly.

8. In the general elections of 2024, a large number of independent candidates won. As a result, the number of general seats won by political parties in the recent election is less than it was in previous elections. It was alternatively argued that after allocation of share of each political party on the basis of general seats won by each political party, rest of the reserved seats may be left vacant. A question arises whether seats reserved for women and non-Muslims in National and Provincial Assemblies can be left vacant? According to Article 34 of the Constitution steps shall be taken to ensure full participation of women in all spheres of national life. The Constitution allocated a specific number of seats for women and non-Muslims in Parliament and each Provincial Assembly. However, they can also contest on general seats, thereby enabling them to contribute in the process of legislation and policy making. It is the constitutional responsibility of every organ and authority of the State and each person performing functions on behalf of an authority of the State, every political party and every citizen to act in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution and the law. The seats reserved for women and non-Muslims is their constitutional right, as such, they cannot be deprived from their such fundamental right by leaving any reserved seat vacant. Similarly, no formula other than provided by the above provisions of the Constitution can be applied for allocation of reserved seats to political parties.

Facts of the Case:

9. The ECP had notified the Election Program for the election of National Assembly and all Provincial Assemblies through a Schedule ('Schedule') on 15 December 2023, which prescribed a specific period for submission, scrutiny and withdrawal of nomination papers for general seats and for seats reserved for women and non-Muslims. A number of candidates contested election to National and Provincial Assemblies independently, out of whom, eighty (80) returned candidates joined Sunni Ittehad Council ('SIC'), within three days of their notifications, as prescribed by the Constitution. SIC is an enlisted political party and Sahibzada Hamid Raza being its Chairman, requested the ECP for submission of his party's list of candidates and allocation of seats reserved for women and non-Muslims to SIC on the basis of total number of independent candidates, who joined it. The request of the appellant was declined by the ECP vide order dated 01.03.2024, which was assailed before the Peshawar High Court, but failed[p1], hence these appeals.

10. The learned counsel for the appellant stated that after the independent candidates joined SIC, in a way, it secured general seats, therefore, SIC was entitled for its share in the seats reserved for women and non-Muslims in National and Provincial Assemblies, respectively. The learned counsel stated that though SIC did not win general seats in National or any Provincial Assembly, but because of joining independent candidates, SIC has secured general seats. He suggested that after securing general seats, a purposive and progressive interpretation of Article 51(6) (d)&(e) and Article 106(3) (c) of the Constitution is required in order to consider SIC as a political party for the purpose of allocation of reserved seats. He made a reference to PLD 2024 SC 698[2].

Findings:

11. The Supreme Court ('SC') can interpret the Constitution, but it must ensure that words are not read into it nor should it ascribe artificial meaning to commonly understood words. Article 51(6) (d) & (e) and Article 106(3)(c) of the Constitution are clear enough to understand. The said provisions state that election to the seats reserved for women and non-Muslims shall be conducted in accordance with the law, which is the Act. Its section 104 provides that political parties shall within the period fixed by the ECP for submission of nomination papers, file separate lists of their candidates with the ECP to seats reserved for women and non-Muslims; and the listed candidates shall file nomination papers by or before the last date fixed for filing of nomination papers for general seats as prescribed by the Schedule. The nomination papers filed for reserved seats shall be scrutinized in the same manner as nomination papers of candidates on general seats are scrutinized under section 62 of the Act.

12. Admittedly, the appellant (SIC) did not nominate any candidate for general seats nor filed its list of candidates and their nomination papers before the ECP within the stipulated period, which is a condition precedent to elect candidates to the seats reserved for women and non-Muslims. Although SIC is an enlisted political party and the independent elected members have a constitutional right to join it, but it does not mean that it fulfils the criteria necessary for allocation of seats reserved for women and non-Muslims. As SIC did not contest election, therefore, in the context of Article 51(6)(d)&(e) and Article 106(3)(b)&(c) of the Constitution, it cannot be termed as a political party. Merely because a large number of independent returned candidates joined SIC does not entitle it to file its list of candidates for reserved seats, and that too after the conduct of election. All the Hon'ble members of the Bench have unanimously held that the appellant is not entitled to file its list of candidates for the seats reserved for women and non-Muslims.

13. As far as the judgment relied upon by the learned counsel for the appellant (PLD 2024 SC 698) with regard to purposive and progressive interpretation of the Constitution is concerned, relevant portion whereof is reproduced as under:

In absence of express words or an enactment, preventing the Council from inquiring into the matter upon resignation or retirement of a judge, jurisdiction of the Council cannot be abolished, ousted or terminated. Since there is no express provision in the Constitution, nor is there any enactment, preventing the Council from continuing its proceedings of inquiry in a situation where a judge is retired or resigns before conclusion of the inquiry, it is the constitutional obligation of the Council to conclude the inquiry initiated against a judge and form an opinion regarding his conduct.

In the referred case, Article 209 of the Constitution was under discussion, which assigns power to the Supreme Judicial Council ('SJC') to initiate an inquiry against a judge of Supreme Court, Federal Shariat Court or a High Court. The Constitution does not provide for automatic termination of an inquiry already initiated against a sitting judge, upon his resignation or retirement. It was for this reason that this Court held that once the SJC initiates the inquiry against a sitting Judge, it shall be taken to its logical conclusion. Had the provision of Article 209 of the Constitution been interpreted progressively or purposively, in a manner that upon retirement or resignation of a judge, the inquiry initiated by a constitutional body shall stand terminated, it would have amounted to adding these words into the Constitution, which is beyond the domain of this Court. The referred judgment in the circumstances is of no assistance to the appellant, rather it strengthens the view that the Constitution has to be interpreted rigidly and to be implemented in its letter and spirit. As has been discussed above that the appellant does not qualify for reserved seats, therefore, we cannot mould the Constitution in a manner to facilitate SIC. The appeals to such extent failed.

Status of Returned Candidates who joined SIC:

14. In order to ascertain the status of 80 returned candidates, who joined SIC, the learned counsel for the ECP on our directions, produced their nomination papers. Perusal whereof would reveal that out of the 80 returned candidates, 39 returned candidates had filed declarations about their affiliation with PTI. Despite such fact, the ROs while publishing list of the contesting candidates in Form 33, showed them as independents, on the basis whereof, they contested election and were subsequently notified as independent returned candidates by the ECP. The ROs did not fill Forms 33 of these 39 candidates in consonance with their declarations. The learned counsel for the ECP admitted the fact that those 39 candidates filed declarations about their affiliation with PTI, but because of refusal of symbol by the ECP, endorsed by this Court on 13 January 2024 in the case of Election Commission of Pakistan[3], PTI was not considered as a political party for the purpose of election. He relied upon the Explanation to rule 94 of the Rules, which is reproduced as under:

'Explanation. For the purpose of this rule, the expression "political party" means a political party to which a symbol has been allocated by the Commission."

The learned counsel for the ECP stated that on account of non-allocation of symbol to PTI, the declarations of the candidates and their nomination by PTI were not accepted. According to him, all of them were independent returned candidates, who contested election on different election symbols. They had exercised their constitutional right by joining SIC out of their free will and consent.

Political Party:

15. Under Article 17(2) of the Constitution "Every citizen, not being in the service of Pakistan, shall have the right to form or be a member of a political party, subject to any reasonable restrictions imposed by law in the interest of sovereignty or integrity of Pakistan, public order or morality." A political party means a group of persons organized to acquire and exercise political power. Section 2(xxviii) of the Act defines a political party as under:

"political party" means an association of citizens or a combination or group of such associations formed with a view to propagating or influencing political opinion and participating in elections for any elective public office or for membership of a legislative body, including an Assembly, the Senate, or local government;

The definition in the Act is so clear that the Parliamentarians did not consider the need of further explanation. To the contrary, rule 94 of the Rules provides an explanation to the definition of a political party. It is a settled proposition of law that rules framed under a Statute must remain within its domain and cannot transgress the limits and parameters of the statute[4]. The explanation to rule 94 of the Rules is, therefore, beyond the scope of the definition of a political party, hence, amounts to transgressing the limits and parameters provided by section 2(xxviii) of the Act. The Constitution has recognized the right of formation of a political party, subject to any reasonable restrictions imposed by law in the interest of sovereignty and integrity of Pakistan, public order and morality. After complying with the provisions of sections 200 and 201 of the Act, a political party shall be enlisted with the ECP in a manner as provided by section 202 of the Act. Under section 215 of the Act, a political party enlisted under the Act shall be eligible to obtain an election symbol for contesting election for National and Provincial Assemblies as well as local governments. However, under section 215(5) of the Act, if a political party fails to comply with the provisions of section 209 or 210 of the Act, and fails to conduct its intraparty election, the ECP shall not allocate an election symbol to such political party or combination of political parties in subsequent election. This is the reasonable restriction imposed upon a political party in the circumstances.

16. Primarily, the purpose of allocation of a symbol to political parties is to facilitate their voters in identifying, recognizing and remembering the party's nominated candidates. If an election symbol of a political party is revoked for any reason, there is no penal consequence in the Act, except losing the right of having a common election symbol. Thus, refusing symbol to any political party does not affect its existence nor does it lose the rest of its rights available to it under the Constitution and the Act. Non-allocation of symbol to a political party, in no way prevents a candidate from filing a declaration about his affiliation with that political party, nor does it prevent such political party from nominating a candidate to contest an election. Once a political party is enlisted, it has a right under section 206 of the Act to nominate candidates for election to the National and Provincial Assemblies. If a candidate is nominated by a political party having no common symbol, under section 67(1) of the Act, he shall be allotted one of the prescribed symbols not allocated to any political party. Such political party can still propagate and influence political opinion and agenda in order to promote its nominated candidates. The primary role of a political party is to place a political agenda and policies to persuade people. To achieve its goal, a political party contests election by putting up candidates, and voters choose the party's nominated candidates on the basis of its manifesto, policies and programs. The party which wins majority seats in the election, forms a government and the parties which win less number of seats in the election, form an opposition. In any case, an enlisted political party shall exist and has a right to exercise its political power by participating in election, unless the Supreme Court upholds the declaration made against a political party by the Federal Government under section 212 of the Act, that such political party shall stand dissolved forthwith.

Status of PTI:

17. It is important to mention here that on account of not-conducting of intra-party election, the ECP had declined to allot symbol to PTI, because this is what section 215(5) of the Act stipulates. However, this did not mean that affiliation of the candidates with PTI stopped or that PTI stopped being a political party to contest election. Candidates from different constituencies from National and Provincial Assemblies filed nomination papers and declarations showing their affiliation with PTI, but the ROs while issuing list of contesting candidates drawn up in Form 33, declared them as independents. The decision of the ROs was solely based upon the explanation to rule 94 of the Rules and on account of the decision of the ECP, revoking symbol of PTI. The election authorities did not properly apply the relevant provisions of the Constitution and the Act. The PTI's affiliated candidates had submitted their declarations by 24 December 2023, much earlier than the judgment passed by this Court on 13 January 2024. The contention of the learned counsel for the ECP that the decision of declaring PTI's affiliated candidates as independents, were pursuant to the judgment of this Court, is unfounded. There was no restraining order either from the ECP or in the judgment of this Court, preventing PTI from nominating candidates and participating in election, but, the ROs and the ECP misinterpreted the said judgment, which created an anomaly.

18. Admittedly, a large number of renowned lawyers are members of PTI and many of them contested election of the year 2024 for the general seats in National and Provincial Assemblies, filing declarations about their affiliation with PTI. Surprisingly, none of them had challenged the order of the ROs, declaring them as independent candidates and their notifications being independent returned candidates issued by the ECP. It is not known as to what had prevented them to do so? The learned counsel for the appellant and the PTI were unable to assign any reason in this behalf. Though, a PTI candidate, Mr. Salman Akram Raja, challenged the order of the RO but did so only to the extent of declaring him as an independent candidate, but surprisingly he did not take the matter to its logical conclusion. His petition was objected to by the Registrar, against which, a chamber appeal was provided by the Supreme Court Rules, 1980 but he did not avail such remedy, for the reason best known to him. We must say that the administration of PTI and its nominated candidates for National and Provincial Assemblies, were equally responsible for misinterpreting the judgment of this Court by presuming the PTI's nominated candidates as independents. They were negligent in failing to challenge the orders of the ROs and the ECP.

Entitlement of PTI for the Reserved Seats:

19. In the case in hand, the matter pending before this Court pertains to administrative responsibility of the ROs and the ECP with regard to allocation of seats reserved for women and non-Muslims, as provided by the Constitution and the Act. They have committed an illegality by declaring PTI's affiliated candidates as independents. These appeals pending before us is a continuation of the original matter of publishing list of contesting candidates drawn up in Form 33 by the ROs and notifications of returned candidates issued by the ECP in their administrative capacities. Since right of the electorate and of candidates for the seats reserved for women and non-Muslims is involved, they cannot be penalized because of the act of the ROs, the ECP, the PTI's administration and of those 39 candidates, who did not agitate their grievances. To protect and preserve their constitutional right, we can take notice of the matter.

20. Choosing a candidate for general seats and the seats reserved for women and non-Muslims is one of the fundamental rights of an electorate, guaranteed by the Constitution and the law. It is therefore, not a matter solely of the PTI, rather it involves a constitutional right of an electorate and legitimate interests of women and non-Muslims, which has to be provided to them on the basis of general seats secured/won by PTI. Protecting their constitutional rights and interests should have been the prime consideration of the ROs and the ECP, but the needful was not done and they acted contrary to the command of the Constitution and the law. We do not agree with the reasons which prevailed upon the ROs and the ECP, declaring PTI's 39 affiliated returned candidates as independents. The electorate voted for them in their such capacity. The act of the ROs and the ECP, declaring them as independent returned candidates amounts to depriving them from their constitutional right of forming a Parliamentary Party of PTI in National and Provincial Assemblies. Similarly, it has also deprived the PTI's women and non-Muslims candidates from their legitimate fundamental right to participate in national life, and to promote agenda and policies of the political party, to which they were affiliated. Consequently, the members to the seats reserved for women and non-Muslims shall be elected in accordance with law on the basis of general seats won/secured, including the said 39 returned candidates.

Independents:

21. We have perused the nomination papers of 80 candidates, who joined SIC, out of whom, 41 candidates in clear terms declared themselves as independents, while filing their declarations without there being a certificate (ticket) from any party, including PTI. The date for submission of nomination papers as per the Schedule was with effect from 20 December 2023 till 24 December 2023. Admittedly, none of the candidates or the leadership of PTI came forward to claim that the candidates who declared themselves as independents, were actually the party's nominated candidates. There is nothing on the record to suggest that these 41 candidates were compelled, coerced, pressurized, misinterpreted the law or judgment of this Court or was there any other peculiar circumstance beyond their control, to declare their status as independents. In the given circumstances, there is no reason, why they should be considered as PTI's nominated candidates. Judges decide cases in accordance with the Constitution and law, based upon the material available before them. Any such contention must be supported by the record, which is lacking in this case, therefore, these 41 candidates were independents. In this behalf, observations made by the Hon'ble eight Members of the Bench in Paragraph 108 of the majority judgment as under:

108. ...The assertion of SIC and PTI that they were also PTI candidates and the electorate voted for them for their being PTI candidates though appears satisfactory but is not supported by the record presently before us. Therefore, it is the most challenging matter involved in the case where the scales of the requirements of law and of justice are to be justly, fairly and reasonably balanced.

22. According to section 67(3) of the Act, 'A candidate not nominated by any political party (hereinafter called as 'independent candidate')'. In Paragraph 110 of the judgment, authored by our learned brother Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J., it is stated that, according to section 66 of the Election Act, two elements make a person the candidate of a political party: (i) the candidate's own declaration that he belongs to that party, and (ii) the party's certificate (party ticket) nominating him as its candidate'. We agree with these findings and in the light thereof, there is no dispute that these 41 candidates did not file declarations about their affiliation with PTI, nor is there party's certificate (party ticket) nominating them as its candidates. This establishes the fact that at the time of submission of nomination papers, none of them had filed declarations about their affiliation with PTI, nor had a certificate (ticket) from the said party. All these candidates after being notified as independently elected candidates had an option to join PTI, instead they by exercising their constitutional right, joined SIC with free will and consent, and stated so in the affidavits filed by them. It is important to mention here that Mr. Salman Akram Raja, Advocate Supreme Court, appearing on behalf of PTI, surprisingly supported the stance of all those who joined SIC. The declarations in the nomination papers of 41 candidates were stated as independents, which were also accepted by this Court unanimously. It is for this reason, the Hon'ble majority Members gave the 41 independent candidates an option that they may join PTI by submitting declarations about their affiliation with PTI and to obtain certificates of their nomination by PTI, within a period of fifteen days. With great respect, we do not agree with the decision of majority members with regard to providing opportunity to 41 independently returned candidates, who have already joined SIC, by exercising their constitutional right. They are now members of SIC. Neither the Constitution nor the Act permits us to issue direction or provide an opportunity or additional avenue to them to join another political party and that too, within a period of fifteen days.

23. These are the reasons for our short order dated 12 July 2024, which is reproduced here under:

For reasons to be recorded later, we dispose of these appeals, petitions and miscellaneous applications through a short order as under:

1. These matters involve a controversy regarding the allocation of seats reserved for women and non-Muslims. The Sunni Itehad Council ("SIC") did not contest the General Elections of the year 2024. SIC, which demands allocation of reserved seats on account of inclusion of independent parliamentarians in it, did not secure a single seat in the National Assembly or any of the Provincial Assemblies nor submitted a list of its candidates for seats reserved for women and non-Muslims. Thus, it is not entitled to any of the reserved seats in the National Assembly and in the Provincial Assemblies. The impugned judgment and the order dated 1 March 2024 of the Election Commission of Pakistan ("ECP") to such extent is upheld.

2. Under Article 51(3) of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution"), the total number of seats in the National Assembly shall be 326, out of which 60 seats are reserved for women and 10 seats for non-Muslims. Such right of women and non-Muslims has been guaranteed by the Constitution. They shall be elected in accordance with the law through proportional representation system of political parties' list of candidates on the basis of total number of general seats secured by each political party from the Province concerned in the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies, as provided by Article 51(6) (d) and (e) of the Constitution. Therefore, they cannot be deprived of this right of theirs by leaving these seats vacant, and all reserved seats must be filled in, as provided by Article 224(6) of the Constitution.

3. The impugned judgment of the High Court and the said order of the ECP to the extent of the proportional representation distribution of seats amongst the political parties which won and secured seats is also maintained, however, since the ECP calculated and allocated the seats to the parties by the exclusion of the Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI") candidates, therefore, to such extent, the impugned judgment of the High Court and the order of the ECP are set aside.

4. During the hearing, it transpired that a number of candidates had submitted their nomination papers declaring on Oath that they belonged to PTI supported by an affiliation certificate of the said party, though some did not submit affiliation certificates of PTI, however, since they stated on Oath that they belonged to PTI, and did not contradict themselves, they should be considered to be members of PTI in the National and the Provincial Assemblies. The ECP by misinterpreting the judgment of this Court dated 13 January 2024, which was regarding non-holding intra-party elections in PTI, wrongly mentioned the said candidates of the PTI as independents in Form 33 of the Election Rules. The ECP had no authority to declare validly nominated candidates of a political party to be independent candidates. Similarly, a candidate once declared himself/herself as a candidate of a political party, could not subsequently resile from his/her candidature of a particular party, after the last date of withdrawal of the nomination papers.

5. It is important to mention here that neither the PTI nor any candidate affiliated with PTI approached either this Court before or during the hearing of these proceedings, or the High Court to challenge the decision of the ECP, declaring them as independents. However, in view of the fact that the appeal and the petition are a continuation of election proceedings before the ECP, we can look into the vires of the decision of the ECP in the light of the provisions of Article 51(1)(d) and (e) of the Constitution read with sections 66, 67 and 104 of the Elections Act, 2017 to safeguard the interest of women and non-Muslims. As a consequence whereof, the candidates who had submitted their nomination papers declaring that they belonged to PTI and had not filed a document showing affiliation with another political party before the last date of withdrawal of the nomi-nation papers, should have been treated as the Parliamentary Party of PTI, but the needful was not done by the ECP. Consequently, the PTI as a Parliamentary Party is entitled to the reserved seats. The ECP should recalculate and reallocate the reserved seats amongst the political parties, including the PTI, as provided by Article 51(6)(d) and (e) of the Constitution.

6. The candidates who had submitted their nomination papers by 24 December 2023, which was the last date of submission of nomination papers, and had declared themselves either as independent candidates or had left blank the relevant column in the nomination papers/declaration and were elected shall be considered to be independents. SIC is a registered political party and every independent member of the National Assembly and of the Provincial Assemblies has a right to join it. All those who joined the SIC are presumed to have done so out of their own free will. None of them claimed to have joined SIC because of any misunderstanding of any judgment, the law, compulsion, coercion or undue influence and it is not for this Court to presume otherwise. We must ensure that words are not read into the Constitution nor to ascribe artificial meaning to commonly understood words. We must also abide by validly enacted laws and must not do anything either to hinder or facilitate a political party by ignoring the laws mandate.

Judge

Qazi Faez Isa, CJ. I agreed with the short order dated 12 July 2024 authored by Justice Jamal Khan Mandokhail and agree with his detailed reasons thereof which have been issued today.

2. However, I consider it my duty to point out the constitutional violations and illegalities in the majority's short order of 12 July 2024, and the majority's detailed judgment of 23 September 2024, the order/ clarification of 14 September 2024 and the Clarification of 18 October 2024 (respectively 'the majority's short order', 'the majority's judgment', 'the majority's order/clarification' and 'the majority's Clarification'). I do hope and expect that my distinguished colleagues in the majority[1] will reflect and correct their mistakes and ensure that Pakistan is governed in accordance with the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan ('the Constitution'). Unfortunately, the review petitions against the majority short order could not be heard because my Hon'ble colleagues (Justice Syed Mansoor Ali Shah and Justice Munib Akhtar) outvoted me on the Committee constituted under the Supreme Court (Practice and Procedure) Act, 2023; attached is my separate note to the minutes of the meeting held on 18 July 2024.

3. These appeals were heard by a thirteen-member Bench of this Court, comprising of all judges of the Supreme Court.[2] The majority's short order concluded by permitting the Election Commission of Pakistan ('ECP') and Pakistan Tehreek-i-Insaf ('PTI') to, 'apply to the Court by making an appropriate application, which shall be put up before the Judges constituting the majority in chambers for such orders and directions as may be deemed appropriate'. This deviated from how courts have always functioned, was novel and unprecedented.

4. The majority of eight judges decided to part ways with the Court, comprising of thirteen judges, which had heard the appeals. The majority set up its own virtual court, permitted the making of 'an appropriate application' by the ECP and PTI, and directed that such appropriate application would only be heard by them whilst cloistered in Chambers. In doing this the majority of the Hon'ble Judges effectively legislated, because neither the Constitution nor any law permits what they did. Incidentally no party or counsel during the hearing ever suggested the course of action which the majority adopted, and neither the majority's short order nor the majority's judgment offers an explanation to justify it. In effectively legislating the Hon'ble Judges in the majority also contradicted themselves. They stated that the ECP and the PTI may 'apply to the Court' but then proceeded to state that only the 'judges constituting the majority' would hear the 'appropriate application'. This was not the only contradiction. It has been settled by the Supreme Court that a hearing of a case after it has been decided (which would be a review petition) should be by the same Bench and by the same number of Judges as had earlier heard the case:[3]

'Needless to mention that the dissenting Judges on the Bench that heard the case, subject to their availability, are necessary members of the Bench constituted to hear review petition filed against the majority judgment, i.e., judgment of the Court,... .'

'10. As the judgment of the Court is considered to be the judgment of all the members of that Bench, irrespective of its being majority judgment or unanimous judgment, there can be no difference in judicial powers of the members ... . Hence, there can be no fetters on the exercise of his judicial power as that would offend the fundamental constitutional value of independence of the judiciary.'

5. The majority disregarded the precedents of this Court, including the above. They not only carved out a separate eight-member 'court' from the thirteen-member Court, but also innovated further by not finally concluding the hearing of the appeals, because they permitted appropriate application to be filed, introduced timelines and changed what the Constitution provided.

6. The timelines that were introduced were as under:

(i) 41 returned candidates to file a statement within 15 days;

(ii) Upon receipt of the above statements the ECP to give notice to the political party concerned;

(iii) Then within 15 days the political party to submit its 'confirmation that the candidates contesting the General Elections as its candidates'; and

(iv) The ECP within 7 days to issue and post on its website 'the list of candidates now MNAs'.

7. Judges may decide or dispose of a case as per their understanding of the Constitution and the law but it is critical that the case must be decided or disposed of. Permitting appropriate application to be filed by the ECP or the PTI meant that the case was not decided or disposed of. This coupled with the stated timelines effectively kept the appeals pending. In civil cases after a judgment is pronounced the decree follows. In constitutional cases too a judgment can be executed, provided it is finally and conclusively decided. The majority's short order and the majority's judgment did not conclude the appeals. The well trodden legal path was abandoned by the majority which created unnecessary and avoidable problems. Since the appeals were not finally decided there was no decision which could be stated to be binding, in terms of Article 189 of the Constitution. Similarly, contempt of court proceedings for any non-compliance of the 'order of the Court', under Article 204 of the Constitution, cannot be initiated. The right of review, which Article 188 of the Constitution grants, was also effectively negated.

8. The majority's short order was announced on 12 July 2024, following which the Hon'ble Judges had to issue their detailed reasons for the same. Instead something inexplicable happened. A purported 'order' was uploaded on the Supreme Court's website on 14 September 2024, and this was done without informing the Chief Justice, the other Judges (in the minority), and bypassing the Registrar and the office of the Supreme Court. And, this was done on a Saturday, after the Registrar had left. The Deputy Registrar who was still in the premises of the Supreme Court submitted the following note to (me) the Chief Justice, after 8 pm on Saturday, 14 September 2024:

'I bring it to your kind notice that a news is floating on the media that Supreme Court of Pakistan has issued clarification of order dated 12.07.2024 passed in C.A. No. 333/2024 (Election - National Assembly / Reserved Seats). However, neither cause list was issued, nor notices were issued to the parties by the office and the order has still not been received in office till 8.00pm and was uploaded on the website.

Submitted for information, please.'

9. In view of the unusual happenings (mentioned above) I sought the following information from the Registrar; my questions and the answers from the Registrar are mentioned below:

| Questions by the Chief Justice | Answers by the Registrar |
|---|---|
| 1) When were the said applications filed? | The application of the ECP was received in the office of the Registrar on 26 August 2024. |
| 2) Why were the said applications not fixed before the Committee constituted under the Supreme Court (Practice and Procedure) Act, 2023? | These applications were not placed before the Committee in view of the majority's short order as directed by them to hear it in Chambers. |
| 3) How were the said applications fixed for hearing and how was this done without issuance of cause list disclosing their fixation? | These applications were not fixed for hearing rather were placed before the majority Judges in Chambers. As such no cause list was issued. |
| 4) Did the office issue notices to the parties and to the Attorney-General for Pakistan? | Notices were not issued to the parties nor to the Attorney-General for Pakistan. |
| 5) In which courtroom/ chamber were the applications heard, and by whom? | No hearing took place on these applications as the applications were placed before the majority Judges in Chambers. |
| 6) Why was a cause list not issued for announcement of the said order? | As the matter was placed before the majority Judges in Chambers and no hearing took place on the applications,therefore, the cause list for announcement of the said order was not issued. |

| 7) Why was the said order not fixed for announcement? | Neither any hearing took place on the applications nor the judgment/order was reserved, rather the same was decided by the majority Judges in Chambers. |
| 8) Without first depositing the original file and the said order in the Supreme Court's office how was the said order uploaded on the website? | Webmaster of IT Directorate uploads orders on the official website of this Court and did so on the directions of the Hon'ble Judges. |
| 9) Who directed the uploading of the said order on the Supreme Court's website? | As reported, the Webmaster of IT Directorate uploaded the said order on the official website of this court on 14 September 2024 on the direction of Mr. Sadaqat Hussain, Sr. PS to Justice Syed Mansoor Ali Shah (HJ-1). As also reported, he received the said order via Whatsapp from Mr. Sadaqat Hussain at 4:32 pm on 14 September 2024 along with the Tagline. |

10. The majority's order/clarification was admittedly passed without first listing the cases, without issuing notices to the parties and without issuance of the requisite notice to the Attorney-General for Pakistan. The title of the 'order' stated - 'In Chambers'. However, not all of the said eight Hon'ble Judges were in the Supreme Court premises and some were not even in Islamabad. By not issuing notices, not granting an opportunity of hearing, and not conducting the hearing in open Court, the well established rules of natural justice were transgressed, and Article 10A of the Constitution, which gives protection to procedural fairness and has elevated due process and fair trial to the status of a Fundamental Right, was contravened. A nine-member Bench of this Court had recently rendered the following unanimous opinion:

'The proceedings of the trial by the Lahore High Court and of the appeal by the Supreme Court of Pakistan do not meet the requirements of the Fundamental Right to a fair trial and due process enshrined in Articles 4 and 9 of the Constitution and later guaranteed as a separate and independent Fundamental Right under Article 10A of the Constitution.'[4]

11. The majority's order/ clarification was incorporated into the majority's judgment (in its paragraph 58), however, the title of the 'order' was changed to 'clarification'. The Hon'ble Judges may have realized their non-compliance with Article 10A of the Constitution, therefore, in the majority's judgment they stated that, 'there was no legal requirement nor did we find it necessary to hear the parties before clarifying our own order'. However, it was acknowledged that the same was done 'without issuing notice to or hearing the parties'. With respect, to say that there was no legal requirement to hear the parties disregarded innumerable judgments of this Court. 'It has been laid down as principle of law by the superior courts that in every statute, principle of natural justice of hearing a person... shall be deemed to have been embodied.'[5] It is a '...principle of natural justice that an order affecting the rights of a party cannot be passed without an opportunity of hearing.'[6] '...the appellant shall have the right of being heard.'[7] By not hearing the parties to the appeals the Hon'ble Judges also effaced several millennia of jurisprudence.[8] No provision of the Constitution, law or precedent was cited to support that there was 'no legal requirement' to hear the parties. The mandatory requirement of openness and transparency were also transgressed. Secrecy and one-sided determinations are the harbingers of suspicion and mistrust, and undermine the trustworthiness and standing of courts.

12. The majority's order/ clarification was followed by yet another; the majority's Clarification which, like the earlier one of 14 September 2024, was uploaded on the website of the Supreme Court in similar manner. This was done on Friday, 18 October 2024 at 3.59 pm. This time too the cause list was not issued, parties were not informed, and an opportunity of hearing was not provided. Where and when the Hon'ble Judges had met also remains a mystery. The title of the majority's Clarification is baffling, it stated, 'In Chambers at Islamabad and Karachi', that is, simultaneously in two cities. The majority's judgment (in paragraph 120) had stated that they were 'parting with the judgment', but almost a month later (on 18 October 2024) in the majority's Clarification they invalidated their own parting.

13. In my 46 years association with the law, I have not come across such novel methodology (as mentioned above), nor learnt of such practice being in vogue in any other country governed by the rule of law. In Chittaranjan Cotton Mills Ltd. v. Staff Union[9] this Court had (over four decades ago) stated the consequences of an improperly constituted court:

'Where the Court is not properly constituted at all the proceedings must be held to be coram non judice and, therefore, non-existent in the eye of law. There can also be no doubt that in such circumstances "it would never be too late to admit and give effect to the plea that the order was a nullity", as was observed by the Privy Council in the case of Chief Kwame Asante, Tredahone v. Chief Kwame Tawia (9 DLR 686 (PC)).'

The majority's order/clarification and the majority's Clarification cannot be stated to have been issued by a 'Court'; the forum which issued them was coram non judice. Moreover, such forum did not comply with the rudimentary principles of natural justice, of due process and of fair trial. Therefore, with great respect, the same do not constitute legal orders, and are of no legal effect. They also cannot be categorized as a 'decision' of the Supreme Court (in terms of Article 189 of the Constitution), resultantly, they need not be followed or acted upon.

14. Another significant departure from the Constitution by the majority's short order was to repeatedly refer to minorities therein. Minorities are neither mentioned in Article 51 nor in Article 106, and instead both provisions state 'non-Muslims'. Muslims and non-Muslims denote religious status; without reducing either's citizenship rights. To designate non-Muslims as minorities is suggestive of a reduced citizenship status. Minorities in the context of the Constitution could be any number of groups, such as, those with disabilities, the illiterate, racial or ethnic minorities, and may also include religious minorities (a sect within the same religion or of another religion). Substituting non-Muslims with minorities and disregarding the placement of these two words in the Constitution is neither linguistically nor textually correct.

15. The word minorities is used in the Constitution three times; in its Preamble and in the Principles of Policy.[10] Non-Muslims is used fifteen times in the Constitution.[11] Everyone who considers the Constitution, particularly Judges, must adhere to its language and not lift anything from one place and superimpose it on another provision. An eleven-member Bench of this Court in Benazir Bhutto v. Federation of Pakistan[12] held that:

'In construing constitutional provisions the expression used in one provision cannot be lifted and superimposed on the other provision which is not only against the canons of interpretation but also makes the reading of the provisions as a whole discordant.'

16. Articles 51 and 106 of the Constitution were under consideration in the appeals, however, the majority's short order and the majority's judgment not only disregarded their texts but effectively amended the Constitution. The Constitution can only be amended in the manner as stipulated therein (Articles 238 and 239), and judges have no role in amending it. In Hamza Rasheed Khan v. Election Commission of Pakistan[13] six judges of this Court categorically stated the obvious, which was that no court, including the Supreme Court, could confer jurisdiction upon itself:[14]

'12. Any court, including this Court, cannot by a judicial order confer jurisdiction on itself or any other court, tribunal or authority. The power to confer jurisdiction is legislative in character; only the legislature possesses it. No court can create or enlarge its own jurisdiction or any other court's jurisdiction. Nor any court has any inherent or plenary jurisdiction.

Because of the constitutional command in Article 175(2) of the Constitution, the courts in Pakistan do not possess any inherent jurisdiction on the basis of some principles of common law, equity or good conscience and only have that jurisdiction which is conferred on them by the Constitution or by or under any law.'

'26. ...conferring the jurisdiction, vesting the right of action, specifying the acts and providing the procedure would clearly amount to legislating rather than interpreting law.'

17. The majority's short order did not state that an implementation Bench had been constituted. However, even if it is assumed (for the sake of argument alone) that this is what the majority had done, even then the majority's order/ clarification and the majority's Clarification could not be issued by such a purported implementation Bench. In Adnan A. Khawaja v. State[15] a five-member Bench of this Court held, that:

'It goes without saying that an implementation Bench cannot go behind a concluded and final judgment or revisit the same.'

18. This Court is empowered to call others to account, therefore, it must all the more be self-accountable, as was expressed by a nine-member Bench of this Court in Liaquat Hussain v. Federation of Pakistan:[16]

'It may be seen that independence of Judiciary and its separation from Executive as mandated by the Constitution does not make its authority absolute but require its regulation within the four corners of laws, rules and procedure. Its normal functioning should be transparent and inspire confidence amongst general public. It is bound to exercise jurisdiction and authority within the prescribed domain so that it remains self-accountable.'

'...so long as the Parliament acts within the parameters of the Constitution, there is no restriction or prohibition to legislate on any subjects ... .'

19. Justice Syed Mansoor Ali Shah had disagreed with the then Chief Justice Umar Ata Bandial and Justice Ijaz ul Ahsan, and had dismissed the constitution petitions challenging the amendments made to the National Accountability Ordinance, 1999, stating that:

'...the majority judgment through a long winding conjectural path of far-fetched "in turn" effects has tried hard to "ultimately" reach an apprehended violation of the fundamental rights. The majority judgment has also fallen short to appreciate that what Parliament has done, Parliament can undo; the legislative power of the Parliament is never exhausted. If the Parliament can enact the NAB law, it can also repeal the entire law or amend the same.'

The five-member Bench of this Court in its decision (in the Intra Court Appeals[17] arising out of the above petitions), agreed with Justice Shah, and also agreed with him that the courts must not be influenced by politics and should preserve the future of democracy:

'Courts must rise above the 'hooting throng' and keep their eyes set on the future of democracy, undeterred by the changing politics of today. Courts unlike political parties don't have to win popular support. Courts are to decide according to the Constitution and the law even if the public sentiment is against them.'

20. Justice Syed Mansoor Ali Shah (in stating the above) had departed from his earlier decision in Jurist Foundation v. Federation and Pakistan[18] wherein a challenge to the appointment of General Qamar Javed Bajwa as the Chief of the Army Staff was made. The Government of the then Prime Minister Mr. Imran Khan, the then Law Minister Mr. Muhammad Farogh Naseem and the then Attorney-General Mr. Anwar Mansoor Khan wanted General Bajwa to continue as the Chief of the Army Staff. Mr. Muhammad Farogh Naseem even resigned from his position of Federal Law Minister to represent General Bajwa in Court. He was assisted by the learned Mr. Abid Shahid Zuberi. Within two days of the filing of the petition the petition was decided. The petition was neither allowed nor dismissed; instead what the respondents[19] wanted was given. The Court extended the tenure of General Bajwa by six months; which constituted legislating, and this is demonstrable from the judgment authored by Justice Syed Mansoor Ali Shah:

'Continuity of Incumbent COAS for Six Months

48. ...the tenure of a COAS and in the light of the assurance given by the Federal Government to address these issues through fresh legislation within six months, we ... find it appropriate to allow the current status of the COAS to continue for a period of six months, whereafter the new legislation (Act of the Parliament) shall determine his tenure and other terms of his service.' (p. 44)

The Constitution must never be made subservient to personal ambition, and those who do so, as well as their abettors and facilitators, should be made to face the consequences of their actions.

21. These appeals arise out of two civil petitions for leave to appeal[20] ('the said CPLAs') which had assailed the unanimous judgment dated 25 March 2024 of a five-member Bench of the Peshawar High Court by a political party, the Sunni Ittehad Council, which stated that the designated independent candidates in the National Assembly, who had joined it within the prescribed three days, as stipulated in the provisos to sub-clauses (d) and (e) of clause (1) of Article 51 of the Constitution, were their candidates, therefore, the Sunni Itthehad Council be given proportional representation from the seats reserved for women and non-Muslims, and the same be done in respect of the Provincial Assemblies, under sub-clause (c) of clause (1) of Article 106.

22. The said CPLAs came up for hearing before a three-member Bench[21] of this Court on 6 May 2024 when leave to appeal was granted, and on the very same day, the impugned judgment of the Peshawar High Court and ECP's order dated 1 March 2024 were suspended. The Court then stated that since the interpretation of the Constitution was required, therefore, the cases be placed before the Committee constituted under the Supreme Court (Practice and Procedure) Act, 2023 for the constitution of a larger Bench. The appeals (emanating from the said CPLAs), however, were ordered to be fixed on 3 June 2024, which was after almost a month.

23. I as Chief Justice, heading the Committee, proposed that these appeals should not be heard by those who may be considered to be the beneficiaries or affectees of the constitutional amendment which was then being discussed; to consider making the office of the Chief Justice a tenured three year post. The potential beneficiaries/affectees would have been the Chief Justice and five Judges,[22] and they would have been excluded from the Bench. However, the majority (Justice Syed Mansoor Ali Shah and Justice Munib Akhtar) did not agree. Therefore, I next proposed that the Full Court should hear these appeals.

24. The issue in these appeals was straightforward, which was to consider certain provisions of Articles 51 and 106 of the Constitution. However, these provisions were attended to in the majority's judgment cursorily. The first 58 paragraphs of the majority's judgment are devoted to a general discourse on elections, political parties, Articles 17 and 19 of the Constitution, certain provisions of the Elections Act of 2017, the rules made thereunder, the majority's short order and the majority's order/clarification. Reference was also made to an application (CMA No. 5913 of 2024, filed on 26 June 2024) on behalf of the PTI and Mr. Gohar Khan, but neither had signed it; the application was signed by an Advocateon-Record of this Court. The application states that the applicants 'may kindly be allowed to assist this August Court as interveners.' The majority's judgment also refers to eight articles, seven books mentioned fourteen times, fourteen foreign cases and two excerpts from speeches, but without stating their relevance to our Constitution, the Elections Act and the rules made thereunder.

25. Pakistan has a written constitution. The language used in the Constitution is easily understandable. Unlike the constitutions of some countries our Constitution is not centuries old nor does it use archaic words requiring extrapolating meaning therefrom. The majority's judgment, with respect, lost sight of the basics. The people of Pakistan are governed by the Constitution and by the laws enacted by their elected representatives, they do not want to be told how to govern themselves or made to encounter foreign doctrines, like the one expounded by the Austrian jurist and philosopher Hans Kelsen which was misapplied by the Supreme Court, and had caused untold misery to Pakistanis. In a rule based system like ours the applicable rules have to be applied, irrespective of one's own personal preferences. It is best not to interpolate one country's constitution with that of another. For instance, our Constitution requires that those wanting to contest elections must be a minimum twenty-five years of age, but in the United Kingdom the minimum age is eighteen years, and the minimum prescribed age for the President of Pakistan is forty years, but in the United States of America the age is thirty-five years. Just because in the United Kingdom or in the United State of America the stated age is different does not mean that it is correct or better, let alone that we should adopt it. We should do what our Constitution states.

26. The applicable provisions of our constitution are clear and self-evident, and it is best not to look for meaning which does not exist in the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan.

ORDER

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---A child (hereinafter referred to as "respondent No.1"), following the divorce of his parents in 2009 and the subsequent death of his mother, filed a suit for maintenance through his maternal grandmother against his father ("petitioner"). The trial court decreed the suit, fixing the maintenance allowance at Rs. 5,000/- per month, effective from November 2009 until respondent No.1 attained the age of majority, with a 10% annual increment, vide judgment dated 21.09.2015. Feeling aggrieved, the petitioner preferred an appeal before the learned Additional District Judge, Lahore, which was dismissed as non-maintainable vide order dated 17.10.2015. Subsequently, the petitioner challenged the judgment before the Lahore High Court, Lahore which was dismissed in limine vide order dated 11.05.2016 ("impugned order"). Hence, the present petition.

2. Courts must approach cases involving children with a dedicated child justice approach, rooted in a legal and moral obligation to protect, nurture, and rehabilitate children, ensuring their rights and well-being within the justice system. Child justice encompasses both children in conflict with the law, who require rehabilitative interventions rather than punitive measures, and children in contact with the law, who must be safeguarded and supported throughout judicial processes. As custodians of justice, courts must adopt a child justice approach that prioritizes the best interests of the child, recognizing their vulnerabilities, developmental needs, and potential. This approach demands sensitivity to their circumstances, ensuring access to education, shielding them from exploitation, and fostering an environment conducive to their growth and reintegration into society. As Nelson Mandela aptly said, "There can be no keener revelation of a society's soul than the way in which it treats its children."[1] By adhering to these principles, the judiciary not only fulfils its legal obligations but also demonstrates judicial sensitivity towards children, contributing to a just and compassionate society.

3. The Constitution of Pakistan, 1973, provides a robust framework for child justice. Article 25(3) empowers the State to enact special provisions for the protection of children, including measures that may favourably differentiate them from adults. Article 25A mandates free and compulsory education for children aged 5 to 16 years. Article 35 obliges the State to protect children, while Article 37(e) ensures just and humane working conditions, explicitly prohibiting the employment of children in vocations unsuitable to their age or sex. This constitutional framework underscores child justice, prioritizing the well-being, rehabilitation, and reintegration of children into society, while addressing their unique rights and vulnerabilities within judicial processes.

4. As a signatory to the the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child ("UNCRC") in 1989, Pakistan is under an international obligation to take special measures to protect and rehabilitate children who come into conflict with the law.[2] The UNCRC provides a framework for child justice systems globally, emphasizing dignity, rehabilitation, and reintegration. Pakistan's constitutional mandate, combined with its international obligations, has catalyzed the establishment of a child justice system in the country. The adoption of UNCRC in 1989, almost universally ratified, marked a global paradigm shift in the international community's perspective, recognizing children as rights holders, not merely vulnerable dependents in need of special care.[3]

5. To fulfil the mandate of child justice, the UNCRC outlines guiding principles[4] affecting children. These principles, inter alia, include: (i) Ensuring that the best interests of the child is given primary consideration[5]; in all actions where children are directly, or indirectly involved or affected by the justice system, the best interests of the child should be a primary consideration, (ii) Guaranteeing fair and equal treatment of every child, free from all kinds of discrimination; a child in conflict with the law shall be treated without discrimination of any kind, (iii) Advancing the right of the child to express his or her views freely and to be heard; all children in conflict with the law have the right to participate in decisions affecting them, and in particular, to be given the opportunity to be heard in any judicial or administrative proceedings; (iv) Protecting every child from abuse, exploitation and violence[6]; children in contact with the law should be protected from any form of hardship while going through state and non-state justice processes and thereafter. (v) Treating every child with dignity and compassion[7]; children should be treated with care, sensitivity, fairness and respect throughout any procedure or case, with special attention for their personal situation, well-being and specific needs, and with full respect for their physical and psychological integrity, (vi) Respecting legal guarantees and safeguards in all processes; basic procedural safeguards as set forth in relevant national and international norms and standards shall be guaranteed at all stages of proceedings in state and non-state systems, as well as in international justice, (vii) Preventing conflict with the law as a crucial element of any juvenile justice policy; within juvenile justice policies, emphasis should be placed on prevention strategies facilitating the successful socialization and integration of all children, in particular through the family, the community, peer groups, schools, vocational training and the world of work, and (viii) Using deprivation of liberty of children only as a measure of last resort and for the shortest appropriate period of time; provisions should be made for restorative justice, diversion mechanisms and alternatives to deprivation of liberty. By adopting these principles and a child-centered approach, justice systems can provide fair, equitable, and effective solutions tailored to children's unique needs and circumstances. This also aligns with the the principle of restorative justice which is an approach to justice that focuses on repairing the harm caused by a crime or conflict, rather than solely punishing the offender. It involves the victim, the offender, and the community in a search for solutions which promote repair, reconciliation, and reassurance.[8]

6. A child-centered approach in the judiciary is essential because it acknowledges that children, unlike adults, are still in their formative years and are particularly vulnerable to the psychological and emotional impacts of legal proceedings. Scholars such as Karl Hanson and Olga Nieuwenhuys have emphasized that a child-centered approach recognizes that "children shape, interpret, and practice what their rights are," and emphasizes "living rights" --- rights as dynamically experienced and realized by children.[9] This approach advocates for judicial processes that are rehabilitative rather than punitive, protecting the child's dignity while fostering rehabilitation and reintegration into society. Such a framework aligns with both national and international legal standards, ensuring that children's voices are heard, their rights safeguarded, and their future prospects protected.

7. Courts, particularly at the district level, must adopt this approach to ensure that the justice system meets the unique needs, rights, and vulnerabilities of children. By prioritizing children's best interests in judicial decisions, the judiciary can promote long-term societal benefits, reduce recidivism, and support the development and well-being of future generations. As the saying goes, "In serving the best interests of children, we serve the best interests of all humanity."[10]

8. We have examined the present case with a child justice lens, prioritizing the best interests of the child -- an approach that the courts must employ when dealing with cases involving children in contact or in conflict with the law. In this case, we see no jurisdictional error, illegality, or procedural irregularity in the impugned order. Therefore, we are of the view that the impugned order does not warrant any interference. Leave is, therefore, declined, and this petition is dismissed.

MH/M-60/SC Petition dismissed.

ORDER

In response to the notice issued to the Additional Registrar (Judicial) of this Court, requiring an explanation as to why the cases (C.P.L.A. No. 836- K of 2020, etc.) were not fixed on 20.01.2025 in compliance with the court order dated 16.01.2025 and to show cause why contempt proceedings should not be initiated against him for such non-compliance of the court order, Mr. Muhammad Salim Khan, the Registrar of this Court, has appeared on behalf of the Additional Registrar (Judicial), Mr. Nazar Abbas, who is reported to be indisposed.

2. The Registrar has presented copies of two decisions made by two different Committees: first, the decision of the Committee constituted under Section 2 of the Supreme Court (Practice and Procedure) Act, 2023 ("Act"); and second, the decision of the Committee constituted under Article 191A of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan ("Constitution"). He stated that the Committee constituted under Section 2 of the Act convened its meeting on 17.01.2025 and, by a majority decision, decided to "withdraw" the said cases from the regular Bench and refer them to the Committee established under Article 191A of the Constitution. Subsequently, the latter Committee convened its meeting on the same date, i.e., 17.01.2025, and directed that all cases challenging the vires of the 26th Constitutional Amendment be fixed for hearing before the Constitutional Bench on 27.01.2025. He explained that, because of these decisions of the two Committees, the aforementioned cases were not be fixed by the office for hearing on 20.01.2025 before the regular Bench.

3. Mr. Salahuddin Ahmed, counsel for the respondents (C.P.L.A. 836-K/2022), has submitted that the vires of the 26th Constitutional Amendment were not challenged in the cases being heard by the regular Bench; rather, the issue under consideration was limited solely to the jurisdictional bar of regular Benches under Article 191A of the Constitution. Therefore, it appears that the said cases do not fall within the purview of the decision rendered by the Committee established under Article 191A of the Constitution. Even otherwise, he submitted, the Committee established under Article 191A of the Constitution is required to pass a speaking order to determine whether the matter should be placed before the Constitutional Bench or a regular Bench as required under Section 2A of the Act. He has further submitted that there are two preliminary issues involved in the proceedings. First, the explanation advanced by the Registrar is that the case was not fixed before this Court due to the decisions of the Committees constituted under Section 2 of the Act and under Article 191A of the Constitution, both dated 17.01.2025. Therefore, the legal validity of the explanation of the Registrar must be examined and determined by the Court. Second, whether the decisions of the Committees taken on the administrative side cannot undo the effect of a judicial order. In support of this contention, learned counsel relied upon Malik Asad Ali v. Federation of Pakistan (1998 SCMR 15, 1998 SCMR 130, PLD 1998 SC 161) and Human Rights Case No. 14959-K of 2018 (PLD 2019 SC 183). Additionally, he cited the unreported order dated 21.05.2024 passed by the Islamabad High Court, Islamabad, in W.P. No. 3061/2022, titled Muhammad Sajid v. Imran Khan. He also placed reliance on Nusrat Bhutto v. Chief of the Army Staff (PLD 1977 SC 657), Syed Zafar Ali Shah v. General Pervez Musharaf (PLD 2000 SC 869), and CJP Iftikhar Muhammad Chaudhry v. President of Pakistan (PLD 2010 SC 61) to contend that the judicial powers of this Court cannot be taken away through administrative orders. Lastly, learned counsel submitted that the issue at hand affects the judicial powers of all judges of this Court. Therefore, propriety demands that this matter be placed before the Full Court. In support of this contention, learned counsel referred to Justice Qazi Faez Isa v. President of Pakistan (2019 SCMR 1875), CJP Iftikhar Muhammad Chaudhry v. President of Pakistan (PLD 2010 SC 61) and Malik Asad Ali v. Federation of Pakistan (PLD 1998 SC 161).

4. The above contentions of the learned counsel have given rise to the following substantial questions of law of public importance:

(i) whether the Committees constituted under Section 2 of the Act and Article 191A of the Constitution have the authority to withdraw a case in which cognisance has already been taken by a regular bench and serious questions of constitutional law relating to the jurisdiction of the regular Bench have been framed; and

(ii) whether the said Committees can, by an administrative order, undo the effect of a judicial order, whereby next date of hearing a specific case has been fixed before a regular Bench.

Under Article 190 of the Constitution, all executive and judicial authorities throughout Pakistan, including officers within the establishment of this Court, are required to act in aid of the Supreme Court, meaning in aid of its judicial orders, not administrative orders. Furthermore, in accordance with the constitutional mandate of Article 5 of the Constitution, every citizen, including officers within the establishment of this Court, is bound to obey the Constitution and the law. Accordingly, the legality of the explanation put forth by the Registrar, as well as the outcome of the present contempt proceedings, hinges upon the determination of the aforementioned questions.

5. In light of the significance of the questions involved, we hereby appoint Mr. Hamid Khan, Sr. ASC, and Mr. Muneer A. Malik, Sr. ASC, as amici curiae to assist the Court in addressing the aforementioned questions. Further, Mr. Shahid Jamil Khan, ASC, has also sought permission to assist the Court in the matter. As he represents one of the respondents in the main cases, his request is granted. Notice is also issued to learned Attorney General for Pakistan to conduct these proceedings as well as assist the Court on the above questions.

6. The hearing is adjourned to tomorrow, i.e., 22.01.2025, for arguments on the above questions.

ORDER

Mr. Nazar Abbas (accused person) has tendered appearance and seeks time to file his written statement. Let the needful be done by tomorrow i.e. 23.01.2025. It is clarified that on 21.01.2025 the Registrar of the Court had tendered appearance on behalf of Mr. Nazar Abbas and submitted on his behalf that the case was not fixed on 20.01.2025 because of the two decisions of the Committees constituted under Section 2 of the Supreme Court (Practice and Procedure) Act, 2023 (the "2023 Act") and Article 191(A) (4) of the Constitution. Hence the defence presented by the Registrar on behalf of the Additional Registrar were the two Committees decisions dated 17.01.2025.

2. The learned Attorney General for Pakistan has pointed out that the amicus curiae appointed by this Court yesterday are already counsel in cases challenging the 26th Constitutional Amendment before the Constitutional Bench. Be that as it may, the question before us is the scope of Section 2 of the 2023 Act and does not directly relate to the 26th Constitutional Amendment. Even otherwise, we have asked the learned A.G.P. to suggest other names for appointing as amicus curiae, who are not associated with the challenge laid against the 26th Constitutional Amendment. He remained reluctant to suggest a name. We, therefore, appoint Mr. Ahsan Bhoon, learned ASC, and Khawaja Haris Ahmad, learned ASC as amici curiae in addition to the amici already appointed. Office is directed to intimate them so that can make it convenient to appear in person or through video link before the Court tomorrow.

3. Mr. Shahid Jamil Khan, learned ASC, representing respondents in the main case tendered appearance and requested to assist the Court on the question framed by the Court vide order dated 21.01.2025. He referred to Articles 204(c) and 175(2) of the Constitution to submit that the jurisdiction under Article 187 (Complete Justice) is also available to the Bench and hence the decisions of the Committee can be examined by the Bench. He submits that the administrative order cannot override a judicial order and to the extent of inconsistency the administrative order is void and non est. He has placed reliance on para-43 of case reported as Malik Asad Ali and others v. Federation of Pakistan through Secretary, Law, Justice and Parliament Affairs, Islamabad and others (PLD 1998 SC 161), Human Right case in the matter regarding disposal of infectious wastes in the Province of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa (PLD 2019 SC 183) and Muhammad Imtiyaz v. Ch. Muhammad Naeem and others (PLD 2023 SC 306). Walking us through the Supreme Court (Practice and Procedure) Act, 2023, the learned counsel read Sections 2 and 2A and submitted that all the cases pending in the Supreme Court must first be taken-up by the original Committee under Section 2 of the 2023 Act and if the question arises before that Committee whether a case ought to be heard by the Constitutional Bench or the Regular Bench it ought to be referred to the Committee constituted under Article 191A of the Constitution under Section 2A. In the end he submits that the question as to how the Benches are to be regulated is a matter of some serious concern and therefore ought to be heard by a Full Court of this Court.

4. Mr. Munir A. Malik, learned counsel has tendered appearance as amicus curiae. He submits that two fundamental questions arise in this case: (i). that all the cases pending in the Supreme Court are to be first examined by the Committee constituted under Section 2 the 2023 Act and only if a question arises that the matter ought to be sent to the Committee constituted under Article 191A(4) of the Constitution (Section 2A of the Supreme Court (Practice and Procedure) Act, 2023), can the case be sent to the said Committee. (ii). that judicial order cannot be trumped by an administrative order because that directly affects the independence of the judiciary. He added that a case being heard by a Bench cannot be withdrawn through an administrative order. He submits that these questions are of fundamental importance and go to the root of the independence of the judiciary and submits that it ought to be heard by a Full Court of this Court so that the matter is settled once and for all. When asked whether such an order can be passed in contempt proceedings, he submits it can be as in the present case the very defence presented by the accused person is that the case was not fixed before the Court because of the decisions of the two Committees dated 17.01.2025.

5. Mr. Hamid Khan, learned counsel has tendered appearance as amicus curiae and has referred to para-4 of the order passed by this Court on 21.01.2025. He read out the two questions of public importance framed in the said paragraph. Rephrasing the two questions he submits; i). whether a judicial order and its implementation can be undone or varied by a Committee exercising administrative and procedural powers of the Court; and ii). whether a constitutional question coming-up before a Bench of the Court could be decided by it or referred to a Full Court for its determination. He then referred to Articles 175 and 176 of the Constitution to submit that the Supreme Court has been constituted under Article 175 and its constitution has been described under Article 176 of the Constitution. Both these Articles read together do not envisage any divisibility within the Supreme Court regarding the exercise of judicial power. The learned amicus was on his legs when the Court had to rise for today. To come-up tomorrow i.e. 23.01.2025.

MH/I-1/SC Order accordingly.

Muhammad Ahsan Bhoon, Advocate Supreme Court, Amicus curiae

Salahuddin Ahmed, Advocate Supreme Court, Shahid Jamil, Khan, Advocate Supreme Court, Counsel for Respondents (in CPLA 836-K of 2020, etc.)

Nazar Abbas, Addl. Reg. (J), SCP. (The respondent/accused in person)

Dates of hearing: 21st, 22nd and 23rd January, 2025.

ORDER

The underlying facts that have given rise to an unsavoury situation are that a three-member Bench of this Court (comprising Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, Ayesha A. Malik, and Irfan Saadat Khan, JJ.) heard certain cases (CPLA No. 836-K of 2020, etc.) on 13 January 2025. At the outset of the proceedings, an objection was raised regarding the Bench's jurisdiction to hear these cases, which involved a challenge to the constitutionality of a law, on the basis of Article 191A of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan ("Constitution"). After hearing arguments of the learned counsel on the jurisdictional objection, the Bench adjourned the hearing to 16 January 2025 by allowing time to the learned counsel for the parties to make preparation to further assist the Court on the points concerning the jurisdictional objection. The order dated 13 January 2025 is reproduced below:

At the very outset, the learned counsel for the petitioners submitted that the present regular bench of the Court cannot hear these cases, as they involve a challenge to the constitutionality of a law, namely, subsection (2) of Section 221-A of the Customs Act, 1969. When asked why this bench cannot hear these cases, the learned counsel referred to the provisions of Article 191A, which was added to the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan through the 26th Constitutional Amendment. In response to the petitioners' objection regarding the lack of jurisdiction of the present bench of the Court, the learned counsel for the respondents contended that Article 191A, the basis of the objection regarding jurisdiction, is constitutionally invalid as it infringes upon the salient features of the Constitution, including the independence of the judiciary and the separation of powers among the three organs of the State. He further submitted that a constitutionally invalid amendment cannot oust the constitutionally valid conferment of jurisdiction on the regular benches of the Court.

2. When asked how the present bench of the Court can decide upon the constitutional validity of the newly added Article 191A, the learned counsel for the respondents took the position that since the objection raised and the basis thereof pertain to the jurisdiction of the present bench, it must be decided by it. In support of his stance, he referred to Sabir Shah v. Shad Muhammad Khan (PLD 1995 SC 66), Fazlul Quader Chowdhry v. Abdul Haque (PLD 1963 SC 486) and Marbury v. Madison (5 US 137 [1803]) and sought time to further assist the Court on this point.

3. Given the objection raised and the reply thereto, we find that it would be necessary to first decide upon the same before proceeding further in the matter at hand. Therefore, the learned counsel for the parties are granted time to prepare their arguments and assist the Court on the said points. The hearing for arguments on those points is adjourned to 16.01.2025.

On 16 January 2025, the three-member Bench stood reconstituted, with Aqeel Ahmed Abbasi, J., replacing Irfan Saadat Khan, J., and the said cases were posted before the reconstituted Bench. However, the reconstituted Bench could not proceed with the hearing, as Aqeel Ahmed Abbasi, J., was one of the two judges who had delivered the impugned judgment in these cases in the High Court of Sindh. Consequently, the reconstituted Bench (comprising Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, Ayesha A. Malik and Aqeel Ahmed Abbasi, JJ.) directed the office, by its order dated 16 January 2025, to fix these cases before the earlier Bench on Monday, 20 January 2025, at 1:00 pm. The order dated 16 January 2025 is reproduced below for ready reference:

These cases were heard on 13.01.2025 by a bench comprising Mr. Justice Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, Mrs. Justice Ayesha A. Malik and Mr. Justice Irfan Saadat Khan and were posted for 16.01.2025, however, the bench today cannot hear this matter, as the impugned judgment has been authored by one of us (Aqeel Ahmed Abbasi, J.). Considering that it was a part heard matter, let these cases be posted for 20.01.2025 at 01:00 p.m. before the same bench comprising Mr. Justice Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, Mrs. Justice Ayesha A. Malik and Mr. Justice Irfan Saadat Khan. Notice shall also be issued to the Attorney General for Pakistan under Order XXVII-A of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 ("C.P.C.").

On 20 January 2025, Mr. Salahuddin, ASC (counsel for one of the respondents in the said cases), appeared before the Bench (comprising Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, Ayesha A. Malik, and Aqeel Ahmed Abbasi, JJ.) that had passed the aforementioned order and pointed out that the cases had not been fixed for hearing as per the court order dated 16 January 2025. The Bench called for the Additional Registrar (Judicial); however, due to his unavailability, the Deputy Registrar (Judicial) appeared. The Deputy Registrar confirmed that the cases had not been fixed on that day, i.e., 20 January 2025 before any regular Bench but had instead been fixed for hearing before the Constitutional Bench on 27 January 2025, pursuant to the decision of the Committee constituted under the Supreme Court (Practice and Procedure) Act, 2023 ("Act"). He further submitted that the decision of the Committee had not yet been communicated to the office, in writing. Upon receiving information of these facts, the said Bench initiated suo motu contempt proceedings against the Additional Registrar (Judicial) for defiance of the court order and for obstructing the administration of justice. The Bench, while calling for his explanation, fixed the hearing of the contempt proceedings for 21 January 2025 by its order dated 20 January 2025. Relevant paragraphs 4 and 5 of the order dated 20 January 2025 are reproduced below:

4. It is a sad state of affairs that a judicial order of this Court has been ignored by the office and the cases put up before the Committee for a decision, despite the precedents of this Court to the contrary reported as Asad Ali v. Federation of Pakistan (1998 SCMR 15), Asad Ali v. Federation of Pakistan (1998 SCMR 130) and Human Rights Case No. 14959-K of 2018 (PLD 2019 SC 183). The defiance of the judicial order of this Court lowers the dignity and honour of this Court and hamper the administration of justice. In this background, let notice be issued to the Additional Registrar (Judicial) of this Court as to why contempt proceedings may not be initiated against him.

5. Office shall number this petition and fix it for hearing before us tomorrow i.e., 21.01.2025, when the additional Registrar (Judicial) shall appear in person with the explanation as to why the above-mentioned cases have not been fixed before the Bench today.

On 21 January 2025, the Bench that had passed the aforementioned order was reconstituted, excluding Ayesha A. Malik, J., from the Bench, and the suo motu contempt proceeding was listed before this reconstituted two-member Bench (comprising Syed Mansoor Ali Shah and Aqeel Ahmed Abbasi, JJ.).

2. On 21 January 2025, in response to the notice issued to the Additional Registrar (Judicial) of this Court, the Registrar of the Court appeared on behalf of the Additional Registrar (Judicial), who was reported to be indisposed. The Registrar presented copies of two decisions made by two different Committees: first, the decision of the Committee constituted under Section 2 of the Act; and second, the decision of the Committee constituted under Article 191A of the Constitution. He stated that the Committee constituted under Section 2 of the Act convened its meeting on 17 January 2025 and, by a majority decision, resolved to "withdraw" the said cases from the regular Bench and refer them to the Committee established under Article 191A of the Constitution. Subsequently, the latter Committee convened its meeting on the same date, i.e., 17 January 2025, and directed that all cases challenging the vires of the 26th Constitutional Amendment and vires of law be fixed for hearing before the Constitutional Bench on 27 January 2025. He explained that, because of these decisions by the two Committees, the said cases were not fixed by the office for hearing on 20 January 2025 before the regular Bench. The explanation provided by the Registrar, coupled with the contention raised by Mr. Salahuddin, ASC (counsel for one of the respondents in the said cases), gave rise to the following substantial questions of law of public importance:

(i) Whether the Committees constituted under Section 2 of the Act and Article 191A of the Constitution have the authority to withdraw a case [from a Bench], in which cognisance has already been taken by a regular Bench and serious questions of constitutional law relating to the jurisdiction of the regular Bench have been framed; and

(ii) Whether the said Committees can, by an administrative order, undo the effect of a judicial order, whereby next date of hearing a specific case has been fixed before a regular Bench [to hear arguments on the jurisdiction of the regular Bench].

The Court observed that "[u]nder Article 190 of the Constitution, all executive and judicial authorities throughout Pakistan, including officers within the establishment of this Court, are required to act in aid of the Supreme Court, meaning in aid of its judicial orders, not administrative orders. Furthermore, in accordance with the constitutional mandate of Article 5 of the Constitution, every citizen, including officers within the establishment of this Court, is bound to obey the Constitution and the law. Accordingly, the legality of the explanation put forth by the Registrar, as well as the outcome of the present contempt proceedings, hinges upon the determination of the aforementioned questions."

3. In light of the significance of the questions involved, the Court appointed Mr. Hamid Khan, Sr. ASC, and Mr. Muneer A. Malik, Sr. ASC, as amici curiae to assist in addressing the aforementioned questions. Additionally, the Court granted permission to Mr. Shahid Jamil Khan, ASC (counsel for one of the respondents in the main cases), to assist in the matter. Notice was also issued to the learned Attorney-General for Pakistan to provide assistance on the above questions. The hearing was then adjourned to 22 January 2025 for arguments on these questions.

4. On 22 January 2025, the Court heard the arguments of Mr. Shahid Jamil Khan, ASC (counsel for one of the respondents in the main cases), as well as those of the learned amici curiae, Mr. Muneer A. Malik, Sr. ASC, and Mr. Hamid Khan, Sr. ASC. The Court also appointed two additional amici curiae, Mr. Ahsan Bhoon, ASC, and Khawaja Haris Ahmad, ASC, to assist in addressing the said questions, and adjourned the hearing to 23 January 2025.

5. On 23 January 2025, the Court heard further arguments of Mr. Hamid Khan, Sr. ASC, the learned amicus curiae, as well as from Mr. Salahuddin, ASC (counsel for one of the respondents in the main cases). The Court also heard the arguments of Mr. Ahsan Bhoon, ASC, and Khawaja Haris Ahmad, ASC, the learned amici curiae, as well as the learned Attorney-General for Pakistan.

6. On the same day, i.e., 23 January 2025, the respondent-accused, Mr. Nazar Abbas, the Additional Registrar (Judicial), filed his written reply (Crl.M.A. No. 134/2025) to the show cause notice. He explained his position mostly in the same terms as the explanation provided by the Registrar of the Court, on his behalf on 21 January 2025, as noted above. Some relevant portions of his reply are reproduced below:

1. That the answering respondent in reply to the subject Notice begs to submit that the undersigned has held this Hon'ble Court in the highest respect and esteem throughout his 36 long years of service with unblemished service record. Accordingly, the undersigned cannot even imagine wilful flouting or disregarding any order passed by this Hon'ble Court especially on the last leg of his service career which is going to end in a couple of weeks.

7. That as per the Court Roster, the requisite Bench for the purpose of hearing CPLA No.836-K/2020 etc. was not available on 20.01.2025, therefore, a note was initiated for constitution of Special Bench comprising Hon'ble Judges as mentioned in the order dated 16.01.2025, which partly heard the matter on 13.01.2025.

8. That upon perusal of the office note, the HCJ was pleased to place the matter before the Committee constituted under Section 2(1) of the Supreme Court (Practice and Procedure) Act, 2023 in the following terms: "May be placed before the Committee tomorrow at 12 noon."

9. That on 17.01.2025, the Committee constituted under Section 2(1) of the Supreme Court (Practice and Procedure) Act, 2023 decided through majority vote that the matter be placed before the Committee constituted under Article 191A(4) of the Constitution of Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973.

10. That the Committee constituted under Article 191A(4) of the Constitution of Islamic Republic of Pakistan 1973 held its meeting at 12:45 pm on 17.01.2025 and resolved that all cases challenging the 26th Constitution amendment and vires of Law be fixed before the 8 members Constitutional Bench on 27.01.2025, the Court Roster be issued accordingly.

12. That the constitution of Benches or approval of the Roster is beyond the capacity as well as jurisdiction of the answering respondent. The responsibility of the answering respondent at the most is to apprise the Competent Authority to the non-availability of any appropriate bench, which has been not only conveyed before time but also has been suggested to be met with by formation of special Bench so there is no lapse on the part of the answering respondent in the whole scenario.

13. That act of the office regarding non-fixation of the case before the Bench, was neither deliberate not wilful, it was in pursuance of the decisions taken by the two Committees. The answering respondent initiated an office note to comply with the order of the Court dated 16.01.2025 in letter and spirit by the constitution of the requisite Special bench and having no intention to withhold or disobey the order of the Hon'ble Court.

PRAYER

Inspite of the above facts, the answering respondent surrenders himself at the mercy of this Hon'ble Court with further prayer that the Show Cause Notice dated 20.01.2025 may kindly be withdrawn in the interest of justice.

7. We have considered the explanation provided by the respondent-accused in his reply to the show cause notice, as well as the arguments of the learned amici curiae, the learned Attorney-General and the learned counsel for some of the respondents in the main cases.

Preliminary points regarding the jurisdiction of the Benches that passed the orders dated 13 and 16 January 2025

8. First, we find it appropriate to address two preliminary points raised before us regarding the jurisdiction of the Benches that passed the orders dated 13 and 16 January 2025.

9. The first point raised was that the three-member Bench, which passed the order dated 13 January 2025, lacked jurisdiction to hear cases involving a challenge to the constitutionality of a law, as such matters fall within the exclusive domain of the Constitutional Bench under Article 191A of the Constitution. It was also argued that the said Bench could not examine the vires of the 26th Constitutional Amendment, whereby Article 191A was added to the Constitution, as this too falls within the exclusive domain of the Constitutional Bench under Article 191A.

10. The said point was also rebutted before us with the submissions that the Bench which passed the order dated 13 January 2025 had not commenced hearing the matter concerning the constitutionality of the law. Instead, it was hearing arguments on the objection raised to its jurisdiction to entertain such matters based on Article 191A. Furthermore, the Bench was also deliberating on whether it could examine the constitutionality of Article 191A itself, as the objection to its jurisdiction was rooted in that very Article. Thus, the Bench was addressing the jurisdictional question rather than the substantive matter of the constitutionality of the law involved in the cases before it. Since Khawaja Haris Ahmad, the learned amicus curiae, has provided his written articulation on this point, we find it expedient to reproduce the relevant portion here:

It is noteworthy that when, on 13.01.2025, the learned Bench took up the matter relating to its jurisdiction to entertain and decide the CPLAs (filed under Article 185(3) of the Constitution) fixed before it, this involved neither assuming jurisdiction over the merits of the CPLAs, nor decision of constitutionality of any law point involved in the CPLAs. Rather, in effect, it only took upon itself the task of ascertaining if Article 191A(3) could be so construed as to exclude the Bench's jurisdiction to hear the CPLAs. To do so, the learned Bench was dealing with the matter like any other case where question of jurisdiction is raised - i.e. (i) first looking at the wording of the provision itself to see if it per se excluded the Court's jurisdiction; and, (ii) if so, to see whether the provision of law relied upon for excluding the Court's jurisdiction constitutes valid law or not. Thus, in the instant case, the learned Bench would first examine the words of Article 191A(3) to ascertain if a plain reading of it excludes the Court's jurisdiction in the matter; and, if such exclusion is a necessary consequence, then the Court would proceed to ascertain the constitutional validity of Article 191A(3). Prima facie it appears that the aforesaid exercise in not covered by exclusionary provisions of Article 191A(3) of the Constitution.

Similarly, Mr. Shahid Jamil Khan, ASC, adopted the same stance. In addition to the cases of Pir Sabir Shah,[1]1 Fazlul Quader Chowdhry[2] and Marbury[3] referred to by Barrister Salahuddin, he also cited extracts from Justice Fazal Karim's Judicial Review of Public Actions (2nd Edition, Volume 3, pages 1403-1406), where the learned author has discussed several cases from American, English and Pakistani jurisdictions on this point.

11. The second point raised was that the three-member Bench, which passed the order dated 16 January 2025 directing the office to fix certain cases before a particular Bench, acted without lawful authority, and that the said order was passed in contravention of the law governing the constitution of Benches and the assignment of cases. It was contended that the constitution of Benches falls within the domain of the Committee established under Section 2 of the Act, whereas the assignment of cases to Benches is the exclusive authority of the Chief Justice of Pakistan under the Supreme Court Rules, 1980. This point was also contested before us by referring to several precedents where Benches have issued directions for fixing cases even before the Full Court.

12. We are afraid we cannot address or adjudicate upon the above points in the present contempt proceedings, as the said points raised before us are misplaced. This Bench is not seized with a review petition against the orders of the three-member Benches dated 15 and 16 January 2025. Instead, we are only dealing with the contempt proceedings initiated for the alleged non-compliance with that order. A similar point was raised before this Court during the contempt proceedings against Syed Yousaf Raza Gilani, the then Prime Minister of Pakistan, regarding non-compliance with the directions issued in a judgment.[4] In that case, a seven-member Bench of this Court rejected the same in the following terms:

The Respondent's stand amounts to saying that the order of this Court is non-implementable, as he believes that the same is not in accord with the Constitution of Pakistan and the International law. This argument, if accepted, would set a dangerous precedent and anyone would then successfully flout the orders of the Courts by pleading that according to his interpretation they are not in accord with the law. A judgment debtor would then be allowed to plead before the executing Court that the decree against him was inconsistent with the established law. No finality would then be attached to the judgments and orders of the Courts, even those by the apex Court of the Country. ... The executive authority may question a Court's decision through the judicial process provided for in the Constitution and the law but is not entitled to flout it because it believes it to be inconsistent with the law or the Constitution. Interpretation of the law is the exclusive domain of the judiciary.

(Emphasis added)

Guided by the above reasoning of a larger Bench of this Court, we similarly dispose of the said points with the observation that if any of the parties to the cases in which the said orders were passed, or any other person, was aggrieved by the same, he could have availed of the legal remedy of seeking a review of the order through the judicial process provided under the Constitution and the law. But, no one is entitled to disobey or decline compliance with the court order merely because he believes it to be inconsistent with the Constitution and the law.

13. Next, we proceed to take up and address the aforementioned questions of law, for which the assistance of the learned amici curiae was sought.

(i) Whether the Committees constituted under Section 2 of the Act and Article 191A of the Constitution have the authority to withdraw a case from a Bench in which cognisance has already been taken by a regular Bench and serious questions of constitutional law relating to the jurisdiction of the regular Bench have been framed.

14. The practice of hearing part-heard cases by the same Bench is so well-established in our jurisdiction that neither the learned counsel assisting this Court on the above question nor our research assistants could find and cite any case from our jurisdiction in which a dispute arose and was adjudicated regarding the withdrawal of a part-heard case from one Bench and its reassignment to another, without a request being made by the original Bench hearing the case in its judicial order. However, such disputes have arisen and been adjudicated upon in the neighbouring jurisdiction, i.e., the Indian jurisdiction, in several cases. Since the bench constitution and case-assignment legal framework in both our jurisdiction and the neighbouring jurisdiction are largely similar, the jurisprudence developed there would offer valuable insights for the determination of the question under consideration before this Court. The relevant portions of some of these cases are, therefore, cited below:

Zikar v. Govt. of State of M.P. AIR 1951 Nag 11 (DB)[5]

The point for consideration is whether the power to regulate the sittings of the High Court which the Chief Justice undoubtedly possesses can be invoked for withdrawing and transferring a case of which a Division Court is in seisin. The power to regulate the sittings of the Court which is an administrative power cannot afford any basis for regulating the mode of hearing of a case by a Court properly seized of it. The power to withdraw and transfer a case from such a Court without its concurrence is a power to prevent the exercise of jurisdiction by that Court which can only be done by virtue of a superior power of control or correction, for which authority must be found either in an express provision or by necessary implication. There is no express provision and in our view there is no warrant for any such implication.

The argument of the learned Counsel for the applicant that the application should have been placed before the Honourable the Acting Chief Justice or that the Acting Chief Justice has the power to withdraw or transfer a case before us without our concurrence is devoid of any basis in law and is in fact opposed to precedents.

M. Ranka v. Hon'ble the Chief Justice (1991) 2 L.W. 225 (DB)[6]

With respect we disagree with the last observation of S. Ramalingam, J. that a party or a counsel may make a special mention before the Chief Justice so that the case pending before one Bench may be posted before another Bench. So far as other two observations are concerned, we think it right to say that if for some reasons, the learned Judges assigned with a case or cases, find that they should not hear the case or the cases, they may direct the papers to be placed before the Chief Justice for posting such case or cases before some other Bench and in some extraordinary circumstances, the counsel appearing in a case may make a special request that a particular case or cases may not be heard by a particular Bench for reasons none other than the reasons that are spelt out in the principles that no one shall be a judge in his own cause (Nemo debet esse judex propria causa). So far as the first rule is concerned, if the Judge himself or the Judges themselves say that a particular case or cases assigned to him/them say be taken out of his/their list, there should be no difficulty. So far as the second rule is concerned in which it is said that a counsel may bring to the notice of the court that a particular case or cases may not be heard by a particular Bench or a Judge of the court means to say only that the counsel would being a fact to the notice of the court and no more. He cannot be allowed to insist or ask this Court not to hear a case. It will be again for the Judge or the Judges hearing the case to decide whether they should say that the cases be listed before another Judge or Bench or not. Judges of the court including the Chief Justice are equals and exercise the same judicial power except such powers that are specifically assigned to the Chief Justice. There is no reason to concede a power in the Chief Justice to transfer a case from one Bench to another Bench of the Court or from one Judge to another Judge of the Court. Act of allocating business or portfolio or assigning case or cases is different from the act of recalling the case from the file of a particular Judge or a Bench of the court and from transferring a case from the file of a particular Judge or a Bench of the court and from transferring a case from the file of a particular Judge or a Bench of the court, to another Judge or a Bench of the court because any decision about it would partake the character of a judicial order.

(Emphasis added)

Jawahar Ram Gupta v. Hon'ble Chief Justice 1996 (27) ALR 557 The Chief Justice is free to assign a case where he will, but transferring an already assigned case from one Judge to another, we reiterate with emphasis, is not an authority which the Supreme Court observed for itself was with it. After April 13, 1996 when the Chief Justice had assigned this matter to this Court, the sanctity of the proceedings, as the Supreme Court has held, cannot be interfered with even by the legislature.

Activity outside the courtrooms in Court cases, and such Sunday residence orders of Chief Justices, could have disastrous consequences in the High Court's handling of matters, particularly those sensitive matters which many already try to avoid hearing.

This Court records with great humility, and concern, that what the Supreme Court could not do, the Hon'ble the Chief Justice was misled to do and at his residence, not in Court. Whatever be the degree of the in facie curiae contemptuous situation, it will be judged by the Division of the High Court concerned. The reservation also will be considered by that Division. Otherwise, what will be happen is that the record will remain within the portals of the court of Record in perpetuity as no Division will be able to enter judgment. On this the Supreme Court clearly reflected: "As for transfer from one Judge to another, there again is no original jurisdiction which we can exercise. It is not a fundamental right and so Article 32 has no application and there is no other law to which recourse can be had".

The above extracts illustrate a well-established practice that once a case is assigned to a Bench and that Bench has taken seisin (assumed jurisdiction) of the matter and partly heard it, the Chief Justice cannot unilaterally withdraw it and reassign it to another Bench except under specific, judicially recognised circumstances. This practice is firmly rooted in the high constitutional value of judicial independence whereby a Bench enjoys the freedom and independence to adjudicate upon a lis it has taken cognisance of. When a Bench is seized of a case and has partly heard it, the matter becomes part of judicial pro- ceedings, and the Bench hearing the case assumes exclusive jurisdiction over it. Any interference-whether through withdrawal or reassignment-without judicial justification undermines the principle of judicial independence.

15. The said practice imposes a significant limitation on the administrative powers of the Chief Justice. While the Chief Justice has the authority to regulate the formation of Benches and allocate cases as an administrative function, these powers do not extend to withdrawing or transferring a part-heard case from a Bench that has already assumed jurisdiction. Such withdrawal or reassignment is not merely an administrative act but a judicial one. Consequently, any such action must either stem from a judicial order passed by the Bench seized of the matter or be supported by express statutory authority if carried out by another court or authority.

16. The principles of judicial propriety and case continuity require that a Bench, once seized of a case, must see it through to its conclusion, barring exceptional circumstances. Arbitrary withdrawal or reassignment of a case after it has been partly heard sets a dangerous precedent, undermines the sanctity of judicial proceedings and erodes public confidence in the judiciary. Exceptional circumstances that may justify the reassignment of a case include instances where the Bench seized of the matter makes a judicial request for reassignment due to recusal, conflict of interest or other valid reasons. As the decision regarding the withdrawal or reassignment of a case partakes of the character of judicial process. Such decisions cannot rely solely on administrative discretion, as this would compromise the finality and integrity of judicial orders. These principles collectively affirm that the sanctity of judicial proceedings takes precedence over administrative powers, thereby safeguarding the impartiality and independence of the judiciary.

17. For almost similar reasons that create a bar on the power of assignment of cases concerning the withdrawal and reassignment of part-heard cases, this Court held in Human Rights Case No. 14959-K of 2018 (PLD 2019 SC 183) that a similar limitation also applies to the constitution of benches. It was held and observed in that case:

The above Rule [of Order XI of the Supreme Court Rules 1980] provides for administrative powers of the Chief Justice to constitute benches. However, once the bench is constituted, cause list is issued and the bench starts hearing the cases, the matter regarding constitution of the bench goes outside the pale of administrative powers of the Chief Justice and rest on the judicial side, with the bench. Any member of the bench may, however, recuse to hear a case for personal reasons or may not be available to sit on the bench due to prior commitments or due to illness. The bench may also be reconstituted if it is against the Rules and requires a three-member bench instead of two. In such eventualities the bench passes an order to place the matter before the Chief Justice to nominate a new bench. Therefore, once a bench has been constituted, cause list issued and the bench is assembled for hearing cases, the Chief Justice cannot reconstitute the bench, except in the manner discussed above.

7. In the absence of a recusal by a member of the Bench, any amount of disagreement amongst the members of the Bench, on an issue before them, cannot form a valid ground for reconstitution of the Bench. Any reconstitution of the Bench on this ground would impinge on the constitutional value of independence of judiciary. The construct of judicial system is pillared on the assumption that every judge besides being fair and impartial is fiercely independent and is free to uphold his judicial view. This judicial freedom is foundational to the concept of Rule of Law. Reconstitution of a bench while hearing a case, in the absence of any recusal from any member on the bench or due to any other reason described above, would amount to stifling the independent view of the judge. Any effort to muffle disagreement or to silence dissent or to dampen an alternative viewpoint of a member on the bench, would shake the foundations of a free and impartial justice system, thereby eroding the public confidence on which the entire edifice of judicature stands.

Public confidence is the most precious asset that this branch of the State has. It is also one of the most precious assets of the nation.

While relying on the above observations in the case of Muhammad Imtiyaz,[7] this Court reiterated that the arbitrary reconstitution of Benches undermines the integrity of the judicial system and may have serious repercussions. If Benches are changed arbitrarily without justifiable reasons, it creates doubts and raises concerns about the fairness of the system. The public may question the impartiality of a judicial process that appears arbitrary. To uphold the rule of law, transparency and fairness in the matters of the constitution of Benches and the assignment of cases is imperative to maintain the independence, integrity and prestige of this Court.

18. We may mention here that it was argued before us that the cases concerning the powers of the Chief Justice, decided prior to the promulgation of the Act, have become irrelevant following the establishment of the Bench Constitution Committee under Section 2 of the Act, which has been endorsed by the Full Court of the Supreme Court on the judicial side in the case of Raja Amer.[8] We, however, are not persuaded by this argument for the simple reason that it was categorically held in Raja Amer that the powers of the Committee under Section 2 of the Act are the same as those previously exercised by the Chief Justice. The relevant observation is as follows:

Both the powers of suo motu invoking original jurisdiction and constituting benches were earlier being exercised by one person, the Chief Justice; it is these administrative powers that have now been conferred on the Committee comprising three persons, i.e., the Chief Justice and the two most senior Judges - nothing more nothing less.[9]

Therefore, whatever was stated in the referred cases regarding the powers of the Chief Justice to assign or withdraw cases from Benches fully applies to the Committees as well.

19. In view of the settled jurisprudence of the sub-continent on the constitution of Benches and the assignment of cases discussed above, we answer question (i) in the negative. We hold that the Committees constituted under Sections 2 of the Act and 191A of the Constitution lack the authority to withdraw a case that has been partly heard, where cognisance has already been taken by a regular Bench, and transfer it to another Bench, unless the Bench itself refers the case to the Committees for its assignment to another Bench for some justifiable reason. Such partly heard cases may include those where serious questions of constitutional law concerning the jurisdiction of the regular Bench have been framed, some arguments on those questions have been heard and the hearing has been adjourned for further arguments.

(ii) Whether the said Committees can, by an administrative order, undo the effect of a judicial order, whereby next date of hearing a specific case has been fixed before a regular Bench to hear arguments on the jurisdiction of the regular Bench.

20. This question need not detain us long, as a similar issue was addressed and decided by a Full Court of this Court in the case of Malik Asad Ali.[10] It was held in the said case that an administrative order passed by the Hon'ble Chief Justice (acting under restraint) passed in derogation of a judicial order would be without lawful authority and of no legal effect. In that case, the Chief Justice's administrative declaration, which sought to invalidate the convening of a Full Court under a judicial order of a Bench for hearing cases listed in Supplementary Cause List No. 405 of 1997, was declared illegal.

21. The above cited observations of a seven-member Bench of this Court in the contempt case against Syed Yousaf Raza Gillani are equally relevant. It was observed therein that "the executive authority may question a Court's decision through the judicial process provided for in the Constitution and the law but is not entitled to flout it because it believes it to be inconsistent with the law or the Constitution." This principle applies with equal force to the executive authority of the Chief Justice or the Committees, as the case may be.

22. Therefore, it can be held unequivocally that no administrative authority, including the Committees constituted under Section 2 of the Act and 191A of the Constitution, can, by an administrative order, undo the effect of a judicial order. Question (ii) is answered accordingly.

23. We may mention here that it was also argued before us that the Committees did not pass any administrative orders to undo the effect of the judicial orders. Instead, it was contended, the cases were transferred to the Constitutional Bench through the operation of law under Clause (4) of Article 191A, which states that all petitions, appeals or review applications against judgments rendered or orders passed, to which Clause (3) applies, pending or filed in the Supreme Court prior to the commencement of the Constitution (Twenty-sixth Amendment) Act 2024, stand transferred to the Constitutional Bench. However, we find this argument misconceived, and it is sufficiently answered by the formulation provided by Khawaja Haris Ahmad, the learned amicus curiae. For ease of reference, his formulation is again reproduced here:

It is noteworthy that when, on 13.01.2025, the learned Bench took up the matter relating to its jurisdiction to entertain and decide the CPLAs (filed under Article 185(3) of the Constitution) fixed before it, this involved neither assuming jurisdiction over the merits of the CPLAs, nor decision of constitutionality of any law point involved in the CPLAs. Rather, in effect, it only took upon itself the task of ascertaining if Article 191A(3) could be so construed as to exclude the Bench's jurisdiction to hear the CPLAs. To do so, the learned Bench was dealing with the matter like any other case where question of jurisdiction is raised - i.e. (i) first looking at the wording of the provision itself to see if it per se excluded the Court's jurisdiction; and, (ii) if so, to see whether the provision of law relied upon for excluding the Court's jurisdiction constitutes valid law or not. Thus, in the instant case, the learned Bench would first examine the words of Article 191A(3) to ascertain if a plain reading of it excludes the Court's jurisdiction in the matter; and, if such exclusion is a necessary consequence, then the Court would proceed to ascertain the constitutional validity of Article 191A(3). Prima facie it appears that the aforesaid exercise in not covered by exclusionary provisions of Article 191A(3) of the Constitution.

As evident from the above, the three-member Bench that passed the order dated 13 January 2025 was not deliberating on the constitutionality of the law challenged in those cases but was addressing the jurisdictional question, which every court inherently has the power to adjudicate. The Bench, which had previously referred such cases to the Constitutional Bench, was confronted with the principles governing a court's inherent power to decide jurisdictional questions. When the argument was prima facie supported by the referred precedents of the cases of Pir Sabir Shah, Fazlul Quader Chowdhry and Marbury, the Bench decided to adjudicate the jurisdictional matter after obtaining full assistance from the learned counsel for the parties, and the cases were adjourned to allow for further preparation and assistance on the jurisdictional issue.

24. In Pir Sabir Shah, the Court addressed the jurisdictional question of whether appeals filed before it under Section 8-B of the Political Parties Act, 1962, were competent and whether that provision was ultra vires the Constitution. Similarly, in Fazlul Quader Chowdhry, the Court dealt with the question of whether Clause (4) of Article 224 of the 1962 Constitution, which barred all courts from questioning the validity of constitutional amendments, was ultra vires the Constitution. The principle emerging from these cases is that if a dispute arises concerning a court's jurisdiction over a particular matter, the court has the power to hear and determine that dispute-even if its conclusion leads to the finding that it lacks jurisdiction. Moreover, in determining its jurisdiction, the court may examine the constitutionality of the law, including any constitutional provision, that confers or bars its jurisdiction. Based on this principle, the Bench that passed the order dated 13 January 2025 was acting within its jurisdiction. If, ultimately, it had determined that Article 191A validly excluded its jurisdiction, it would have transferred the cases to the Constitutional Bench in accordance with Clause (5) of Article 191A of the Constitution, and would not have proceeded to address the matter of the constitutionality of the law challenged in those cases.

25. For these reasons, we find that it was the administrative decisions of the Committees that illegally nullified the judicial orders and unlawfully deprived the regular Bench of its judicial power to decide the jurisdictional question raised before it. Such jurisdictional questions, as contended by Khawaja Haris Ahmad, do not fall within the ambit of Clauses (3) and (5) of Article 191A of the Constitution.

26. As both the above questions have been answered in the negative. We are sanguine that the office shall fix the main case i.e. CPLA No. 836-K of 2020, etc before the original three-member bench comprising Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, Ayesha A. Malik, and Irfan Saadat Khan, JJ. in the first week of February 2025.

Decision on the Explanation of the Alleged Contemner

27. Having answered the questions of law, we now turn to the validity of the explanation furnished by the alleged contemner in response to the show-cause notice. Under Section 17(3) of the Contempt of Court Ordinance 2003, we must determine whether the interests of justice require further action and whether a charge for contempt of court should be framed against him. As required by law, the alleged contemner was given an opportunity for a preliminary hearing, and we have duly considered his written reply, along with the documents filed in support thereof.

28. It has become evident from the record that in compliance with the court order dated 16 January 2025, the alleged contemner initiated a note on the same day-16 January 2025-regarding the constitution of a Special Bench comprising the Judges mentioned in the said order. However, the Committee constituted under Section 2 of the Act, by a majority comprising the Hon'ble Chief Justice and Hon'ble Justice Amin-ud-Din Khan, passed an order on 17 January 2025, withdrawing the cases from the regular Bench and directing that they be placed before the Committee constituted under Article 191A of the Constitution for fixation before the Constitutional Bench.

29. We find that the alleged contemner did what he could to comply with the court order. As stated in his written reply, he had no authority to constitute the Bench of Judges as mentioned in the court order. At most, he could inform the Competent Authority, which was done by him not only in a timely manner but also with a proposal for the constitution of the Special Bench comprising the Judges specified in the court order, for the fixation of cases before it as directed. The alleged contemner's failure to fix the case before the Bench specified in the court order, therefore, does not constitute a contumacious act on his part.

30. In a contempt appeal by the Registrar of the High Court of Sindh,[11] a fourteen-member larger Bench of this Court drew a distinction between a case of contempt against a party to the case and a case of contempt against an officer of the Court, in the following words:

A distinction has to be made between a case of contempt of Court based on defiance or violation of a judicial order in the nature of temporary injunction by a party whereby such party was restrained from acting in a particular manner but in spite of service of notice or having come to know of the passing of such order, acts in a manner to alter the position to his advantage so as to frustrate the temporary injunction and an act of mere non-submission of a report called for by the Court by an Officer of the Court. In the former case, the Court would take strict view and mere act of defiance of the judicial order would by itself justify raising of presumption that the doer of the act was guilty of contempt of Court unless he proves otherwise whereas in the latter case, it has to be determined on application of judicial mind as to whether the accused deliberately did not submit the report on account of having personal interest in any of the parties to cause damage to the other party in the case in which the report was called or had any personal interest which, if proved or established, would make the act of non-submission of the report mala fide. In the absence of any of these factors and element of contumacy, his conduct could not be held to have suffered from mala fides or contempt of Court. Mere non-compliance of an order, in the absence of contumacy, would not amount to contempt of Court.

Per Rana Bhagwandas, J. (Additional note)

It may be pertinent to observe further that every failure to comply with an order may not amount to be criminal contempt warranting action therefor. There may be cases where there are justifiable reasons or causes for non adherence of an order of a Court which would depend on the facts of each case. There may also be cases where non-compliance of the order was not wilful or deliberate. Likewise, there may be instances where compliance with an order of a Court may be beyond the scope of authority of a person to whom it is directed. Each-case, therefore, has to be examined in its proper perspective having regard to the facts and circumstances of a case. (Emphasis added)

Upon examining the case of the present alleged contemner, the Additional Registrar (Judicial) of this Court, we find that he did not deliberately avoid the fixation of the cases before the Bench as directed in the court order. There is no evidence to suggest that he had any personal interest in the matter or had connived with any of the parties to the case, nor did he act with the intention of causing damage to any of the parties to the case. There is no indication of mala fide intent in his actions. In the absence of any such factors or elements of contumacy, his conduct cannot be considered contumacious, nor can it be said to have suffered from mala fides, requiring contempt proceedings against him. For these reasons, by accepting his explanation, the show-cause notice issued against him for contempt proceeding is discharged.

Contempt Proceedings Against the Members of the Committees

31. We have also deliberated on the question of whether, following the discharge of the show-cause notice against the alleged contemner, the Additional Registrar (Judicial), the matter should be considered concluded or whether it should proceed further against the members of the two Committees, where the first Committee unlawfully withdrew the part-heard cases from a Bench and transferred it for the consideration of the other Committee, through an administrative order by undoing the effect of a judicial order. While the second Committee, in total disregard of the judicial order passed by the regular Bench, simply in pursuance of the direction of the first Committee, went ahead and fixed the case before the Constitutional Bench on 27 January 2025. Both the Committees were not legally authorized to take administrative decisions dated 17 January 2025 in violation of the judicial order. In this background, it appears that the matter has to proceed further against the members of the two Committees. However, judicial propriety and decorum demand that the said question be considered and decided by the Full Court of the Supreme Court so that it is authoritatively decided once and for all. We note with advantage that the matter of contempt proceedings against the Registrar of a High Court[12] was treated with such gravity that a larger bench of 14 Judges was convened to adjudicate it. Therefore, in our view, this issue is even more serious, warranting the collective and institutional deliberation of all Judges of this Court. Consequently, we refer this matter to the Hon'ble Chief Justice for the convening of the Full Court to deliberate and decide on this important issue.

32. We may clarify here that we have not referred this matter to the Committee constituted under Section 2 of the Act, as its authority is limited to constituting benches of the Supreme Court. The Full Court of the Supreme Court, however, is constituted by the Constitution itself under Article 176. The distinction between the benches of a Court and the Full Court is well-established and constitutionally recognised in the provisions of Article 203J(2)(c) and (d) of the Constitution and the responsibility of convening the Full Court conventionally falls within the domain of the Chief Justice.

33. Before parting with this judgment, we find it necessary to acknowledge and express our appreciation for the invaluable assistance rendered to us by all the learned amici curiae, especially on such short notice.

MH/M-2/SC Order accordingly.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---These two appeals have been filed under clause (5) of Article 63A of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan ("Constitution") to challenge the orders dated 21 November 2024 ("impugned orders") passed by the Election Commission of Pakistan ("Commission") regarding the declarations made by the Party Head of the Pakistan Muslim League (N) ("PML-N"), which were referred to the Commission by the Speaker of the National Assembly under clause (3) of Article 63A of the Constitution. In the declarations, dated 21 and 31 October 2024, the Party Head of PML-N declared that the appellant had intentionally defected from the Parliamentary Party of PML-N, on the grounds of his sitting on the opposition benches in the National Assembly with the Parliamentary Party of the Sunni Ittehad Council ("SIC") and his abstaining from voting on the Finance Bill 2024 (Money Bill) and the Constitution (26th Amendment) Bill, in contravention of the directions issued by the Parliamentary Party of PML-N. By the impugned orders, the Commission confirmed these declarations under clause (4) of Article 63A of the Constitution. Consequently, the appellant was de-seated from his membership in the National Assembly, and his seat (NA-262) was declared vacant.

2. Briefly, the background facts of the case are that the appellant contested for a seat in the National Assembly from NA-262, Quetta-I, in the 2024 general elections held on 8 February 2024. In the poll, the appellant secured 20,278 votes as an independent candidate, while the runner-up candidate, belonging to the Jamiat Ulema-e-Islam Pakistan, secured 12,887 votes and the PML-N candidate received 2,510 votes. Having secured the highest number of votes, the Commission declared the appellant elected as a returned candidate to the said seat in the National Assembly as an independent candidate, through its notification dated 15 February 2024, issued under Section 98 of the Elections Act 2017 ("Elections Act"). Subsequently, on 18 February 2024, a letter was submitted to the Commission by Mr. Muhammad Shahbaz Sharif, the then President of PML-N, under Rule 92(6) of the Election Rules 2017, informing the Commission that the appellant had joined PML-N through a consent affidavit dated 16 February 2024; whereas, on 20 February 2024, a similar letter was submitted to the Commission by Sahibzada Muhammad Hamid Raza, the Chairman of the Sunni Ittehad Council ("SIC"), notifying the Commission that the appellant had joined SIC through a consent affidavit dated 20 February 2024. The Commission accepted the letter received of the President of PML-N but rejected the letter of the Chairman of SIC. However, during the sessions of the National Assembly, the appellant used to sit on the opposition benches with members of the Parliamentary Party of SIC, and also did not vote on the Finance Bill 2024 and the 26th Constitutional Amendment Bill, contrary to the directions issued by the Parliamentary Party of PML-N. Consequently, the President of PML-N declared the appellant's defection from the political party, PML-N, and the Commission, by the impugned orders, confirmed these declarations. Hence, these appeals have been filed by the appellant.

3. Before the Commission, as well as before this Court, the appellant took the stance that he never joined PML-N; therefore, the question of his defection from that political party does not arise. The consent affidavit dated 16 February 2024, purporting to show his joining of PML-N, is fake and fabricated. In this regard, he has instituted a civil suit and filed a criminal complaint. In the civil suit, the said consent affidavit has been suspended, and in the preliminary inquiry conducted in the criminal complaint, it has been found to be fake and fabricated. The appellant elaborated that he belongs to Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf ("PTI") and initially filed his nomination paper to contest the seat of NA-262, Quetta-I, under the PTI party ticket. However, due to a dispute regarding PTI's intra-party elections and its election symbol, his nomination paper as a PTI candidate was rejected. Consequently, he filed another nomination paper as an independent candidate, and contested and won the election for the said seat as an independent candidate. Subsequently, he joined SIC through a consent affidavit dated 20 February 2024, in accordance with PTI's party decision. However, the joining of independent candidates to SIC has not been recognized as constitutionally valid by the Supreme Court in its judgment passed in Civil Appeal No. 333 of 2024 (Sunni Ittehad Council v. Election Commission of Pakistan); therefore, he remains an independent member of the National Assembly.

4. On the other hand, the stance of the Party Head of PML-N was that the appellant joined PML-N through his consent affidavit dated 16 February 2024 and did not challenge the said affidavit until he was declared to have defected from PML-N. The civil suit and criminal complaint filed by the appellant disputing the genuineness of the consent affidavit are an afterthought, intended solely to evade the consequences of defection. Once a consent affidavit for joining a political party is filed, it becomes irrevocable and cannot be substituted or withdrawn.

5. By the impugned orders, the Commission accepted the stance of the Party Head of PML-N and concluded that, after being elected as an independent candidate, the appellant joined PML-N on 16 February 2024. It further held that the appellant acted contrary to the directions issued by the Parliamentary Party of PML-N by abstaining from voting on the Finance Bill 2024 and the 26th Constitutional Amendment Bill. Consequently, the Commission confirmed the declarations made by the Party Head of PML-N and pronounced that the appellant had ceased to be a member of the National Assembly and that his seat had become vacant.

6. In addition to the above respective stances of the parties, the learned counsel for the appellant vehemently contended that the Commission does not possess jurisdiction under Article 63A of the Constitution to decide the disputed question of whether the consent affidavit dated 16 February 2024 is genuine or fake, and consequently, whether the appellant is a member of the Parliamentary Party of PML-N. He argued that only a Civil Court, not the Commission, is competent to adjudicate upon this disputed fact. Furthermore, he contended that the Commission's decision on this matter is not just, fair and reasonable. These contentions were refuted by both the learned counsel for the Party Head of PML-N and the Commission, who submitted that the Commission has the power to decide this question and has rightly determined the genuineness of the said consent affidavit.

7. We have considered the respective stances and contentions of the parties and, with the able assistance of their learned counsel, examined the material available on the record of the case.

8. Before examining the correctness of the Commission's decision regarding the genuineness of the appellant's consent affidavit dated 16 February 2024 and his alleged defection from PML-N, it would be expedient to first address the question of the Commission's jurisdiction: Does a Civil Court or the Commission have the jurisdiction to determine whether the member concerned is a member of the Parliamentary Party of a political party in proceedings under clauses (3) and (4) of Article 63A of the Constitution, for the purpose of determining his alleged defection from that political party?

9. A plain reading of Article 63A of the Constitution reveals that it grants power to the Party Head of a political party to declare that a member of the Parliamentary Party[1] of that political party has defected, if the member: (a) resigns from the membership of their political party or joins another Parliamentary Party; or (b) votes or abstains from voting in the House contrary to any direction issued by the Parliamentary Party to which he belongs, in relation to: (i) election of the Prime Minister or the Chief Minister, (ii) a vote of confidence or a vote of no-confidence, or (iii) a Money Bill or a Constitution (Amendment) Bill.[2] The use of the word "may" in granting this power to the Party Head indicates that its exercise is discretionary, not obligatory. Even if a member defaults under grounds (a) or (b), the Party Head is not obligated to declare defection necessarily and he may choose not to exercise this power. Furthermore, the requirement of providing the member concerned an opportunity to show cause as to why such a declaration should not be made against him underscores that the Party Head must exercise this power justly, fairly and reasonably, rather than whimsically or arbitrarily. The original jurisdiction conferred upon the Commission, as well as the appellate jurisdiction of this Court, to confirm or otherwise the declaration made by the Party Head, therefore, extends to examining whether the Party Head has exercised this power justly, fairly and reasonably.[3]

10. A plain reading of clause (1) of Article 63A also makes it evident that the power to make a declaration of defection has been granted only to the Party Head of a political party, not to any other office-bearer of the party, and that it can be exercised only in relation to a member of the Parliamentary Party of that political party in the House, not to any other member of the House. The existence of these two facts is a condition precedent for the exercise of the power to make the declaration of defection against a member of the House and for the exercise of jurisdiction by the Commission to confirm such a declaration.

11. However, Article 63A has not expressly conferred power on the Commission to determine the existence of these facts before exercising its jurisdiction to confirm, or otherwise, the declaration. Therefore, the question as to the power of the Commission to decide these preliminary or collateral facts, also referred to as jurisdictional facts, arose in the cases of Bahadur Khan Bangulzai[4] and Giyan Chand.[5] In Bahadur Khan Bangulzai, the fact in dispute was whether the person who made the declaration of defection was the Party Head of the political party concerned; while in Giyan Chand, the dispute was whether the person (a member of the House) against whom the declaration of defection had been made was a member of the Parliamentary Party of the political party whose Party Head had made the declaration, as is the case in the present matter.

12. In Bahadur Khan Bangulzai, the Balochistan High Court, after referring to several academic and judicial expositions on the doctrine of jurisdictional fact, concluded that "the Chief Election Commissioner has the jurisdiction to determine as to who is the head of the political party, being a jurisdictional fact. However, no powers are available to the Chief Election Commissioner for resolving inbuilt organisational structural disputes which might have cropped up in the folds of a political party." On appeal, this Court endorsed this conclusion and elaborated it further by holding that "if a plea is raised before the Chief Election Commissioner that the person who made the reference on account of alleged defection is not the head of the political party involved, the Chief Election Commissioner is obliged to examine the bona fides of such a plea. If the person who has made the reference as the Head of the political party involved has been acting as such in the past, the Chief Election Commissioner is supposed to proceed on the assumption that he is the Head of the political party involved. However, if he finds no reliable material to conclude that the person who made the reference is factually the Head of the political party involved, and the question relates to inbuilt organisational structural disputes within the political party, he may direct the parties to resolve the question through civil proceedings [in a Civil Court]."

13. In Giyan Chand, the Peshawar High Court observed that "the Chief Election Commissioner did not determine whether or not the jurisdictional fact in terms of Article 63-A of the Constitution existed in order to disqualify the petitioner" and that "Article 63-A of the Constitution prescribes certain facts as sine qua non for its application but none of the facts either existed or were proved against the petitioner by ANP inasmuch as the petitioner did not contest the election as a candidate or a nominee of ANP nor was he a member of ANP in terms of the requirements prescribed by the Constitution of ANP nor did he join ANP after being elected Member of the Assembly."

14. Since the decisions in both the above cases were primarily based on the doctrine of jurisdictional fact, we find it appropriate to briefly outline this doctrine as expounded in various judicial pronouncements.

15. The doctrine of jurisdictional fact connotes that if a certain state of facts must exist before a tribunal or authority can exercise the jurisdiction vested in it, such tribunal or authority may inquire into those facts to determine whether it has jurisdiction but cannot confer jurisdiction upon itself by making an erroneous decision regarding them. As per this doctrine, when a tribunal or authority is vested with jurisdiction limited to decide on a particular matter, it generally has the ancillary power to inquire into and ascertain the existence of facts collateral to that matter when their existence is disputed before it. This power to ascertain collateral facts- referred to as jurisdictional facts- forms the foundation for the exercise of its jurisdiction. A jurisdictional fact is, thus, one upon whose existence the assumption and exercise of jurisdiction by a tribunal or authority depend. It is a prerequisite fact whose existence must be ascertained before jurisdiction over a particular matter can be properly assumed and exercised. Its existence is a sine qua non or condition precedent to the assumption and exercise of jurisdiction. However, a tribunal or authority with jurisdiction limited to a particular matter cannot assume jurisdiction over a matter not conferred upon it by erroneously deciding the jurisdictional fact. An error in determining a jurisdictional fact constitutes a jurisdictional error, rendering the order passed without jurisdiction. Therefore, when a tribunal or authority is established by law to exercise jurisdiction over a particular matter, the legislature defines the scope of its powers. It may, either expressly or by necessary implication, stipulate that jurisdiction can only be assumed and exercised if a particular state of facts exists or is shown to exist. In such cases, though the tribunal or authority is obligated to objectively ascertain, in the event of a dispute, whether that state of facts exists before exercising jurisdiction over the matter, its decision on the existence of that state of facts-the jurisdictional fact-is not conclusive. Instead, the decision is subject to challenge before and final determination by the civil courts of plenary jurisdiction or is subject to correction by the constitutional courts through judicial review. However, where the legislature grants the power to determine not only the substantive matter but also the preliminary or collateral facts- referred to as jurisdictional facts- upon which further jurisdiction depends, the tribunal or authority has the power to conclusively determine whether the jurisdictional fact exists. In the latter case, its decision on jurisdictional facts stands on the same footing as a decision on the fact in issue or the adjudicatory fact regarding the substantive matter, and is likewise final, subject to any right of appeal to a higher forum; it cannot be challenged before a Civil Court of plenary jurisdiction.[6]

16. There is, therefore, a distinction in the legal effect of the ascertainment or determination of a jurisdictional fact by a tribunal or authority with limited jurisdiction, as expounded by Lord Esher, M.R.,[7] and subsequently adopted by this Court[8] and the Indian Supreme Court,[9] in two scenarios: (1) where the legislature entrusts a tribunal or authority with jurisdiction to adjudicate upon a matter, including the power to determine whether the preliminary state of facts on which its jurisdiction depends exists; and (2) where the legislature confers jurisdiction on such a tribunal or authority to proceed only if a certain state of facts exists or is shown to exist. In the former case, the tribunal or authority has the power to conclusively determine jurisdictional facts, whereas in the latter case, it only objectively ascertains the existence of the state of facts before exercising the jurisdiction conferred upon it. Such a finding must, of course, be based on the weight of the material placed before the tribunal or authority and not made arbitrarily or whimsically, as it remains subject to correction by an appellate forum, if any, or by constitutional courts through judicial review, in addition to final determination by civil courts of plenary jurisdiction.[10]

17. Article 63A of the Constitution does not explicitly entrust the Commission with the power to determine the preliminary state of facts- jurisdictional facts-on which its jurisdiction to confirm the declaration depends. Therefore, the present matter falls within the second of the two categories described above. The Commission has no power to conclusively determine jurisdictional facts but has only the power to objectively ascertain the existence of jurisdictional facts before exercising the jurisdiction conferred upon it under clauses (3) and (4) of Article 63A of the Constitution, for the purpose of determining the alleged defection of a member from his political party. Its finding on a jurisdictional fact, such as whether the member concerned belongs to the Parliamentary Party of a political party, is not conclusive; rather, it is subject to correction by this Court, as its appellate forum, and ultimately to final determination by a Civil Court of plenary jurisdiction. The question regarding the Commission's jurisdiction is answered accordingly.

18. Having thus answered the question of law, we now proceed to examine the correctness of the Commission's decision regarding the genuineness of the appellant's consent affidavit dated 16 February 2024 and consequently the ascertainment of the jurisdictional fact whether the appellant is a member of the Parliamentary Party of PML-N.

19. Clause (2) of Article 63A specifies two instances in which a member of a House becomes a member of a Parliamentary Party: (i) if the member is elected as a candidate or nominee of a political party, he automatically becomes a member of the Parliamentary Party constituted by that political party in the House, or (ii) if the member, having been elected as an independent candidate (i.e., not as a candidate or nominee of any political party), subsequently joins a Parliamentary Party through a written declaration. In the first instance, where no act by any person or authority is required for a member of the House to become part (member) of a Parliamentary Party in the House, no dispute can arise regarding the status of such a member. However, in the second instance, where the member's action-namely, a written declaration of joining a Parliamentary Party-is required, a dispute may arise concerning the genuineness or validity of such a written declaration. It is in the latter case that the necessity arises for the Commission, before confirming the declaration made by the Party Head, to ascertain the genuineness or validity of the written declaration made by the member, showing his joining of a particular political party.

20. As observed above, the finding on a jurisdictional fact must be based on the weight of the material placed before the court, tribunal or authority and cannot be made arbitrarily or whimsically. Therefore, it is incumbent upon us to examine and evaluate the weight of the material submitted by the parties before the Commission, as well as before this Court, in support of their respective assertions.

21. The material supporting the stance of the Party Head of PML-N comprises the consent affidavit dated 16 February 2024, showing the appellant's joining of PML-N. In disputing the genuineness of this affidavit, the appellant produced a copy of his consent affidavit dated 20 February 2024, demonstrating his affiliation with SIC. This affidavit bears both his thumb impressions and signatures, and by its submission to the Commission, the appellant implicitly negated the existence of any prior consent affidavit. Furthermore, the appellant submitted a record of his tweet dated 23 February 2024, wherein he expressly denied joining any other party, stating: "I, returned candidate of NA-262 Qta-1, have joined Sunni Ittehad Council. The details of which are: I have voluntarily joined SIC, and all the required documents have been handed over to and received [by the] Election Commission on 20.2.24 at 9:35 PM. I strongly deny joining any other party."

22. The appellant also produced photographs taken during the first session of the National Assembly on 29 February 2024, showing him wearing a badge bearing the photograph of the founding chairman of PTI, Mr. Imran Khan, while taking the oath and signing the roll of members. Additionally, Bulletin No. 1 of the National Assembly (1st Session 2024), available on the official website of the National Assembly, mentions the appellant as an independent member of the Assembly at serial No. 254. Extracts from the official website of the National Assembly, dated 27 September 2024, which also shows that even till the said date the appellant was an independent member of the National Assembly. The appellant further presented a Civil Court order dated 2 November 2024, suspending the operation of the consent affidavit dated 16 February 2024, as well as an inquiry report dated 5 November 2024 prepared by the SHO, PS, Civil Lines, Quetta, which concluded that the said affidavit appeared to be false and fabricated. Moreover, the appellant produced copies of an affidavit and a statement by Saeed Ahmad, Oath Commissioner, whereby the said Oath Commissioner categorically denied having attested the disputed consent affidavit.

23. The weight of the material produced by the parties in support of their respective assertions is self-evident and requires no elaborate discussion. The Commission, as well as this Court acting as its appellate forum, is obligated to objectively assess the genuineness and validity of the consent affidavit dated 16 February 2024, based on the prima facie probative value of the material produced before it. Upon such assessment, the consent affidavit dated 16 February 2024 attributed to the appellant is found to be neither genuine nor valid.

24. Additionally, the Party Head of PML-N has failed to demonstrate a single instance where the appellant acted as a member of PML-N's Parliamentary Party in the National Assembly. On the contrary, the Party Head himself stated in his declarations that the appellant sits on the opposition benches with members of SIC. In Bahadur Khan Bangulzai, this Court observed: "If the person who has made the reference as the Head of the political party involved has been acting as such in the past, the Chief Election Commissioner is supposed to proceed on the assumption that he is the Head of the political party involved." Applying the principle underlying this observation to the present case, where the appellant is not shown to have ever acted as a member of PML-N's Parliamentary Party but has consistently conducted himself as a member of SIC and PTI, the Commission ought to have proceeded on the assumption that the appellant is not a member of PML-N's Parliamentary Party.

25. Therefore, in our considered view, the Commission's findings on the genuineness and validity of the consent affidavit dated 16 February 2024 are contrary to the weight of the material on record and are, therefore, legally unsustainable. Since the appellant is not found to be a member of PML-N's Parliamentary Party, the declarations made by the Party Head of PML-N regarding the appellant's defection from that party, and the confirmation thereof by the Commission through the impugned orders, were without jurisdiction. Consequently, these appeals are allowed. The impugned orders passed by the Commission are set aside, and the declarations made by the Party Head of PML-N that the appellant had defected from the said political party are not confirmed. Accordingly, the appellant's membership of the National Assembly from seat NA-262 stands restored as an independent member, not as a member of the Parliamentary Party of PML-N.

26. We may, however, clarify that the finding of this Court regarding the genuineness and validity of the consent affidavit dated 16 February 2024, as explained above, is subject to final determination by the Civil Court. Given the seriousness of the appellant's allegations regarding the fabrication and use of a false consent affidavit against Mr. Muhammad Shahbaz Sharif, the then President of PML-N and now the Prime Minister of Pakistan, we expect that the Civil Court, where the civil suit is sub judice, and the Magistrate, before whom the criminal complaint is pending adjudication, shall decide the same as early as possible.

27. These are the reasons for our short order dated 12 December 2024, which is reproduced hereunder for the completion of the record:

For reasons to be recorded later, these appeals are allowed. The impugned judgments passed by the Election Commission of Pakistan are set aside, and the declarations made by the Party Head of PML(N) that the appellant had defected from the said political party are not confirmed. Accordingly, the appellant's membership of the National Assembly from seat NA-262 stands restored as an independent member, not as a member of the Parliamentary Party of PML(N).

AYESHA A. MALIK, J.---I have read the judgment authored by my learned colleague Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J. and agree with it, however, I have given additional reasons in a concurring judgment as it is essential to examine the constitutional role of the Election Commission of Pakistan (ECP) and its conduct while hearing the matter of defection under Article 63A of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 (Constitution) as during the course of the arguments, a great amount of emphasis was placed on the fact that the ECP is a constitutional body with constitutional powers and that the decisions taken under Article 63A of the Constitution in the instant case are in accordance with its constitutional functions.

2. The subject of elections is dealt with in Part VIII Chapters 1 and 2 of the Constitution wherein the ECP is constituted[11] and the appointment of the Chief Election Commissioner,[12] the term of office of the Commissioner and Members[13] and the terms of their service[14] are provided for. Importantly, Article 218 (3) of the Constitution provides that it is the duty of the ECP to organize, conduct and make arrangements for honest, just and fair elections in accordance with law and free from corrupt practices. In furtherance of this constitutional duty, Article 219 of the Constitution confers specific duties on the ECP which include preparing the electoral rolls for the elections to the National Assembly, Provincial Assemblies and the local governments. It also places the duty of organizing and conducting elections to the Senate and the duty to fill casual vacancies in a House or a Provincial Assembly along with the duty to appoint Election Tribunals and hold the general elections to the National Assembly, Provincial Assemblies and the local governments. In this manner, the Constitution provides the duties and establishes constitutional standards that the ECP must uphold in matters related to the elections.

3. Article 218 (3) of the Constitution has been interpreted by this Court time and again holding that the primary duty of the ECP is to ensure free, fair and transparent elections[15]. This Court has also consistently reiterated that the ECP is required to adhere to the constitutional standards of honesty, justice and fairness while making all necessary arrangements for holding elections, ensuring therein that all election related activities both individually and collectively adhere to the given constitutional standards.[16] This Court has also clarified that in execution of its duty of organizing and conducting elections, the ECP is not a law making body rather works within the legal framework provided by Parliament.[17] This is because legal competence for enacting electoral laws is found in Article 222 of the Constitution which gives Parliament legislative competence to enact electoral laws on specific subjects such as allocation of seats, delimitation, preparation of electoral rolls, matters relating to corrupt practices, etc. In the Zulfiqar Ali Bhatti case[18] while interpreting Article 222 of the Constitution, this Court has specifically stated that the competence to make electoral law is one which regulates the constitutional duty to conduct elections. The Court further stated that the use of the word power in Article 222 of the Constitution[19] actually confers and means the duties and functions entrusted to the ECP under the Constitution.

4. What is fundamental to the constitutional role of the ECP is the duty to organize and conduct free and fair elections for the benefit of the citizen who enjoys the fundamental right to not only contest elections but also the right to vote for the candidate of their choice under Article 17(2) of the Constitution. This fundamental right is also an expression of the choice of the voters under Article 19 of the Constitution. In the exercise of these fundamental rights which culminate through the electoral process and voting, voters are able to choose the composition of their government by exercising their choice and ability to participate.[20] These rights are so integral that their violation results in the denial of other fundamental rights such as the right to be protected and treated in accordance with the law, the right to life and liberty, and the inviolability of dignity.[21] This constitutional duty of the ECP was discussed in the Muhammad Sibtain Khan case[22] wherein this Court differentiated between the legal concept of power and duty and concluded that a constitutional duty is not the same as a constitutional power and that the ECP had failed to maintain the distinction between these two distinct legal concepts. The Court explained that Article 218 (3) of the Constitution imposed a constitutional duty on the ECP and that Articles 220 and 224 were in furtherance of that duty and cannot be read as a constitutional power which would make the ECP the master of all electoral matters. The reason given was simple, that on a constitutional plane, the ECP is not the master rather the forum or organ that must perform the task which lies at the heart of the constitutional democracy.

5. The facts of the instant case compel us to once again reiterate that the constitutional duty of the ECP cannot be considered as an overarching constitutional power vis- -vis other constitutional provisions and institutions. The ECP is, as per the constitutional mandate, an independent body, duty bound to conduct free and fair elections and duty bound to ensure that those elected by the people remain in government. The independence of the ECP is the fundamental safeguard in a democratic system which maintains the integrity of the elections, and ensures that the will of the people translates into their consent to be governed by the elected representatives. This is what gives legitimacy to the government because it is based on the choice of the people. This is what builds public confidence, protects the rule of law and protects people from political manipulation.

6. The Constitution expressly provides that the authority of government rests solely on the will of the people. This will manifests itself through the peoples exercise of their right to vote and participate in the electoral and political process. Elections are the primary manner in which registered voters elect representatives who will govern on their behalf and exercise the powers of the government. This is a fundamental right guaranteed by the Constitution.[23] The facts of this case show that the ECP failed to perform its constitutional duty to actualize the will of the people. The Appellant in these cases is an elected member of the National Assembly against whom a reference for defection was filed under Article 63A of the Constitution. The allegation against him is that he defected from his party being PML(N). The Appellant in his defence clearly and unequivocally stated that he was elected as an independent candidate for NA-262 (Quetta-I) and was accordingly notified on 15.02.2024.[24] He then joined Sunni Ittehad Council (SIC) on the basis of his affidavit dated 20.02.2024 along with a letter dated 20.02.2024 issued by the Chairman SIC to the ECP informing them of his joining SIC. However, on account of the judgment passed in the SIC case[25], he remained an independent member of the National Assembly. He also clearly stated that he never submitted the affidavit dated 16.02.2024 wherein it is alleged that he has joined PML(N), that this affidavit is a fake and fabricated document for which he has instituted a civil suit as well as a criminal complaint. In the civil suit, the said affidavit was suspended by the Senior Civil Judge-I, Quetta on 02.11.2024 and in the criminal complaint, on the basis of a report filed by the SHO the said affidavit was stated to be fake and fabricated. Hence, the Appellant's entire case before the ECP was premised on the fact that he was never a candidate for or a member of the PML(N). When the issue of defection came up, the ECP did not consider any of the material evidence relied upon by the Appellant nor did they consider his stance with reference to the affidavit of 16.02.2024. Given that there were two affidavits before the ECP, it had to thoroughly examine the documents in order to determine whether it could proceed under Article 63A of the Constitution. Instead, the ECP accepted the version of the party head of PLM(N) without any scrutiny and proceeded on that basis. The ECP did not specifically considered the denial of the affidavit of 16.02.2024 and denial of the letter of the party head dated 17.02.2024, nor did they provide the Appellant with these documents until he sought a direction from the High Court of Balochistan on 31.10.2024 to provide him the required documentation. Instead, the ECP opted to act on the letter of the party head of PML(N) dated 17.02.2024 without following due process which not only violated the Appellant's right to due process and fair hearing but also violates the right to vote of the people who voted for the Appellant. In doing so, the ECP also disregarded the stay order dated 02.11.2024 issued by the Senior Civil Judge-III, Quetta and ignored the proceedings in the criminal complaint. These actions of the ECP demonstrate a leaning by the ECP in favour of a political party and the government which totally negates its constitutional duty and the Constitution's standards to act honestly, justly and fairly. Consequently, when political competitors are not afforded equal opportunities during the election period, it results in a violation of the citizens' fundamental rights. In terms of the judgment in this matter, authored by Justice Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, the ECP should have confirmed that the affidavit of 16.02.2024 was a genuine document and should have confirmed the genuineness of the declaration made by the party head of PML(N). Without tentative appraisal of these documents, the ECP's decision is not sustainable and violates the fundamental right to vote of the people who actually voted for the Appellant.

7. This Court has reminded the ECP that elections are the lifeline to democracy and the ECP is the guarantor of electoral integrity.[26] The independence of the ECP, therefore, is fundamental to the election process without which the very foundation of democracy is undermined. This Court has also recognized and declared that the ECP should not become subservient to political influences, or political engineering rather remain an impartial custodian of democracy as any leaning of the ECP in favour of the government would compromise the legitimacy of the political system.[27] At the heart of protecting electoral integrity is the right to vote and the exercise of this right, by the people. The supremacy of the vote underscores the idea, that power and legitimacy in a democratic system derives its consent from the governed which is why an independent constitutional body is required to ensure that the will of the people by way of election is actualized. It is unfortunate that despite clear pronouncements by this Court, the ECP conducts itself in a manner that is not in line with its constitutional duty rather aligned with the notion that they have the constitutional power to disregard other constitutional institutions and the basic right of the vote.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---"Sexual harassment is not about sex. It is about power."[1] Briefly stated, Dr. Sidra Zafar, a lady doctor ("respondent No. 5") filed a complaint against her driver, Muhammad Din ("petitioner"), alleging harassment and misconduct before the Ombudsperson, Punjab on 30.12.2019 under the Protection against Harassment of Women at the Workplace Act, 2010 ("2010 Act").The complaint detailed how respondent No. 5 was subjected to abuse, verbal assaults, and character assassination by the petitioner by engaging in inappropriate conduct, using indecent language and behaving unethically with female patients and by spreading malicious rumours about her alleged affairs with male colleagues, scandalizing her reputation, and making derogatory remarks in the presence of other staff members. Despite multiple warnings, his misconduct continued. On 26.10.2019, the petitioner unlawfully entered the ultrasound room while respondent No.5 was performing an ultrasound on a patient. He video-recorded the procedure without consent, later disseminating the video and making false and defamatory allegations against her, insinuating multiple affairs with men in an attempt to tarnish her dignity and professional standing.

2. It is important to underline that respondent No. 5 lacked the direct authority to remove the petitioner from his position, hence enjoying no control over him. Infact, she formally requested her department to transfer him and even after the transfer order was issued, the petitioner defiantly refused to comply with the order, withholding the vehicle's keys and logbook from the next appointed driver.

3. Taking cognizance of the complaint, the Ombudsperson issued a show-cause notice to the petitioner, who denied the allegations. However, after a thorough examination of the evidence, the Ombudsperson found that the allegations stood proved and ruled that the petitioner's actions constituted harassment under Section 2(h) of the 2010 Act, and imposed the major penalty of compulsory retirement from service under Section 4(4)(ii) of the 2010 Act, vide order dated 18.03.2020. Aggrieved by the same, the petitioner preferred a representation before the Governor of Punjab, which was dismissed, vide order dated 06.08.2020 ("impugned order"). Subsequently, the petitioner invoked the constitutional jurisdiction of the Lahore High Court, Lahore, by filing a writ petition against the impugned order, which was also dismissed, vide judgment dated 30.03.2023 ("impugned judgment"). Hence, the instant petition for leave to appeal.

4. We have heard the learned counsel for the petitioner at some length and have gone through the impugned judgment of the High Court and the record of the case.

5. At the outset, it is imperative to recognize that workplace harassment remains a pressing global issue, affecting millions of workers across various sectors. More than one in five workers (22.8% or 743 million people) worldwide have experienced some form of workplace violence or harassment.[2] Women are slightly more likely than men to have faced harassment over their careers.[3] Workplace harassment is not merely an individual grievance-it is a systemic problem that perpetuates gender inequality by restricting women's economic and professional growth. According to the Global Gender Gap Index (2024), (an index designed to measure gender equality globally) Pakistan ranks 145th out of 146 countries, making it the second lowest in the world.[4] In terms of economic participation, it ranks 142nd, reflecting a deteriorating situation for women in the workforce. These alarming statistics underscore the persistent challenges faced by women in professional settings, particularly in countries with significant gender disparities like Pakistan. The prevalence of workplace harassment not only affects individual wellbeing but also reinforces systemic gender inequality, limiting women's participation in the workforce and widening economic gaps.

6. Workplace harassment as a concept embodies a pattern of persistent mistreatment based on gender, power, or hierarchical disparities that creates a climate of fear and oppression in professional settings.[5] It is deeply intertwined with institutional culture and functions as a mechanism of exclusion, discouraging women from fully participating in professional and economic life.[6] Rooted in power imbalances, discrimination, and systemic inequalities, workplace harassment not only undermines an individual's autonomy and dignity but also erodes broader principles of liberty, equality and social justice, particularly for women and transgender persons. Workplace harassment and sexual harassment are deeply interconnected, as both stem from power imbalances, systemic discrimination, and entrenched societal norms that reinforce gender hierarchies. Sexual harassment is indeed widely understood as a manifestation of power dynamics rather than merely a sexual act. This perspective is well-documented in standard literature, which emphasizes that harassment often stems from an individual's desire to assert dominance, control, or exploit power imbalances, particularly in hierarchical settings like workplaces, schools, or other social structures.[7] Pioneering feminist legal scholar Catherine MacKinnon reframed sexual harassment not as individual misconduct but as systemic sex-based discrimination that reinforces gender hierarchies in the workplace.[8] She identifies two primary forms of workplace harassment. The first, "quid pro quo" meaning (meaning "this for that"), involves explicit demands for sexual favours in exchange for job benefits or avoiding negative consequences. The second, "hostile work environment" harassment, occurs when unwanted sexual conduct - conduct rooted in gender - creates an intimidating, hostile, or offensive work environment affecting an employee's ability to work. Unlike "quid pro quo" harassment, which involves direct coercion, "hostile work environment" harassment is more pervasive and indirect, yet equally damaging. According to MacKinnon, both forms of harassment originate from gender-based discrimination, impeding women's equal opportunity for employment, performance, and professional advancement.[9] For her, sexual harassment is the mechanism through which women are kept in their place in the workplace.

7. MacKinnon's model reinforces that workplace power structures are viewed as hierarchical, with authority flowing from senior to junior employees. However, the present case demonstrates how gendered power dynamics[10]---even if an individual is lower in a formal power hierarchy, they may still wield informal power rooted in societal gender norms; social reinforcement[11]---harassment can be perpetuated by individuals at any level of a hierarchy if they are reinforced by social or cultural norms that condone or trivialize such behavior; and intersectionality[12]---literature on intersectionality highlights how multiple axes of power (gender, race, class, etc.,) intersect to shape experiences of harassment--can override organizational hierarchies. Despite being senior in hierarchy, respondent No. 5 was subjected to harassment by a driver, an employee significantly lower in the institutional hierarchy. This contradiction underscores the reality that harassment is about power, not formal position. The petitioner exerted informal power- through gendered privilege, power dynamics, and social reinforcement-to create a hostile work environment for a senior. This phenomenon reflects deeply ingrained patriarchal norms that resist women's leadership, particularly in male-dominated professions where authority remains subconsciously associated with masculinity. However, gender-based harassment is not solely about hierarchy-it is fundamentally about who is perceived as having the right to wield authority. Even a junior employee, through informal power structures, social reinforcement, and gendered privilege, can create a hostile work environment for a senior. When women's authority is perceived as illegitimate or easily undermined, colleagues, clients, and even subordinates may use harassment as an "equalizer" to reassert traditional power dynamics.[13] This reinforces the notion that workplace harassment is less about sexual desire and more about control and domination, serving as a tool to police and punish women who disrupt male-dominated spaces.[14] Thus, while sexual harassment is primarily understood as a power-based behavior, individuals at any level of a hierarchy can perpetrate harassment, particularly when supported by gendered or social reinforcements.

8. Pakistan has made legislative strides to combat workplace harassment, notably through the 2010 Act, which aims to create a safe working environment for all individuals, including women and transgender persons, free from harassment, abuse, and intimidation with a view towards fulfilment of their right to work with dignity.[15] The 2010 Act provides a definition[16] of harassment, encompassing unwelcome sexual advances. It applies to all workplaces, including public and private sector organizations, educational institutions, and businesses, and establishes mechanism such as inquiry committees within workplaces[17] and the office of the Ombudsperson to adjudicate complaints[18]. It is important to note that recently, the Parliament of Pakistan has expanded the scope of the 2010 Act to enhance its effectiveness through the Protection against Harassment of Women at the Workplace (Amendment) Act, 2022 ("Amendment Act").[19] The Amendment Act broadens the application of the law by redefining key terms and extending its protections to a wider range of individuals and workplaces. The definition of "employee" now includes informal workers without contracts, freelancers, domestic workers, interns, trainees, among others.[20] Similarly, the definition of "workplace" has been expanded to encompass any location where professional services are rendered, including educational institutions, concerts, studios, performance venues, courts, highways, sporting facilities, and gymnasiums.[21] Additionally, the Amendment Act refines the definition of "harassment" by explicitly incorporating gender-based discrimination-whether sexual in nature or not-when it stems from a prejudicial mindset and results in discriminatory behavior.[22] The phrase "sexually demeaning attitude" has been clarified to mean any gesture or expression with a derogatory connotation that interferes with work performance or creates an intimidating, hostile, or offensive work environment. The Act now explicitly recognizes that harassment includes gender-based discrimination that fosters an abusive workplace, even when it is unrelated to sexual conduct. It is important to note that the petitioner's actions also fall within this expanded definition. Pervasive workplace harassment, such as the denial of equal opportunities or gender-based criticism of one's abilities, also falls within its ambit. Significantly, the Amendment Act replaces the phrase "a woman or man" with "any person" in the definition of "complainant," thereby extending the law's protection to transgender persons as well.[23] This inclusive approach ensures that the law safeguards all persons-male, female, and transgender persons-acknowledging the heightened vulnerability of female and transgender persons to workplace harassment.

9. In effect, the 2010 Act along with the recent amendments uphold gender equality and women's right to work without fear of exploitation under Article 25 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution"), safeguard human dignity under Article 14 of the Constitution, promote the right to a safe and working environment under Article 18 of the Constitution, and strengthen institutional accountability. Moreover, they give effect to Article 34 (Principles of Policy) of the Constitution which mandates steps to ensure the full participation of women in all spheres of national life and guarantees equal opportunity for women and transgender persons to earn their livelihood in a safe working environment. Viewing on a constitutional plane, the right to a safe, harassment-free workplace for all genders-including men, women, and transgender persons-is rooted in the constitutional guarantees of life, liberty, dignity, and equality.[24] A safe, harassment-free workplace is intrinsically linked to gender justice, which embodies the protection of human rights, ensuring equal access to opportunities and resources for all genders, and the elimination of discrimination, violence, and structural inequalities based on gender.

10. The 2010 Act along with the Amendment Act aligns with most international legal instruments, most notably the International Labour Organization Violence and Harassment Convention No. 190 ("ILO Violence and Harassment Convention"), which is the first-ever binding international treaty that explicitly provides for the elimination of workplace harassment and violence. It defines workplace harassment as, "A range of unacceptable behaviours and practices, or threats thereof, whether a single occurrence or repeated, that aim at, result in, or are likely to result in physical, psychological, sexual, or economic harm, and includes gender-based violence and harassment."[25] Similarly, Articles 11 and 12 of the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women ("CEDAW")[26] protect women's right to work in safe and equitable conditions free from discrimination and mandates states to introduce laws and mechanisms to prevent gender-based violence, including workplace harassment. The United Nations Sustainable Development Goals, Goal 5 (Gender Equality) and Goal 8 (Decent Work and Economic Growth) call for eliminating all forms of violence against women and girls and ensuring safe working conditions, and protection from harassment. Other international instruments that support eliminating workplace harassment include the Universal Declaration of Human Rights ("UDHR")[27], the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights ("ICCPR"),[28] and the International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights ("ICESCR")[29].

11. Courts worldwide have played a crucial role in shaping workplace harassment jurisprudence by interpreting these principles within their national legal frameworks. In Meritor[30], the U.S. Supreme Court formally recognized sexual harassment as a form of sex discrimination under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act, 1964. It established that a hostile working environment constitutes unlawful workplace harassment, even if no economic loss occurs. The U.S. Supreme Court, once again, in Harris[31] lowered the burden of proof for victims, and employed an objective criterion to establish that if the work environment was hostile or abusive from the perspective of a reasonable person, it qualified as harassment. The landmark ruling of the Supreme Court of India in Vishaka[32] recognized workplace harassment as a violation of fundamental rights, specifically the right to equality, life, and dignity under the Indian Constitution. It also introduced the Vishaka Guidelines, making it mandatory for organizations to establish mechanisms to address workplace harassment and paved way for the enactment of the Sexual Harassment of Women at Workplace (Prevention, Prohibition and Redressal) Act, 2013 in India. In Janzen[33], the Supreme Court of Canada recognized sexual harassment as sex discrimination under the Canadian Human Rights Act and ruled that harassment is about power and control, not sexual attention. In Carmichele[34], the Constitutional Court of South Africa held that the state has a duty to prevent workplace harassment and gender-based violence, placing responsibility on the government to ensure that laws provide protection against sexual violence in employment settings.

12. The 2010 Act and the Amendment Act, along with constitutional and international legal principles, provide a robust framework to combat harassment and promote safe, inclusive work environments. However, the effectiveness of these laws depends on strong judicial enforcement. As jurisprudence evolves, courts must continue to interpret and apply these protections in a manner that upholds human dignity, gender justice, and workplace equality.

13. Viewing the instant case with the aforesaid lens, the contentions raised by the learned counsel for the petitioner have been convincingly answered in the impugned judgment. No jurisdictional error, illegality or procedural irregularity in the impugned judgment has been pointed out to us. In this background we are of the view that the impugned judgment does not warrant any interference. Leave is, therefore, declined and this petition is dismissed.

14. Before parting with this judgment, it is significant to note that Pakistan's commitment to eliminating workplace harassment requires stronger alignment with international legal frameworks. While the 2010 Act and the Amendment Act provide a foundation for safeguarding workers against harassment, the country has yet to ratify the ILO Violence and Harassment Convention which sets a comprehensive global standard for preventing and addressing workplace harassment, ensuring legal accountability, and promoting a culture of dignity and respect. Ratifying ILO Violence and Harassment Convention would reinforce Pakistan's constitutional guarantees of dignity, equality, and nondiscrimination, strengthen legal protections for workers- particularly women and marginalized groups-and signal a firm commitment to upholding international human rights standards.

15. Copy of this judgment be dispatched to the Attorney-General for Pakistan for considering the recommendation in this judgment regarding the ratification of the ILO Violence and Harassment Convention with the relevant quarters.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---The marriage between Muhammad Sajid ("petitioner") and Shamsa Asghar ("respondent") was solemnized on 05.02.2018. Out of this wedlock, a daughter was born. However, the relationship between the parties became strained, ultimately culminating in a divorce. The respondent thereafter instituted a suit for recovery of maintenance allowance and dowry before the learned trial court. The suit was partially decreed to the extent of dowry and maintenance vide judgment dated 10.03.2022. Aggrieved by the quantum of the decree, both parties filed appeals before the learned Additional District Judge, Sialkot. As far as the petitioner is concerned, he filed an appeal for the reduction of the maintenance allowance while the respondent filed an appeal for the enhancement of the quantum of the decree regarding dowry. The said appeals were partially allowed[1], and more importantly, the valuation of dowry was enhanced while the claim for maintenance was dismissed vide judgment dated 19.09.2022 ("impugned judgment"). Subsequently, the petitioner preferred a civil revision before the Lahore High Court, Lahore, which was dismissed vide order dated 17.10.2022 ("impugned order"). Hence, the instant petition for leave to appeal before this Court.

2. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties at length and examined the impugned order of the High Court and the record of the case.

3. The primary legal question before us is whether the "dowry" claimed by the bride includes "presents" given to the groom or his family.

4. It is important to note that, at the time of the marriage, the respondent's parents had provided her with dowry as per the list appended to the plaint and exhibited as Exhibit P.2 before the learned trial court. The courts below have examined this list failing to appreciate the distinction between "dowry" and "presents". In order to address this issue, we turn to the governing legal framework, namely, the Dowry and Bridal Gifts (Restriction) Act, 1976 ("Act"). This legislation was enacted to regulate the practice of giving and receiving "dowry", "bridal gifts" and "presents" in the context of marriage, with the express purpose of limiting the value and extent of such exchanges. The Act defines the above terms in Sections 2(a), 2(b) and 2(e) in the following manner:

2. Definitions. In this Act, unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context,

(a) "bridal gift" means any property given as a gift before, at or after the marriage, either directly or indirectly, by the bridegroom or his parents to the bride in connection with the marriage but does not include Mehr;

(b) "dowry" means any property given before, at or after the marriage, either directly or indirectly, to the bride by her parents in connection with the marriage but it does not include property which the bride may inherit under the laws of inheritance and succession applicable to her;

(d) ...

(e) "present" means a gift of any property not being a bridal gift or dowry, given before, at or after the marriage, either directly or indirectly, to either party to a marriage in connection with the marriage or to the relatives of the bride or bridegroom but does not include neundra and salami;

(f) .

(g) .

A perusal of these definitions reveals that the legislature has drawn a clear distinction between three categories of property exchanged in connection with marriage: "dowry[2]," "bridal gifts," and "presents". Dowry originates from the bride's parents to the bride; bridal gifts are conferred by the groom or his parents upon the bride; and presents constitute a residual category of gifts given to either party to a marriage (i.e., bride or groom) or their relatives in connection with the marriage.[3] Further, Section 5 of the Act provides:

5. Vesting of dowry etc., in the bride. All property given as dowry or bridal gifts and all property given to the bride as a present shall vest absolutely in the bride and her interest in property however derived shall hereafter not be restrictive, conditional or limited.

The above stipulates that all property given to the bride as dowry, bridal gifts, or presents shall vest absolutely in her.[4] The use of the phrase "shall vest absolutely" confers exclusive and unqualified proprietary rights upon the bride, thereby barring any adverse claim by the husband or his relatives. The subsequent part "and her interest in property however derived shall hereafter not be restrictive, conditional or limited" acts as a safeguard to protect the bride's proprietary autonomy from customary or familial encumbrances. This absolute vesting of rights in the bride remains unaffected by any subsequent separation or divorce, thereby reinforcing her enduring and independent entitlement to such property.

5. The legislative intent underpinning Section 5 is to secure the independent proprietary status of the bride and to shield her from dispossession, particularly in the event of marital breakdown. A purposive interpretation of this provision necessarily confines the scope of recoverable property to that which is demonstrably intended for the bride. Accordingly, items gifted to the groom or his relatives, unless clearly shown to be intended for the bride's use or held in trust for her benefit, fall outside the protective ambit of the Act.

6. In furtherance of this protective scheme, Section 7 of the Family Courts Act, 1964, read with the Schedule [Part I] appended thereto, vests the Family Court with jurisdiction to adjudicate claims relating to "dower", "maintenance", "dowry", and "personal property and belongings of a wife"[5]. This framework empowers a wife to initiate proceedings for the recovery of property, whether classified as dower, dowry, bridal gifts or presents (given to the bride). In such cases, these items vest absolutely in her as personal property and are recoverable under the Family Courts Act.[6] However, this entitlement does not extend to "presents" given to the groom or his relatives, as such items do not vest in the bride and therefore fall outside the scope of "personal property and belongings of a wife" as contemplated by the law.

7. The right of a bride to her property and belongings under Section 5 is further reinforced by the constitutional guarantees enshrined in Articles 23[7] and 24[8] of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution"), which recognize her right to hold, and dispose of her property irrespective of her marital status. It is further buttressed by Article 25 of the Constitution which guarantees equality before the law and equal protection of the law, obligating the State to eliminate all forms of discrimination against women.[9] Additionally, Article 35 of the Constitution obligates the State to protect the marriage, the family, the mother, and the child.[10] In construing Section 5, courts must therefore interpret the statutory language in harmony with these constitutional principles, ensuring that women's economic autonomy is upheld and not subordinated to any patriarchal or customary practices.

8. A parallel foundation for this interpretation exists in classical Islamic jurisprudence. As articulated in D. F Mulla's Principles of Mohammadan Law, any property, movable or immovable, given to the wife at the time of the marriage, whether by her own family, the husband, or his family, is presumed to be her exclusive property unless clear and cogent evidence is led to rebut this presumption.[11] Under Hanafi law, gifts (hiba)[12] made to the bride in connection with marriage are deemed irrevocable and confer absolute ownership in the bride.[13] This includes dowry, Mehr and any other wedding gifts. Although such gifts exchanged between spouses are considered irrevocable, neither party may subsequently seek their recovery or revocation.[14] The presumption of exclusive ownership reflects a deliberate policy of financial empowerment of women. Any interpretive approach that seeks to include property never delivered to or intended for the bride would distort both the legislative intent and well-settled Islamic principles.

9. Consequently, "presents" given to the groom's family cannot be claimed by the bride under the Act unless it is clearly established that they were intended solely for her use or benefit. The definitional framework provided in Sections 2(a), (b), and (e), read in conjunction with Section 5, establishes a clear threshold: only property that legally vests in the bride is afforded protection under the statute.[15] Accordingly, the term "present" under Section 2(e) must be interpreted restrictively to exclude items given to the groom's family or relatives, as such items do not vest in the bride and are therefore not recoverable by her.

10. We also find it necessary to clarify the reasoning adopted by the High Court in interpreting the term "dowry" under Section 2(b) of the Act.[16] The phrase "directly or indirectly" must be construed purposively to encompass the various modes through which dowry may be given, rather than focusing on its formal classification. This means that dowry need not be transferred in a direct or documented manner; it may be conveyed through intermediaries, informal channels, or third parties, so long as its origin lies with the bride's parents and the transfer is linked to the marriage, and the bride is the ultimate beneficiary.

11. While this judgment is confined to interpreting the statutory protections afforded to the bride, we find it necessary to acknowledge the broader social realities surrounding the practice of dowry. When socially imposed, dowry can exert severe pressure on families, especially those with limited financial resources.[17] In contrast, Islam designates Mehr as the sole obligatory provision, an unconditional gift from the groom to the bride, intending to secure her financial autonomy without burdening her family.[18] Dowry, unless given voluntarily and free from coercion, or social pressure, perpetuates inequality and exploitation, running contrary to the ideals of equitable marriage enshrined in both constitutional and Islamic frameworks. Thus, this ruling must not be misconstrued as an endorsement of dowry; rather, it serves as a firm reminder that any property received by the bride remains exclusively hers and is not subject to claim or appropriation by the groom or his family. No misplaced expectations or entitlements should arise in this regard. Society must strive to abandon regressive dowry practices, and instead promote a model of marriage rooted in simplicity, mutual dignity, and the groom's financial responsibility through Mehr. As a matter of public policy, any gifts or contributions made by the bride's family should be entirely voluntary, and given without societal pressure, thereby preserving familial dignity and reaffirming the constitutional commitment to equality and human dignity.

12. In view of the above, the list provided by the respondent shows that certain items, given to the family of the groom, fall outside the scope of dowry and bridal gifts and pass as "presents", as defined under the Act. These items are listed at Sr. Nos. 65 to 72 in Exhibit P.2 which cannot be decreed in favour of the bride. Therefore, the impugned judgment is modified to exclude these items, while the suit decreed in favour of the respondent to the extent of the remaining items is maintained.

13. This petition is hereby converted into an appeal and allowed in the terms set out above. Accordingly, the impugned order of the High Court stands set aside.

MH/M-44/SC Appeal allowed.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---"A woman's legal rights, her personhood, and her autonomy are not erased by marriage, not should they be made contingent upon it."[1] Briefly stated, Zahida Parveen ("petitioner") was appointed as a Primary School Teacher (Basic Pay Scale-12) at Government Girls Primary School, District Karak, under the deceased son/daughter quota pursuant to Rule 10(4) of the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Civil Servants (Appointment, Promotion, and Transfer) Rules, 1989 ("Rules"), vide order dated 17.03.2023. Subsequently, the District Education Officer (Female), District Karak withdrew the petitioner's appointment order without issuing a show-cause notice, vide order dated 15.05.2023 ("impugned order"). It is pertinent to note that the petitioner's services were terminated based on a clarification letter dated 21.02.2020[2] ("impugned clarification"), which stipulates that the benefit of appointment under the deceased son/daughter quota is not available to a female who has contracted marriage. A further guidance/ clarification was issued by the Provincial Government on 28.04.2023, providing that a married daughter may be considered eligible for appointment only if she has separated from her husband and dependent on her parents.[3] Aggrieved, the petitioner filed a departmental appeal against the impugned order before the Government of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, which was not responded to within the statutory period. Consequently, the petitioner preferred an appeal before the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Service Tribunal, Peshawar, ("Tribunal"), challenging the impugned order, which was dismissed vide judgment dated 03.06.2024 ("impugned judgment"). Hence, the instant petition for leave to appeal.

2. Learned counsel for the petitioner submitted that the impugned clarification, when read in conjunction with Rule 10(4) of the Rules constitutes a misinterpretation and misconstruction of the relevant statutory provisions. It was further contended that the petitioner was not afforded an opportunity of personal hearing, and that her services were terminated without the initiation or conclusion of any proper inquiry or fact-finding investigation. Accordingly, the impugned judgment is contrary to the fundamental principles of natural justice and is liable to be set aside. Conversely, learned counsel for the respondents supported the impugned judgment, arguing that the petitioner was not entitled to appointment under Rule 10(4), as she was residing with her husband at the relevant time.

3. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties at length and examined the impugned judgment of the Tribunal along with the record of the case.

4. The Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Civil Servants Act, 1973 ("Act") is the principal law governing the terms and conditions of service for civil servants in the province. Section 26 of the Act empowers the Governor, or any person authorized by the Governor, to make rules necessary for carrying out the purposes of the Act. The Rules formed under the Act provide the framework for appointment, promotion, and transfer of civil servants. Rule 10 relates to appointments under special categories, and Rule 10(4), relevant for the present matter, is reproduced below:

Rule 10. Appointment by Initial Recruitment.--

(3) ...

(4) Where a civil servant dies or is rendered incapacitated/ invalidated permanently during service then notwithstanding the procedure provided for in sub-rule (2), the appointing authority may appoint one of the children of such civil servant, or if the child has not attained the age prescribed for appointment in Government Service, the widow/wife of such civil servant, to a post in any of the Basic Pay Scales 1-10:

Provided that the child or the widow/wife as the case may be, possesses the minimum qualification prescribed for appointment to the post:

(7) ...

A plain reading of Rule 10(4) makes it evident that it allows compassionate appointment in cases where a civil servant dies or is rendered permanently incapacitated during service. It allows the appointing authority to appoint either one of the children of such a civil servant or, if the child is below the eligible age for government service, the widow/wife, to a post in Basic Pay Scales 1 to 10, subject to prescribed qualifications. The language of the rule is inclusive, indicating that the benefit is to be extended equally to all children, without distinction based on gender, marital status, disability or religion. Therefore, a plain reading of the provision indicates that a married daughter falls within the scope of "one of the children" and cannot be excluded solely on the basis of her marital status.

5. Now adverting to the impugned clarification issued by the Establishment Department, Government of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, whereby Rule 10(4) of the Rules was interpreted so as to restrict its scope, the core question that arises is whether such an executive construction issued by a Section Officer can be regarded as legally competent to clarify, modify, or curtail the scope of the Rules. It is a settled principle of statutory interpretation that executive construction may assist in understanding administrative practice but holds no binding force where it seeks to override or contradict the express language of a statutory rule.[4] While executive authorities may issue instructions to supplement the implementation of rules, but it cannot, under the pretext of a clarification, amend or distort the scope of duly framed rules enacted under any statutory mandate.[5] Allowing subordinate executive authorities to restrict the lawful scope of such rules would amount to an impressible encroachment into the legislative domain and offend the doctrine of separation of powers.[6] Executive fiat cannot override legislative command, and any interpretation enabling such a proposition would be legally unsustainable and constitutionally repugnant.[7]

6. Applying this principle to the instant case, it is evident that the impugned clarification issued by the Establishment Department suffers from multiple constitutional and legal infirmities. First, the Establishment Department lacked the authority under Section 26 of the Act to issue any clarification that effectively amends Rule 10(4) --a power vested exclusively in the Governor. By purporting to interpret and restrict Rule 10(4), the impugned clarification amounts to an unauthorized executive act, effectively amending Rule 10(4) through an administrative fiat in clear excess of the executive's mandate. Second, and more critically, we have noticed that the impugned clarification introduces a discriminatory classification by excluding married daughters from eligibility, despite Rule 10(4) containing no such restriction, while allowing married sons to benefit under the same provision. Such a distinction does not meet the test of reasonable classification under Article 25 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution"). It is well settled that reasonable classification must be founded on an intelligible differentia and must bear a rational nexus to the object sought to be achieved by the law.[8] In the present case, the exclusion of married daughters, despite the rule itself being inclusive and silent on marital status lacks any rational basis. No intelligible differentia is discernible between a married son and a married daughter that would justify such exclusion in light of the underlying purpose of Rule 10(4), which is to provide compassionate economic relief to the bereaved family of a deceased or incapacitated civil servant. This arbitrary classification is thus not only unreasonable but plainly unconstitutional, offending the guarantees of equality (Article 25), non-discrimination in public service (Article 27), and the right to dignity (Article 14).[9] It also undermines the expectations of deceased civil servants whose families were assured of lawful security under the compassionate appointment framework. Consequently, the impugned clarification and the letter dated 28.04.2023 is liable to be struck down for being ultra vires, discriminatory, and constitutionally repugnant. It is well settled law that when the basic order is without lawful authority, then the entire superstructure raised thereon falls to the ground automatically.[10] Since the impugned clarification lacks lawful authority, the petitioner's termination pursuant to it is also void and declared unconstitutional.

7. The exclusion of married daughters from the ambit of Rule 10(4) is not merely a procedural irregularity--it reveals a deeper structural flaw grounded in patriarchal assumptions about a woman's identity and her role within the legal and economic order. It presumes that upon marriage, a woman relinquishes her independent legal identity and becomes economically dependent on her husband, thereby forfeiting entitlements available to similarly situated male counterparts. At its core, this exclusion constitutes a denial of a woman's right to financial and economic independence--rights that are not ancillary but essential to the exercise of constitutional personhood. The Constitution guarantees rights to individuals, not to marital units or prescribed social roles.

Women are autonomous, rights-bearing citizens in their own right, not by virtue of their relationship to a man, be it father, husband, or son. Financial independence is not a privilege but a necessary precondition for the full realization of citizenship, autonomy, and personhood. A married daughter remains equally a child of her deceased parent[11], and to deny her this entitlement on the basis of marriage is to deny her constitutional identity as an equal citizen. It bears mentioning that the principle of a woman's financial independence is not only grounded in the constitutional text but is also firmly embedded in the Islamic legal tradition. Under Islamic jurisprudence, a woman retains full ownership and control over her property, earnings, and financial affairs, irrespective of her marital status.[12] Therefore, any presumption that a married woman becomes financially dependent on her husband is not only legally untenable but also religiously unfounded, and contrary to the egalitarian spirit of Islamic law.

8. The rationale underpinning the impugned clarification represents a constitutionally impermissible revival of the discredited common law doctrine of coverture[13], under which a woman's legal existence was subsumed into that of her husband.[14] Contemporary constitutional jurisprudence[15] has firmly rejected such notions, affirming that marriage neither extinguishes a woman's legal personhood nor curtails her entitlements under the law. Any policy or executive clarification that seeks to reintroduce this logic under the pretext of marital dependency violates the core constitutional guarantees of dignity, equality, and non-discrimination. Excluding married daughters from compassionate appointment under Rule 10(4) not only violates Pakistan's constitutional framework but also breaches its international legal obligations under various instruments[16], most notably those under the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women ("CEDAW")[17]. Article 1 of CEDAW defines "discrimination against women" as "any distinction, exclusion or restriction made on the basis of sex which has the effect or purpose of impairing or nullifying the recognition, enjoyment or exercise by women, irrespective of their marital status, on a basis of equality of men and women, of human rights and fundamental freedoms in the political, economic, social, cultural, civil or any other field." Similarly, Articles 2 and 11 of CEDAW explicitly prohibit discrimination in employment on the basis of sex and marital status. The CEDAW Committee has repeatedly underscored that laws and administrative practices rooted in cultural stereotypes or customary norms are incompatible with the State's duty to secure substantive gender equality.[18]

9. More broadly, the exclusion reflects a regressive and untenable conception of womanhood---one that conditions a woman's civic and economic identity on her relationship to a man. The Constitution neither recognises marriage as a status-diminishing event nor permits the State to presume dependency on that basis. This position is firmly grounded in feminist legal theory. Feminist legal scholars such as Martha Fineman, for instance, challenges the legal system's assumption that marriage guarantees economic support for women. She argues that this presumption has historically served to justify their exclusion from public entitlements, and advocates for reconceptualization of the State as a responsive institution--one that affirms women's economic and legal autonomy.[19] This vision aligns directly with Pakistan's constitutional commitment to equality and dignity. Similarly, bell hooks[20] underscores that true liberation requires economic independence and the dismantling of institutional norms that restrict women's access to public life based on the marital status or traditional roles. When the law denies married daughters equal access to employment opportunities, it reinforces the very patriarchal logic that the Constitution seeks to dismantle. This critique finds further resonance in Simone de Beauvoir's seminal work[21] where she interrogates how society has historically defined women not as autonomous beings but as the "Other,[22] " existing in relation to men rather than as individuals in their own right. De Beauvoir argues that a woman's personhood remains unrealised as long as her legal identity and legal entitlements are mediated through marital status or familial roles.[23] To exclude a woman from compassionate appointment merely because she is married is to reproduce precisely the patriarchal structure that denies women their full legal identity. It relegates them to a derivative status, reducing them to dependents rather than recognising them as independent, rights-bearing individuals. As Beauvoir aptly asserts, true liberation and by extension, constitutional equality requires that women be recognized and treated as full and equal participants in public life, with rights and responsibilities that are not contingent on their relationship to men. Anything less perpetuates a system in which women's access to the justice remains precarious, conditional, and fundamentally subordinate.

10. In view of the foregoing, the exclusion of married daughters from compassionate appointment under Rule 10(4) of the Rules through the impugned clarification and the letter dated 28.04.2023, is declared to be discriminatory, ultra vires, issued without lawful authority, and incompatible with Pakistan's constitutional guarantees and international legal obligations. Consequently, the impugned judgment is set aside, and the respondent-department is directed to restore the petitioner's appointment with all back-benefits.

11. For completeness of record, it is clarified that the judgment of this Court reported as General Post Office, Islamabad and others v. Muhammad Jalal (PLD 2024 SC 1276) has struck down Rule 10(4) of the Rules as being ultra vires the Constitution but has no application on appointments that have been already made.[24] It is well settled that the judgments of this Court operate prospectively, unless declared otherwise.[25] Therefore, the present case remains unaffected by the said judgment.

12. We also find it necessary to express concern over the language used in the impugned judgment, particularly the phrase "a married daughter becomes a liability[26] of her husband."[27] Such language is not only factually and legally erroneous, but also deeply patriarchal, reinforcing outdated stereotypes that are fundamentally incompatible with constitutional values. It assumes that a woman's identity, legal capacity, personhood, and entitlement to support are subsumed into that of her husband upon marriage, treating her as a dependent rather than an autonomous, rights-bearing individual. The use of gender-biased language by judicial or administrative bodies does not merely reflect prevailing social prejudices, it perpetuates and legitimizes structural discrimination, and risks encoding bias into the law itself. Globally, it has been recognized that the language of judicial reasoning plays a critical role in shaping, affirming, or undermining substantive equality.[28] As constitutional subjects, women are entitled to equality not only in result but also in the form, tone, and respect with which the law addresses them. In this context, the Feminist Judgments Project undertaken in several jurisdictions[29] including Pakistan[30] has demonstrated how judicial reasoning can be reframed through a feminist lens, applying existing legal principles while eschewing gendered assumptions and incorporating inclusive, equality-affirming language. The core premise is clear: how law is written matters as much as what it decides.[31]

13. Thus, we deem it imperative to reaffirm that all judicial and administrative authorities bear a constitutional responsibility to adopt gender-sensitive and gender-neutral language. This is not a mere formality, but reflects a substantive commitment to the values of dignity, equality, and autonomy guaranteed to all citizens under Articles 14, 25, and 27 of the Constitution. The judiciary must lead by example, ensuring that the words used to interpret and apply the law do not themselves become instruments of exclusion.

14. This petition is converted into an appeal and allowed in the above terms.

Date of hearing: 19th May, 2025.

JUDGMENT

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---The sole question arising for determination in the present case is whether the petitioner, despite having been wrongly appointed due to securing 377 marks in Matriculation against the required threshold of 399 marks, a discrepancy discovered only after he had rendered 15 years of continuous service is liable to refund the salary received during that period, as directed by the impugned judgment.

2. It is trite that public employment secured through mis-representation or tampered credentials is void ab initio and confers no vested right upon the appointee. Nonetheless, the issue of retrospective salary recovery for services rendered over a significant period engages broader principles of fairness, equity, and administrative accountability. In the present case, the petitioner entered public service in 2003. It was not until 2018, after fifteen years of continuous and uninterrupted service that the department initiated an inquiry into his educational credentials. There is no material on record to show that the petitioner deliberately concealed or suppressed his academic record during this time or resisted verification. On the contrary, his service was accepted, utilized, and remunerated without demur or objection.

3. In the present circumstances, the doctrine of quantum meruit finds clear and compelling application. This equitable principle permits reasonable compensation for services rendered where one party has knowingly accepted and benefited from the work of another, even in the absence of a valid or enforceable contract.[1] For over fifteen years, the petitioner continuously performed duties that fulfilled institutional needs and was compensated accordingly. To retrospectively invalidate such remuneration despite the employer's full knowledge and acceptance of the services rendered would be contrary to the fundamental tenet that no person should unjustly enrich themselves at the expense of another. In this case, it is the employer department that stands to benefit unjustly.

4. The doctrine of quantum meruit, literally meaning "as much as he has earned" or "as much as he deserves" is a foundational principle of equity and restitution in both common law and civil law jurisdictions. It enables a party to claim reasonable compensation for services rendered or work performed, even where a contract is void, unenforceable, or otherwise defective. The doctrine rests not merely on contractual notions, but on the broader equitable premise that a person who has received and retained a benefit should not be allowed to do so without paying reasonable compensation, particularly where the services were not intended to be gratuitous.[2] This creates an implied obligation in law, akin to a quasi-contract, compelling restitution where unjust enrichment would otherwise result.

5. In the context of Pakistani law, the principle finds statutory recognition in Section 70 of the Contract Act, 1872, which provides: "Where a person lawfully does anything for another person... not intending to do so gratuitously, and such other person enjoys the benefit thereof, the latter is bound to make compensation to the former in respect of, or to restore, the thing so done or delivered." Therefore, even where an employment appointment is found to be irregular, if the employee has continuously and faithfully discharged official functions and the employer has enjoyed the resulting benefit over a significant period, the doctrine of quantum meruit furnishes both a moral and legal basis to preclude retrospective recovery of salary. Labor that is not donated but knowingly accepted must be compensated regardless of technical infirmities in the appointment process.

6. Alongside, the doctrine of administrative acquiescence must also be considered. Rooted in principles of equity and fairness, this doctrine is based on the idea that if a person, observing another about to perform an act that might infringe upon their rights, remains silent in circumstances where an objection might have prevented the act, they may later be estopped from objecting.[3] Transposed to public law, it implies that prolonged inaction or silence by a public authority, particularly where it had the duty and opportunity to act may amount to institutional acquiescence.[4] In such cases, the authority's delay in enforcing its rights or correcting an irregularity can defeat retrospective punitive action, especially where the individual affected has acted in good faith and to the authority's benefit throughout. The prolonged inaction by the department, its failure to undertake any meaningful verification or scrutiny of the petitioner's appointment for fifteen years amounts to institutional negligence. Significantly, it was only after the passage of fifteen years that the department initiated any inquiry into the petitioner's appointment. This belated action, without any intervening misconduct by the petitioner, underscores that the lapse lies entirely with the department. Administrative silence over such an extended period, particularly where it results in the receipt and acceptance of services, may amount to acquiescence and estop the department from seeking retrospective punitive measures. The petitioner cannot be faulted for the department's own dereliction of its gatekeeping responsibilities. While the eventual termination of service due to irregular appointment may be legally sustainable, the direction for recovery of fifteen years' salary without any allegation or proof of fraud or mala fide intent on the part of the petitioner is manifestly disproportionate, inequitable, and legally untenable.

7. We specifically queried learned counsel for the respondents as to whether the petitioner had in fact continuously and satisfactorily performed his duties throughout his tenure. The learned counsel candidly conceded that the petitioner had indeed discharged all assigned responsibilities without lapse. In such circumstances, the employer having accepted and benefited from fifteen years of unblemished service cannot now seek restitution of benefits already consumed. Principles of equity, good conscience, and public interest dictate that in the absence of fraud or dishonest conduct by the employee, retrospective recovery of wages is not only unjust, but contrary to settled legal precedent. See Shams ur Rehman[5] and Jalaluddin[6]. The recovery of salary for services lawfully and diligently performed is impermissible, notwithstanding defects in the initial appointment. We are, therefore, of the considered view that the order for recovery in the present case is arbitrary, excessive, and in clear violation of equitable principles and binding precedent.

8. Accordingly, the impugned judgment is set aside to the extent it orders recovery of salary from the petitioner. However, the petitioner's dismissal from service, on account of ineligibility at the time of appointment, shall remain intact and unaffected by this decision.

9. This petition is hereby converted into an appeal and is partially allowed in the above terms.

(Against the impugned judgment dated 24.03.2022 passed by the Lahore High Court, Lahore in W.P. No. 75382 of 2021).

(a) Punjab Rented Premises Act (VII of 2009)---

----S. 19---Ejectment of tenant---Striking off defence---Petitioner/ landlord was aggrieved of judgment passed by High Court setting aside eviction order passed against respondent/tenant to vacate rented premises---Validity---Oral testimonies and documentary evidence produced by petitioner/landlord remained unchallenged, as right of respondent/tenant to cross-examine petitioner's/landlord's witnesses was struck off and that order attained finality, having remained unchallenged by respondent/tenant---In absence of any rebuttal or cross-examination, evidence led by petitioner/landlord stood uncontro-verted---Material on record conclusively established that petitioner/ landlord was lawful owner of the property---Rent proceedings, by their very nature, are summary in character and are intended to ensure swift and efficient resolution of landlord-tenant disputes, particularly in cases of default, so as to safeguard landlord's Constitutionally protected right to property---Petitioner/landlord remained embroiled in litigation for over seven years merely to recover possession of his property---Course of delay ran counter to the foundational objectives of rent legislation and summary adjudication---Such undue delays not only eroded Constitutional rights of property owners but had also given rise to broader economic and social justice concerns---For landlords, prolonged litigation entails financial strain, loss of rental income, and an inability to utilize their property for productive purposes, which can hinder economic growth---Conversely, tenants facing eviction proceedings often live in uncertainty, which can affect their social and economic stability---A just legal system must, therefore, ensure an equitable balance between rights of landlords and tenants, a balance that is fundamentally disrupted when cases are permitted to stagnate in judicial pipeline---Supreme Court set aside judgment passed by High Court and restored that of Lower Appellate Court, which had rightly upheld the claim of petitioner/landlord---Supreme Court directed respondent/tenant to vacate property in question within two months---Appeal was allowed.

(b) Constitution of Pakistan---

----Art. 10A---Right to fair trial and due process of law---Artificial Intelligence (AI), use of---Principle---Right to a fair trial before a competent, independent, and impartial judge is a fundamental principle of due process---AI must not overshadow the core guarantee of judicial autonomy--- While AI has potential to improve consistency and efficiency in legal processes, it also carries risk of introducing biases and limiting judicial discretion---Fairness and transparency must apply equally to AI-assisted rulings---Though AI may enhance efficiency and consistency, it cannot replicate normative judgment, ethical reflection, or contextual sensitivity essential to the act of judging---Dignity of judicial role lies not in mechanical generation of outcomes but in deliberative process of reasoning, listening, and responding a task that remains inherently and irreducibly human---Judicial reasoning involves not only logic but also humanity and it requires attentiveness, moral courage, and the ability to question unjust laws or outdated precedents---By contrast, AI operates within the constraints of existing data and lacks creative imagination and jurisprudential foresight necessary to develop new legal doctrines or safeguard emergent rights---Comparative jurisdictions have cautiously explored AI-assisted adjudication.

Article 10 provides: For the determination of his civil rights and obligations or in any criminal charge against him a person shall be entitled to a fair trial and due process. The successful implementation of this AI initiative has been overseen by the Director General of the FJA, Mr. Hayat Ali Shah, along with Judge Shazia Munawar Makhdoom, former Additional Director (Programs and ICT), FJA; Judges using AI must ensure transparency, fairness, and accountability by disclosing AI assistance, avoiding overreliance on automated decisions, and maintaining human oversight. They should audit AI for bias, protect data privacy, and allow parties to challenge AI-generated inputs. Judicial training on AI's risks and limitations is essential, and decisions must remain explainable and contestable to uphold due process. JUDGMENT

Application (C.M.A. No. 1402-L/2025). This is an application submitted by Mr. Moeen Ahmed, Advocate of the High Court, seeking permission to appear and argue the listed petition on behalf of the petitioner. It is stated therein that he had previously represented the petitioner before the High Court and is well conversant with the facts of the case. The matter pertains to a rent dispute, and the parties have been engaged in protracted litigation for the past seven years. In view of the foregoing, and in the interest of justice, the application is allowed. Mr. Moeen Ahmed, Advocate of the High Court, is permitted to appear and argue the case on behalf of the petitioner.

Main Case

2. The facts of the case, briefly stated, are that the petitioner is the lawful owner of a residential property, measuring five marlas, situated in Moza Rajghar, Tehsil and District Lahore ("property"). The said property was purchased by the petitioner through a registered sale deed dated 11.08.1999, executed in his favour by the previous owner, Muhammad Yaqoob. In the year 2016, the property was rented out to Mushtaq Ahmed ("respondent No. 1"), the real brother of the petitioner, under an oral tenancy agreement at a monthly rent of Rs. 35,000/-. Subsequently, respondent No. 1 committed default in the payment of the rent with effect from July 2016, compelling the petitioner to institute eviction proceedings against him on 06.07.2018. During the course of trial, the right of respondent No. 1 to cross-examine the petitioner's witnesses was struck off vide order dated 09.10.2019. The said order attained finality as it was not assailed before any forum. Consequently, respondent No.1 neither cross-examined the petitioner's witnesses nor produced any evidence in support of his defence. Notwithstanding this, the learned Special Judge (Rent) dismissed the eviction petition vide order dated 01.03.2021, relying solely on the evidence led by the petitioner. The petitioner preferred an appeal before the learned appellate court, which was allowed vide judgment dated 11.11.2021. Aggrieved thereby, respondent No. 1 invoked the constitutional jurisdiction of the High Court which set aside the judgment of the appellate court and dismissed the petitioner's eviction petition vide judgment dated 24.03.2022 ("impugned judgment"). Hence, the instant petition seeking leave to appeal against the impugned judgment.

3. Learned counsel for the petitioner contends that both the dismissal of the eviction petition and the impugned judgment of the High Court are vitiated by a manifest misreading and misappreciation of the record. It is submitted that the courts below erroneously relied upon purported inconsistencies between the pleadings and the testimonies of the petitioner's witnesses (AW-1 to AW-3), particularly misinterpreting the deposition of AW-1, the petitioner's mother. AW-1 deposed the property in question which had been given to her by the petitioner and that she rented it out and collected rent on his behalf. The courts[1] below erroneously construed this statement to imply that she was acting in the capacity of a "landlady," thereby undermining the petitioner's status as a landlord and negating the existence of a landlord-tenant relationship between the petitioner and the respondent No. 1. Learned counsel submitted that at no point, either in her affidavit or in her oral testimony, did AW- 1 disclaim the petitioner's ownership or assert any independent propriety interest in the property. Her role was confined solely to that of an agent for the purpose of rent collection, a fact consistently corroborated by the testimonies of AW-2 and AW-3. It was further argued that the mere delegation of rent collection does not divest the petitioner of ownership, nor does it sever or extinguish the landlord-tenant relationship. When the pleadings and evidence are read in their entirety and in conjunction, they unequivocally establish the ownership of the property and respondent No. 1's status as a tenant in default.

4. Conversely, learned counsel for respondent No. 1 places reliance on the testimonies of AW- 1 to AW-3 particularly that of AW- 1 to contend that it was the petitioner's mother, and not the petitioner himself, who had rented out the property to respondent No. 1. It is argued that the deposition of AW- 1 undermines the existence of a landlord-tenant relationship between the petitioner and respondent No. 1. However, learned counsel for respondent No. 1 candidly conceded that none of the witnesses, including AW- 1, disputed the petitioner's ownership of the property or denied the obligation of respondent No. 1 to pay rent in terms of the oral tenancy agreement. Thus, notwithstanding the interpretive emphasis placed on AW- 1's testimony, the essential elements of the tenancy, including the petitioner's ownership and the respondent's liability, remain uncontroverted on the record.

5. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties and have carefully examined the testimonies of the three witnesses (AW-1 to AW-3), as well as the documentary evidence brought on the record. The testimonies of the witnesses unequivocally establish that the petitioner is the admitted owner of the property. Not a single witness has refuted the title to the property of the petitioner. The evidence further reveals that the property was placed under the charge of the petitioner's mother (AW- 1), as the petitioner was residing abroad. Accordingly, the mother rented out the property and collected rent on behalf of the petitioner. The oral testimonies and the documentary evidence produced by the petitioner have remain unchallenged, as the right of respondent No. 1 to cross-examine the petitioner's witnesses was struck off vide order dated 09.10.2019, an order that attained finality, having remained unchallenged by respondent No. 1. In the absence of any rebuttal or cross-examination, the evidence led by the petitioner stands uncontroverted. The material on record conclusively establishes that the petitioner is the lawful owner of the property and that his mother merely acted as his agent for the limited purpose of renting out the property and collecting rent. Her role in managing the property or receiving rent does not, by any legal standard, confer ownership on upon her. While the law may recognize such agents as "landlords" for the procedural purpose of instituting eviction proceedings, such recognition is merely representative and does not derogate from the petitioner's legal title or his status as the actual landlord. The evidence, therefore, unequivocally confirms (i) the petitioner's ownership of the property, and (ii) respondent No. 1's persistent default in the payment of rent since July 2016. The core ingredients for the grant of eviction, namely, the existence of a landlord-tenant relationship under the oral tenancy agreement and continued default in rent payment stand fully established.

Nature and Purpose of Rent Proceedings

6. Rent proceedings, by their very nature, are summary in character and are intended to ensure swift and efficient resolution of landlord-tenant disputes, particularly in cases of default, so as to safeguard the landlord's constitutionally protected right to property. The very rationale of summary proceedings is defeated when such proceedings are allowed to linger for inordinate periods. The present case is a testament to this concern: the eviction petition was instituted before the learned Special Judge (Rent) in 2018, dismissed in 2021, and has only now come up for hearing before this Court in 2025. The petitioner-landlord has remained embroiled in litigation for over seven years merely to recover possession of his property, a course of delay that runs counter to the foundational objectives of rent legislation and summary adjudication. Such undue delays not only erode the constitutional rights of property owners but also give rise to broader economic and social justice concerns. For landlords, prolonged litigation entails financial strain, loss of rental income, and an inability to utilize their property for productive purposes, which can hinder economic growth. Conversely, tenants facing eviction proceedings often live in uncertainty, which can affect their social and economic stability. A just legal system must, therefore, ensure an equitable balance between the rights of landlords and tenants, a balance that is fundamentally disrupted when cases are permitted to stagnate in the judicial pipeline.

Use of Artificial Intelligence ("AI") - An Innovative Road Ahead

7. There is an urgent need to examine the systemic causes of such delays and to devise innovative court and case management systems, particularly at the level of the District Judiciary, where the bulk of such disputes originate and where the pressure of case pendency is most acutely felt. While structural reforms are a must and require to continue with vigour, the present crisis compels immediate and pragmatic innovation. In Pakistan's overburdened courts, the integration of Artificial Intelligence ("AI") presents a promising path to operational reform, provided its adoption remains grounded in principled constitutional limits. Under Articles 10A[2] and 37(d)[3] of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution"), the right to fair and expeditious justice must not be rendered illusory. Within this constitutional framework, the thoughtful adoption of AI can serve as a viable instrument for access to timely justice and alleviating systemic backlogs.[4]

8. We notice that Commercial GenAI platforms like ChatGPT, Copilot, and DeepSeek have drawn increasing interest from judges around the world who seek new ways to conduct legal research, drafting, and decision support. In 2023, a Colombian judge expressly announced that ChatGPT was consulted when drafting a judicial ruling.[5] By 2025, appellate judges in Washington D.C. publicly cited ChatGPT in their official opinions.[6] More recently, a judge in Pakistan revealed using ChatGPT to adjudge a case both in a civil and a criminal matter, triggering a debate whether commercial AI is appropriate for official judgments.[7] The promise and potential of AI to enhance the efficiency and working of the justice system cannot be ignored any longer. We find this to be a fit case to explore the use of AI by the judiciary in order to actualize the constitutional mandate of Articles 10A and 37(d) of the Constitution.

Use of Artificial Intelligence ("AI")[8] to Enhance Judicial and Institutional Efficiency

Judicial Efficiency

9. AI, when deployed within principled boundaries, holds significant potential to enhance judicial and institutional productivity and efficiency. Its role is not to replace human adjudication but to supplement and support judicial functions, particularly in areas where judges themselves build expertise. Key applications can include: (i) Smart Legal Research: AI tools can rapidly process vast legal databases to extract relevant precedents, statutory provisions, and scholarly commentary, providing judges with timely, contextually rich legal material.[9] Smart Legal Research is an emerging discipline that applies AI technologies[10] to enhance the accuracy and efficiency of judicial research. Courts worldwide have adopted such platforms, recognizing that they uncover additional sources and insights complementing human research efforts. AI tools such as as Westlaw, LexisNexis AI tools, Casetext: CARA AI & CoCounsel, Bloomberg Law, vLex, SUPACE, Judge-GPT, and AI-assisted writing platforms like BriefCatch, WordRake, PerfectIt, Clearbrief and ChatGPT are increasingly integrated into judicial workflows, offering substantial support in legal research and drafting.[11] These tools streamline processes by enhancing efficiency, clarity, and precision, and can improve textual quality by detecting errors and refining structure. Federal Judicial Academy ("FJA"), Islamabad has taken a momentous stride in judicial innovation by introducing Judge-GPT, an LLM-based AI mechanism devised in collaboration with ETH Zurich.[12] Approximately 1500 judges within the District Judiciary currently utilize this technology, which is tailored to conform with Pakistan's legislative framework, procedural statutes, and domestic jurisprudence rather than mirroring any commercial prototype. Preliminary observations include that Judge-GPT expedites case law research and better drafting of court orders, enabling judges to devote enhanced attention to substantive legal analysis. Judges must, however, undertake careful verification of all references suggested by Judge-GPT while adhering to established ethical and procedural protocols.[13] Ongoing training in the system's evolving capabilities is likewise encouraged, ensuring that judges fully comprehend its scope and limitations. Should subsequent reviews affirm the reliability of Judge-GPT, a more extensive deployment may follow, marking a profound milestone in Pakistan's continued efforts to enhance judicial efficiency while preserving foundational principles of justice. (ii) Language Precision and Drafting: AI-powered platforms refine grammar, syntax, and structure, thereby enhancing the clarity, coherence, and professionalism of judicial writing. Some of the AI-assisted writing platforms are: BriefCatch, WordRake, PerfectIt, Clearbrief and ChatGPT (iii) Comparative Jurisprudence: With increased access to international legal databases, judges can engage with foreign jurisprudence more efficiently, enabling domestic legal thought to evolve in dialogue with comparative and international law. (iv) Decision-Making Support: AI assists in organizing complex case files, identifying key legal questions, and summarizing voluminous records, thereby enabling more informed and timely decision-making. (v) Consistency and Coherence: By identifying conflicting precedents and promoting jurisprudential uniformity, AI promotes predictability and stability in legal outcomes, reinforcing public confidence in the judiciary. These functions establish AI as a valuable supplementary resource. However, AI tools remain subordinate to judicial reasoning and must never be mistaken as a substitute for the exercise of judicial conscience, discretion, or interpretive judgment. It is strongly underlined that the judicial role requires that AI tools be viewed as supplementary aids rather than substitutes for human reasoning. The responsibility for ensuring the accuracy, ethical integrity, and confidentiality of judicial determinations rests entirely with the judge.

Administrative Efficiency

10. Case allocation stands as a critical administrative function in any judiciary. The manner in which these allocations are executed can have a significant impact on both the neutrality and efficacy of adjudication, given that the judge presiding over a matter may influence its outcome. Traditionally, allocations are overseen by court administrators or senior judges, occasionally prompting concerns of partiality, judge shopping, or disproportionate caseloads.[14] In response, courts in a variety of jurisdictions have increasingly adopted AI-driven mechanisms designed to enhance objectivity. These range from straightforward random-assignment programs to advanced algorithms that categorize and assign cases based on their nature or complexity. A principal objective of this approach is the promotion of transparency, achieved by clarifying and standardizing the rules that govern allocation, thereby mitigating any suspicion of favouritism or manipulation. The allocation of cases within judicial systems is a foundational element of procedural fairness, and courts worldwide are increasingly adopting AI-driven frameworks to eliminate discretion, reinforce transparency, and prevent manipulation. Recognizing the risks of partiality, judge shopping, and imbalanced caseloads associated with manual allocations, jurisdictions such as China, Kazakhstan, and various European countries have institutionalized automated, random, or algorithm-based distribution systems often backed by constitutional or statutory mandates. (i) China's "Smart Courts": Historically, the assignment of cases in China was managed by court personnel or senior authorities, thereby introducing the risk of personal discretion.[15] To safeguard impartiality, the Supreme People's Court promulgated directives mandating computer-based random assignment, with narrow exceptions permitted for major or sensitive matters, related proceedings, and circumstances requiring direct leadership supervision.[16] Any departure from this protocol must be substantiated, and any alteration to the initially assigned judge must be transparently disclosed. (ii) Kazakhstan: Kazakhstan's AI-driven case distribution functions as a central component of the nation's judicial digitization efforts, with the Supreme Court offering clear guidance for judicial officers to adopt fully automated protocols that allocate new cases based on defined algorithmic factors such as jurisdiction, classification, and caseload.[17] By analysing whether cases fall into civil, criminal, administrative, or other categories, the system directs matters to judges with the appropriate specialization while continuously monitoring workloads to uphold equitable distribution and procedural efficiency. (iii) Europe: Multiple European judiciaries have adopted automated case allocation to enhance transparency and reduce corruption risks. Slovakia pioneered this approach in 2002 with a computerized random assignment system (colloquially called an "electronic filing room"), effectively transferring authority from court presidents to software-driven algorithms.[18] Under this framework, most Slovakian courts operate through a lottery principle that assigns incoming cases randomly, thereby preventing the selection of pliable judges for specific proceedings.[19] Between 2017 and 2018, Georgia introduced a similar randomized electronic method, that balances factors including case type and judges' existing workloads.[20] Comparable technological mechanisms are employed in Poland, the Czech Republic, and Romania, reflecting a broader commitment to mitigating judicial bias and preserving impartial adjudication. Empirical analyses across these jurisdictions suggest that random allocation strengthens judicial independence and curtails undue influence. (iv) Argentina: Prometea an AI-based platform implemented in Argentina in 2017 fulfils an integral role in case allocation by classifying and triaging routine filings.[21] (v) Colombia: The Constitutional Court of Colombia adopted PretorIA, an AI system inspired by Argentina's Prometea, to address the large volume of tutela proceedings - petitions for constitutional protection.[22] It constructs a hierarchy of these cases based on urgency and fundamental rights considerations.[23] (vi) Brazil: The judiciary has adopted AI-driven systems that govern case allocation and clustering, thereby enhancing transparency and efficiency.[24]

Gaps in the AI Systems - A Warning

11. Although AI may yield significant advantages its adoption likewise generates pressing ethical considerations that necessitate rigorous examination.[25] Therefore, the responsible use of AI in judicial systems must be grounded in a robust framework of constitutional, ethical, and international legal principles.[26] These principles, inter alia, include: (i) Transparency and Explainability: Contemporary deep learning AI models often function as "black boxes" - a system where inputs and outputs are visible, but the internal decision-making process is unclear or too complex to interpret. This lack of transparency makes it difficult to understand how or why the model reaches its conclusions.[27] A lack of "explainability" mechanisms further undermines accountability: AI-generated outcomes may lack adequate justification, compromising transparency and public trust.[28] (ii) Hallucination: In AI, a hallucination is a fabricated or unfounded output that arises from a purely statistical pattern-matching process rather than an internal fact-checking mechanism.[29] LLMs like ChatGPT can confidently cite non-existent cases or procedural facts if their training data suggests it.[30] Many courts have already disciplined attorneys for filing briefs containing such ghost citations, which erodes trust in the legal process.[31] Therefore, hallucinations present both a technical and judicial challenge. Technically, models like GPT-4 have shown a significant incidence of fabricating legal references (58% in one study), underscoring their reliance on statistical predictions over fact verification.[32] These invented authorities can distort court proceedings, undermine evidentiary accuracy, and raise due process concerns if false information slips into the record. Some courts now require attorneys to certify that any AI-generated text has been thoroughly checked before filing.[33] Therefore, judges apply a trust-but verify approach to maintain factual accuracy and protect the rule of law. (iii) Accountability and Human oversight: Accountability is a central principle of judicial proceedings, especially when AI may inform or influence a ruling.[34] It requires that identifiable human authorities hold final responsibility and that mechanisms exist to question and correct any uncertain or objectionable outcomes arising from AI outputs.[35] Judges retain sole accountability for rulings, ensuring that AI acts only as supportive guidance rather than dictating final outcomes. Its function must remain strictly auxiliary, supporting judges while preserving their indispensable role in administering justice.[36] Therefore, many jurisdictions employ a human-in-the-loop or human-in-command approach.[37] Although AI tools might suggest risk scores or prepare draft decisions, a judge ultimately delivers and authenticates the final ruling and retains complete liability. We reiterate the necessity of human oversight, emphasizing that judges should examine and, when necessary, override AI-generated recommendations to preserve judicial integrity. This process also ensures that while developers or other associated parties may be held accountable for technical errors or biases, overarching responsibility rests with the judiciary. Courts must view algorithmic recommendations as advisory rather than conclusive, thereby protecting judicial authority over legal determinations. (iv) Fairness and non-discrimination: AI-driven tools for bail, sentencing, and comparable judicial decisions frequently replicate or exacerbate existing biases, especially when their underlying training data incorporate historical inequities.[38] AI systems must not influence judicial reasoning by embedding latent demographic or ideological biases. This Court warns against "automation bias", the undue deference to algorithmic recommendations and affirms that any AI adoption must maintain institutional independence and judicial impartiality. Accordingly, many legal frameworks now require more stringent oversight and emphasize that fairness must shape AI adoption in the judiciary, thereby honoring constitutional imperatives and reinforcing judicial integrity.

Artificial Intelligence ("AI"), Judging and Fair Trial

12. The right to a fair trial before a competent, independent, and impartial judge is a fundamental principle of due process. AI must not overshadow the core guarantee of judicial autonomy. While AI has the potential to improve consistency and efficiency in legal processes, it also carries the risk of introducing biases and limiting judicial discretion. This Court emphasizes that fairness and transparency must apply equally to AI-assisted rulings, in alignment with Article 14 of the International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights[39] and General Comment No. 32[40] of the United Nations Human Rights Committee. UNESCO's 2021 Recommendation on the Ethics of Artificial Intelligence and its 2022 Global Toolkit on AI and the Rule of Law similarly call for accountability and oversight in AI deployment.[41] In Europe, the European Commission for the Efficiency of Justice Ethical Charter and the Council of Europe Convention on Artificial Intelligence and Human Rights, Democracy and the Rule of Law, 2024 emphasize transparency and accountability within judicial systems.[42] Moreover, Article 22 of the EU General Data Protection Regulation restricts fully automated decisions with significant legal consequences[43], while the EU AI Act, 2024 designates judicial AI as high-risk, requiring bias-free data, thorough documentation, explainability, and human oversight in accordance with the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights. Similar initiatives by the OECD and G20 also stress a human-centric and transparent approach to justice.[44] While AI can assist in legal research and streamline tasks, it must not replace the critical human role of considering nuance, moral judgment, and equity.

Judging with AI - A Note of Caution

13. It must be unequivocally affirmed that AI is not, and must never become, a substitute for judicial decision-making. Adjudication is a constitutional function rooted in legal reasoning, institutional independence, and human empathy, qualities no automated system can replicate. The human part of justice lies in its moral and emotional core, the qualities that AI can never replicate (atleast today). While AI may process data and identify legal patterns, it lacks the capacity for compassion, ethical discernment, and the nuanced understanding of human suffering. Judges, juries, and lawyers bring empathy to their decisions, weighing not just the letter of the law but the spirit of fairness, the context of actions, and the possibility of redemption. Justice requires discretion, knowing when to show mercy, when to challenge unjust laws, and when to adapt to evolving societal values. It demands moral courage to uphold equity over rigid logic and the wisdom to balance punishment with rehabilitation. Most importantly, justice must be seen as legitimate by those it serves, and this legitimacy stems from the belief that a fellow human has truly listened, understood, and acted with conscience. Without these irreplaceable human elements, justice becomes a mechanical exercise, devoid of the very humanity it seeks to protect. Therefore, delegating core adjudicative functions to AI would constitute a dereliction of judicial duty constituting misconduct and compromise foundational principles such as impartiality and due process. The courtroom is not a site for algorithmic governance but a space for reasoned, principled deliberation, attentive to both legal nuance and the lived experiences of litigants. Judges must maintain vigilant oversight to ensure that AI remains an assistive tool, not a decision-maker. While such engagement demonstrates a progressive outlook, it also underscores the urgent need to delineate clear boundaries. The deployment of AI within judicial contexts especially those implicating rights, liberties, and access to justice must be approached with caution. Though AI may enhance efficiency and consistency, it cannot replicate the normative judgment, ethical reflection, or contextual sensitivity essential to the act of judging. The dignity of the judicial role lies not in the mechanical generation of outcomes, but in the deliberative process of reasoning, listening, and responding, a task that remains inherently and irreducibly human. Judicial reasoning involves not only logic but also humanity. It requires attentiveness, moral courage, and the ability to question unjust laws or outdated precedents. By contrast, AI operates within the constraints of existing data and lacks the creative imagination and jurisprudential foresight necessary to develop new legal doctrines or safeguard emergent rights. Comparative jurisdictions have cautiously explored AI-assisted adjudication. In China and Estonia, limited-function AI systems resolve low-stakes disputes under strict human oversight. While AI can support judicial functions, it cannot replace the human conscience that animates the judicial role.[45] AI remains merely an auxiliary resource, while indispensable human judgment and individualized discernment remain paramount in judicial decision-making.

14. Judiciaries in the USA, UK, Canada, Australia, and Singapore are methodically incorporating AI-driven tools into legal research.[46] In the US, Chief Justice John Roberts had acknowledged AI's potential while emphasizing that its use demands caution and humility.[47] Reflecting the same circumspection, the Illinois Supreme Court adopted a policy, effective January 1, 2025, that permits AI in court workflows but requires human oversight and accountability, thereby addressing concerns about algorithmic reliability.[48] In England and Wales, 2023 guidance authorizes AI for administrative tasks but excludes it from substantive legal analysis.[49] Similarly, the Canadian Judicial Council issued guidelines in 2023 encouraging AI exploration while reaffirming that judges alone retain responsibility for final rulings.[50] Courts in Australia and Singapore have introduced comparable measures, including Singapore's 2024 guide, which holds court users accountable for AI-generated content.[51] These developments embody a measured approach to AI integration, preserving judicial prudence and upholding the integrity of judicial processes.

The Future

15. While the integration of AI in the judicial process offers promising avenues for reform along with serious limitations, we must remain mindful that this assessment is being made today. The rapid advancement of AI technologies, their applications, and their potential consequences within the judicial system are still unfolding and may with time overcome the gaps identified above. We stand at the intersection of innovation and tradition. For any justice system to remain fair and just in the age of AI, certain core universal values must be preserved as non-negotiable ethical foundations. First and foremost, human dignity and compassion must remain central, ensuring that algorithms never override mercy or individualized consideration in judgments. Fairness and anti-discrimination principles must be hardwired into AI systems to prevent the replication of historical biases, guaranteeing equal treatment under the law. The rule of law must always prevail over the rule of data, with human judges retaining ultimate authority to interpret evolving legal and moral standards. Due process protections, including presumption of innocence and right to confront evidence cannot be compromised by automation. Finally, the system must preserve space for restorative justice and rehabilitation, recognizing that punishment should serve societal healing rather than mere efficiency. These principles form the essential guardrails ensuring that technological advancement enhances rather than diminishes justice, keeping the human element at the heart of legal systems even as AI capabilities grow more sophisticated. As we explore AI's role in the judicial system, we must continue to be vigilant in ensuring that these advancements do not undermine the core principles of justice, fairness, and impartiality. What the judicial landscape will look like in the coming years is uncertain, but the values that underlie our legal system must always remain the foundation upon which any innovative technological edifice is to be built.

The Enduring Role of Mediation and ADR in the AI Era

16. It is interesting to note that as AI continues to revolutionize the legal profession, especially with its ability to automate tasks such as legal research, case law summaries, contract review, drafting, and argument building, it raises an important question: what will be left for lawyers to do? While the more logical and fact-based aspects of legal work are increasingly replaceable by AI, the human qualities that underpin mediation and alternative dispute resolution ("ADR") remain irreplaceable.[52] AI lacks the ability to feel the emotional tenor, to de-escalate tension between parties, or to recognize the power of silence in a negotiation. It also cannot build trust across the table through empathy, qualities essential to successful mediation. This is where human mediators continue to hold the advantage. While AI may be able to streamline many facets of legal practice, it cannot replicate the deeply human process of mediation, where the emphasis is on understanding, negotiating, and resolving conflicts through human interaction. In fact, mediation is emerging as the future power player in dispute resolution. For lawyers in the Global South, there exists a unique opportunity to lead this shift in the legal profession. As AI continues to take over repetitive and fact-based legal tasks, lawyers can position themselves as experts in mediation and ADR, offering services that AI simply cannot replicate. The growing emphasis on mediation as a core skill set presents an exciting opportunity for the next generation of legal professionals to shape the future of dispute resolution in the brave new world of AI.

17. In sum, AI must be welcomed with careful optimism. It can streamline judicial functions, reduce delays, and expand access to legal knowledge. But it cannot replicate the moral, ethical, and empathic reasoning that lies at the heart of judging.[53] Courts must thus pursue a calibrated integration harnessing AI's efficiencies without surrendering the conscience, independence, and humanity that justice demands.

18. We strongly recommend that the National Judicial (Policy Making) Committee in collaboration with the Law and Justice Commission of Pakistan considers developing comprehensive guidelines on the permissible uses of AI within the judiciary. These must delineate clear boundaries, ensuring that AI is used only as a facilitative tool and never in a manner that compromises human judicial autonomy, constitutional fidelity, or public trust in the justice system. Let a copy of this judgment be dispatched to both the Law and Justice Commission of Pakistan and the National Judicial (Policy Making) Committee for preparing guidelines to regulate this emerging intersection of law and AI.

19. In light of the foregoing discussion, we affirm the judgment of the appellate court, which rightly upheld the petitioner's claim. Consequently, the impugned judgment of the High Court is set aside. This petition is converted into an appeal and allowed and respondent No. 1 is directed to vacate the property in question within two months from the date of this judgment.

20. Before parting with this judgment, we acknowledge with appreciation the invaluable assistance rendered to the Bench by Ms. Beenish Chaudhary[54], University of Buckingham (U.K.) and Mr. Umer A. Ranjha, Judicial Law Clerk, Supreme Court of Pakistan.

C.R.Ps 5 to 9/2023

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, A.C.J.---Through the present petitions, the petitioners seek review of the judgment of this Court dated 29.02.2022. This Court upheld the judgments of the Peshawar High Court, Peshawar in the impugned judgment under review (reported as District Education Officer (Female) Charsadda and others v. Sonia Begum and others (2023 SCMR 217) whereby challenges brought by candidates who had been denied appointments as Primary School Teachers ("PSTs") due to discrepancies between their domicile certificates and CNIC addresses were dismissed. The Court affirmed that under Section 3 of the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa (Appointment, Deputation, Posting and Transfer of Teachers, Lecturers, Instructors and Doctors) Regulatory Act, 2011, it is the domicile certificate, and not the CNIC address, that determines a candidate's permanent residence for employment purposes. It further cautioned that relying solely on CNIC addresses would undermine the value of domicile certificates and unfairly disadvantage otherwise qualified applicants. Recognizing the distinction between "domicile" and "residence" and invoking the doctrine of legitimate expectation, the Court held that candidates who had successfully passed competitive examinations and possessed valid domicile certificates could not be denied appointments on technical grounds. Consequently, leave to appeal was refused. Hence, these instant review petitions.

2. At the very outset, we deem it necessary to express our concern regarding the growing trend of filing review petitions in a casual and mechanical manner, often as a veiled attempt to reargue matters already conclusively adjudicated. While the right of access to courts is a cornerstone of our constitutional framework, it is not an unqualified or limitless right. Such access must be exercised with due responsibility and in a manner that upholds the dignity and finality of judicial proceedings. When litigants such as the petitioners before us initiate repetitive and meritless petitions, or employ tactics aimed at delaying the conclusion of proceedings, they erode the integrity of the judicial process. In light of these concerns, it is necessary to restate the settled and narrow contours of the Court's review jurisdiction.

Scope of Review Jurisdiction

3. It must be noted that Article 188 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution") empowers the Supreme Court to review any judgment pronounced or order made by it. Article 188 provides:

> Review of judgments or orders by the Supreme Court.---The Supreme Court shall have power, subject to the provisions of any Act of Majlis-e-Shoora (Parliament) and of any rules made by the Supreme Court, to review any judgment pronounced or any order made by it.

The aforesaid provision empowers the Supreme Court to review its judgment under Article 188 of the Constitution, subject to the provisions of any Act of Parliament, and of any rules made by this Court. The procedure governing the exercise of review jurisdiction is further elaborated in the Supreme Court Rules, 1980 ("Rules"). Order XXVI, Rule 1 of the Rules stipulates that a review petition may be filed on grounds similar to those mentioned in Order XLVII, Rule 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 ("C.P.C."), which provides that a review may be sought where there is (1) discovery of new and important matter or evidence which, after the exercise of due diligence, was not within knowledge of, or could not be produced by, the third party seeking review at the time when the decree was passed or order made; (2) some mistake or error apparent on the face of the record, and (3) any other sufficient reason.[1]

4. The term "mistake or error apparent on the face of the record" cannot be defined with precision or exhaustiveness, and there would always remain an element of indefiniteness inherent in its very nature.[2] It is to be determined in each case on the basis of its own peculiar facts. Such an error may involve a question of law or fact; however, the critical condition is that it must be self-evident, immediately apparent, and not require extensive discussion or reasoning.[3] If an error is not self-evident and its detection demands prolonged debate or analysis, it cannot be classified as an error apparent on the face of the record. A decision, order, or judgment cannot be corrected simply because it is erroneous in law, or because a different view could have been taken by the court or tribunal on a point of law or fact.[4] It is important to note that a party filing a review petition cannot be allowed to repeat previously overruled arguments in an attempt to reopen the conclusions reached in the judgment.[5] It is well established law that the power of review should not be confused with the appellate power, which permits a superior court to correct errors made by a subordinate court.[6] Review proceedings are distinct from appeals and must be strictly confined to the scope and parameters outlined in Order XLVII, Rule 1 of the C.P.C.

5. In view of the aforesaid, the upshot of the discussion is that the power of review, as articulated in Article 188 of the Constitution and governed by the Rules and the C.P.C., is not an open invitation to revisit judgments merely on the basis of dissatisfaction with the outcome. It is a limited jurisdiction, exercised with great caution and circumspection. The conditions for filing a review petition are specifically enumerated, and they do not extend to re-arguing points of law or fact that have already been conclusively determined.

6. We have heard the learned Additional Advocate General, Khyber Pakhtunkhwa at some length, gone through the impugned judgment, record of the case and the law on the subject. It becomes evident that these petitions seek to rehear matters already settled in the judgment under review. These petitions do not disclose any new or important evidence, nor do they point to any error that is apparent on the face of the record. In fact, the issues raised in the review petitions appear to be a mere reiteration of arguments that have already been considered and rejected by this Court. Therefore, we find that there is no ground made out for the review of the impugned judgment and are of the view that the present petitions are completely frivolous and vexatious.

Frivolity of the Petitions

7. Frivolous claims serve no purpose other than to waste the Court's time and resources. The repeated filing of such petitions, especially when the issues have already been conclusively settled, clutters the judicial process with baseless assertions. This compels the Court to divert its valuable time and attention to matters devoid of merit. Frivolous litigation is costly not only for the judicial system but also for litigants.[7] Such cases consume limited court resources and require parties to expend substantial time and financial resources defending unwarranted claims. This imposes an undue burden on both the judiciary and the litigants, leading to avoidable expenses and procedural delays. Moreover, frivolous litigation delays justice for deserving litigants by diverting the Court's focus from meritorious cases[8], thereby disrupting the efficient administration of justice and impeding the timely resolution of genuine disputes.

8. It is pertinent to highlight that over 2.2 million cases are currently pending before courts across Pakistan, including approximately 56,635 cases before this Court alone.[9] A proportion of these consist of review petition.[10] Frivolous, vexatious, and speculative litigation contributes substantially to this backlog, artificially inflating dockets and obstructing the expeditious adjudication of legitimate claims. The misuse of judicial processes not only squanders finite judicial resources but also undermines public confidence in the justice system. Frivolous and vexatious litigation has become a serious menace, choking and clogging the judicial machinery. Resources, both human and material that ought to be deployed toward resolving genuine disputes are instead wasted on these baseless claims.[11] This form of litigation must be unequivocally discouraged and systematically eliminated. As Justice Bowen famously remarked, "I have found in my experience that there is one panacea which heals every sore in litigation and that is costs."[12] The imposition of costs, as authorized under Order XXVIII, Rule 3 of the Rules[13], serves as a critical deterrent against the abuse of judicial process. It reinforces judicial discipline, promotes expeditious adjudication, and protects the integrity of the legal system. By ensuring that only bona fide claims occupy the Court's time, cost sanctions not only preserve judicial resources but also enhance broader access to justice.

Imposition of Costs

9. The imposition of costs functions as a crucial corrective mechanism within the justice system, simultaneously deterring meritless claims and preserving court access for genuine litigants.[14] As Professor Sanford Levinson has aptly observed, cost sanctions serve as an economic check on frivolous litigation, discouraging litigants from misusing judicial processes for vexatious purposes.[15] Any meaningful reform aimed at reducing case pendency, promoting alternative dispute resolution, or streamlining civil justice will be ineffective without robust and enforceable provisions on the imposition of costs.[16] This Court has consistently emphasized that frivolous litigation results in an unjustified waste of judicial time perpetuated in part by the absence of meaningful financial repercussions for filing baseless claims.[17] Such litigation not only delays the resolution of valid disputes but also misappropriates public resources, including funds, facilities, and manpower. These are financed by taxpayers and must be judiciously utilized.[18] Cost sanctions in frivolous and vexatious matters are thus essential to fulfilling the constitutional mandate of a fair trial under Article 10A of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution"). Failure to impose costs effectively denies genuine claimants access to justice under Article 9 and impairs the constitutional goal of expeditious justice outlined in Article 37(d) of the Constitution. In recognition of this, the Supreme Court has consistently directed all tiers of the judiciary to impose appropriate costs to check the abuse of process, prevent unwarranted adjournments, curb procedural delinquency, and preserve the judiciary's efficiency and integrity.[19]

10. The legal framework governing the imposition of costs in Pakistan is rooted in both statutory law and procedural rules. In addition to Order XXVIII, Rule 3 of the Rules, Section 35 of the C.P.C. empowers courts to determine by whom and to what extent costs are to be paid. Section 35-A further authorizes compensatory costs against parties who raise false or vexatious claims or defences. More recently, the Costs of Litigation Act, 2017 enacted for the Islamabad Capital Territory has fortified the cost regime by mandating the imposition of compensatory, special, and adjournment costs. This transforms cost sanctions from a discretionary tool into a mandatory judicial duty. Although this statute currently applies only in the Islamabad Capital Territory, it offers a viable legislative model for adoption across provinces to standardize and strengthen deterrence against frivolous litigation nationwide.

11. One of the central challenges in curbing frivolous litigation is the absence of a universally accepted definition of a "frivolous suit." As Professor Suja A. Thomas has observed that there is considerable disagreement about what exactly qualifies as frivolous.[20] In this context, courts may consider a set of non-exhaustive factors to assess whether a case is frivolous. These inter alia include: (i) Conduct of the parties: Any behaviour that unnecessarily prolongs or delays the proceedings[21], (ii) Margin of success or failure: Whether the claim was reasonably arguable or plainly untenable from the outset[22], (iii) Falsehood or fraud: If a party or its witnesses lied under oath or submitted forged or fabricated document[23], (iv) Compliance with legal obligations: Whether the party has scrupulously complied with the Code of Civil Procedure, the Evidence Act, and other applicable substantive or procedural laws[24], (v) Unnecessary denials: If a party refused to admit facts or documents that ought reasonably to have been admitted[25], and (vi) Violation of court processes: Failure by a party or its legal representative to comply with court rules, practice directions, or lawful court orders.[26]

12. In various jurisdictions, including the United States[27], lawyers are ethically and procedurally obligated to certify, before filing a case, that the action is not initiated for improper purposes such as to harass, delay, or increase litigation costs unnecessarily. They must also certify that the claims, defences, and legal contentions are warranted by existing law and that factual contentions are supported by evidence. Courts have the discretion to penalize not only litigants but also legal representatives who violate these duties. This reinforces professional accountability and deters frivolous litigation. In Pakistan, a similar obligation exists specifically in the context of review petitions. Under the Rules, it is mandatory that the Advocate signing the review application briefly state the precise grounds on which the review is sought.[28] Furthermore, the Advocate must provide a reasoned certificate affirming that, in their professional opinion, the case warrants review. This safeguard ensures the limited jurisdiction of review is not misused, thereby conserving judicial time for matters of genuine substance.

13. Another significant obstacle in addressing frivolous litigation is the difficulty in determining what constitutes "reasonable" litigation costs. As emphasized by Sir Rupert Jackson and the Manitoba Law Reform Commission, cost regimes should be proportionate, comprehensible, and flexible enough to deliver justice in individual cases.[29] Token or nominal costs fail to deter luxury or baseless litigation. The Supreme Court of India has advocated for the imposition of punitive, rather than merely compensatory costs to effectively discourage frivolous claims.[30] Courts must therefore impose costs that are realistic and proportionate not only to disincentivize meritless litigation but also to encourage the use of alternative dispute resolution mechanisms, all while safeguarding access to justice for those with legitimate grievances.

14. The consistent imposition of meaningful and proportionate costs rooted in statutory authority, judicial discipline, and constitutional imperatives is essential to deter abuse of process and restore procedural integrity. It is imperative that courts across all tiers actively embrace cost sanctions as a necessary tool for judicial economy, procedural fairness, and the delivery of timely and effective justice. Only by weeding out vexatious and baseless claims can the judiciary ensure that its limited resources are directed toward those causes that truly deserve legal redress.

15. In view of the aforesaid, these civil review petitions are accordingly dismissed, with costs of Rs. 100,000/- (Rupees One Hundred Thousand only) imposed under Order XXVIII, Rule 3 of the Supreme Court Rules, 1980, for being frivolous and for having squandered the valuable time of the Court. The costs shall be deposited within fifteen (15) days with any charitable institution recognized under the Thirteenth Schedule to the Income Tax Ordinance, 2001. Proof of such deposit must be placed on the record of this case. In the event of non-compliance, the office shall place the matter before the appropriate Bench for further orders.

C.P.L.A No. 402-P/2023

16. This petition is barred by limitation, having been filed with a delay of thirteen (13) days. The application for condonation of delay (C.M.A. No. 600-P/2023) fails to disclose any sufficient cause warranting condonation and is, therefore, dismissed. Even otherwise, the petition seeks to agitate the same issue which has already been conclusively adjudicated in District Education Officer (Female) Charsadda and others v. Sonia Begum and others (2023 SCMR 217). We see no justification to depart from the earlier view taken by this Court. Accordingly, this petition is dismissed both on the ground of limitation and on merits.

ADDITIONAL NOTE

MUHAMMAD ALI MAZHAR, J.---The judgment authored by one of us, which has been sought to be reviewed [District Education Officer (Female) Charsadda and others v. Sonia Begum and others (2023 SCMR 217)] resonates that all the questions raised by the parties, both for and against, were properly discussed and answered in extenso. Since no plausible or reasonable ground, including any error apparent on the face of the record, was accentuated, therefore, all review petitions were dismissed with cost by means of the judgment authored by my learned brother, Justice Syed Mansoor Ali Shah. As the filing of review petitions has become an increasing trend, often resorted to as a matter of course rather than as a means to correct errors apparent on the face of the record as a legal necessity or propriety, I also feel it is my utmost responsibility to contribute an additional note on this crucial issue.

2. No doubt, this Court has been conferred the powers to review its judgment under Article 188 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan ("Constitution"), but this is subject to the provisions of any Act of Parliament and of the rules made by this Court. In this background, Order XXVI of the Supreme Court Rules, 1980 ("Rules"), is also quite pertinent, wherein it is expounded that, subject to the law and practice, the Supreme Court may review its judgment or order on grounds similar to those mentioned in Order XLVII, Rule 1, of Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 ("C.P.C."), and in a criminal proceeding, on the ground of an error apparent on the face of the record. The precondition and yardstick for filing a review application is that the Advocate signing the application shall specify, in brief, the points upon which the prayer for review is based, and shall add a certificate in the form of a reasoned opinion that review would be justifiable in that particular case.

3. While recognizing the right to file a review petition within the framework and scope of review jurisdiction in the aforesaid rules, a penal clause is also embedded; that in case the Court concludes that the Review Application was vexatious or frivolous, the Advocate or the Advocate-On-Record drawing the application shall render himself liable to disciplinary action.

4. The survey of Order XLVII, Rule 1, C.P.C., divulges that an aggrieved person may file an application for review of the judgment or order on the ground of the discovery of new and important information or evidence which, after the exercise of due diligence, was not within his knowledge or could not be produced by him at the time when the decree was passed or order made, or on account of some mistake or error apparent on the face of the record, or for any other sufficient reason. So, for all intents and purposes, the review of judgment or order may be entreated only in instances of errors in the judgment or order floating on the surface of the record with a substantial impact on the final outcome of the lis. However, it does not connote or entail a right of rehearing of a decided case, especially where there has been a mindful and thoughtful decision on the point of law as well as fact. In my view, every judgment rendered by a court of law is presumed to be a solemn and conclusive determination of all points arising out of the lis. Irregularities, if any, which have no significant effect or impact on the outcome, would not be sufficient to warrant review. However, if the incongruity or ambiguity is of such a nature as to transmute the course of action from being one in aid of justice to a process of injustice, then, obviously, a review petition may be instituted for redressal, to demonstrate the error if it is found floating conspicuously on the surface of the record, but a mere desire for rehearing of the matter cannot constitute sufficient ground for the grant of review, which, by its very nature, cannot be equated with the right or remedy of appeal. The clemency afforded by review exists to nip in the bud an irreversible injustice, if any, done by a court, such as misconstruction of law, misreading of evidence, or non-consideration of pleas raised, which would amount to an error floating on the surface of the record. However, where the court has taken a conscious and deliberate decision on a point of fact or law, a review petition will not be competent. The review jurisdiction of the court is neither commensurate with a right of appeal nor an opportunity of rehearing, nor can a judgment or order be reviewed merely because a different view could have been taken.

5. At present, it has become a custom or routine practice to file review applications unwarily and injudiciously, based on certificates issued by advocates that merely imitate the grounds already urged and decided in the main petition or appeal, without specifying any genuine error in the judgment or order which merits its reversal. It is high time that this practice be denounced and condemned, as it constitutes nothing but a waste and depletion of the precious time of the Court and places an unnecessary burden on its docket. Reiteration of the same arguments in a review application is not sufficient to prompt a different view. A review of a judgment or order is a substantial step and such a departure should only be resorted to when a patent mistake, inadvertence, or oversight appears on the record which cause a serious miscarriage of justice.

6. While adverting to the provision or construction of any law and/or the Constitution, some errors may be apparent on the face of the record which cause substantial injury which require some remedial measures to advance the cause of justice. This may include the discovery of new and important matter or evidence which, after the exercise of due diligence, was not within the knowledge of, or could not be produced by, the party seeking review at the time when the decree was passed or order made; some mistake or error apparent on the face of the record; or any other sufficient reason. The ground of error apparent on the face of the record, is common to review in both civil and criminal proceedings. For such review to be entertained, the specific ground must not only be mentioned in the certificate of the advocate, but also be conspicuously spotted in the review petition, rather than relying on sweeping or irrational grounds having no nexus with the case. Undoubtedly, it is the duty of the Judges of the apex Court to correct their errors, because the principles of law enunciated in their judgments are binding on all other courts in the country under Article 189 of the Constitution. Orders based on an erroneous assumption of material facts, or those made without adverting to a provision of law, or reflecting a departure from the undisputed construction of law and the Constitution, may amount to an error apparent on the face of the record and can be rectified. Earlier also, in my judgment in the case of Commissioner Inland Revenue Z-III, Corporate Regional Tax Office, Tax House, Karachi v. Messrs MSC Switzerland Geneva and others (2023 SCMR 1011 = 2023 SCP 150), the review jurisdiction was discussed in extenso. With reference to the aforesaid judgment, the rationes decidendi deducible from a plethora of local and foreign dicta rendered time and again on the exercise of review jurisdiction are as under:

"1. Mistakes or errors which are self-evident and found floating on the face of the record, or the production of new and important evidence which was not in the knowledge of the applicant after the exercise of due diligence and which could not be produced at the time the order under review was made, which, if noticed earlier, would have material bearing on the final result of the case and, if not corrected, may perpetuate illegality and injustice

2. Orders based on an erroneous assumption of material facts, or without adverting to a provision of law, or a departure from undisputed construction of law and Constitution may amount to an error apparent on the face of the record. However, where there is a material irregularity but there is no substantial injury consequent thereon, the exercise of power to review to alter the judgment would not necessarily be required as the irregularity must be of such a nature as to convert the process from being one in the aid of justice to a process of gross injustice

3. Misconstruction of law, misreading of the evidence on record and non-consideration of pleas raised before a Court would amount to an error floating on the surface of record.

4. Where the Court has taken a conscious and deliberate decision on a point of fact or law, a review petition will not be competent.

5. Where two conclusions drawn simultaneously appear to be the outcome of banking upon a hyper technicality, with the consequence that both the views became destructive of each other, this by itself is a sufficient ground for review of the judgment.

6. Where the judgment under review is found to have directed the doing of something which is in conflict with the Constitution or law, then it will be the duty of the Court to amend such error. However, it was observed on the scope of review that the incorrectness of a conclusion can never be a ground for review as it would amount to granting the Court a jurisdiction to hear appeals against its own judgments which is not permissible.

7. If the conclusion is wrong because something manifest has been ignored by the Court or the Court has not considered an important aspect of the matter, a review petition would lie.

8. A judgment cannot be reviewed merely because a different view could have been taken, rather a review petition would lie only when there is an alleged error in the judgment which is evident and can be established without elaborate arguments.

9. The review petition would also be competent if some relevant evidence or question of fact or law has been overlooked which, had it been considered by the Court, might materially have affected the judgment of the Court.

10. Review jurisdiction does not allow the re-hearing of a decided case, more so when the Court has given a conscious and deliberate decision on the point of law as well as of fact while disposing of the constitution petition before it. Moreover, the grounds not urged or raised at the time or hearing the constitution petition cannot be allowed to be raised in the review proceedings

11. If the error in the judgment/ order is so manifest and is floating on the surface, which is so material that had the same been noticed prior to the rendering of the judgment the conclusion would have been different, in such a case a review petition would lie. The Constitution does not place any restriction on the power of the Supreme Court to review its earlier decisions or even to depart from them nor the doctrine stare decisis will come in its way so long as review is warranted in view of the significant impact on the fundamental rights of citizens or in the interest of public good and the Court is competent to review its judgment/order suo motu without any formal application.

12. Mere desire of re-hearing of the matter cannot constitute sufficient ground for the grant of review. It is well settled by now that where petitioner took up all material grounds taken by him during the course of hearing of appeal and dealt with and decided in judgment under review and thus sought rehearing of arguments addressed by him at time of hearing and disposal of appeal and wished a different decision from one already given without satisfying jurisdictional requirement necessary for maintaining review petition.

13. Discovery of new and important matter or evidence which, after the exercise of due diligence, was not within knowledge of, or could not be produced by the party seeking review at the time when the decree was passed or order made; some mistake or error apparent on the face of the record; or any other sufficient reason and error apparent on the face of the record, are common grounds for review in both civil and criminal proceedings.

14. The expression, "error apparent on the face of the record" cannot be defined with precision or exhaustiveness, and there would always remain an element of indefiniteness inherent in its very nature. It is to be determined in each case on the basis of its own peculiar facts, whenever Judges of these courts are pointed out, in review jurisdiction conferred by the Constitution or law, something in their judgment or order that is in conflict with the Constitution or any law of the land, it becomes their duty to unhesitatingly correct that error. Duty of the Judges of the apex Court of the country is more thoughtful and profound in this regard, as there is no other court which can correct their error, and the principles of law enunciated in their judgments are, under Article 189 of the Constitution, binding on all other courts in the country.

15. An application to review a judgment is not to be lightly entertained and the Court could exercise its review jurisdiction only when grounds are made out as provided. A review of a judgment is a serious step and reluctant resort to it is proper only where a glaring omission or patent mistake or like grave error has crept in earlier by judicial fallibility. A mere repetition, through different counsel, of old and overruled arguments, a second trip over ineffectually covered ground or minor mistakes of inconsequential import are obviously insufficient.

16. In a review petition, it is not open to the Court to reappreciate the evidence and reach a different conclusion, even if that is possible. Conclusion arrived at on appreciation of evidence cannot be assailed in a review petition unless it is shown that there is an error apparent on the face of the record or for some reason akin thereto. The power of review cannot be confused with appellate power which enables a superior court to correct all errors committed by a subordinate court.

17. A review is by no means an appeal in disguise whereby an erroneous decision is reheard and corrected, but lies only for patent error.

18. A review of a judgment is a serious step and reluctant resort to it is proper only where a glaring omission or patent mistake or like grave error has crept in earlier by judicial fallibility. It is neither fairness to the Court which decided nor awareness of the precious public time lost what with a huge backlog of dockets waiting in the queue for disposal, for counsel to issue easy certificates for entertainment of review and fight over again the same battle which has been fought and lost. The Bench and the Bar, we are sure, are jointly concerned in the conservation of judicial time for maximum use.

19. The normal principle is that a judgment pronounced by the Court is final, and departure from that principle is justified only when circumstances of a substantial and compelling character make it necessary to do so. The Court may also reopen its judgment if a manifest wrong has been done and it is necessary to pass an order to do full and effective justice.

20. Real distinction between a mere erroneous decision and a decision which could be characterized as vitiated by 'error apparent', and that a 'review' is by no means an 'appeal' in disguise. It has become almost an everyday experience that review applications are filed mechanically as a matter of routine and the grounds for review are a mere reproduction of the grounds of special leave. If parties file review petitions indiscriminately, the time of the court is unnecessarily wasted. Greater care, seriousness and restraint is needed in filing review applications".

7. In light of the foregoing discussion, it is manifest that the review petitions under consideration were devoid of any merit, failed to disclose any error apparent on the face of the record, and did not meet the exacting standards prescribed under the Constitution, the Rules of this Court, or the settled jurisprudence. They represented, at best, a misguided attempt at re-agitating decided issues under the garb of review. The Court, therefore, has rightly dismissed the review petitions with costs. It is imperative to underscore that the sanctity and finality of judicial determinations must not be compromised by the mere persistence of litigants or mechanical issuance of advocate certificates. The review jurisdiction is not a fallback for unsuccessful litigants to reopen a lis, but a narrowly confined judicial tool intended to correct palpable and consequential mistakes.

----Art.186---Reference by the President under Article 186 of the Constitution---Judge of Supreme Court, who was part of the Bench which heard the Reference, signing the short opinion/order but retiring before the detailed reasons released and signed---Held: Judges who retire before signing the detailed reasons could do so after their retirement---It is commonsensical that, if a Judge has already signed a written opinion/short order, but then retires, he can sign/give the detailed reasons post-retirement---This also prevents the unnecessary wastage of public resources and Court time, which would happen if the Bench was to be reconstituted (after the retirement of a Judge) and the entire matter heard again.

reopened andtransferred to Federal Investgation Agency (FIA) immediately after General Zia-ul-Haq's coup d'etat overthrowing Mr. Bhutto's government---Significantly, no judicial order was issued directing that the investigation be reopened or the crime reinvestigated by the FIA---In the post coup investigation interim investigation report (challan) was submitted, and in addition to section 302 (murder) of the Pakistan Penal Code, 1860 ('P.P.C.') and section 307 (attempt to murder) mentioned in the FIR, sections 120B (criminal conspiracy to commit an offence) and 109 (abetment of an offence) were added---Acting Chief Justice ('ACJ') of the Lahore High Court transferred the case to the Lahore High Court for trial despite the fact that the Sessions Judge, Lahore had already taken cognizance of the case---This was done by the 'ACJ' without issuing notices to Mr. Bhutto and to the other accused, without providing them an opportunity of a hearing and without enabling them to acquire legal representation---Mr. Bhutto had appointed General Zia-ul-Haq as the Army Chief who by his actions of 5 July 1977 (i.e. coup d'état) had clearly violated Article 6 of the Constitution and committed the offence of high treason, the prescribed punishment for which is imprisonment for life or death---General Zia, therefore had a motive to proceed against Mr. Bhutto, because had he not done so, Mr. Bhutto may have proceeded against him for committing high treason---By conducting the murder trial itself, the High Court made redundant a number of provisions of the Constitution and Chapter XXVII of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898 ("the Code")---Section 376 of the Code requiring the confirmation of death sentences was violated and this inalienable right was contravened---Since the trial was conducted by the High Court itself, Mr. Bhutto and the other accused were deprived of one right of appeal, which Articles 4(1) and 9 of the Constitution guaranteed---Foremost basis for the conviction of Mr. Bhutto was the testimony of an accused, who turned approver, namely, the then Director-General of the Federal Security Force ('FSF')---After the coup d'etat of 5 July 1977 approver was arrested, nominated as an accused and pleaded that he would make disclosure of the crime, provided he was pardoned---His plea was accepted and he was made an approver---Crime was committed three years earlier and approver's conscience remained dormant and only awoke when he was arrested---Approver's credibility was accepted and he was believed without demur by the Trial and Appellate Courts---However, there were a number of factors which prudence should have alerted and shown that he was self-serving, self-preserving, morally bankrupt, and a false witness---Furthermore, confessions must be voluntary and must not have been obtained by fear of prejudice or hope or advantage---If the confession directly or indirectly is the result of inducement, threat or promise from a person in authority, it would be treated as not voluntary---With regard to the three offences attracting death sentences, section 302, P.P.C. (murder), section 307 PPC (attempted murder) and section 111, P.P.C. (abetment), there was no direct or circumstantial evidence against Mr. Bhutto---Spent bullet casings, ejected from the firearm(s) that were used in the attack, didnot match any of the weapons in use of the FSF---Trial Court proceeded on an incorrect assumption that the motive stood established, even though the facts did not suggest this---Proceedings of the National Assembly were also relied upon by the Courts for establishing motive, which was not permissible [Article 66(1) of the Constitution]---Mr. Bhutto's enmity with the complainant was cited by the complainant as the motive, however, it was not even considered that such enmity could equally be a reason to falsely implicate Mr. Bhutto---First reporting of the crime to the police was by complainant's brother, however, the FIR was not registered when he reported the crime, nor was he cited as the informant/complainant in the FIR when it was registered---Surprisingly, complainant's brother was also not produced as a witness---All the six co-accused were arrested after General Zia's coup d'etat and the imposition of Martial Law, and all of them had confessed to the crime---This remarkable coincidence was not considered by the Trial Court or the Appellate Court to be unusual nor was it ever considered whether these confessions could have been induced---Two of the accused were pardoned and made approvers---Acting Chief Justice, who headed the Bench of the Lahore High Court which had convicted Mr. Bhutto, and the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court who headed the Bench which had upheld the conviction, both assumed their offices in somewhat unusual circumstances giving rise to justifiable misgivings---Bias was on display in a number of paragraphs of the Trial Court's (High Court's) judgment---Gratis observations were made which had absolutely nothing to do with the case before the Court---Manner in which the trial was conducted was antithetical to a fair trial and due process---Trial Court (High Court), which had tried and convicted Mr. Bhutto, and the Appellate Court (Supreme Court), which had dismissed his appeal, were operating when there was no constitutional rule in the country and one man's (General Zia-ul-Haq's) will and whim became legislation and his person had replaced the entire democratic order----Major constitutional and legal lapses that had occurred during the trial, appeal and review stage with respect to requirements of fair trial and due process stated.

(g) Criminal trial---

----Political trials---Scope and purpose---Around the world, authoritarian regimes use "political trials" to legitimize their seizures of power, delegitimize opponents and consolidate authority---A political trial is one whose disposition—the determination of guilt or innocence, followed by punishment—depends primarily on the accused's professed attitudes and activities in relation to the ruling regime---In such trials, the legal process is not employed to ensure justice or minimize errors but rather to discredit and punish political opponents---These trials often rely heavily on statements obtained during investigations from former allies or associates of the accused, who may be coerced or induced to turn against the accused---Such evidence, which would usually hold limited weight in a fair trial, becomes a convenient basis for conviction in a political trial, supporting the alleged criminality of the accused---Political trials thus serve as a potent and notorious "judicial tool" for authoritarian regimes, aimed at suppressing political resistance and eliminating opposition---These trials frequently violate due process and fair trial requirements to produce politically desirable outcomes.

(h) Administration of justice---

----"Transitional justice"---Scope and purpose---In post-authoritarian regimes, "transitional justice" forms a crucial part of the transition from repressive authoritarianism to constitutional democracy---It involves uncovering the crimes of former authoritarian rulers and holding them accountable for past human rights violations, including unlawful detentions, imprisonments and politically motivated trials---Transitional justice, however, is not about vengeance or retribution but about a principled approach to healing and justice---Courts globally have affirmed that they must address the demands of victims for truth and justice while laying the foundation for societal reconciliation and systemic transformation---This dual focus on accountability and restoration is what sets transitional justice apart from ordinary judicial processes---Transitional justice, therefore, encompasses a set of methods through which states that have experienced fundamental human rights violations seek to distance themselves from that past and move forward in a manner consistent with the need for justice for those who have suffered from these violations---These methods of transitional justice include truth and reconciliation commissions and the criminal prosecution of former authoritarian rulers---Furthermore, holding both executive and judicial institutions accountable for their actions during the period of authoritarian repression, as well as exonerating past victims of state repression and miscarriages of justice, is essential for facilitating the transition of these state institutions toward greater respect for, and promotion of, the rule of law and fundamental human rights---Transitional justice encompasses broader mechanisms, including revisiting flawed judicial decisions made during authoritarian regimes through compromising due process and fair trial requirements---This process helps restore fairness and legitimacy in the legal system---By revisiting and rendering opinions on the fairness and legitimacy of such decisions, the Court delivers justice to affected individuals and sends a powerful message: judicial complicity with authoritarianism will not be shielded from scrutiny---This approach reinforces judicial independence, ensures accountability for regime-orchestrated injustices, and establishes a precedent for discrediting flawed judicial decisions rendered under oppressive regimes---Such actions underscore the judiciary's commitment to constitutional principles, reminding past and future judges of their duties and the need to resist authoritarian pressure---Ultimately, this helps safeguard democracy, the rule of law and human rights.

----Arts. 4, 9, 10A & 186---Reference by the President under Article 186 of the Constitution to revisit the cases of Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto (former Prime Minister of Pakistan) reported as Zulfikar Ali Bhutto and 3 others v. The State (PLD 1979 Supreme Court 38) and Zulfikar Ali Bhutto v. The State (PLD 1979 Supreme Court 53)---'Political trial'---Victim of 'judicial murder'---Murder trial of Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto ("Mr. Bhutto") by the Trial Court (the Lahore High Court) and the appellate court (the Supreme Court)---Requirements of due process and fair trial not met---Violations of procedural due process and fair trial requirements stated.

The murder trial of Mr. Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto, a former Prime Minister of Pakistan, serves as a classic example of a political trial, illustrating how such trials can be manipulated to advance authoritarian designs. Bhutto's trial effectively served as a potent and notorious "judicial tool" for strengthening General Zia's authoritarian regime, aimed at suppressing political resistance, eliminating opposition and ensuring the consolidation of power. It helped to entrench the repressive military authoritarian regime under which it was conducted. Instead of independent, substantive evidence, the prosecution relied heavily on confessional statements given by, or procured from, Bhutto's former associates—accomplices turned approvers.

Likewise, several violations of procedural due process and fair trial requirements were committed to achieve politically desirable outcomes. These included the unauthorized reinvestigation of the case, which had previously been closed by an order of the Magistrate concerned; the surreptitious and unlawful transfer of the investigation from the regular investigating agency (Provincial Police) to the Federal Investigation Agency; the transfer of the trial from the regular Trial Court (Sessions Court) to the High Court without adherence to legal requirements; the unjustified cancellation of bail previously granted to Bhutto by a Single Bench of the Lahore High Court; the determination of Bhutto's recusal application by judges other than the one whose recusal was sought, without addressing the instances cited to demonstrate the bias and prejudice of the judge (Justice Maulvi Mushtaq); the composition of the trial and appellate court benches, both of which were headed by judges (Justice Maulvi Mushtaq and Justice Anwar-ul-Haq) who harboured personal grievances against Bhutto due to being passed over for appointments as Chief Justice of their respective courts—the Lahore High Court (Trial Court) and the Supreme Court (appellate court); and the unwarranted reconstitution of the appellate court bench from nine judges to seven judges. It is an established principle that justice must not only be done but must also manifestly and undoubtedly be seen to be done. The infringement of this fundamental principle also constitutes a violation of due process and fair trial requirements. Because of these glaring violations, Bhutto is rightly regarded as the victim of "unfair judicial proceedings" and "legalized political murder"—also referred to as "judicial murder". Both the obvious procedural irregularities and illegalities in the reinvestigation and trial, as well as the biased composition of the trial and appellate court benches, rendered the verdict illegitimate and undermined the independence and impartiality of the superior courts (High Courts and the Supreme Court) for years to come.

Rex v. Sussex Justices [1924] 1 KB 256; Ramsey Clark, Injustice against Bhutto in 2 Courts, (1979) and Ian Talbot, Pakistan: A Modern History, (1998) and Paula Newberg, Judging the State: Courts and Constitutional Politics in Pakistan, (1995) ref.

The Constitution and the law provide no mechanism to set aside the judgment by which Bhutto was convicted and sentenced, as that judgment attained finality following the dismissal of the review petition by the Supreme Court. Furthermore, in its advisory jurisdiction under Article 186 of the Constitution, the Supreme Court lacks the authority to reappraise the evidence or overturn a final decision. However, after carefully examining the record of the reinvestigation and trial proceedings, the Supreme Court concluded— and so stated— that the trial proceedings in the Lahore High Court and the appellate proceedings in the Supreme Court of Pakistan did not meet the requirements of the Fundamental Right to a fair trial and due process as enshrined in Articles 4 and 9 of the Constitution, which were later reinforced as a separate and independent Fundamental Right under Article 10A of the Constitution. Supreme Court's expression of this opinion reflects a commitment to confront past missteps and fallibilities during an authoritarian regime with humility, embodying a spirit of self-accountability and underscoring our dedication to ensuring that transitional justice shall be served with unwavering integrity and fidelity to the Constitution and the law.

Following are principles for appreciating the evidence of an approver:

(i) That if a statement of fact made by an accused in a confession is of the nature that if it is assumed to be true, it would negate the offence alleged to be confessed, it is called an exculpatory confession.

(ii) That a statement of an accused that contains self-exculpatory matter cannot amount to confession.

(iii) That a retracted confession is sufficient to sustain a conviction for a capital offence, if the Court is of the view that the same is voluntary and is true, but as a rule of prudence, it has been consistently held by the superior Courts that the same should not be acted upon unless corroborated by some other reliable evidence in material particulars.

(iv) That though the confession of a co-accused cannot be made the foundation of conviction but it may be used in support of other evidence.

(v) That the confession of a co-accused is evidence of a weak character.

(vi) That under Islamic jurisprudence, in order to make a confession reliable, it should be voluntarily made and not on account of any coercion, duress or violence.

(vii) That any delay in recording of a confession may, or may not, be fatal as to the evidentiary value of a retracted confession.

(viii) That any lapse on the administrative side on the part of a Magistrate recording a confession, may not be fatal as to the evidentiary value of such confession provided the Court is satisfied that the lapses on his part have not, in any way, adversely affected the voluntariness or truthfulness of the confession.

(ix) That if an accomplice's evidence is not corroborated in material respects, it cannot be acted upon and that the evidence of an accomplice cannot be used to corroborate evidence of another accomplice.

The State (PLD 1979 Supreme Court 53)---Murder trial of Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto by the Trial Court (the Lahore High Court) and the appellate court (the Supreme Court)---One of the questions framed by the Supreme Court in the Presidential Reference was

Qazi Faez Isa, CJ.

Background

1. The Federal Cabinet[1] headed by the Prime Minister decided to file a reference under Article 186 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan ('the Constitution') 'in respect of the proceedings of the judicial process in the case of trial Shaheed Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto, former Prime Minister' ('Mr. Bhutto'), and the Prime Minister advised[2] the President of Pakistan ('the President') to file the reference. Resultantly, the President submitted a reference to the Supreme Court,[3] which was numbered as Reference No. 1 of 2011 ('the Reference').

Seeking the Opinion of the Supreme Court

2. Article 186 of the Constitution, pursuant to which the Reference was filed, states that:

'186. (1) If, at any time, the President considers that it is desirable to obtain the opinion of the Supreme Court on any question of law which he considers of public importance, he may refer the question to the Supreme Court for consideration.

(2) The Supreme Court shall consider a question so referred and report its opinion on the question to the President.'

Questions Formulated for Opinion

3. The following questions for the opinion of the Court were formulated:

'1. Whether the decision of the Lahore High Court as well as the Supreme Court of Pakistan in the murder trial against Shaheed Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto meets the requirements of fundamental rights as guaranteed under Article 4, sub-Articles (1) and (2) (a), Article 8, Article 9, Article 10A/due process, Article 14, Article 25 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973? If it does not, its effect and consequences?

2. Whether the conviction leading to execution of Shaheed Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto could be termed as a decision of the Supreme Court binding on all other courts being based upon or enunciating the principle of law in terms of Article 189 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973? If not, its effect and consequences?

3. Whether in the peculiar circumstances of this case awarding and maintaining of the death sentence was justified or it could amount to deliberate murder keeping in view the glaring bias against Shaheed Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto?

4. Whether the decision in the case of murder trial against Shaheed Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto fulfills the requirements of Islamic laws as codified in the Holy Quran and the Sunnah of the Holy Prophet (SAW)? If so, whether present case is covered by doctrine of repentance specifically mentioned in the following Suras of Holy Quran:

(a) Sura Al-Nisa: verses 17 & 18

Sura Al-Baqara: verses 159, 160 and 222 Sura Al-Maida: verse 39

Sura Al-Aaraaf: verse 153

Sura Al-Nehal verse 119

Sura Al-Taha: verse 82

as well as

(b) Sunan Ibn-e-Maaja, Chapter 171, Hadith No. 395

What are effects and consequences of doctrine Re: Repentance

5. Whether on the basis of conclusions arrived at and inferences drawn from the evidence/ material in the case an order for conviction and sentence against Shaheed Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto could have been recorded?'

Larger Bench

4. The Supreme Court[4] ordered that a larger Bench should be constituted to hear the Reference. Resultantly a larger Bench, comprising of the Chief Justice and eight Judges, was constituted, and it last heard the Reference on 12 November 2012; the Reference was not fixed in Court for eleven years. All the members of this Court who were hearing the Reference have retired.

Rehearing of the Reference

5. The Reference was again fixed in Court for hearing on 12 December 2023. This Court noted that, 'A number of other presidential references, filed later under Article 186, of the Constitution, were taken up for hearing and decided by this Court,[5] but this Presidential Reference remains pending, it merits determination as early as possible.' It would be appropriate to reproduce the following paragraphs from the order passed on 12 December 2023:

'2. Learned Mr. Farooq H. Naek referred to an application (C.M.A. No.8622/2018) filed on behalf of Mr. Bilawal Bhutto Zardari, the grandson of the late Mr. Bhutto and states he wants to be represented herein. We are informed that there is only one surviving daughter of the late Mr. Bhutto and he has eight grandchildren. The application is allowed and learned Mr. Naek may represent Mr. Bilawal Bhutto Zardari and assist this Court. If Mr. Bhutto's daughter and any of his grandchildren also want to be represented they may engage counsel. Mr. Naek states that he has also filed an application (CMA No. 10492/2023) seeking live telecast of these proceedings, however, the committee constituted in this regard had before filing of the application already made requisite arrangements and recommended that the Presidential Reference be broadcast, and proceedings are being broadcast,[6] therefore, this application has become infructuous and is disposed of.

3. Learned Mr. Naek refers to the report of Justice Shafi-ur-Rehman, who was then a Judge of the Lahore High Court, regarding the investigation into the murder of Mr. Mohammad Ahmed Khan, the father of the complainant, Mr. Ahmed Raza Khan Kasuri. He requested that he be provided its copy. A Tribunal of inquiry was constituted by the Government of Punjab in exercise of its powers conferred by section 3 of the West Pakistan Tribunals of Inquiry Ordinance, 1969.[7] The Report of the Tribunal is dated 22 February 1975 and comprises of 30 pages, and is mentioned in the judgment of the Lahore High Court[8] and also in the appeal therefrom.[9]

4. The learned Attorney-General for Pakistan ('AG') was asked whether any of the successive Presidents or the Federal Government sought to withdraw the Presidential Reference or wants to do so now, and the learned AG stated that this was not done nor is this sought to be done now.

5. Learned AG was asked to read the Presidential Reference, which he did. He also read some of the orders of this Court, including order dated 21 April 2011[10] which formulated questions for the opinion of this Court. A number of amici curiae were appointed, some of whom have passed away and others we are told are indisposed. Learned Mr. Ali Ahmed Kurd, an amicus appointed by this Court, states that he will be rendering assistance. We are also informed that learned Mr. Makhdoom Ali Khan, another amicus appointed by this Court, will also be rendering assistance. Notice had also been issued to the Supreme Court Bar Association ('SCBA') and the late Ms. Asma Jahangir represented SCBA; if SCBA want to be represented before this Court they may nominate a counsel to assist us. We also appoint learned Messrs Khalid Javed Khan, Salahuddin Ahmed and Zahid F. Ebrahim as amici curiae. Mr. Yasser Kureshi, an academic working at Oxford University, United Kingdom, and Ms. Reema Omer of the International Commission of Jurists are also appointed as amici curiae. They are appointed to particularly attend to the constitutional and legal aspects of the matter.

6. The first and foremost constitutional and legal points, in addition to those recorded in order dated 21 April 2011, that require consideration are:

(1) Whether the Presidential Reference is maintainable under Article 186 of the Constitution;

(2) Whether the Presidential Reference requires a factual inquiry, and if so, whether under Article 186 of the Constitution an opinion can be given in this regard;

(3) The constitutional-legal position of the trial and appeal, and its credibility/ legitimacy when the person being tried was removed from power by a usurper who himself assumed power and then launched the prosecution of Mr. Bhutto in a criminal case which was filed as 'untraced'; and

(4) Were certain judge(s) removed from the trial and/or hearing the appeal to secure a particular result.

7. If the aforesaid aspect is successfully attended to then we will need to consider the trial and appeal which will require expertise in criminal law and procedure. Justice Manzoor Ahmed Malik, former Judge of the Supreme Court, and Justice Assadullah Khan Chamkani, a former Judge of the Peshawar High Court, have vast experience and we want to benefit from their knowledge in this regard, therefore, they are appointed as amici curiae, who may either submit a written brief and/or address us in person. We note that learned Mr. Khawaja Haris Ahmed was the Advocate-General, Punjab and was associated with the Presidential Reference when it was earlier heard and is also a criminal law expert, therefore, he is also appointed as amicus curiae to assist with the criminal law and procedure.

8. With regard to the criminal law aspects the learned amici curiae may assist on the following:

(1) If, and when, can a murder trial be conducted by the High Court, and to cite local and international precedents;

(2) Was the murder-trial being conducted by the High Court objected to, and if it was, how was the objection attended to;

(3) The consequences, if any, of departing from the usual mode of trial;

(4) The admissibility or otherwise of a confessional statement of an approver and to what extent can it be used against a co-accused;

(5) Was there any legal bias, and if so its effects; and

(6) What were the facts leading to reopening the investigation, and was it because fresh evidence had been discovered or was it on account of the usurper securing his position.

9. The Presidential Reference refers to an interview, which we are told was given to Mr. Iftikhar Ahmed of Geo television by Justice Nasim Hassan Shah, who was on the Bench of the Supreme Court which decided the appeal and review[11]. Mr. Ahmed Raza Kasuri also refers to his application (C.M.A. No. 5788/2011) and states that he has filed extracts from a book written by the same learned Judge - Constitution, Law and Pakistan Affairs. Mr. Naek states that Justice Dorab Patel had also given an interview about the case.

10. Office is directed to send copies of the Presidential Reference, all orders and the Report of the Tribunal to the learned amici curiae who may attend to the questions noted above, in order dated 21 April 2011 and in the Presidential Reference. The learned amici may submit their respective written opinions on all or any of the said matters, and on any other aspect which they consider relevant, by Friday, 5 January 2024.'

6. We heard this Reference on 8 January, 20, 26, 27 and 28 February and 4 March 2024. On 6 March 2024 we announced our Opinion under Article 186 of the Constitution which read as follows:

'In the course of performing our core duty to administer justice 'in accordance with the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan and the law', we (judges) are bound to 'do right to all manner of people, according to law, without fear or favour, affection or ill-will.'[12] There have been some cases in our judicial history that created a public perception that either fear or favour deterred the performance of our duty to administer justice in accordance with the law. We must, therefore, be willing to confront our past missteps and fallibilities with humility, in the spirit of self-accountability, and as a testament to our commitment to ensure that justice shall be served with unwavering integrity and fidelity to the law. We cannot correct ourselves and progress in the right direction until we acknowledge our past mistakes.

2. The advisory jurisdiction, under Article 186 of the Constitution, requires this Court to render an opinion on any question of law of public importance referred to by the President. To us, the question of law, in essence, is whether the requirements of due process and fair trial were complied with in the murder trial of Mr. Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto ("Mr. Bhutto"), the former Prime Minister of Pakistan, by the trial court (the Lahore High Court) and the appellate court (the Supreme Court). This question we approach and answer considering whether the trial court and the appellate court attended to and dealt with the requirements of due process and fair trial.

3. The reference filed by the President of Pakistan has provided us an opportunity to reflect upon the proceedings of the trial, conviction and death sentence of Mr. Bhutto, under the regime of the military dictator General Zia Ul Haq. The reference was filed during the government of the political party founded by Mr. Bhutto but the successive governments of other major political parties carried forward this inquiry and did not opt to withdraw the reference. This collective interest reflects the widespread desire of the people of Pakistan to seek the opinion of this Court on whether Mr. Bhutto was afforded a fair trial and due process for his trial for the murder of Mr. Muhammad Ahmed Khan Kasuri.

4. With the able assistance of the eminent legal minds of the country, we for the reasons to be recorded later and subject to amplifications and explanations made therein, render an opinion on the referred questions in the following terms:

Question (1)

Whether the decision of the Lahore High Court as well as the Supreme Court of Pakistan in the murder trial against Shaheed Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto meets the requirements of fundamental rights as guaranteed under Article 4, sub-Articles (1) and (2) (a), Article 8, Article 9, Article 10A/due process, Article 14, Article 25 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973? If it does not, its effect and consequences?

(i) The proceedings of the trial by the Lahore High Court and of the appeal by the Supreme Court of Pakistan do not meet the requirements of the Fundamental Right to a fair trial and due process enshrined in Articles 4 and 9 of the Constitution and later guaranteed as a separate and independent Fundamental Right under Article 10A of the Constitution.

(ii) The Constitution and the law do not provide a mechanism to set aside the judgment whereby Mr. Bhutto was convicted and sentenced; the said judgment attained finality after the dismissal of the review petition by this Court.

Question (2)

Whether the conviction leading to execution of Shaheed Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto could be termed as a decision of the Supreme Court binding on all other courts being based upon or enunciating the principle of law in terms of Article 189 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973? If not, its effect and consequences?

Opinion

Referenced questions do not specify the principle of law enunciated by this Court in the Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto case regarding which our opinion is sought. Therefore, it cannot be answered whether any principle of law enunciated in the Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto case has already been dissented to or overruled.

Questions (3) and (5)

Whether in the peculiar circumstances of this case awarding and maintaining of the death sentence was justified or it could amount to deliberate murder keeping in view the glaring bias against Shaheed Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto?

Whether on the basis of conclusions arrived at and inferences drawn from the evidence/ material in the case an order for conviction and sentence against Shaheed Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto could have been recorded?

Opinion

In its advisory jurisdiction under Article 186 of the Constitution, this Court cannot reappraise the evidence and undo the decision of the case. However, in our detailed reasons, we shall identify the major constitutional and legal lapses that had occurred with respect to fair trial and due process.

Question (4)

Whether the decision in the case of murder trial against Shaheed Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto fulfils the requirements of Islamic laws as codified in the Holy Quran and the Sunnah of the Holy Prophet (SAW)? If so, whether present case is covered by doctrine of repentance specifically mentioned in the following Suras of Holy Quran:

(a) Sura Al-Nisa, verses 17 and 18; Sura Al-Baqara, verses 159, 160 and 222; Sura Al-Maida, verse 39; Sura Al-Aaraaf, verse 153; Sura Al-Nahl, verse 119; Sura Al-Taha, verse 82; as well as (b) Sunan Ibn-e-Maaja, Chapter 171, Hadith No. 395.

What are effects and consequences of doctrine - Re: Repentance

Opinion

We were not rendered any assistance on this question, therefore, it would be inappropriate to render an opinion.'

Retirement of Senior Puisne Judge Sardar Tariq Masood

7. Sardar Tariq Masood, J was the senior puisne judge when the Reference was heard and the above opinion was rendered, however, he retired on 10 March 2024. It is commonsensical that, if a Judge has already signed a written opinion/short order, but then retires, he can sign/give the detailed reasons post-retirement. This also prevents the unnecessary wastage of public resources and Court time, which would happen if the Bench was to be reconstituted (after the retirement of a Judge) and the entire matter heard again. A Supreme Court Bench comprising of thirteen Judges[13] held that Judges who had retired before signing the detailed reasons could do so after their retirement.

Facts of the case

8. On 11 November 1974 at 12.30 am Mr. Muhammad Ahmad Khan ('Mr. Khan'), his wife, his wife's sister and his son Mr. Ahmad Raza Kasuri ('Mr. Kasuri') were returning home after having attended a wedding in a car driven by Mr. Kasuri when it was fired upon and a bullet struck Mr. Khan in the head, which resulted in his death. The FIR[14] was registered on the written complaint of Mr. Kasuri ('the Complainant'), who stated that he suspected that he (and not his father) was the intended target because he was vociferously opposed to the government party (Pakistan Peoples Party) of Mr. Bhutto. Attributing motive to Mr. Bhutto, he stated that Mr. Bhutto had addressed him in the National Assembly (of which both were members - MNAs) saying that he (Mr. Kasuri) had exhausted his patience (' ') and that he (Mr. Bhutto) had said that he had had enough of Mr. Kasuri (' ').

Police Investigation of the Crime

9. The Police commenced its investigation[15] of the crime but the perpetrators could not be unearthed. Therefore, the Senior Superintendent of Police ('SSP') transferred the investigation to a specialized investigation unit, that is, to the Crime Investigation Agency ('CIA').[16] However, the CIA also failed to trace the criminals, and after nine and a half months submitted its report recommending the closure of the investigation.[17]

Closing the Investigation

10. The Police could not make any progress in discovering those who had committed the crime which had killed Mr. Khan. The CIA too drew a blank. Therefore, a report was prepared by Inspector Abdul Hameed of CIA, Lahore which was also signed on 19 March 1976 by the Deputy Superintendent of Police ('DSP'), Ichhra Circle, Lahore within the limits of which the crime was committed, and on 24 April 1976 by the Superintendent of Police ('SP'), Cantonment, Lahore, recommending that the investigation be closed. The Magistrate ordered the closure of the investigation on 3 May 1976. Neither Mr. Kasuri, nor the other legal heirs of the late Mr. Khan, nor anyone else objected to the closure of the investigation. The Magistrate's order closing the investigation was never challenged.

Tribunal of Inquiry

11. The Government of Punjab appointed a Judge of the Lahore High Court as the Tribunal[18] to inquire into:

No. SOG-III-6-309/74 - Whereas the Government of the Punjab is of the opinion that it is necessary to appoint a Tribunal for the purpose of making an inquiry into the incident which took place at Shadman-Shah Jamal Round-about, nearly four furlongs to the north of P. S. Ichhra, Lahore on the night between 10th and 11th November, 1974 at 12-30 a.m. (night):

Now, therefore, in exercise of the powers conferred on him by Section 3 of the West Pakistan Tribunals of Inquiry Ordinance, 1969 (Ordinance II of 1969), the Governor of the Punjab is pleased to appoint Mr. Justice Shafi-ur-Rehman, Judge, Lahore High Court as the Tribunal.

2. The terms of reference of the Tribunal shall be-

(i) To inquire into the incident which took place on the night between 10th and 11th November, 1974 at Shadman-Shah Jamal Round-about, nearly four furlongs to the north of P. S. Ichhra, Lahore leading to the death of Nawabzada Muhammad Ahmed Khan, resident of 130-J, Model Town, Lahore, father of Mr. Ahmed Raza Khan Qasuri, MNA, in which connection FIR No. 402/74 was recorded on 11th November 1974 at P. S. Ichhra, Lahore

(ii) To examine the investigations conducted by the Police in the case and give such directions as may be appropriate.

3. The Tribunal will finalize the inquiry and submit his report within one month.

F. K. BANDIAL

Chief Secretary.'

12. The Tribunal submitted Report of the Tribunal on 22 February 1975, which found that:

'15. The only motive mentioned in the FIR accounting for the occurrence is the affiliations and the political activities of the complainant, Mr. Ahmed Reza Khan Kasuri, and the extreme exasperation and dislike for him of the Prime Minister publicly expressed on the floor of the National Assembly. In explaining the mention of such a motive in the FIR the complainant made it clear that it does not necessarily mean that he was subjected to this and the precedent attacks directly at the bidding of the Prime Minister or that the attack was organized by someone in Government or Party. He said that on political differences, whatever their nature or extent, such a public condemnation by the Prime Minister, who happens to be, for the time being, the repository and source of all political and governmental powers, could prompt a die-hard, an over enthusiastic person, or a trigger happy individual, in the government or outside, of the party or not, to accomplish his extermination from the scene.'

The Tribunal issued the following directions:

'36. In short, the directions that I propose giving to the investigating agency are the following:-

(i) A more thorough and expert examination of the spot.

(ii) Preservation of property connected with the crime, already recovered or recoverable from the spot.

(iii) Expert examination of all the recovered articles together, with a view to narrow down the class of weapon used in the commission of the crime.

(iv) Natural witnesses to the occurrence i.e. residents of the area, invitees at the house of Bashir Shah, the Patrol Parties to be subjected to more purposive interrogation particularly for ascertaining the number of shots fired, number of weapons used and the suspects.

(v) The surviving occupants of the car should have been profitably interrogated on certain aspects of the investigation.

(vi) The material witnesses in the case and the suspects to be fully protected against physical harm.'

However, nothing was unearthed about the perpetrator(s) of the crime.

5 July 1977

13. The Chief of Army Staff, General Mohammad Zia-ul-Haq, overthrew the democratic order and imposed martial law on 5 July 1977. The investigation of the murder of Mr. Khan on 11 November 1974, which was closed on 3 May 1976, was reopened on the verbal orders of the Director of the Federal Investigation Agency ('FIA').[19] The prosecution never explained how and why an investigation into a thirty-two month old case, which was closed fourteen months earlier, was reopened. It was also not explained how and why the investigation was transferred to the FIA. Both of these actions (the reopening of the investigation and its transfer to FIA) were taken immediately after General Zia-ul-Haq's coup d'etat overthrowing Mr. Bhutto's government. The case was resurrected.[20]

Post Coup Investigation

14. The interim investigation report (challan) was submitted on 11 September 1977.[21] In addition to section 302 (murder) of the Pakistan Penal Code, 1860 ('P.P.C.') and section 307 (attempt to murder) mentioned in the FIR were added, sections 120B (criminal conspiracy to commit an offence) and 109 (abetment of an offence). The following seven persons were nominated in the interim investigation report to having conspired to murder Mr. Kasuri and for the murder of Mr. Khan:

Mr. Bhutto, Prime Minister

(Sheikh) Masood Mahmood, Director-General FSF

Mian Muhammad Abbas, Director FSF

Mr. Ghulam Hussain, Inspector FSF

Mr. Ghulam Mustafa, Inspector FSF

Mr. Arshad Iqbal, Sub-Inspector FSF

(Rana) Iftikhar Ahmad, Assistant Sub-Inspector FSF

However, in the final investigation report (challan) dated 18 September 1977 Masood Mahmood and Mian Muhammad Abbas were shown as approvers.

Transfer of case to the Lahore High Court

15. A murder case under section 302, P.P.C. can only be tried by a Court of Session. Therefore, the investigation report, which was submitted to the Magistrate, was forwarded to the Sessions Judge, Lahore on 12 September 1977. After receipt of the report the trial would have commenced. However, on the very next day (13 September 1977) the case (Criminal Original No.60/77, titled State v. Z. A. Bhutto) came up before Justice Mushtaq Hussain, the Acting Chief Justice ('ACJ'), who the very same day ordered that, 'In view of submissions made in the petition the case is transferred to this Court for trial.' This was done despite the fact that the Sessions Judge, Lahore had already on 12 September 1977 taken cognizance of the case. It is inexplicable how then the case was listed for hearing before the ACJ. Criminal Original No.60/77 is untraceable, therefore, it cannot be ascertained what was recorded therein, and what had necessitated its immediate fixation in the High Court, and before Justice Mushtaq Hussain. The record (which is available), however, shows that Justice Mushtaq Hussain immediately and on the same day 13 September 1977 granted the said petition, by passing the following order:

'In view of the submissions made in the petition the case is transferred to this Court for trial. It shall be heard by a Full Bench consisting of

1. Myself

2. Zakiuddin Pal
3. M.S.H. Qureshi
4. Sheikh Aftab Hussain and
5. Malik Gulbaz Khan, JJ.

To be heard on 24.9.1977.

Maulvi Mushtaq Hussain
ACTING CHIEF JUSTICE'

Commencement of the Trial

16. On 24 September 1977 the trial of Mr. Bhutto and of the other co-accused commenced. The High Court ordered that the evidence be summoned, however, even though the accused were present in Court, the charge was not framed against them. The charge was also not framed on the next date, that is, on 3 October 1977. Framing of charge is a mandatory requirement,[22] and only after it is framed can a trial commence. The charge was finally framed on 11 October 1977 when all the accused pleaded not guilty. From 11 October 1977 to 25 February 1978 the High Court (acting as the Trial Court) recorded the statements of forty-one prosecution witnesses (PWs) and of four defence witnesses (DWs). On 2 March 1978 judgment was reserved and it was announced on 18 March 1978. Mr. Bhutto was convicted for the following offences of the PPC: (a) section 120-B and sentenced to five years rigorous imprisonment, (b) section 302 read with sections 301 and 111 and sentenced to death and (c) under section 307 read with section 109 and sentenced to seven years rigorous imprisonment for each offence.

Appeal and Review

17. Mr. Bhutto appealed his conviction before the Supreme Court,[23] but his appeal was dismissed on 6 February 1979 by a majority of four to three.[24] A review petition[25] seeking review of the Judgment dismissing Mr. Bhutto's criminal appeal was filed, but it was unanimously dismissed on 24 March 1979.

Death Warrant and Execution

18. Mr. Bhutto's 'Warrant of Execution on Sentence of Death' ('the death warrant') was signed by Mushtaq Hussain, J, who by now had become the Chief Justice of the Lahore High Court. The death warrant concluded in the following words: 'Given under my hand and the seal of the Court this 25th day of March 1979', and it directed the Superintendent District Jail at Rawalpindi to execute the sentence on 'the Second day of April 1979'. The execution date was later changed to 'the Fourth day of April 1979'. Mr. Bhutto was executed and the Superintendent District Jail Rawalpindi issued a certificate stating that he was 'hanged by the neck till he was dead at Rawalpindi on Wednesday the 4th day of April, 1979; that the body remained suspended for a full hour and was not taken down until life was ascertained by a medical officer to be extinct...'.

The Constitutional scope of this matter

19. We want to clarify, and emphasize, that we are not hearing a petition, an appeal or a review petition. Neither the Constitution nor the law provides a mechanism whereby Mr. Bhutto's conviction could be set aside. Mr. Bhutto's conviction attained finality after the dismissal of the review petition by the Supreme Court. In our advisory jurisdiction, under Article 186 of the Constitution, the decision cannot be undone.

Detailed Reasons

20. With regard to the conviction and sentence of Mr. Bhutto, on 6 March 2024 we had recorded that, 'in our detailed reasons, we shall identify the major constitutional and legal lapses that had occurred with respect to fair trial and due process'. The following are the detailed reasons.

Reopening of the Investigation

21. The investigation of the murderous attack that took place on 11 November 1974 was undertaken by the Police, however, as no progress could be made it was transferred to the CIA, but still the perpetrator(s) could not be discovered. A Tribunal comprising of a High Court Judge was then constituted who issued certain directions but it did not help in unearthing the criminal(s). The recommendation to close the investigation was then made, which was accepted by the Magistrate and the investigation was officially closed on 3 May 1976. No one objected to the closure of the investigation. No application was submitted to reopen the investigation, and no Court ordered that the investigation be reopened. The complainant, who was a lawyer of some standing, also did not object to the closure of the investigation nor did he take the objection that its closure was premature.

22. Within a few days of General Zia's take over those, who were made the accused, were arrested, the crime, which was declared to be untraced and the investigation of which had been closed, was reopened (without authorization) and FIA re-investigated it (without aurthorization). Everyone who was made a co-accused with Mr. Bhutto had surprisingly confessed to the crime. And, the High Court unilaterally and without hearing the accused elected to itself conduct a murder trial, which was wholly unprecedented. Mr. Bhutto had appointed General Zia-ul-Haq as the Army Chief[26] who by his actions of 5 July 1977 had clearly violated Article 6 of the Constitution and committed the offence of high treason, the prescribed punishment for which is imprisonment for life or death. General Zia, therefore had a motive to proceed against Mr. Bhutto, because had he not done so, Mr. Bhutto may have proceeded against him for committing high treason.

Reinvestigation by FIA

23. The Federal Investigation Agency Act, 1974 ('the FIA Act') constituted the FIA, and empowered the FIA to investigate the offences listed in the Schedule to the FIA Act, but it does not permit the reinvestigation of a crime which has already been investigated by the Police and the investigation whereof was ordered to be closed. Significantly, no judicial order was issued directing that the investigation be reopened or the crime reinvestigated by the FIA. The FIA had received the case file on 8 August 1977, but it had already commenced reinvestigation on 24 July 1977, as per case diary recorded by Abdul Khaliq, Deputy Director, FIA. This suggests that there was a preconceived objective. This transgression escaped the attention of the Trial Court Judges and also of the majority of the Appellate Court Judges.

Transfer of Case to the High Court

24. The reinvestigation report was submitted to the Sessions Judge, Lahore[27] on 12 September 1977 who sought a report from the Public Prosecutor. However, the very next day (on 13 September 1977) the case was placed before a single Judge of the Lahore High Court, namely, Justice Mushtaq Hussain, who did something most unusual. Without issuing notices to Mr. Bhutto and to the other accused, without providing them an opportunity of a hearing and without enabling them to acquire legal representation, he ordered that, 'In view of the submissions made in the petition the case is transferred to this Court for trial.'

25. Section 526 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898 ('the Code') empowers the High Court to transfer a criminal case to itself if: (a) a fair trial is not possible, (b) the case involves some questions of law of unusual difficulty, (c) if the place in or near which any offence has been committed needs to be viewed, (d) it will be to the general convenience of the parties or witnesses or (e) to secure the ends of justice. However, Justice Mushtaq Hussain, ACJ did not cite any reason, let alone any of those mentioned in the law necessitating the transfer of case to the High Court and for it to conduct the trial itself.

Prejudice Caused to the Accused/Convict

26. A murder trial is conducted by a Court of Session.[28] Appeal against conviction lies before the High Court.[29] Article 185(2)(b) of the Constitution and sections 411-A and 526 of the Code permit trials to be conducted by the High Court, but these provisions do not provide for a High Court to conduct a murder trial. There was not a single precedent of a High Court conducting a murder trial. Mr. Bhutto's murder trial by the High Court made history; never before nor since has this happened. In other countries of the Indian subcontinent, where there are similar legal provisions, a High Court has never conducted a murder trial.

27. By conducting the murder trial itself, the High Court made redundant a number of provisions of the Constitution and Chapter XXVII of the Code. Section 374 requires that every sentence of death is required to be confirmed by the High Court; a vitally important safeguard against faulty convictions and hasty hangings. The sentence of death which is confirmed by the High Court must also be signed by two judges.[30] When a sentence of death is passed, the High Court to which the matter is sent for confirmation of the conviction and sentence is also empowered to pass any other sentence warranted by law or acquit the accused person.[31] In this case the trial was conducted by the High Court as the Trial Court, therefore, the death sentences passed by the Trial Court had to be confirmed by the Appellate Court. The mandatory requirement of section 376 of the Code, reproduced hereunder, was not complied with:

'Power of High Court to confirm sentences or annul conviction: In any case submitted under Section 374 the High Court:

(a) may confirm the sentence, or pass any other sentence warranted by law; or

(b) may annul the conviction and convict the accused of any offence of which the Sessions Court might have convicted him or order a new trial on the same or an amended charge; or

(c) may acquit the accused person;

Provided that no order of confirmation shall be made under this section until the period allowed for preferring an appeal has expired, or, if an appeal is presented within such period, until such appeal is disposed of.'

28. If for argument's sake it be accepted that the High Court could have conducted a murder trial, this it then did as a Trial Court, and as death sentences were passed these had to be confirmed by submitting the case to the High Court. Any two Judges of the High Court, who had not conducted the trial, could have done so in terms of section 376 of the Code. But, this was not done. Without confirming the sentences of death they could not have been executed. The Code, and its section 376, which provides essential protection to those sentenced to death, was enacted in 1898, but this provision has only once been disregarded, which was in this case.

Constitutional Safeguards were Disregarded

29. The Constitution mandates that, 'To enjoy the protection of law and to be treated in accordance with law is the inalienable right of every citizen.'[32] And, 'In particular no action detrimental to the life, liberty, body, reputation or property of any person shall be taken except in accordance with law.'[33] The law (section 376 of the Code) requiring the confirmation of death sentences was violated and this inalienable right was contravened. Article 9 of the Constitution stipulates that, 'No person shall be deprived of life or liberty save in accordance with law,' and this fundamental right too was violated, regrettably, by those mandated to ensure the laws compliance.

Right of appeal lost

30. An appeal against the conviction and sentence of a Court of Session lies to the High Court.[34] However, since the trial was conducted by the High Court itself, Mr. Bhutto and the other accused were deprived of one right of appeal. Article 4(1) of the Constitution which requires that all be treated in accordance with law, and Article 9 of the Constitution which prohibits anyone to be deprived of life save in accordance with law were vitiated. The convicts were deprived of one right of appeal, which Articles 4(1) and 9 guaranteed, and these rights can not be undone or disregarded, even during the proclamation of emergency.[35]

Right to Fair Trial and Due Process

31. The right to due process and a fair trial is part of the jurisprudence of Pakistan. These rights subsisted even before 'the right to fair trial and due process' were specifically incorporated in the Constitution, through Article 10A in the year 2010 as Fundamental Rights.[36] In the case of Abul A'la Moudoodi v. Government of West Pakistan[37] a five-Member Bench of the Supreme Court had stated (in 1964) that the necessity of due process 'is an element of justice which forms part of the British Common Law', that is inherited by Pakistan. In the case of Benazir Bhutto v. Federation of Pakistan[38] (1988) the Fundamental Right to life (Article 9 of the Constitution) was held, by an eleven-Member Bench of the Supreme Court, to include access to justice, which incorporates fair trial and due process:

'The right of "access to justice to all" is a well-recognised inviolable right enshrined in Article 9 of the Constitution. This right is equally found in the doctrine of "due process of law". The right of access to justice includes the right to be treated according to law, the right to have a fair and proper trial and a right to have an impartial Court or Tribunal. This conclusion finds support from the observation of Willoughby in Constitution of United States, Second Edition, Vol. II at page 1709 where the term "due process of law" has been summarised as follows:

"(1) He shall have due notice of proceedings which affect his rights.

(2) He shall be given reasonable opportunity to defend.

(3) That the Tribunal or Court before which his rights are adjudicated is so constituted as to give reasonable assurance of his honesty and impartiality, and

(4) That it is a Court of competent jurisdiction."

It therefore follows that in terms of Article 9 of the Constitution a person is entitled to have an impartial Court and tribunal. Unless an impartial and independent Court is established the right to have a fair trial according to law cannot be achieved.'

The above principle was reiterated (in 1993) in the case of Government of Balochistan v. Azizullah Memon:[39]

'The right of access to justice is internationally well-recognised human right and is now being implemented and executed by granting relief under the Constitutional provisions. Article 10 of Universal Declaration of Human Rights and Article 14 of the United Nations Convention on Criminal Political Rights[40] recognize the right of fair trial by an independent and impartial Tribunal established by law.'

'The right of access to justice does not only mean that the law may provide remedies for the violation of rights, but it also means that every citizen should have equal opportunity and right to approach the Courts without any discrimination. It also envisages that normally the Courts established by law shall be open for all citizens alike. Where the jurisdiction of the ordinary Courts established under the ordinary law is excluded or barred and certain class of cases or class of persons or inhabitants of an area are not allowed to approach such Courts and are to be tried or rights adjudicated by special Courts, then a fair, rational and reasonable classification must be made which have nexus with the object of the legislation.'

Al-Jehad Trust v. Federation of Pakistan[41] was decided by a five-Member Bench (in 1996) and it reiterated the earlier (1994) decision in the case of Government of Sindh v. Sharaf Faridi,[42] in which the due process of law requirement had been stressed.[43]

In the above mentioned cases, and in many others recording similar opinions, the jurisprudence of fair trial and due process stood established as a fundamental right well before the insertion of Article 10A[44] in the Constitution in 2010. The safeguards to ensure that an accused is fairly and justly treated and that essential requirements of a fair trial and due process are met were disregarded in the case of Mr. Bhutto.

Basis of Conviction

32. The foremost basis for the conviction of Mr. Bhutto was the testimony of an accused, who turned approver, namely, (Sheikh) Masood Mahmood, the then Director-General of the Federal Security Force ('FSF'). After the coup d'etat of 5 July 1977 Masood Mahmood was arrested, nominated as an accused and pleaded that he would make disclosure of the crime, provided he is pardoned. His plea was accepted and he was made an approver.[45]

Masood Mahmood the Approver

33. After Masood Mahmood's arrest he wrote to the District Magistrate, Lahore on 7 September 1977, stating he had, 'simply carried out orders of the former Prime Minister of Pakistan, Mr. Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto, to cause the death of Mr. Ahmad Raza Kasuri.' And, 'in case I am granted pardon... I would be able to disclose material facts regarding the conspiracy leading to the murder...'. He did so because, to use his own words, 'the commission of this heinous crime has haunted my conscience.' Incarceration had revived his flagging conscience. The crime was committed three years earlier and Masood Mahmood's conscience remained dormant and only awoke when he was arrested. A conscience which first wanted to secure a pardon for himself. A conscience which considered that to order an assassination was 'simply' a matter of 'carrying out orders', as was stated by this most senior police officer. The Additional District Magistrate accepted Masood Mahmood's plea on 14 September 1977, seven days after he had written to him offering 'to disclose material facts.'

Statement of Masood Mahmood

34. Masood Mahmood was made an approver on 14 September 1977, and his statement was recorded the same day. He waxed eloquent and most of what he said was irrelevant. The first four pages mention the various positions that he had held and how he reached grade 21. 'My selection to the Indian Police was made against a war reserved vacancy as I had served briefly in the Royal Indian Air Force.' And, 'I resumed duty on 18th September 1948 as Assistant Superintendent Police.' This was followed by saying that Prime Minister

Mr. Bhutto had sent for him on 12 April 1974, had praised him and noted the 'good work' he had done and acknowledged his 'established reputation for integrity, honesty and hard work.' It is questionable whether integrity and honesty would be the qualities to look for in a henchman. Masood Mahmood stated that after an hour of Mr. Bhutto persuading him he condescended to 'take-over as D.G. (FSF) to re-organise and train the force.' He then proceeded to reveal his vulnerability, stating that his ex-colleague Saeed Ahmad Khan, Chief Security Officer of the Prime Minister, and his Assistant, Abdul Hamid Bajwa, told him that if he did not do as Mr. Bhutto asked, 'your wife and children may see no more of you.' Saeed Ahmed Khan was not produced as a witness and Abdul Hamid Bajwa had died, therefore, anything allegedly said by them constituted hearsay. Masood Mahmood then disclosed his cowardice, stating that Mr. Bhutto had told him, 'You do not want Waqar chasing you ... ?' Waqar was also not produced as a witness. Another name which Masood Mahmood dropped was of M. R. Welch, Director FSF in Quetta, who he 'instructed to take care of him [Mr. Kasuri] if possible in Quetta'. Masood Mahmood stated 'that Mian Abbas had previously been asked under his orders through Mr. Haq Nawaz Tiwana do away with Ahmad Raza Kasuri. He directed me to tell Mian Abbas to get on with the job and tell Mian Abbas to produce either Ahmad Raza Kasuri's dead-body or his body totally bandaged all over.' Mian Muhammad Abbas, however, retracted his statement before the Trial Court and Haq Nawaz Tiwana, the previous Director-General of FSF, was not produced to testify. Masood Mahmood stated that Mr. Bhutto had wanted Mr. Kasuri to be killed for quite some time and had already directed Mian Abbas to do so, but to no effect. However, only when Masood Mahmood directed him to do so was Mr. Kasuri fired upon, which instead killed Mr. Khan.

Masood Mahmood Defiance of the Prohibition to Kill

35. Masood Mahmood put himself forward as a man having faith ( ) in God and knew that ordering someone's murder was 'against the dictates of God', but since he was given 'specific orders' from Mr. Bhutto he became 'instrumental in defying God Almighty (May He forgive me) for taking a valuable human life.' The reason cited by Masood Mahmood for defying God was his marital status - 'I would have chucked the job and walked down on the street, had I been a bachelor.'

Masood Mahmood's Credibility

36. Masood Mahmood's credibility was accepted and he was believed without demur by the Trial and Appellate Courts. However, there were a number of factors which prudence should have alerted and shown that he was self-serving, self-preserving, morally bankrupt, and a false witness:

(1) Masood Mahmood testified that Mr. Bhutto had appointed him as the Director General of FSF because of his integrity and honesty, but would those be the qualities that would be sought in one appointed to fulfill a criminal agenda and carry out nefarious activities.

(2) Masood Mahmood stated that 'his father and the deceased were great friends' yet he had no qualms to order the assassination of the son of his father's great friend.

(3) Mr. Bhutto had already instructed Mian Muhammad Abbas to assassinate Mr. Kasuri, according to Masood Mahmood, therefore, it is inexplicable why he would then also tell Masood Mahmood to do so.

(4) Masood Mahmood stated that Mian Muhammad Abbas did not follow Mr. Bhutto's directions to kill Mr. Kasuri, but offered no explanation why he disobeyed and suffered no consequences for such disobedience.

(5) However, Masood Mahmood's orders were followed by Mian Muhammad Abbas, who had earlier disobeyed the Prime Minister.

(6) As stated by Masood Mahmood it was acceptable to Mr. Bhutto if Mr. Kasuri was given a thorough beating yet he directed that Mr. Kasuri be killed.

(7) In ordering an assassination, and not a beating, Masood Mahmood alone would be responsible for it.

(8) Masood Mahmood stated that the following were complicit and were informed about the conspiracy to kill Mr. Kasuri: (1) Haq Nawaz Tiwana, the first Director-General of FSF, (2) Mian Muhammad Abbas, Director FSF, (3) M. R. Welch, Director FSF, Quetta, (4) Saeed Ahmed Khan, Prime Minister's Chief Security Officer, (5) Abdul Hamid Bajwa, Assistant Chief Security Officer and (6) himself. This number of persons knowing about a heinous conspiracy showed complete recklessness and disregard of detection, which any reasonable person would find hard to accept.

(9) The conspiracy theory put forward by Masood Mahmood was believed without a shred of supporting evidence.

(10) After Mr. Khan's murder Masood Mahmood continued to hold the position of DG of FSF, however, he was never again asked by Mr. Bhutto to do anything nefarious, let alone to kill. Did this mean that Mr. Bhutto had only one enemy, and the FSF comprising of thousands of personnel, was established for this sole purpose.

(11) Masood Mahmood secured his freedom and a passage out of the country by sacrificing Mr. Bhutto. A prudent person would be alerted to the conduct of such a person, yet Masood Mahmood's credibility was not questioned by those whose judicial duty it was to satisfy themselves of it.

Conscience and Convenience

37. Masood Mahmood repeatedly referred to his conscience. 'My conscience haunted me' and 'that this action [murder] would be against my conscience.' However, his conscience, lay dormant throughout his tenure as the Director-General of the FSF; it surfaced when he had spent only a few days in custody, and, his resurgent conscience was premised on first extricating himself and securing for himself a pardon. His convenience and safety trumped his conscience, which begs the question, was he truthful or an opportunist? Confessions must be voluntary and must not have 'been obtained from him by fear of prejudice or hope or advantage'.[46] And, 'If the confession directly or indirectly is the result of inducement, threat or promise from a person in authority, it would be treated as not voluntary'.[47] It must be 'ensure[d] that the confessional statement should be absolutely free from the slightest tinge or taint of extraneous influence such as threat, promise or inducement and the Courts are placed under an obligation to affirmatively satisfy themselves that it is free and voluntary'.[48] Masood Mahmood obtained for himself freedom from captivity by his self-serving statement. Masood Mahmood melodramatically put forward his faith by overlooking Islam's most fundamental teaching, and prohibition: to kill a human, and that killing one person was like the killing of all of humanity and saving one person was like the saving of all of humanity.[49] This type of person the Federal Court had perceptively categorized as 'a moral wretch'.[50]

Lack of Evidence

38. With regard to the three offences attracting death sentences, section 302 (murder), section 307 (attempted murder) and section 111 (abetment), there was no direct evidence against Mr. Bhutto, there wasn't even circumstantial evidence, which would exclude any reasonable hypothesis of innocence. The entire prosecution case was built on the statements of Masood Mahmood and Mian Muhammad Abbas, however, Mian Muhammad Abbas retracted his confession and testified to the contrary. Haq Nawaz Tiwana and Abdul Hamid Bajwa had died. M. R. Welch and Saeed Ahmed Khan, without being made approvers, were produced as prosecution witnesses.

Negative Forensic Report

39. The spent bullet casings, ejected from the firearm(s) that were used in the attack, did not match any of the weapons in use of the FSF. The prosecution contended that they were substituted, but without producing any positive evidence to substantiate this. Nonetheless, this contention of the prosecution was accepted, and it was further presumed that the purported substitution was done at the behest of Mr. Bhutto.

Unsubstantiated Inferences

40. Certain notings in some file/document, statedly made by Abdul Ahad, DSP, and Abdul Hamid Bajwa (exhibits 3/2-A and 3/2-A/ 1), were brought on record. And, Mr. Bhutto was sought to be implicated by relying on them purely on the basis of assumptions and his 'subsequent conduct', without stating what this was and how it incriminated him. The Trial Court held that, 'These documents corroborate the evidence of these witnesses on this point,' but without stating the said point. The judgment follows this with another vague sentence - 'These documents further show that the principal accused as well as P. W. 3 agreed to this suggestion', without expounding on what was this suggestion and to what had they agreed. Neither Abdul Ahad nor Abdul Hamid Bajwa were produced as witnesses (Abdul Hamid Bajwa had died), therefore, they could not be subjected to cross-examination. Extraordinary effort was made to draw arbitrary connections, derive meanings therefrom and then use them against the accused. This eroded the fundamental principle of establishing guilt beyond reasonable doubt. The manner in which the trial was conducted was antithetical to a fair trial and due process.

Motive - Corroboration

41. Section 114 of the Evidence Act, 1872[51] in its illustration (b) states, 'that an accomplice is unworthy of credit, unless he is corroborated in material particulars.' In criminal jurisprudence it is well settled that motive cannot corroborate an approver's testimony.[52] However, the Trial Court was of the opinion that motive could be used as corroboration as expressed in paragraph 584 of its judgment, comprising of 627 paragraphs. Respectfully, it was also incorrect to say that, 'The principle laid down is not so wide', which was in complete negation of the said statutory provision. Only in paragraph 584 of the judgment was there a fleeting reference to motive yet the Trial Court proceeded on an incorrect assumption that the motive stood established, even though the facts did not suggest this.

42. The Appellate Court's majority judgment,[53] which comprised of 963 paragraphs, probably the longest judgment in any criminal case, upheld the High Court's judgment. The majority of the Judges of the Appellate Court took an even more novel approach, by first holding that the four co-accused and two approvers were not accomplices but witnesses, and then holding (on this entirely incorrect assumption) that they did not require corroboration. Corroboration of accomplices was categorized as an artificial requirement. 'Without introducing an artificial requirement of corroboration of his evidence by applying the rule contained in illustration (b) to section 114 of the Evidence Act.' Disregarding a statutory provision and declaring it to be an artificial requirement did not behove judges, and all the more so when the object of the law is to prevent wrong convictions.

The Asserted Motive - Constitutional Protection

43. The motive cited by Mr. Kasuri for targeting him was his political differences with Mr. Bhutto. Mr. Kasuri cited Mr. Bhutto's speech of 3 June 1974 in the National Assembly and the exchange of words between them as the motive for the crime. Other speeches in the National Assembly were also referred to, and relied upon, to support motive. The proceedings of the National Assembly were also relied upon by the Courts. This was not permissible. The Constitution stipulates that, 'no member shall be liable to any proceedings in any court in respect of anything said'[54] in Parliament. This constitutional provision, and protection accorded to the Members of Parliament, was not even considered.

44. Mr. Kasuri stated that he was an opponent of Mr. Bhutto yet whatever he said was believed. The possibility of others having a motive, which were mentioned in Report of the Tribunal was not explored. Mr. Khan was shot at and died; the investigators also did not consider the possibility that Mr. Khan may have been the intended target. There were also two ladies in the ill-fated car but, surprisingly, neither of them, nor any of the other children of Mr. Khan were examined to consider whether someone else may have had a motive. Mr. Bhutto's enmity with Mr. Kasuri was cited by Mr. Kasuri as the motive, however, it was not even considered that such enmity could equally be a reason to falsely implicate Mr. Bhutto.

Did Mr. Bhutto or Mr. Kasuri have Motive?

45. The entire prosecution case was premised on the motive which Mr. Kasuri asserted. However, this at best was an expression of suspicion; he could not say that he had personal knowledge of any specific conspiracy on Mr. Bhutto's part. When Mr. Kasuri testified in Court he undermined his own credibility, and consequently the suspicion he harboured that Mr. Bhutto was behind the attack. Mr. Kasuri had successfully contested on the Pakistan Peoples Party ('PPP') ticket from Kasur (NA 63) in the general elections held in 1970. He stated that Mr. Bhutto had 'suspended my primary membership of PPP' on 2 May 1971. And the very next day, 'On 3.5.1971, in a Press Conference I floated my own group in the PPP, which was known all over the country as PPP (Raza Progressive Group).' Mr. Kasuri stated that he then 'made a temporary peace with Mr. Bhutto as a matter of political strategy... in the year 1972.' But, 'Immediately after the lifting of the Martial Law on 21st April, 1972, I showed my teeth against Mr. Bhutto and revived my old role of criticising him both outside and inside the National Assembly of Pakistan.' He continued, 'Mr. Bhutto formally expelled me from the PPP in October, 1972. In June, 1973 I joined Tehrik-I-Istiqlal and I rejoined PPP on 6th April 1976. I joined the PPP because of instinct of self-preservation, because I knew I was a marked man.' The inconsistencies in Mr. Kasuri's testimony abound.

46. Mr. Kasuri attributed the killing of his father to Mr. Bhutto but had no qualms applying to him for a PPP ticket to contest the 1977 general elections - 'I did apply for a PPP ticket for election to the National Assembly this year, ... The ticket was not awarded.' Surely, self-preservation could not be a reason for applying for a PPP ticket in the coming elections. Mr. Kasuri was confronted in cross-examination with his letter (P.W. 1/19) through which he had requested for an interview with Mr. Bhutto, and he stated, 'This request for seeking an interview pertains to the period from 8th of January to 30th of January, 1977, because in this period the tickets had to be decided and I was seeking an interview in relation to that.'

Motive Vitiated by Mr. Kasuri

47. Mr. Kasuri undermined his own narrative and credibility. He rejoined the PPP, headed by Mr. Bhutto, who he had earlier accused for the murderous attack on him, but which had killed his father. Mr. Kasuri tried to resolve this contradiction by saying that he did so for self-preservation. This explanation is difficult to accept, because it would mean that when his father was killed in 1974 he had acted bravely and nominated the Prime Minister for conspiracy and murder but later cowardice awashed over him. It is inexplicable why he would solicit the PPP ticket from the nominated accused after the murder of his father. The justification he offered was irreconcilable and unbelievable. It was imperative for the Trial Court to have scrutinized Mr. Kasuri's vacillating explanations and for the Appellate Court to have analyzed his recorded testimony in this regard, but unfortunately this was not done. The entire prosecution case was premised on Mr. Bhutto having the motive to have Mr. Kasuri killed. A motive which Mr. Kasuri himself vitiated.

48. The Trial Court and the Appellate Court gave credence to the motive theory, however, Mr. Kasuri's testimony could be equally treated to be that of a person wanting to settle personal scores. His testimony had created more than reasonable doubt about the alleged motive and it was equally suggestive of his animus towards Mr. Bhutto and to falsely implicate him. The prosecution is required to establish the guilt of an accused beyond reasonable doubt, which in the case of Mr. Bhutto with regard to motive, the attendant conspiracy and resultant killing it had not done.

Failure to Establish Motive

49. The matter of motive in this case, unlike other criminal cases, was very significant also because of the charge of conspiracy. It is also well established that in criminal cases the prosecution need not set up a motive but if it elects to do so and then fails to establish it the prosecution suffers its consequences.[55] The motive's absence, or failure to establish it is also consequential in a murder case in which the guilt of the offender is established but the asserted motive is not. In such cases the accused invariably is not given capital punishment, but instead imprisonment for life.[56]

Either Kill or Beat Mr. Kasuri

50. Masood Mahmood had confessed, and testified in Court, that Mr. Bhutto wanted one of two outcomes; either that Mr. Kasuri is killed or that he be severely beaten up. In his confessional statement[57] Masood Mahmood said, 'He [Mr. Bhutto] then ordered me to tell Mian Abbas to get on with it and produce either Ahmed Raza Kasuri dead body or his body totally bandaged all over...'. And, that, 'After giving orders to Mian Abbas I carried on normal work....' In his testimony (recorded before the five-Member Trial Court) he said, 'The Prime Minister went on to instruct me that I should ask Mian Muhammad Abbas to get on with the job and to produce the dead body of Mr. Ahmed Raza Kasuri or his body bandaged all over.' And, 'I repeated to [Mian Muhammad Abbas] him the orders of the then Prime Minister verbatim.' He did not disclose the orders that he gave to Mian Abbas. Masood Mahmood (in following Mr. Bhutto's stated orders) could have elected to direct that Mr. Kasuri be given a severe beating, however, he presumably elected to order that he be killed. This aspect neither the Trial Court nor the Appellate Court considered. Therefore, Masood Mahmood, and not Mr. Bhutto, would be liable for the killing.

First Information Report - FIR

51. The crime was first reported to the police, not by Mr. Kasuri, but by his brother, as Mr. Kasuri himself stated. 'My brother, Maj. Ali Raza rang up S. S.P. [Senior Superintendent of Police] Lahore and told him about this incident on the telephone. S. S.P., Lahore at that time was Mr. Asghar Khan, who after, receiving this message on the telephone arrived in the hospital ... along with others. A large contingent of Police also arrived on various kinds of vehicles.' S.S.P. Lahore (PW 12) also confirmed that the crime was first reported by 'Major Ali Raza son of Nawab Muhammad Khan Kasuri, after midnight.' Major Ali Raza, who first informed the police, was also in the hospital when the police reached it. However, the FIR did not mention Major Ali Raza as the informant and the FIR's complainant.

52. Mr. Kasuri submitted a written complaint after almost three hours had elapsed since the crime, in which he mentioned Mr. Bhutto. The FIR was registered at 3.45 am on 11 November 1974 which showed Mr. Kasuri (and not his brother) as the informant/ complainant.

53. Section 154 of the Code requires that when information of a cognizable offence is given to the police it is required to be recorded by the officer in charge of the concerned police station. The categorization of reporting of a crime and reducing it into writing as the first information report (FIR), as its name suggests, is the very first information of a cognizable crime received by the police. An important object of the FIR, which courts consider, is that the crime was promptly reported to the police without retrospection and embellishment.

54. The first reporting of the crime to the police was by Major Ali Raza, however, the FIR was not registered when he reported the crime, nor was he cited as the informant/complainant in the FIR when it was registered. Surprisingly, Major Ali Raza was also not produced as a witness. This glaring anomaly went unnoticed by the Trial Court as well as by the majority of the Appellate Court. On its own this may be inconsequential but since the courts had categorized Mr. Kasuri as the informant, had assumed that the FIR was promptly recorded, without Mr. Kasuri having had time to embellish it and to falsely implicate Mr. Bhutto, and the prosecution had alleged that there was a conspiracy by basing it on the contents of the FIR, all of which the courts had unquestioningly accepted, it became most significant. This was yet another aspect showing that the law and the constitutional safeguards to ensure a fair trial had been disregarded.

The Co-accused

55. All the six co-accused were arrested after General Zia's takeover and the imposition of Martial Law, and all of them had confessed to the crime. This remarkable coincidence neither the Trial Court nor the Appellate Court considered to be unusual nor was it ever considered whether these confessions could have been induced. Two of the accused were pardoned and made approvers. One retracted his confession before the Trial Court but reiterated it before the Appellate Court. The remaining three co-accused did not even engage a counsel and the Trial Court appointed a counsel (at State expense) to represent all three of them, however, their counsel[58] at every juncture wanted to implicate, rather than extricate, his clients and was at pains to reinforce the prosecution case to prove Mr. Bhutto's guilt and thus of his own clients. It was the duty of the counsel, and of the Trial Court, to explain to these three co-accused that to abide by the command of a superior is not a defence to the charge of murder, but this was not done.

Supreme Court Bench Reconstituted

56. Nine Judges commenced hearing the appeal filed by Mr. Bhutto,[59] and heard it till 30 July 1978, where-after seven Judges heard it on 21 August 1978 and they announced their judgment on 6 February 1979. One of the nine Judges was Qaiser Khan, J who had retired on 30 July 1978, on his sixty-fifth birthday.[60] The Constitution envisages that an ad hoc Judge may be appointed within three years of his retirement,[61] but he was not appointed, despite having heard the appeal; the appellant's request in this regard was not heeded. Another Judge, Waheeduddin Ahmed, J, fell ill when the appeal was in its final stages of hearing and required about six weeks to recuperate, but rather than adjourning the case and awaiting for him to resume work the appeal was heard and was concluded in his absence. Considering that the appellant had been convicted and was incarcerated it is not understandable why Qaiser Khan, J was not appointed as an adhoc Judge after his retirement nor why the Appellate Court could not wait for Waheeduddin Ahmed, J to rejoin the Bench. This may have been inconsequential if the Appellate Court's decision was unanimous, but when four Judges had upheld the conviction and three had acquitted Mr. Bhutto it was a matter of great concern.

President's Power to Grant Pardon

57. Fazal Ellahi Chaudhry was elected as the first President of Pakistan under the new Constitution.[62] General Zia-ul-Haq took over the office of President on 16 September 1978, without being elected to it. The Constitution grants to the President the power to pardon, remit, suspend or commute any sentence passed by any court.[63] President Fazal Ellahi Chaudhry had (on his own volition) written to General Zia-ul-Haq 'spelling out extrajudicial considerations which would weigh with the Executive in taking a decision in this matter.'[64] However, the High Court took inexplicable umbrage with Mr. Bhutto's counsel referring to this letter. 'In these circumstances, the introduction of this letter in the present proceedings is nothing but an attempt to politicise the matter... We deprecate such an attempt.'[65] What, however, is of significance is that Mr. Bhutto was not dealt with in accordance with Article 45 of the Constitution, despite the reasons mentioned by President Fazal Ellahi Chaudhry in his letter. This was yet another transgression of due process, and to enjoy the protection of law and to be treated in accordance with law.[66]

Judges who Headed the Benches

58. Justice Mushtaq Hussain, in his capacity as the Acting Chief Justice, headed the Bench of the Lahore High Court which had convicted Mr. Bhutto, and Justice Anwarul Haq was the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and headed the Bench which had upheld the conviction. The assumption of offices by both these Judges was somewhat unusual.

(a) Lahore High Court: Justice Mushtaq Hussain was appointed as the Acting Chief Justice of the Lahore High Court on 13 July 1977, when Justice Aslam Riaz Hussain was holding the position of the Chief Justice of the Lahore High Court. However, Chief Justice Aslam Riaz Hussain was appointed as the Acting Governor of Punjab, and had relinquished the position of the Chief Justice of the Lahore High Court on 16 July 1977, and on the same day administered oath to Justice Mushtaq Hussain as the Acting Chief Justice of the Lahore High Court. The Chief Justice of the Lahore High Court became the Acting Governor of Punjab, who gave oath to an Acting Chief Justice who continued in his acting position for six months; he was given oath as Chief Justice on 16 January 1978. The Constitution does not permit the constitutional office of the Chief Justice to be kept vacant for such a long duration. A High Court consists of a Chief Justice and Judges[67] and an Acting Chief Justice is appointed temporarily and only under certain circumstances.[68] An Acting Chief Justice, who later was made the Chief Justice, had transferred a murder case to the High Court and had himself presided over the trial, which under the aforesaid circumstances gave rise to justifiable misgivings.

(b) Supreme Court: Justice Muhammad Yaqub Ali was the Chief Justice of Pakistan who, 'relinquished charge of the office of Chief Justice of Pakistan' on 22 September 1977. A Judge retires or may resign.[69] Relinquishment of charge is alien to the Constitution. General Zia-ul-Haq, promulgated Martial Law Order 6 of 1977[70] which compelled Justice Muhammad Yaqub Ali to relinquish the office of Chief Justice of Pakistan and enabled the appointment of another. Consequently, Justice Anwarul Haq was appointed as the Chief Justice of Pakistan on 23 September 1977, 'In pursuance of the Proclamation of the fifth day of July, 1977, read with the Laws (Continuance in Force) Order, 1977 (C.M.L.A Order No. 1 of 1977), and in exercise of all powers enabling him in that behalf ... .' The General who had overthrown the democratic order, cast aside the Constitution, pushed aside the Chief Justice of Pakistan and appointed another in his place, one who presided over the Bench which had heard Mr. Bhutto's appeal. And, crucially, Prime Minister Mr. Bhutto was deposed by General Zia-ul-Haq, who had appointed himself as the President of Pakistan by issuing President's Succession Order 1978.[71] These are the facts, historical irony notwith-standing.

Bias of Justice Mushtaq Hussain

59. Mr. Bhutto had repeatedly claimed that Justice Mushtaq Hussain, who was the Acting Chief Justice (later Chief Justice) of the Lahore High Court, was prejudiced against him and was motivated by bias, and that he should not conduct the trial, let alone head the Bench conducting the trial, but this objection was cast aside by the Court.

60. The mere allegation or apprehension of prejudice or bias is not sufficient to sustain it. There must be something tangible and credible which exhibits bias. However, where there is bias it corrodes impartiality, and impartiality is necessary for correct decision-making and also to engender the acceptance of decisions. 'It is not merely of some importance but is of fundamental importance that justice should not only be done, but should manifestly and undoubtedly be seen to be done.'[72]

61. Martial law was imposed on 5 July 1977 and Mr. Bhutto was arrested on 3 September 1977, in a three year old criminal case which had been closed as untraced. Despite having been granted bail by the High Court Mr. Bhutto was arrested on 16 September 1977 under Martial Law Order No. 12.[73] Mr. Bhutto had obtained bail on 13 September 1977 on the very same day (13 September 1977) Justice Mushtaq Hussain constituted a Bench headed by himself to try Mr. Bhutto and also himself heard the petition seeking cancellation of his bail.

62. The five-Member Bench constituted by Justice Mushtaq Hussain issued a show cause notice on 21 September 1977 to Mr. Bhutto, and gave him all of two days to state why the bail granted to him by the High Court should not be cancelled. The show cause notice also paradoxically directed him to appear before the five-Member Bench on 24 September 1977 despite the fact that Mr. Bhutto was incarcerated. On 21 September 1977 Mr. Bhutto challenged the transfer of the case to the High Court by Justice Mushtaq Hussain and placing it before a Bench which he headed.

63. Mr. Bhutto submitted a petition before the Supreme Court stating that Justice Mushtaq Hussain was prejudicial towards him and also had a bias against him. On 24 September 1977 the Supreme Court dismissed the application stating that the same should first be filed before the Trial Court.

64. Mr. Bhutto, pursuant to the Supreme Court order, filed applications seeking Justice Mushtaq Hussain's recusal on a number of grounds, including that: (1) Justice Mushtaq Hussain 'was prejudiced and partial against the Pakistan Peoples Party' and in this regard his statements (published in newspapers) were referred to. (2) The application seeking cancellation of bail, which was granted on 13 September 1977 by K.M.A. Samdani, J of the High Court, was placed before a five-Member Trial Court, constituted by Justice Mushtaq Hussain, and bail was cancelled on 8 October 1977, which could not be done by the Trial Court (because bail had been granted by the High Court), and that too without giving sufficient notice. (3) Upon acceptance of the office of Chief Election Commissioner Justice Mushtaq Hussain ceased to be Acting Chief Justice/Chief Justice because the Constitution stipulated that the Chief Election Commissioner could not hold another office.[74] (4) Specific instances of prejudicial conduct and bias during the conduct of the case were also mentioned. (5) The transfer of the trial from the Court of Session to the High Court, without notice to the accused, further confirmed the prejudice and the bias of Justice Mushtaq Hussain. (6) Private complaint case, on the same facts, was fixed for hearing before a Bench of the High Court,[75] however, Justice Mushtaq Hussain got it placed before the Bench he constituted and headed. (7) And, that Justice Mushtaq Hussain had not taken the oath prescribed under the Constitution but one crafted by the Chief Martial Law Administrator, therefore, he could not be considered to be the Acting Chief Justice or the Chief Justice of the Lahore High Court under the Constitution.

Bias of Trial Court

65. The five-Member Trial Court Bench unanimously dismissed the applications[76] filed by Mr. Bhutto. Request for recusal of a Judge is to be attended by the Judge whose recusal is sought. However, the Bench gave detailed findings on the objections which had been raised by Mr. Bhutto with regard to Justice Mushtaq Hussain. Justice Aftab Hussain[77] wrote the order through which Mr. Bhutto's applications (seeking recusal) were dismissed. Justice Mushtaq Hussain simply wrote two words - 'I agree' - on the order. The Hon'ble Judges signing this order justified taking oath under Martial Law[78] (and not under the Constitution) because if they did not do so 'it will lead to the result that there is no superior Court in Pakistan.' The expression of such nihilism was wholly unjustified, and unnecessary when attending to a request for the recusal of a Judge. The Judges forgot that 'Obedience to the Constitution' was their 'basic obligation', like it is of every person in Pakistan.[79] And, that they had also taken the oath to 'preserve, protect and defend the Constitution.'[80] Such anomie expressed by the Judges undermined the Constitution, and the necessity to abide by it. The order had a devastating effect on citizens and the body politic. Inculcating acceptance of autocratic rule and making it difficult to shake off the yolk of servitude.

66. The order dated 9 October 1977 also gave a definite finding with regard to Justice Mushtaq Hussain simultaneously holding the offices of Acting Chief Justice and of the Chief Election Commissioner by staggeringly extraordinary reasoning - 'The Acting Chief Justice cannot be said to have been appointed as Chief Election Commissioner under the Constitution. His appointment is regulated by Election Commission of Order, 1977 (President's Post Proclamation Order 4 of 1977).' The applicable constitutional provisions with regard to the Chief Election Commissioner[81] were disregarded in preference to the proclamation of one man, who had assumed power unconstitutionally. Incongruity mocked when the Chief Election Commissioner could not even ensure that the stated 'forthcoming General Elections' were held, for which he was chosen and given the office of the Chief Election Commissioner. Scorching irony replaced unconvincing reasoning.

67. With regard to Justice Mushtaq Hussain's transfer of the trial from the Court of Session to the High Court, without issuing notice to Mr. Bhutto, the order disregarded the age old wisdom that a party is entitled to an opportunity of a hearing.[82] It held that, 'No such notice was required in the present case.' This flagrantly disregarded the due process principle which is firmly embedded in our jurisprudence.

68. Mr. Bhutto's objection to the assumption of jurisdiction by the five-Member Bench and also that of the complaint case (filed by Mr. Kasuri) after it was listed for hearing before 'a Division Bench consisting of K.M.A. Samdani, J and Mazharul Haq, J' was brushed aside by expressing surprise. 'It looks rather strange that the accused petitioner should prefer to be tried by a Bench of two Judges and not a larger Bench of five Judges bound by their oath of office to impart justice without fear or favour.' The learned Judges of the Trial Court referred to their oath, but forgot that they had also taken one under General Zia-ul-Haq's dispensation. In any event the two Judges of the Division Bench were as bound by their oath of office to impart justice as were the five. Stressing that they were bound by their oath and to state that the 'constitution of such a Bench [of five Judges] should inspire more confidence rather than create any apprehension in the mind of any party' was quite unnecessary.[83] In any event, and with hindsight, the apprehension of Mr. Bhutto proved to be correct.

69. In Justice Mushtaq Hussain transferring the trial to the High Court, taking away the pending complaint case from the Division Bench of the High Court and fixing it before the Trial Court, which he himself headed, was extraordinary. The law was not followed and settled methodology departed from.

70. Bias was on display in a number of paragraphs of the Trial Court judgment. Gratis observations were made which had absolutely nothing to do with the case before the Court, which was, whether Mr. Bhutto had conspired to order the assassination of Mr. Kasuri. Extraneous paragraphs were written to dishonour and disgrace Mr. Bhutto by five Hon'ble Judges who deemed it necessary to state that, before Mr. Bhutto sought 'election to the office of the Chief Executive of the Federation he would order his own life in accordance with the injunctions and teachings of Holy Qur'an and Sunnah.' The priggish sanctimony, with respect, did not stop here. The moralizing continued:

> 'Before undertaking to observe the principles of democracy, freedom, equality, tolerance and social justice, as enunciated by Islam he should inculcate these qualities in himself. Before a person embarks upon swearing to strive to preserve the Islamic ideology he would bring himself to believe in that ideology and test his firmness in that belief. Before presuming his ability to guarantee to the citizens the enjoyment of the protection of law and their treatment in accordance with law he would be a believer and a true adherent of law. He would consider himself to be as much subject to law as he would wish others to be. A person who considers the Constitution and the law as the handmaid of his polity is neither qualified to be elected to the high office of the Prime Minister nor can ever be true to his Oath.'

71. Mr. Bhutto was neither on trial for corruption nor for violating the Constitution, however, the Hon'ble Judges made gratuitous remarks about these matters too. And, he 'treat[ed] the Constitution and the law as a source of unlimited power for himself which may satisfy his own inane craving for self-aggrandisement and perpetuation of his rule. Such a person, in all probabilities, would destroy the very basis of the Constitution and the law which he is sworn to uphold.' Such pontification, however, overlooked the overthrow of the constitutional order and democratic rule on 5 July 1977, and of the unabated and continuous savagery of the Constitution.

72. Another discordant note in the order of the Hon'ble Judges of the Trial Court was expounding the virtues of equality:

'Islam does not believe in the creation of privileged classes. It believes in the equality before law of all - ruler and governed alike. It is opposed to all types of class distinction. Even the Caliph, the King, the Prime Minister or the President, by whatever name the ruler may be called, is as much subject to the law of the land as any ordinary citizen.'

But no attention was paid to the exceptionalism, and untouchability of General Zia-ul-Haq, the Chief Martial Law Administrator, who had gathered, in himself, all the powers of an absolute monarch.

73. The Appellate Court could not stomach the aforesaid 'gratuitous observations in paragraphs 610 to 611 of its judgment regarding the personal beliefs of the appellant, delivering a sermon as to the mode of conduct prescribed by Islam for a Muslim ruler.' The Appellate Court, however, considered that justice would be served if these paragraphs were expunged from the judgment of the Trial Court.[84] It overlooked what was glaringly obvious - the self-expressed prejudice and bias of the Trial Court.

Adulation and Praise for a Dictator

74. The Trial Court, which had tried and convicted Mr. Bhutto, and the Appellate Court, which had dismissed his appeal, were operating when there was no constitutional rule in the country and one man's will (and whim) became legislation and his person had replaced the entire democratic order. Unfortunately, the Chief Martial Law Administrator was adulated in another case.[85] He was stated to have 'stepped in to save the country.'[86] The expression of such incredulous admiration undermined the credibility of the Appellate Court. Was it not obvious that General Zia-ul-Haq would be the direct beneficiary of a guilty verdict. If Mr. Bhutto was acquitted he may have proceeded to prosecute General Zia-ul-Haq for the crime of high treason. General Zia-ul-Haq's personal survival depended on Mr. Bhutto being found guilty. The continuation of usurped power required Mr. Bhutto to be convicted.

People's Mandate

75. General Zia-ul-Haq's unconstitutional act was 'construed in the nature of a mandate from the people of Pakistan.'[87] It was not at all necessary, nor desirable, to state how popular he was. It was not for the Supreme Court to measure populism, nor what it entailed.

Absence of Fair Trial and Due Process

76. The Supreme Court, including the three Hon'ble Judges of the Supreme Court who acquitted Mr. Bhutto,[88] had also declared, 'that the Fundamental Rights stand validly suspended since 5th of July 1977.'[89] Therefore, and admittedly, the trial was conducted and the appeal heard without Mr. Bhutto having the constitutional protection of the Fundamental Rights and other rights guaranteed in the Constitution. Any single one of the aforesaid noted transgressions may have vitiated the trial and the conviction, however, cumulatively they destroyed any semblance of due process and fair trial, and revealed that innocent men were rushed to the gallows.

The Courts

77. The Trial and Appellate Courts, which conducted the trial and heard the appeal, were not true courts under the Constitution. The country was captive to Martial Law and so too were its courts. When Judges take oath of allegiance to dictators, the courts are no longer of the people.

78. In conclusion we want to acknowledge the assistance provided by all the learned counsel and by the learned amici. However, the painstaking work undertaken by our retired colleague, Justice Manzoor Ahmad Malik, and by his team deserves special mention. The expertise, the depth of knowledge and insightfulness of criminal jurisprudence provided by Justice Manzoor Ahmad Malik was most valuable and helpful.

Justice Musarrat Hilali, J.

SYED MANSOOR ALI SHAH, J.---In the short opinion dated 6 March 2024, we unanimously opined that '[i]n its advisory jurisdiction under Article 186 of the Constitution, this Court cannot reappraise the evidence and undo the decision of the case'. Furthermore, it was observed that '[t]he advisory jurisdiction under Article 186 of the Constitution requires this Court to render an opinion on any question of law of public importance referred by the President', and that in the present Reference, 'the question of law, in essence, is whether the requirements of due process and fair trial were complied with in the urder trial of Mr. Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto ("Mr. Bhutto"), the former Prime Minister of Pakistan, by the trial court (the Lahore High Court) and the appellate court (the Supreme Court)'. The reason for so restricting the scope of inquiry in the present Reference was grounded in the settled jurisprudence on the advisory jurisdiction of this Court, which holds that in its advisory jurisdiction, this Court cannot undertake a fact-finding inquiry, adjudicate a lis between parties or review its judgment rendered in its adjudicatory jurisdiction.[1]

2. I have gone through the detailed opinion authored by the Chief Justice and find that certain discussions and observations made therein, in my view, verge on reappraisal of the evidence in a case that has already been finally decided by this Court in its adjudicatory jurisdiction, thus going beyond the scope of inquiry set in the short opinion. With respect, I find myself unable to associate with such discussions and observations. Therefore, I add this note to briefly underscore the violations of the fundamental right to procedural due process and fair trial that occurred in the murder trial of Mr. Bhutto, as per the question of law taken up and answered in the short opinion. The facts forming the background of the present Presidential Reference and the questions of law referred to this Court for its advisory opinion have been comprehensively mentioned and discussed in the detailed opinion authored by the Chief Justice, and therefore, need no reiteration. While addressing the said violations of procedural due process and fair trial, I have drawn support from the theoretical framework of "transitional justice", which is employed to remedy the injustice caused by "political trials."

3. Around the world, authoritarian regimes use "political trials", writes Shen-Bayh,[2] to legitimize their seizures of power, delegitimize opponents and consolidate authority. A political trial is one whose disposition-the determination of guilt or innocence, followed by punishment---depends primarily on the accused's professed attitudes and activities in relation to the ruling regime.[3] In such trials, the legal process is not employed to ensure justice or minimize errors but rather to discredit and punish political opponents. These trials often rely heavily on statements obtained during investigations from former allies or associates of the accused, who may be coerced or induced to turn against the accused. Such evidence, which would usually hold limited weight in a fair trial, becomes a convenient basis for conviction in a political trial, supporting the alleged criminality of the accused. Political trials thus serve as a potent and notorious "judicial tool" for authoritarian regimes, aimed at suppressing political resistance and eliminating opposition.[4] These trials frequently violate due process and fair trial requirements to produce politically desirable outcomes.

4. In post-authoritarian regimes, "transitional justice" forms a crucial part of the transition from repressive authoritarianism to constitutional democracy. It involves uncovering the crimes of former authoritarian rulers and holding them accountable for past human rights violations, including unlawful detentions, imprisonments and politically motivated trials. Transitional justice, however, is not about vengeance or retribution but about a principled approach to healing and justice. Courts globally have affirmed that they must address the demands of victims for truth and justice while laying the foundation for societal reconciliation and systemic transformation. This dual focus on accountability and restoration is what sets transitional justice apart from ordinary judicial processes. Transitional justice, therefore, encompasses a set of methods through which states that have experienced fundamental human rights violations seek to distance themselves from that past and move forward in a manner consistent with the need for justice for those who have suffered from these violations.[5] These methods of transitional justice include truth and reconciliation commissions and the criminal prosecution of former authoritarian rulers.[6] Furthermore, holding both executive and judicial institutions accountable for their actions during the period of authoritarian repression, as well as exonerating past victims of state repression and miscarriages of justice, is essential for facilitating the transition of these state institutions toward greater respect for, and promotion of, the rule of law and fundamental human rights.[7]

5. Transitional justice serves as a vital tool for addressing injustices perpetrated under authoritarian regimes. It encompasses broader mechanisms, including revisiting flawed judicial decisions made during such regimes through compromising due process and fair trial requirements. This process helps restore fairness and legitimacy in the legal system. By revisiting and rendering opinions on the fairness and legitimacy of such decisions, the Court delivers justice to affected individuals and sends a powerful message: judicial complicity with authoritarianism will not be shielded from scrutiny. This approach reinforces judicial independence, ensures accountability for regime-orchestrated injustices, and establishes a precedent for discrediting flawed judicial decisions rendered under oppressive regimes. Such actions underscore the judiciary's commitment to constitutional principles, reminding past and future judges of their duties and the need to resist authoritarian pressure. Ultimately, this helps safeguard democracy, the rule of law and human rights.[8]

6. The silent application of transitional justice in Pakistan, aside from the present Reference, can also be found in several notable cases. These include the case upholding the conviction and sentence of General Pervez Musharraf,[9] the case of the Sindh High Court Bar Association,[10] which declared the proclamation of emergency and promulgation of PCO by General Pervez Musharraf unconstitutional, and the case of Nawaz Sharif,[11] another former Prime Minister of Pakistan, which reversed his conviction in the Army Chief's Aircraft Hijacking case. These cases demonstrate the importance of ensuring accountability for both executive and judicial officeholders for their actions during periods of authoritarian rule. They also serve as a reminder that transitional justice will remain a vital tool in addressing any future instances of authoritarianism and political trials.

7. The murder trial of Mr. Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto, a former Prime Minister of Pakistan, serves as a classic example of a political trial, illustrating how such trials can be manipulated to advance authoritarian designs. Bhutto's trial effectively served as a potent and notorious "judicial tool" for strengthening General Zia's authoritarian regime, aimed at suppressing political resistance, eliminating opposition and ensuring the consolidation of power. It helped to entrench the repressive military authoritarian regime under which it was conducted. Instead of independent, substantive evidence, the prosecution relied heavily on confessional statements given by, or procured from, Bhutto's former associates-accomplices turned approvers.

8. Likewise, several violations of procedural due process and fair trial requirements were committed to achieve politically desirable outcomes. These included the unauthorized reinvestigation of the case, which had previously been closed by an order of the Magistrate concerned; the surreptitious and unlawful transfer of the investigation from the regular investigating agency (Provincial Police) to the Federal Investigation Agency; the transfer of the trial from the regular trial court (Sessions Court) to the High Court without adherence to legal requirements; the unjustified cancellation of bail previously granted to Bhutto by a Single Bench of the Lahore High Court; the determination of Bhutto's recusal application by judges other than the one whose recusal was sought, without addressing the instances cited to demonstrate the bias and prejudice of the judge

(Justice Maulvi Mushtaq); the composition of the trial and appellate court benches, both of which were headed by judges (Justice Maulvi Mushtaq and Justice Anwar-ul-Haq) who harboured personal grievances against Bhutto due to being passed over for appointments as Chief Justice of their respective courts-the Lahore High Court (trial court) and the Supreme Court (appellate court); and the unwarranted reconstitution of the appellate court bench from nine judges to seven judges. It is an established principle that justice must not only be done but must also manifestly and undoubtedly be seen to be done.[12] The infringement of this fundamental principle also constitutes a violation of due process and fair trial requirements. Because of these glaring violations, Bhutto is rightly regarded as the victim of "unfair judicial proceedings" and "legalized political murder"---also referred to as "judicial murder".[13] Both the obvious procedural irregularities and illegalities in the reinvestigation and trial, as well as the biased composition of the trial and appellate court benches, rendered the verdict illegitimate and undermined the independence and impartiality of the superior courts (High Courts and the Supreme Court) for years to come.[14]

9. In fulfilment of our duty under the principle of transitional justice, and with the aim of distancing ourselves from past violations of fundamental human rights while moving forward in a manner consistent with justice for those who suffered from these violations, we explored all possible options within the existing constitutional and legal framework. The Constitution and the law provide no mechanism to set aside the judgment by which Bhutto was convicted and sentenced, as that judgment attained finality following the dismissal of the review petition by this Court. Furthermore, in its advisory jurisdiction under Article 186 of the Constitution, this Court lacks the authority to reappraise the evidence or overturn a final decision. However, after carefully examining the record of the reinvestigation and trial proceedings, we concluded-and so stated- that the trial proceedings in the Lahore High Court and the appellate proceedings in the Supreme Court of Pakistan did not meet the requirements of the Fundamental Right to a fair trial and due process as enshrined in Articles 4 and 9 of the Constitution,[15] which were later reinforced as a separate and independent Fundamental Right under Article 10A of the Constitution. Our expression of this opinion reflects a commitment to confront past missteps and fallibilities during an authoritarian regime with humility, embodying a spirit of self-accountability and underscoring our dedication to ensuring that transitional justice shall be served with unwavering integrity and fidelity to the Constitution and the law.

10. In the end it needs to be said that the judiciary is a resilient institution, endowed with the remarkable ability to recover and rise above the shadows of authoritarianism. This resilience is not accidental but is deeply rooted in the courage and integrity of those judges who refuse to compromise and have the courage to speak truth to power. In the annals of judicial history, there are turning points when the judiciary is bold enough to confront its past mistakes and chart a course for a better future. Today marks one such moment-a testament to the judiciary's unwavering commitment to justice and the rule of law.

11. The independence of the judiciary is the cornerstone of justice, and its true test lies in a judge's ability to stand firm under authoritarian regimes. The essence of judicial independence is not found in passivity or retrospective correction but in resisting authoritarian overreach at the time it occurs. Transitional justice, while important, should serve as a sobering reminder to judges: justice delayed by decades is justice diminished. Judges must act as the first and last line of defence for the rule of law, refusing to compromise even under duress, so that societies do not have to rely on transitional processes to correct the damage inflicted by judicial capitulation. Let the lesson of transitional justice be clearjudges must uphold their oaths with courage in the face of oppression, for only then can the judiciary truly safeguard democracy and the rights of the people. Transitional justice, however, often becomes necessary because, during oppressive rule, some judges fail to uphold their constitutional duty, succumbing to the pressure of illegitimate authority. This failure not only enables violations of due process and fair trial rights but also erodes public trust in the judiciary.

12. Judges serving under authoritarian regimes must remember that their true strength lies not in holding office but in steadfastly upholding their independence and principles. Justice Dorab Patel exemplified this ideal when he courageously dissented in the Bhutto case, acquitting Mr. Bhutto of the charges, and later refused to take the oath under the Provisional Constitutional Order (PCO) promulgated by General Zia, thereby relinquishing his impending eight-year tenure as Chief Justice of Pakistan. His actions remind us that losing a position is a small sacrifice compared to compromising one's integrity or leaving behind a legacy of submission or compromise. Judges must always bear in mind that a judge's valour is measured by his courage to resist external pressures, stand firm against interference and safeguard the independence of the judiciary without fear or favour. Delay in confronting authoritarian inroads can prove fatal to the rule of law-such incursions must be resisted and rectified immediately, for the judiciary's role is to defend justice, not enable its erosion. I find no more suitable words to close this note than those of Bhutto himself, reflecting both a powerful critique of authoritarianism and a firm belief in the judiciary's essential role as a guardian of democracy. He wrote:

An independent Judiciary is the antithesis of Martial Law Anindependent Judiciary can only function under the umbrella of the Constitution and not under the shadow of the gun….. An independent Judiciary exists side by side with an executive chosen by the people and a legislature elected by them. But the people's Executive is in jail. The assemblies ... have become as silent as the graveyards. Can one flower flourish in a garden turned into a desert?[16]

Syed Mansoor Ali Shah

Judge

YAHYA AFRIDI, J.---I have had the privilege of going through the detailed opinion of Justice Qazi Faez Isa, the Chief Justice, as well as the additional notes of Justice Syed Mansoor Ali Shah and Justice Syed Hasan Azhar Rizvi, in furtherance to the unanimous short opinion of this Court dated 06.03.2024 ("Short Opinion").

2. I find myself in agreement with the observation of Justice Syed Mansoor Ali Shah that certain portions of the detailed opinion of the Chief Justice verge on reappraisal of evidence in a case that has already been finally decided by this Court in its adjudicatory jurisdiction, and thus, the same exceed the scope of the inquiry delineated in the Short Opinion that '[i]n its advisory jurisdiction under Article 186 of the Constitution, this Court cannot reappraise the evidence and undo the decision of the case'.

3. As to the question of law, whether the requirements of due process and fair trial were complied with in the murder trial of Mr. Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto, the former Prime Minister of Pakistan, by the trial court (the Lahore High Court) and the appellate court (the Supreme Court), I fully concur with the observations given in paragraphs No. 23 to 25, 31, 58 to 64 and 67 to 76 of the detailed opinion rendered by the Chief Justice, as well as paragraph No. 8 of the note authored by Justice Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, which highlight the violations of procedural due process and fair trial requirements.

4. I also record my concurrence, for the reasons given therein, with the view of Justice Syed Hasan Azhar Rizvi that the observation of the Chief Justice - that Article 185(2)(b) of the Constitution and sections 411-A and 526 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898 do not permit the High Court to conduct a murder trial - is untenable, as it is founded on a misconception of these provisions. I further agree with the opinion of Justice Syed Hasan Azhar Rizvi that Chapter XXVII of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898 does not extend to death sentences passed by the High Court in the exercise of its original criminal jurisdiction. Consequently, I respectfully differ from the view of the Chief Justice that these provisions necessitate confirmation of such sentences or lead to the forfeiture of the right of appeal, as such an interpretation is contrary to the established legal framework.

5. It is, however, very pertinent to note that the present reference was avowedly filed against the backdrop of the restoration of the judiciary and the proactive role of the restored judiciary in addressing the matters of public importance. In this context, the reference drew attention, inter alia, to the 'admission' of former Chief Justice of Pakistan, late Justice Nasim Hasan Shah, regarding external pressures in the decision of the appeal of Mr. Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto, which the reference described as a regrettable chapter in judicial history of our nation.

6. In consideration of the above, I am of the view that this reference might never have come before us but for the events recounted and the facts disclosed in the interview and autobiography of Justice Nasim Hasan

Shah. Accordingly, it is both relevant and necessary to address certain aspects of that interview and autobiography, which raise significant concerns regarding the due process and fairness of the trial of Mr. Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto, as discussed in the following paragraphs.

7. In the Supreme Court judgement, Justice Nasim Hasan Shah rejected the contention that the trial of Mr. Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto was vitiated by bias on the part of Justice Maulvi Mushtaq Hussain, who presided over the Lahore High Court Bench that conducted the trial. However, this stance stands in direct contradiction to his later remarks in an interview with Iftikhar Ahmad for the program Jawab Deyh. In the aforesaid interview, Justice Nasim Hasan Shah described Justice Maulvi Mushtaq Hussain as an overt enemy of Mr. Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto, expressing that he should not have been part of the Lahore High Court Bench. In fact, the presence of Justice Maulvi Mushtaq Hussain on the Lahore High Court Bench was referred to as "Ziadati", a term that, within the context of the trial, could only be interpreted as bias. This clear contradiction in the views of Justice Nasim Hasan Shah raises concerns about the evaluation, in the appeal, of the question of bias on the part of Justice Maulvi Mushtaq Hussain.

8. Justice Nasim Hasan Shah revealed certain facts in his autobiography Memoirs and Reflections, which suggest that his inclusion in the Bench for the purpose of hearing the appeal of Mr. Bhutto was orchestrated by the Attorney General Sharifuddin Pirzada and Justice Maulvi Mushtaq Hussain. Such manipulation of the Bench composition undermines judicial impartiality and raises serious concerns about the fairness of the proceedings. It also shows that Justice Maulvi Mushtaq Hussain pursued the matter zealously even after the High Court had decided the case and the appeal was pending before the Supreme Court, despite his role having concluded with the decision of the High Court. This unwarranted involvement after conviction blurred the boundaries of judicial propriety and further eroded confidence in the impartiality of the appellate process.

9. The above account of events effectively undermines the duly expected impartiality of judicial decision-making in the trial of Mr. Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto. Such events, if left unaddressed, risk eroding public confidence in the fairness of the judicial process.

10. The extraordinary political climate of the time and the pressures inherent in such an environment appear to have influenced the course of justice in a manner inconsistent with the ideals of judicial independence. It is a sobering reminder of how deviations from constitutional governance can exert undue influence on judicial proceedings in politically charged cases, undermining the ideals of impartiality and due process in such exceptional circumstances. This also accentuates the importance of recognizing the courageous dissents of Justice Dorab Patel, Justice Muhammad Haleem and Justice G. Safdar Shah who stood their ground despite the prevailing atmosphere. Their dissents, even if unsuccessful in altering the outcome, remain a testament to the enduring principles of judicial integrity and impartiality, underscoring the value of an independent judiciary committed to the rule of law.

11. In light of the foregoing discussion, I am of the considered opinion that the requirements of due process and fair trial were not complied with in the murder trial of Mr. Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto by the trial court and the appellate court.

SYED HASAN AZHAR RIZVI, J.---Before I express my concurrence with the detailed opinion authored by Mr. Justice Qazi Faez Isa, Hon'ble Chief Justice of Pakistan, I find it imperative to pen down a few additional observations that resonate with the conclusions reached therein. While I fully agree with the reasoning except those mentioned in para 26 to 30 and the outcome of the detailed opinion, the significance of the issues presented before this Court compels me to elaborate on certain aspects that reinforce our collective judicial philosophy. The case at hand touches upon the intricate application of legal principles and reflects the broader constitutional ethos that guides our jurisprudence. It is with a deep sense of responsibility and a commitment to the rule of law that I concur with the conclusion of the detailed opinion. However, I believe that certain nuances warrant further emphasis to underscore the contours of our legal landscape and to provide clarity for future jurisprudence. In aligning with the detailed opinion, I am mindful of the weighty considerations that have been accurately analyzed by the Chief Justice. The legal discourse presented therein is both thorough and compelling, leaving little room for dissent. Yet, it is the hallmark of a robust judicial system to allow for the expression of supplementary views that may fortify the decision's legal foundation and contribute to the richness of our legal tradition. Therefore, in the spirit of judicial comity and to enhance the legal reasoning that forms the crux of opinion by this Court, I offer the following observations.

2. Before delving into the intricate details of the case, let us first provide a concise overview of the key facts and events that set the stage for this reference. Briefly, Mr. Ahmad Raza Kasuri got registered an FIR No.402/74 dated 11.11.1974 for the offences under section 302/307 (now 324) of the Pakistan Penal Code, 1860 ('P.P.C.'), registered at Police Station ('P.S.') Ichhra, District Lahore against some unknown accused persons for the murder of his father Mr. Muhammad Ahmad Khan ('the deceased'). Later on, seven persons (Mr. Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto ('Mr. Bhutto'), Masood Mahmood, Director General Federal Security Force ('FSF'), Mian Muhammad Abbas, Director FSF, Ghulam Hussain, Inspector FSF, Ghulam Mustafa, Inspector FSF, Arshad Iqbal, Sub-Inspector FSF and Iftikhar Ahmad, Assistant Sub-Inspector (FSF) were nominated and the offences under sections 120-B/109 were also added in this case. A Full Court comprising five judges of the High Court was constituted for the trial of this case. After the trial, all the accused persons (except Masood Mahmood and Ghulam Hussain) were convicted and sentenced to death, along with other punishments, as per the judgment dated 18.03.1978, reported as PLD 1978 Lah. 523, pp. 618-622. A criminal appeal filed against the decision of the High Court was dismissed by this Court vide judgment dated 06.02.1979, reported as PLD 1979 SC 53. The review petition filed by Mr. Bhutto was also dismissed by this Court vide judgment dated 24.03.1979, reported as PLD 1979 SC 741. Finally, Mr. Bhutto was executed on 04.04.1979.

3. Since Mr. Bhutto's execution, one of Pakistan's major political parties, the Pakistan People's Party (PPP), has consistently questioned the fairness of the judicial process, alleging that it was influenced by the then-military dictatorship as well as political factors and as such lacked impartiality. The party views the trial of Mr. Bhutto and his subsequent execution as a miscarriage of justice, which remains a sensitive issue in Pakistani politics. In 2011, this longstanding grievance prompted the then-President of Pakistan, Asif Ali Zardari ('the President'), who was also Bhutto's son-in-law, to file a presidential reference under Article 186 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan ('the Constitution') to seek the opinion of the Court on the legality and fairness of the original proceedings that led to Bhutto's death sentence. The reference aimed to address and rectify any historical injustices and to restore public confidence in the judiciary's impartiality. The President sought the opinion of the Court on the following questions of law:

1. Whether the decision of the Lahore High Court as well as the Supreme Court of Pakistan in the murder trial against Shaheed Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto meets the requirements of fundamental rights as guaranteed under Article 4, sub-Articles (1) and (2)(a), Article 8, Article 9, Article 10A/due process, Article 14, Article 25 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973? If it does not, its effect and consequences?

2. Whether the conviction leading to execution of Shaheed Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto could be termed as a decision of the Supreme Court binding on all other courts being based upon or enunciating the principle of law in terms of Article 189 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973? If not, its effects and consequences?

3. Whether in the peculiar circumstances of this case awarding and maintaining of the death sentence was justified or it could amount to deliberate murder keeping in view the glaring bias against Shaheed Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto?

4. Whether the decision in the case of the murder trial against Shaheed Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto fulfills the requirements of Islamic laws as codified in the Holy Quran and the Sunnah of the Holy Prophet (SAW)? If so, whether present case is covered by doctrine of repentance specifically mentioned in the following Suras of Holy Quran:

(a) Sura Al-Nisa, verses 17 and 18; Sura Al-Baqara, verses 159, 160 and 222; Sura Al-Maida, verse 39; Sura Al-Aaraaf, verse 153; Sura Al-Nahl, verse 119; Sura Al-Taha, verse 82; as well as

(b) Sunan Ibn-e-Maaja, Chapter 171, Hadith No. 395.

5. Whether on the basis of conclusions arrived at and inferences drawn from the evidence/ material in the case an order for conviction and sentence against Shaheed Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto could have been recorded?

4. On 06.03.2024, we unanimously rendered our short opinion (with reasons to be recorded later) on the aforementioned questions, whereby we refused to provide any assistance/ opinion on questions Nos. 2 and 4. However, as regards questions Nos. 1, 3, and 5, we opined as follows:

Opinion on Question No.1

"(i) The proceedings of the trial by the Lahore High Court and of the appeal by the Supreme Court of Pakistan do not meet the requirements of the Fundamental Right to a fair trial and due process enshrined in Articles 4 and 9 of the Constitution and later guaranteed as a separate and independent Fundamental Right under Article 10A of the Constitution.

(ii) The Constitution and the law do not provide a mechanism to set aside the judgment whereby Mr. Bhutto was convicted and sentenced; the said judgment attained finality after the dismissal of the review petition by this Court."

Opinion on Questions Nos.3 and 5

"In its advisory jurisdiction under Article 186 of the Constitution, this Court cannot reappraise the evidence and undo the decision of the case. However, in our detailed reasons, we shall identify the major constitutional and legal lapses that had occurred with respect to fair trial and due process."

5. At the beginning of my note, I mentioned that, in principle, I concur with the conclusion reached in the detailed opinion rendered by the Chief Justice. However, certain areas related to constitutional and legal lapses in the case of Mr. Bhutto require further consideration and explanation keeping in view the scope and extent of authority of this Court in the advisory jurisdiction. Moreover, I disagree with specific observations made by the Chief Justice, as outlined in paragraphs 26 to 30 of the detailed opinion. Therefore, I will first highlight and explain the major constitutional and legal lapses that undermined the proceedings of trial of Mr. Bhutto before the High Court as well as the appeal filed by him before the Supreme Court of Pakistan, causing them to fail to meet the requirements of a fair trial and due process, as enshrined in Articles 4 and 9 of the Constitution. Secondly, I, with respect, outline the reasons for my disagreement with certain observations made by the Chief Justice in the detailed opinion. To avoid repetition, I will refer to the arguments presented by the legal representatives and counsel as outlined in the detailed opinion, except for those necessary for my analysis.

Right to due process and fair trial

6. At the time of the trial of Mr. Bhutto, the right to due process and a fair trial was not explicitly enshrined as a fundamental right in the Constitution. However, these rights have now been provided under Article 10-A, introduced by the Constitution (Eighteenth Amendment) Act, 2010. Even before the addition of this article to the Constitution, the right to a fair trial and due process was well-entrenched in our jurisprudence and considered as a part of the right of access to justice enshrined in the Constitution under Articles 4 and 9. Article 4 of the Constitution states that every individual has the right to be dealt with in accordance with the law, highlighting the necessity of legal processes that are fair and just. Article 9 further reinforces this by asserting that no person shall be deprived of life or liberty except in accordance with the law. These provisions collectively emphasized the importance of lawful procedures and the protection of individual rights, even before the explicit recognition of due process and fair trial in the Constitution. Thus, from the very beginning, this Court has stressed the importance of fair criminal trials to protect the rights and interests of both the victim and the accused. A fair trial ensures that the accused has the opportunity to present a defence and challenge the evidence, while the victim's rights to be heard and to seek justice are upheld. By maintaining impartiality and balancing the interests of both parties, this Court strives to deliver justice and maintain public confidence in the judicial system. For instance, this Court, in the case of Noor Ahmad v. The State (PLD 1964 SC 120), while shedding light on the conduct of criminal trials, observed that it is a fundamental principle that the trial of an accused person should be conducted with the utmost fairness and that anything likely to cause serious embarrassment to the accused in the conduct of their defence should be avoided. The relevant paragraph is quoted below for ease of reference:"

'We are also of the same view. Even though sections 235 and 239 of the Criminal Procedure Code give a discretion to the Court to try certain persons and or offences jointly yet there are certain considerations which are more fundamental than merely the convenience of the proceeding or trial which must be kept in view when deciding as to whether the discretion should in given in case be exercised or not. In a criminal trial, as we have already observed, it is a fundamental principle that the trial of an accused person should be conducted with the utmost fairness and anything which is likely to cause nay serous embarrassment to him in the conduct of his defence should be avoided. Thus, in the present case, it seems to us that whether a collision in such circumstances constituted one transaction or not there should not have been a joint trail of the appellants before us for more than one reason Firstly because the accusations made against them did not allege any kind of joint or concerted action nor disclosed any causal connection between the respective acts of the appellants....'

7. Later, in the case of Ch. Manzoor Elahi v. Federation of Pakistan etc. (PLD 1975 SC 66), this Court delved into the concept of 'due process' and on pages 109, 119, and 120 of the judgment provided a detailed explanation of what 'due process' entails. The Court emphasized the importance of legal procedures that ensure fairness, justice, and the protection of individual rights. The relevant paras of the judgment are reproduced hereunder for ease of reference:

'Article 4 may be compared 'with the due process of law in the American Constitution. The case of Government of West Pakistan v. Begum Agha Abdul Karim Shorish Kashmiri PLD 1969 SC 14, supports this view. In the case under report Article 2 of the 1962 Constitution which is corresponding to Article 4 of the Constitution was considered and the Court observed as follows:-

"The words 'in an unlawful manner' in sub-clause (b) of Article 98(2) have been used deliberately to give meaning and content to the solemn declaration under Article 2 of the Constitution itself that it is inalienable right of every citizen to be treated in accordance with law and only in accordance with law. Therefore, in determining as to how and in what circumstances a detention would be in an unlawful manner one would inevitably have first to see whether the action is in accordance with law, if not, then it is action in an unlawful manner. Law is here not confined to statute law alone but is used in its generic sense as connoting all that is treated as law in this country including even the judicial principles laid down from time to time by the superior Courts. It means according to the accepted forms of legal process and postulates a strict performance of all the functions and duties laid down by law. It may well be as has been suggested in some quarters, that in this sense it is as comprehensive as the American 'due process' clause in a new garb. It is in this sense that an action which is mala fide or colourable is not regarded as action in accordance with law. Similarly, action taken upon extraneous or irrelevant considerations is also not action in accordance with law. Action taken upon no ground at all or without proper application of the mind of the detaining authority would also not qualify as action in accordance with law and would, therefore, have to be struck down as being action taken in an unlawful manner."

Frontier Crimes Regulation was an "existing law" under Article 225 of the 1962 Constitution and Article 280 of the Interim Constitution. It continues to be an "existing law" under Article 268 of the present Constitution. The regulation has, therefore, always been and still is an existing law operating subject to the Constitution of the day.

Since the continued operation of the Frontier Crimes Regulation is subject to the Constitution a question arises whether the Regulation is `law' within the meaning of Articles 4 and 9 of the Constitution. In the case reported in PLD 1969 SC 14, this Court has had occasion to observe that "law" in Article 2 of the 1962 Constitution (corresponding to Article 4 of the Constitution) is as comprehensive as the American "due process of law" clause in a new garb. A reference, therefore, to the views of the American jurists as contained in 16 American Jurisprudence will, be helpful to the discovery of the true meaning of the word "law" as contained in the said two Articles of the Constitution. The following are the extracts from that book:--

- Due process of law' must be understood to mean law in the regular course of administration through Courts of justice (Vide 16 American Jurisprudence 2d paragraph 546).

- It means law according to the settled course of judicial proceedings or in accordance with natural, inherent, and fundamental principles of justice, enforceable in the usual modes established in the administration of government with respect to kindred matters.
- A general law administered in its legal course according to the form of procedure suitable and proper to the nature of the case, conformable to, the fundamental rules of right and affecting all persons alike, is `due process of law'.
- Due process has to do with the denial of fundamental fairness shocking to the universal sense of justice; it deals neither with power nor with jurisdiction, but with their exercise.
- 'Law embraces all legal and equitable rules defining human rights and duties and providing for their enforcement, not only as between man and man, but also between the State and its citizens. (Vide 16 American Jurisprudence 2d paragraph 546).
- It is a general public law of the land (paragraph 547).
- It is the law that operates on all persons alike and do not subject the individual to the arbitrary exercise of the powers of Government.
- Under the 'due process of law' no change in procedure can be made which disregards those fundamental principles, to be ascertained from time to time by judicial action which relate to process of law, protect the citizen in his private right and guard him against the arbitrary action of Government (paragraph 549).
- Substantive due process has been roughly defined as the constitutional guarantee that no person shall be deprived of his life, liberty, or property for arbitrary reasons, such deprivation being constitutionally supportable only if the conduct from which the deprivation follows is prescribed by reasonable Legislation (i.e. the Legislation the enactment of which is within the scope of legislative authority) reasonably applied (that is, for a purpose consonant with the purpose of the Legislation itself). To the extent that arbitrary action involves procedural arbitrariness, such action is, of course, barred by the principles of due process. In general terms it has been stated that the requirement of due process of law may be satisfied if there is no unauthorised and merely arbitrary exercise of the powers of Government to the detriment of the people or of some of them.
- It has been authoritatively stated that the right of a citizen to due process of law must rest upon a basis more substantial than favour or discretion, and in many instances statutes have been held unconstitutional on the ground that they operated to vest in the Courts or in other officials an arbitrary power over matters protected by the Constitution (paragraph 550)."

Applying the concept of `law' as contained in the extracts just quoted, section 11 of the Frontier Crimes Regulation (hereinafter called the F. C. R. which empowers the Deputy Commissioner to refer the determination of the guilt or otherwise of a person to the "Council of Elders," does not seem to me to be "law" as contemplated in Articles 4 and 9 of the Constitution. The section gives unfettered powers to the Deputy Commissioner to refer the said question for decision to a Council of Elders, if he thinks it inexpedient that the matter should be determined by any Court of the classes prescribed in section 6 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. No guidance, at all, has been laid down in what circumstances the reference to the Council of Elders should be made. No rule of procedure or evidence has been prescribed for a proceeding before such Council. The Council is not prevented from adopting methods which are arbitrary and inconsistent with reason and the civilised decencies. The section has nothing to do with the regular course of administration through Courts of justice, and does not exclude arbitrary action involving procedural arbitrariness. It constitutes a denial of fundamental fairness shocking to universal sense of justice.'

8. In "Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan: A Commentary on the Constitution of Pakistan, 1962," by Muhammad Munir, former Chief Justice of Pakistan, it is mentioned on page 197 that in a criminal trial, an accused person has the following important rights under the general law:

'1. The right to know before the trial the charge and the evidence against him;
2. The right to cross-examine the prosecution witnesses;
3. The right to produce evidence in defence;
4. The right to appeal or to apply for revision;
5. The right to be represented by counsel;

6. The right to have the case decided by the Judge who heard the evidence;
7. The right to trial by jury or with the aid of assessors;
8. The right to certain presumptions and defences; and
9. The right to apply for transfer of the case to another Court.'

The above rights were approvingly referred to and endorsed by a five-member bench of this Court in the case of Brig. (Retd.) F.B. Ali and another v. The State (PLD 1975 SC 506). In this case, the Court, with respect to the above list of rights, observed that the rights (except the right mentioned at serial No.7 which is no longer available in Pakistan) enumerated by Mr. Munir are clearly available in a trial even by a Court Martial.

HIGH COURT AS A COURT OF ORIGINAL CRIMINAL JURISDICTION

9. In our country, the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898 ('Cr.P.C.'), as the general law of the land, governs the procedure for conducting criminal trials in all criminal courts. Even where special criminal laws are silent on certain matters, the courts take guidance from and follow the principles laid down in the Cr.P.C. Undoubtedly, under the scheme of the Cr.P.C., the High Courts fall within the category of Criminal Courts and can try any offence under the P.P.C. A detailed procedure for trial before the High Court has been outlined in Chapter XXII-A of the Cr.P.C. For a better understanding of the above legal position, the relevant provisions of the Cr.P.C. (as existed at the time of the trial of Mr. Bhutto) are discussed below:

Section 6, Cr.P.C. provides the different classes of Criminal Court and Magistrates as follows:

"6. Classes of Criminal Courts and Magistrates: (1) Besides the High Courts and the Courts constituted under any law other than this Code for the time being in force, there shall be five classes of Criminal Courts in Pakistan, namely: -

(I) Courts of Session;

(II) [1]

(III) Magistrate of the first class:

(IV) Magistrate of the second class;

(V) Magistrate of the third class."

Emphasis supplied.

Section 28, Cr.P.C. states about the courts, competent to try offences under the P.P.C in the following words:

"28. Offences under Penal Code: Subject to the other provisions of this Code any offence under the Pakistan Penal Code may be tried-

(a) by the High Court, or

(b) by the Court of Session, or

(c) by any other Court by which such offence is shown in the eighth column of the Second Schedule to be triable."

Emphasis supplied.

Section 190, Cr.P.C. prescribes a mode for taking cognizance of an offence under P.P.C. as follows:

'190. Cognizance of offences by Magistrates. (1) Except as hereinafter provided, any District Magistrate or Sub-Divisional Magistrate, and any other Magistrate specially empowered in this behalf, may take cognizance of any offence-

(a) upon receiving a complaint of facts which constitute such offence;

(b) upon a report in writing of such facts made by any police officer;

(c) upon information received from any person other than a police officer, or upon his own knowledge or suspicion, that such offence has been committed.

(2) The Provincial Government, or the District Magistrate subject to the general or special orders of the Provincial Government, may empower any Magistrate to take cognizance under subsection (1), clause (a) or clause (b), of offences for which he may try or send to the Court of Sessions for trial.

(3) A Magistrate taking cognizance of an offence under subsection (1) of an offence triable exclusively by a Court of Session shall, without recording any evidence, send the case to the Court of Session for trial.'

Emphasis supplied.

Section 193, Cr.P.C. mandates that the Court of Sessions is not authorized to take cognizance of any offence as a court of original jurisdiction unless the case has been sent to it under section 190(3) supra. This provision of law is also reproduced hereunder for ease of reference:

'193. Cognizance of offence by Courts of Sessions.

(1) Except as otherwise expressly provided by this Code or by any other law for the time being in force, no Court of Sessions shall take cognizance of any offence as a Court of original jurisdiction unless the case has been sent to it under section 190, subsection (3).

(2) Additional Sessions Judges and Assistant Sessions Judges shall tray such cases only as the Provincial Government by general or special order may direct them to try, or as the Sessions Judge of the Division, by general or special order, may make over to them for trial.'

Emphasis supplied.

Section 194, Cr.P.C. provides for the taking of cognizance of offences by the High Court as follows-

'194. Cognizance of offences by High Court: (1) The High Court may take cognizance of any offence in manner hereinafter provided.

Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to affect the provisions of any Letters Patent or Order by which a High Court is constituted or continued, or any other provision of this Code.

(2) (a) Notwithstanding anything in this Code contained the Provincial Government, exhibit to the High Court, against persons subject to the jurisdiction of the High Court, information for all purposes for which Her Majesty's Attorney-General may exhibit informations on behalf of the Crown in the High Court of Justice in England.

(b) Such proceedings may be taken upon every such information as may lawfully be taken in the case of similar informations filed by Her Majesty\s Attorney-General so far as the circumstances of the case and the practice and procedure of the said High Court will admit.

(c) All fines, penalties, forfeitures, debts and sums of money recorded or levied under or by virtue of any such information shall form part of the revenues of the Province.'

Emphasis supplied.

10. As per the mandate of section 28, Cr.P.C., the High Court and the Court of Session have concurrent jurisdiction along with subordinate courts to try offences under the P.P.C. The Court of Session, unlike the High Court, is not a court of original criminal jurisdiction. As section 193 of the Cr.P.C. places a complete and clear bar on taking cognizance of any offence by the Court of Session in its original jurisdiction unless the case is sent to it by a Magistrate under section 190(3), Cr.P.C. Section 190(3), Cr.P.C., prescribes a mode of transmitting criminal cases (exclusively triable by the Court of Session) by a Magistrate after taking its cognizance under section 190(1) of the Cr.P.C. to the Court of Session, without recording evidence, for trial. It may be noted that the Magistrate taking cognizance of the offence will decide the forum competent to try the offence keeping in view the provision of section 30 as well as Schedule II to the Cr.P.C. No departure from this procedure ordinarily is possible. A perusal of Column 8 of Schedule II, Cr.P.C., indicates that the High Court is not mentioned as one of the courts competent to try offences under the P.P.C. Under this column, either the offences are triable by the Court of Session or by a Magistrate. However, Section 194 of the Cr.P.C. authorizes the High Court to directly take cognizance of any offence under the P.P.C., even though the High Court is not mentioned in Column 8 of Schedule II of the Cr.P.C. as a Court competent to try any offence. The above-stated position was quite different before the promulgation of the Law Reforms Ordinance, 1972 whereby the words appearing in section 194(1) "upon a commitment made to it" were omitted. Before the said Ordinance, the provision of section 194(1) was as under:

'194. Cognizance of offences by High Court: (1) The High Court may take cognizance of any offence, upon a commitment made to it, in manner hereinafter provided.'

11. Thus, prior to the amendment of subsection (1) of section 194, Cr.P.C. as it has been indicated hereinabove the High Court had no jurisdiction to directly take cognizance of the offence except upon a commitment made to it in the manner provided thereafter but after the amendment of subsection (1) of section 194, Cr.P.C. jurisdiction has been conferred upon the High Court to take cognizance of any offence directly. So far as the term 'in manner hereinafter provided' is concerned it has been noticed that the said term has already been explained by a two-member bench of this court in the case of Dr. Muhammad Afzal and others v. The State (2001 SCMR 1615). The Hon'ble bench, after a thorough examination of the legal provisions on the subject, concluded that, '...High Court can take cognizance of offence of Pakistan Penal Code under section 194, Cr.P. C. in the same manner as cognizance is taken under section 190(1)(c), Cr.P.C. by a Magistrate namely upon an information received from any person other than a police officer or upon his own knowledge or suspicion that such offence has been committed.' In addition, the High Court may withdraw for trial any case pending before any subordinate court while exercising its powers under Section 526, Cr.P.C. However, whether the High Court takes direct cognizance of a case or withdraws it from a subordinate court, it must follow the procedure for trial as provided under Chapter XXII-A of the Cr.P.C.

MAJOR CONSTITUTIONAL AND LEGAL LAPSES IN THE CASE OF MR. BHUTTO

12. Keeping in mind the above-settled principles and procedures to be adhered to while conducting a criminal trial, and after a thorough scrutiny of the entire record of Mr. Bhutto's case from the trial court/High Court up to this Court, I have found the following major constitutional and legal lapses that caused the proceedings of the trial of Mr. Bhutto to fail to meet the requirements of a fair trial and due process:

I) Biased Conduct of the Acting Chief Justice

In this case, the incomplete report/Challan under section 173, Cr.P.C. ('Challan') was submitted before the concerned area Magistrate on 11.09.1977. As the said Magistrate was not competent to try an offence punishable under section 302 P.P.C. (the main offence in the case), he, therefore, forwarded the same under section 190(3), Cr.P.C. to the Court of Session for trial. The record shows that on 13.11.1977, the State, through the Special Prosecutor, filed a petition, i.e., Criminal Misc. Application No. 127- T of 1977, for transfer of the criminal cases pending before a Court of Session at Lahore. The petition was fixed before the Acting Chief Justice, Mushtaq Hussain, who, on the same day, withdrew the case from the Court of Session and transferred it to the High Court and constituted a Full Court comprising five judges of the High Court for the trial of the case, and also adjourned the case to 24.09.1977 for hearing, vide the same judicial order dated 13.09.1977 (as reproduced in para 15 of the detailed opinion).

It would not be out of place to mention here that Chapter 1 of Volume-V of the High Court Rules and Orders deals with the Judicial Business of the High Court. Its Part A(b) prescribes a procedure for the disposal of petitions for the transfer of criminal cases. Rule 5 provides, 'the petitions for transfer of cases shall ipso facto be treated and dealt with as urgent petitions'. Rule 6 provides, 'Notice of the hearing of urgent petitions shall not be given individually to the petitioner or his counsel but a list of such petitions shall be hung up for the purpose on the notice board outside the Deputy Registrar's room and/or displayed in electronic media on the day proceeding the date fixed for the hearing of these petitions giving the name of the Judge by whom the petition will be heard.' Rule 7 provides, 'In petitions for transfer of cases under section 526, Criminal Procedure Code, filed in the High Court, the Sessions Judge shall, without fail, return all notices received by him from the High Court, whether for himself or for parties, after service, within one week from the date of their receipt.' Rule 8, Part A(b) further provides that 'The Sessions Judge shall, without fail, also submit, within one week from the date of receipt of the High Court letter, all reports or explanations called for by the High Court from himself or the Magistrate concerned with regard to allegations contained in the petitions for transfer or affidavit, copy whereof will accompany the said letter.' However, the then Acting Chief Justice sidestepped the above-noted prescribed procedure and, without giving/issuing any notice to the Court of Session/trial court for service to the parties, displaying the same in electronic media, or seeking any report or explanation from the Court of Secession/trial court with regard to allegation contained in the petition, passed the order dated 13.09.199 in a hasty manner.

Furthermore, he (the Acting Chief Justice) did not satisfy any of the conditions/grounds mentioned in section 526(1) (a-e) for exercising his jurisdiction under the said provision of law. The said order is also silent on the fact of what urgency or exigency necessitated the Acting Chief Justice to constitute a Full Bench for trial through a judicial order instead of a special order as required under Part-B of Chapter 3 of the High Court Rules and Orders. Without having any lawful authority, he, vide the said order, fixed the next date of hearing in the main case, even though the case file was not before him. Under the law, after the constitution of the Full Court/trial court, it is the exclusive power of the Full Court/trial court to fix the next hearing date at its convenience. All the aforementioned facts indicate his undue favor to someone against Mr. Bhutto. Even otherwise, the language of the order dated 13.09.1977 'In view of the submissions made in the petition the case is transferred to this Court for trial' ex -facie speaks volumes about his apparent bias or impartiality against Mr. Bhutto.

II) Non-observance of Prescribed Procedure by the Full Court

On September 24, 1977, the Full Court took up Mr. Bhutto's case for the first time and delivered the requisite copies to the accused persons (Mr. Bhutto, Mian Muhammad Abbas, Arshad Iqbal, Rana Iftikhar, and Ghulam Mustafa) under section 265-C, Cr.P.C. The Court also summoned the evidence for October 2, 1977. As previously mentioned, the Full Court was bound to follow the procedure for trial as provided under Chapter XXII-A of the Cr.P.C. Under this chapter, section 265-D stipulates that if, after perusing the police report or the complaint and all other documents and statements filed by the prosecution, the Court is of the opinion that there is ground for proceeding with the trial of the accused, it shall frame in writing a charge against the accused. However, the Full Court did not frame any charges against the accused persons, thereby ignoring the above mandatory provision of law and directly summoned the evidence. This implies that the Full Court had already formed its opinion to proceed with the trial even without perusing the record. However, the charges were formally framed against the accused person on October 11, 1977.

On November 5, 1977, Mr. Bhutto filed an application before the Full Bench, expressing his apprehension that a fair and impartial trial would not be conducted in his case. The Full Court, instead of disposing of the application, observed, 'This application be placed on record, which shall be disposed of in accordance with law, after the trial.' I find this course of action adopted by the Full Court difficult to understand. The application should have been disposed of promptly, considering that the accused was expressing distrust in the Court. However, the Court seemed adamant about concluding the trial without addressing the concerns raised by Mr. Bhutto.

III) In-Camera Trial Without Any Justification

On January 24, 1978, Mr. Bhutto informed the Full Bench that he had boycotted the trial after the cross-examination of Ghulam Hussain (PW.34) and, therefore, he was not prepared to answer any questions under section 342 of the Cr.P.C., which were directly related to his defence. Upon this, the Full Court made a general observation that the accused (Mr. Bhutto) had made several scurrilous, scandalous, and baseless attacks on the impartiality of the Bench. Consequently, the Court, solely based on the above reason, directed that the proceedings of the case be held in camera. It further ordered that no part of the in-camera proceedings would be published in any form whatsoever. Section 352, Cr.P.C. provides that the place in which any Criminal Court is held for the purpose of inquiring into or trying any offence shall be deemed an open Court, to which the public generally may have access, so far as the same can conveniently contain them. This provision of law, however, provides an exception to the above general rule that the Presiding Judge may, if he thinks fit, order at any stage of any inquiry into or trial of, any particular case, that the public generally, or any particular person, shall not have access to, or be or remain in, the room or building used by the Court.

I would feel no hesitation to observe here that this was a trial of a prominent politician who was also the head of a major political party and had served as the Prime Minister of the country. Against whom allegations of criminal conspiracy levelled by another politician in connection with the murder of his father. This situation created a compelling need for an open trial to ensure that justice was not only done but also perceived to be done transparently. An almost similar observation has been made by a five-member bench of this Court in Syed Ali Nawaz Gardezi v. Lt.-Col. Muhammad Yusuf (PLD 1963 SC 51) wherein the said Hon'ble Bench upheld the findings of the trial court, which ordered an open trial for the accused because the accused was a high-ranking government official. This decision highlights the importance of transparency and public scrutiny in cases involving individuals in significant positions of authority. In light of these considerations, it appears that the Full Bench did not exercise its discretion appropriately by ordering an in-camera trial and caused serious prejudice to the accused, Mr. Bhutto in contumacious disregard of the law previously declared by this Court in the Nawaz Gardezi case supra.

IV) Denial of the Right to Defend

Similarly, On January 28, 1978, the request of Mr. Bhutto for the supply of a copy of his statement recorded under section 342, Cr.P.C. on January 25, 1978, was declined (with the permission only to see that statement) for the reason that the proceedings were held in camera. In the case of Mr. Bhutto, the legal requirements for a fair trial, such as due notice and the opportunity to defend oneself, appear to have been compromised, as he was not provided with the materials necessary to prepare his defence effectively. This could possibly undermine the fairness and integrity of the trial proceedings. A fair trial for a criminal offence involves not only the technical observance of the framework and formalities of the law but also the recognition and just application of its substantive principles to ascertain the truth and prevent miscarriage of justice.

V) Erroneous Appreciation of Evidence of Approver

There is no denying the fact that there was no direct evidence in this case, which was solely based on the evidence of the approvers Masood Mahmood and Mian Muhammad Abbas. Under section 133 of the Evidence Act, 1872 (now Article 16 of the Qanun-e-Shahadat Order, 1984), an accomplice is a competent witness against an accused person. Thus, the evidence of an accomplice holds significant importance in the criminal justice system, particularly in cases where direct evidence is scarce. An approver is a participant or accomplice in a crime who agrees to testify against their fellow accused in exchange for leniency or a pardon. However, the evidence of an approver is treated with caution due to the inherent risk of unreliability and the possibility of ulterior motives. Section 114, illustration (b) of the Evidence Act, 1872 (now Article 129, illustration (b) of the Qanun-e-Shahadat Order, 1984), reinforces this caution by requiring that the testimony of an approver be corroborated in material particulars by independent and reliable evidence. This corroboration is necessary to ensure that the testimony of the approver is truthful and not fabricated to secure their own benefit. This Court in the case of Ghulam Qadir and another v. The State (PLD 1959 SC (Pak.) 377) had a chance to examine the evidentiary value of an approver. After a thorough analysis of the material available on record and the law on the subject, a 3-member bench of this Court laid a normal standard of corroboration for the acceptance of the evidence of an approver in a criminal case. S. A. Rahman, J.- (as he then was) speaking for the bench observed as under:

'As a matter of strict law, the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice could, if accepted, form the basis of a conviction in a criminal case. However in the course of judicial precedents, a rule of prudence has been evolved under which it is always insisted that there ought to be independent corroboration of an approver's statement on material points suggesting a link between accused persons and the crime before such a statement could be accepted as a safe foundation for their conviction. The reason for the rule is obvious. There is always danger of substitution of the guilty by the innocent in such cases and it is realised that it would be extremely risky to act upon the statement of a self-confessed criminal who while trying to save hip own skin, might be unscrupulous enough to accept suggestions of others to inculpate a person unconnected with the crime in place of his real accomplice for whom he may have a soft corner. But the corroboration required would depend on the facts and circumstances of each particular case and no hard and fast rule can be laid down in this behalf. Surely, one of the factors calling for consideration may be the circumstance that the approver had no ostensible motive to involve any of the accused persons falsely in the case. That does not imply any relaxation of normal standards of corroboration in such cases and indeed, in my humble judgment, the High Court, in the present case, does nor appear to have been guilty of any such lapse.'

The above normal standard of corroboration was followed by a subsequent equal bench of this Court in the case of Abdul Khaliq v. The State (1970 SCMR 307). The bench observed, "The extent and nature of corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice may vary from case to case. The rule of practice requiring corroboration of the evidence of the accomplice is that the corroboration must be in respect of some material particulars implicating the accused, and it is not necessary that evidence of the accomplice should be corroborated in every detail of the crime.' Later, a 5-member bench of this Court in the case of Abdul Majid and another v. The State (PLD 1973 SC 595) approvingly referred to the above observations of the earlier 3-member bench regarding the requirement of the normal standard of corroboration of the statement of an approver and decided the case accordingly.

Later a matter involving the encounter/murder of six persons by the police came for consideration before this Court in the case of Ch. Muhammad Yaqoob and others v. The State (1992 SCMR 1983). This Court after analyzing the case law from 1949 to 1991 observed that the testimony of an approver is to be scrutinized with care and caution and the Court should be doubly sure that his (approver's) evidence is corroborated in material particulars by reliable evidence. Further, this Court laid down the following principles for appreciating the evidence of an approver:

(i) That if a statement of fact made by an accused in a confession is of the nature that if it is assumed to be true, it would negate the offence alleged to be confessed, it is called an exculpatory confession.

(ii) That a statement of an accused that contains self-exculpatory matter cannot amount to confession.

(iii) That a retracted confession is sufficient to sustain a conviction for a capital offence, if the Court is of the view that the same is voluntary and is true, but as a rule of prudence, it has been consistently held by the superior Courts that the same should not be acted upon unless corroborated by some other reliable evidence in material particulars.

(iv) That though the confession of a co-accused cannot be made the foundation of conviction but it may be used in support of other evidence.

(v) That the confession of a co-accused is an evidence of a weak character.

(vi) That under Islamic Jurisprudence, in order to make a confession reliable, it should be voluntarily made and not on account of any coercion, duress or violence.

(vii) That any delay in recording of a confession may, or may not, be fatal as to the evidentiary value of a retracted confession as in the case of Syed Sharifuddin Pirzada v. Sohbat Khan and 3 others (supra), this Court has held that the factum that the accused were in the police custody for 11 to 15 days, was not fatal as to the credibility of the retracted confessions for the reason that the Court was satisfied that the retracted confessions were not tutored and were, in fact, made voluntarily.

(viii) That any lapse on the administrative side on the part of a Magistrate recording a confession, may not be fatal as to the evidentiary value of such confession provided the Court is satisfied that the lapses on his part have not, in any way, adversely affected the voluntariness or truthfulness of the confession.

(ix) That if an accomplice's evidence is not corroborated in material respects, it cannot be acted upon and that the evidence of an accomplice cannot be used to corroborate evidence of another accomplice.

It is relevant to mention here that the provisions of sections 337 to 339, Cr.P.C., lay down the procedure for tendering a pardon to an accomplice. The combined effect of these provisions is that a pardon may be tendered with the objective of 'obtaining the evidence of any person supposed to have been directly or indirectly concerned in, or privy to, the offence.' A pardon can be offered to such a person on the condition that he makes a full and true disclosure of all circumstances within his knowledge related to the offence and to every other person involved, whether as a principal or abettor, in its commission. It is evident that, without attempting to provide a formal definition of the term 'accomplice', the above provisions outline the criteria necessary for treating a person as an accomplice to tender a pardon. An accomplice, therefore, means a guilty associate or partner in crime, someone who is consciously connected with the offence in some way, whether before, during, or after its commission, or who makes admissions of facts showing that he had a conscious hand in the offence. If a witness is not concerned with the commission of the crime for which the accused is charged, he cannot be said to be an accomplice in the crime. In other words, an accomplice is a particeps criminis, who is consciously so connected with the criminal act done by his confederate that he, due to the presence of the necessary mens rea and his participation in the crime in some way, can be tried alongside that confederate who actually perpetrated the crime. A witness who could not be so indicted due to the absence of mens rea cannot be considered an accomplice.

VI) Masood Mahmood does not qualify to be an Approver

As the case rests mainly on the evidence of the approver his evidence requires a careful scrutiny, and can only be accepted if it is supported in material particulars by other reliable evidence. Upon examining the testimony of the approver (PW-2), numerous discrepancies and irregularities have been observed. Nonetheless, the following significant excerpts from his evidence are reproduced below for a thorough understanding and proper appreciation of his evidence:

'In June 1974 when Mr. Ahmad Raza Kasuri was speaking in the National Assembly, Mr. Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto addressed him directly and not through the Speaker as follows: He asked him to keep quiet, that he had enough of him and that he would not tolerate his nuisance anymore. This is more or less, what the Prime Minister said. A day or two later I was sent for by the prime Minister. He, inter alia, said to me that he was fed up with the obnoxious behavior of Mr. Ahmad Raza Kasuri and that Mian Muhammad Abbas, an Officer of the FSF, knew all about his activities. This officer is an accused in this Case. The then Prime Minister further told me that this officer had already been given directions through my predecessor to get rid of Mr. Ahmad Raza Kasuri. The Prime Minister went on to instruct me that I should ask Mian Muhammad Abbas to get on with the job and produce the dead body or Mr. Ahmad Raza Kasuri or his body bandaged all over.'

'On the 11th of November, 1974, I was at Multan so was Mr. Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto. Very early in the morning he rang me up. He said to me, "Your Mian Abbas has made complete balls of the situation. Instead of Mr. Ahmad Raza Kasuri, he has got his father killed". I was taken by surprise. The Prime Minister hung up after telling me that he would summon me later…. Soon after that, when I returned to the Headquarters, Mian Abbas informed me and reported to me that his operation had been successful, but instead of the intended victim his father Nawab Muhammad Ahmad Khan had been murdered at Lahore'.

'As far as I remember, I left Multan in the same afternoon. I was summoned by Mr. Bhutto on our return to Rawalpindi. He was peeved and agitated. He said that the actual task had yet to be accomplished. I said to him, "at your behest, an idea conceived by you was carried out and communicated by me to Mian Abbas who already your directions through my predecessor and the fact remains that both you and I and my subordinates will be taken to task by God Almighty, but I will not carry out any such orders any more'.

In answer to a question during cross-examination, the approver (PW-2) stated that:

'I did not give any plan of mine to Mian Muhammad Abbas for committing the murder of Mr. Ahmad Raza Kasuri.
Since Mr. Abbas had assured me about the execution of the orders ive to him by the then Prime Minister, therefore,
I did not give any person to him for the execution of those orders'.

A careful examination of the above-quoted excerpts from the evidence of Masood Mahmood, the approver (PW-2), reveals that he implicitly distanced himself from the alleged conspiracy involving Mr. Bhutto. He portrayed himself as an innocent and God-fearing man who merely conveyed a message from the then Prime Minister to another officer, treating it as part of his official duties. Moreover, the alleged incident took place on November 11, 1974, and he was taken into custody on July 5, 1977, with his confessional statement recorded on August 24, 1977. To substantiate his bona fides and the voluntariness of his actions, he claimed that on August 14, 1977, he wrote a letter to the Chief Martial Law Administrator, explicitly disclosing the misdeeds of the Federal Security Force, as well as his own actions wrongly carried out under the orders of Mr. Bhutto. Surprisingly, the letter was written after more than two and half years of the occurrence while he was in custody. If he had truly repented for his previous actions, he should have written that letter before his arrest. However, this stance has no value, as the letter or a copy thereof was not produced by him as evidence. He also failed to explain why he remained silent for approximately two and half years after the alleged incident and why he did not report it to the concerned authorities. Even otherwise, if his entire statement is considered in its totality, it does not constitute any offence. His statement is free from any mens rea and is therefore exculpatory; thus, he does not fall within the category of an accomplice. However, the High Court/Trial Court did not take note of this important aspect of the matter and, relying upon the evidence of the approver, erroneously convicted Mr. Bhutto. Although, this Court, in paragraph 413 of the majority judgment, made an important observation to the effect, '...If a witness is not an accomplice in the sense indicated above, namely, on account of the absence of mens rea then the real question is not of requiring corroboration of his evidence, but of the degree of credit to be attached to his testimony, depending on all the facts and circumstances of the particular case. In other words, he has then to be judged as any other witness, without introducing an artificial' requirement of corroboration of his evidence by applying the rule contained in illustration (b) to section 114 of the Evidence Act.'

Later, the majority judgment (para 456) concluded that Masood Mahmood, the approver was a truthful and reliable witness and dismissed the appeal of Mr. Bhutto while hypothetically observing, 'that Masood Mahmood enjoyed a special position under Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto, that he was in close and constant touch with him throughout his tenure as Director-General of the Federal Security Force from 1974 to 1977, that he was shown all kinds of favours and considerations by being sent abroad for official visits and medical treatment, that he was not the only civilian official taken into custody on the proclamation of Martial Law, and that during his long career in the Police service of Pakistan, he had held important positions involving the assumption of responsibility and exercise of authority, and it was, therefore difficult to hold that Masood Mahmood had become an instrument in the hands of the Martial Law authorities to deliberately and falsely concoct the story he had narrated at such length at the trial. A further significant fact strengthening this conclusion was that even if he was pressurised to falsely implicate the former Prime Minister, there was no reason for the Martial Law authorities, or for Masood Mahmood himself to falsely assign an important operational role in the conspiracy to the appellant
Mian Muhammad Abbas, who was then functioning as one of the Directors of the Federal Security Force, incharge of Operations and Intelligence...'.

VII) Lack of Corroboration of Evidence of the Approver

If, for the sake of argument, it is accepted that Masood Mahmood fulfills all the requirements of being an approver, the next important legal question is whether the prosecution has succeeded in providing the necessary corroboration to support his testimony. To find the answer, I thoroughly examined the available records and was highly disappointed to find any convincing evidence to corroborate the sequence of events as alleged by Masood Mahmood, the approver. As far as the motive is concerned, it has been found from the excerpt of evidence of Masood Mahmood, as quoted above, that the motive mainly set out by the prosecution was Mr. Bhutto's speech in June 1974 in the National Assembly, where he directly addressed Mr. Ahmad Raza Kasuri and said he had enough of him and would not tolerate his nuisance anymore. In addition to this, Mr. Ahmad Raza Kasuri, while appearing as PW-1 before the High Court/Trial Court, gave a detailed account of his differences with Mr. Bhutto. Notably, he stated that he was a founding member of the Pakistan People's Party ('PPP'), formed on December 1, 1967, and was elected to the National Assembly in 1971 on that party's ticket. As he considered Mr. Bhutto a power-hungry, their relations cooled and eventually became strained. The above are the two main reasons for the involvement of Mr. Bhutto in this case, as per the prosecution evidence available on record. It is worth discussing a shocking fact: Mr. Ahmad Raza Kasuri, while appearing as PW-1, disclosed that Mr. Bhutto formally expelled him from the PPP in October 1972. In June 1973, he joined Tehrik-I-Istiqlal and then rejoined the PPP on April 6, 1976, due to an instinct for self-preservation. I am unable to understand, and even a person of ordinary prudence could not fathom, why he would rejoin a party led by someone accused of conspiring in his father's death. His rejoining is not justified in any manner, regardless of his reasoning. Based on these facts, it could be surmised that Mr. Ahmad Raza Kasuri might have been subjected to some external pressure possibly motivated by the then Martial law regime to implicate

Mr. Bhutto in the murder of his father, even though he might not have personally wished to do so or might have been convinced of Mr. Bhutto's innocence subsequently.

VIII) Motive Remained Unproved

Even otherwise, when there are open hostilities between two groups, the motive factor may propel one side to commit a crime, and the same factor may possibly induce the other group to implicate their rivals. Further, the motive is a double-edged weapon, which can be used either way and by either side i.e. for real or false involvement. Reference in this regard may be made to the cases of Noor Elahi v. Zafarul Haque (PLD 1976 SC 557); and Allah Bakhsh v. The State (PLD 1978 SC 171). Therefore, to my understanding the prosecution failed to establish the motive part of the case; but the High Court/Trial Court (in para 464 of the judgment) had erroneously held, 'the motive to kill Ahmad Raza Kasuri is proved to be on the part of the principal accused [Mr. Bhutto]'. Similarly, this Court in para 497 of the majority judgment subscribed to the finding of the High Court/Trial Court while ignoring the above apparent fundamental inconsistencies in the case of the prosecution and held that Mr. Bhutto had a strong motive to do away with Ahmad Raza Kasuri owing to their violent political differences, and the manner and the language in which Ahmad Raza Kasuri gave vent to his views against the former Prime Minister and his polices.

IX) The Retracted Confession of Mian Abbas carries no Evidentiary Value

A careful examination of the confessional statement made by Mian Abbas under section 164, Cr.P.C. shows that he also attempted to exculpate himself by laying the blame on approvers Masood Mahmood and Ghulam Hussain and incidentally implicating Mr. Bhutto in this crime. Under these circumstances, his statement cannot be treated as a confession for the purposes of section 30 of the Evidence Act, 1872 (now Article 43 of the Qanun-e-Shahadat Order, 1984). Moreover, he had initially admitted his guilt and recorded his judicial confession. However, he later retracted that confession, yet the High Court/ Trial Court convicted him and sentenced him to death. During the appeal proceedings before this Court, he again changed his mind, retracted the retraction of his judicial confession, and pleaded guilty. Although a conviction can be based on a retracted judicial confession provided it is corroborated, the conduct of Mian Abbas as described above makes him a highly unreliable witness in case involving a capital sentence.

X) Impact of Negative Report of Ballistics Experts

Additionally, the negative report of the Ballistics Expert dated September 8, 1977, regarding the use of any of the 25 guns of the third Battalion of the FSF, then stationed in Walton Lahore, in the present crime undermines the entire prosecution case, not only in regard to the use of weapons belonging to this Battalion but also regarding the use of FSF ammunition. Particularly, this report is fatal to the evidence of the approver Ghulam Hussain and of the other witnesses who claimed to have supplied Short Machine Guns (SMGs) and ammunition to Ghulam Hussain for the purpose of carrying out an attack on Mr. Ahmad Raza Kasuri.

DISAGREEMENT WITH CERTAIN REASONS IN THE DETAILED OPINION

13. No doubt, the High Court, as earlier discussed, is fully competent to take direct cognizance under section 194, Cr.P.C. of a criminal case for the commission of any offence under the P.P.C. or transfer the same to itself for trial under section 526, Cr.P.C., as both provisions have existed in the Cr.P.C. since its inception in 1898. If these provisions were found to be inappropriate, the Parliament could amend or delete them in any of the subsequent amendments made after its adoption. Given the above legal position, I do not agree with the observation made in para 26 of the detailed opinion authored by the Chief Justice whereby it has been observed, 'Article 185(2)(b) of the Constitution and sections 411 -A and 526, of the Code permit trial to be conducted by the High Court, but these provisions do not provide for a High Court to conduct a murder trial.' I would feel no hesitation to state here that Section 411-A, Cr.P.C. only provides a remedy of appeal to an accused who has been convicted in a trial held by the High Court in the exercise of its original criminal jurisdiction. An exception is attached to this provision, under which no appeal lies in cases where an appeal lies to the Supreme Court under Article 185 of the Constitution. Article 185(2)(b) of the Constitution stipulates that an appeal shall lie to the Supreme Court from any judgment, decree, final order, or sentence of a High Court if the High Court has withdrawn any case for trial before itself from any court subordinate to it and has in such trial convicted the accused person and sentenced him. As the High Court withdrew the case of Mr. Bhutto from the Court of Session/Trial Court and convicted him, his case was not covered under section 411-A, Cr.P.C. being subject to its exception clause. Therefore, Mr. Bhutto filed a direct criminal appeal before this Court under Article 185(2)(b).

14. The Chief Justice, with due respect, erred in understanding the true meaning and purpose of Article 185(2)(b) of the Constitution and sections 411-A and 526 of the Cr.P.C. Consequently, his observation that the aforementioned provisions of law permit the trial to be conducted by the High Court, but do not allow the High Court to conduct a murder trial, is untenable under the law being based on a misconception of these provisions. It is, however, true that the trial of Mr. Bhutto, for the first time, was conducted by the High Court in its original criminal jurisdiction; but now one more example can also be quoted from the recent past. Where a single bench of the Islamabad High Court tried the case of an on-duty Additional Sessions Judge, Raja Khurram Ali Khan, and his wife, Maheen Zafar, for torturing their domestic worker, Tayyaba Bibi. They were both convicted and sentenced and their criminal appeal under section 411-A, Cr.P.C., was dismissed by the Division Bench of the same High Court. See Raja Khurram Ali Khan and another v. Tayyaba Bibi and another (2019 YLR 98). A Criminal Appeal filed against the judgment of the Division Bench was also dismissed by this Court. See Raja Khurram Ali Khan and 2 others v. Tayyaba Bibi and another (PLD 2020 SC 146).

15. As far as the observation of the Chief Justice in para 27-28 of the detailed opinion regarding confirmation of the death sentence by the High Court is concerned, my understanding of the legal framework as provided under Chapter XXVII titled 'OF THE SUBMISSION OF SENTENCES FOR CONFIRMATION' is quite different. Under this chapter, the Legislature has provided valuable safeguards for the life and liberty of convicts in cases involving capital sentences. The provisions contained therein seek to ensure that in capital sentence cases, where the life of the convicted person is at stake, the entire evidentiary material bearing on the innocence or guilt of the accused and the question of the sentence must be scrutinised with utmost caution and care by a superior Court. This Chapter only deals with the sentence of death passed by a Court of Session and it has nothing to do with the sentence of death passed by a High Court while trying a case in its original criminal jurisdiction. The provision of section 374 is more than clear in this regard which states as under:

'374. Sentence of death to be submitted by Court of Session: When the Court of Session passes sentence of death, the proceedings shall be submitted to the High Court and the sentence shall not be executed unless it is confirmed by the High Court'.

Emphasis Supplied.

Further, section 377 states as under:

'377. Confirmation of new sentence to be signed by two Judges: In every case so submitted, the confirmation of the sentences, or any new sentence or order passed by the High Court, shall, when such Court consists of two or more Judges, be made, passed and signed by at least two of them.'

Emphasis Supplied.

16. The above provisions are clear and require no further interpretation regarding whether a death sentence passed by a Full Bench comprising five judges of the High Court still requires confirmation by another two judges of the same Court. On a reference for the confirmation of the sentence of death, the High Court is required to proceed in accordance with sections 375 and 376, Cr.P.C. and the provisions of these sections make it clear that the duty of the High Court, in dealing with the reference, is not only to see whether the order passed by the trial court is correct, but to examine the case for itself and even direct a further enquiry or the taking of additional evidence if the Court considers it desirable in order to ascertain the guilt or the innocence of the convicted person. If, for the sake of argument, it is accepted that the said death sentence passed by a Full Bench still requires confirmation by another two judges of the same High Court, it would be against the spirit of the above Chapter as well as the settled law whereby a smaller bench cannot sit as an appellate authority against the decision of a larger bench even it would disturb the internal hierarchy of the High Court. For instance, Section 3(1) of the Law Reforms Ordinance, 1972, provides for an appeal to a bench of two or more judges of a High Court from a decree passed or final order made by a single judge of that Court in the exercise of its original civil jurisdiction. But no such appeal would lie if the decree or final order is made by a bench comprising more than one judge, thus rendering the said provision of law redundant. Similarly, we, for the purposes of Section 374, Cr.P.C., cannot use the terms 'Court of Session' and 'High Court' interchangeably, as both are distinct and separate judicial forums. Consequently, when the High Court passes a sentence of death in its original criminal jurisdiction, the above Chapter XXVII of Cr.P.C. becomes redundant and inoperative. However, the convict may seek the remedy of appeal under Article 185(2)(b) of the Constitution or Section 411-A, Cr.P.C., as the case may be, as discussed in the preceding paragraphs. Therefore, with such an interpretation and understanding of Chapter XXVII of Cr.P.C., I am unable to agree with the view expressed by the Chief Justice in paragraphs 27 to 30 of the detailed opinion regarding the application of Chapter XXVII, as well as the loss of the right of appeal in the case of a criminal trial conducted by the High Court in its original criminal jurisdiction, as being misconceived.

17. In conclusion, while exercising the restraint expected of me in an advisory jurisdiction, I have no hesitation in stating that no evidence whatsoever was available on record to sustain the conviction of Mr. Bhutto as recorded by the High Court/Trial Court and upheld by this Court. The evidence of the material witnesses, namely Ahmad Raza Kasuri (PW-1), Masood Mahmood (PW-2), Saeed Ahmad (PW-3), Mr. Welch (PW-4), and Ghulam Hussain (PW31) is full of contradictions, improvements, and improbabilities and was not sufficient for awarding the capital punishment to Mr. Bhutto. Even the majority of this Court erroneously subscribed to the findings of the High Court/Trial Court without carrying out any independent analysis or review of the material available on record. In short, the case of Mr. Bhutto is a bitter example of unfairness, wherein both substantive and procedural laws were misapplied to please the then-Martial Law authorities. As a result, we lost a great political leader. This case stands as a stark reminder of how legal systems can be manipulated for political gain, leading to grave injustices. The misapplication of laws in this case not only undermined the integrity of the judicial process but also eroded public trust in the legal system. It highlights the importance of judicial independence and the need for courts to be free from political influence. The loss of Mr. Bhutto, a visionary leader, was not just a blow to his supporters but to the nation as a whole, depriving it of his leadership and contributions.

18. The above are the reasons in support of the unanimous short opinion rendered by this Court on 06.03.2024.

Opinion on Reference No.01/2011, filed under Article 186 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973

MUHAMMAD ALI MAZHAR, J.---

Pursuant to the decision of the Federal Cabinet, the President of Pakistan, in the year 2011, filed a reference under Article 186 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution") seeking an opinion in respect of the proceedings of the judicial process in the case of the trial of Shaheed Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto, former Prime Minister of Pakistan (Mr. Bhutto).

For the ease of reference, the following index provides an outline of the key topics discussed in the opinion:

|---|---|---|
| I. | Quintessence of Advisory Jurisdiction | 826 |
| II. | Opinion of Larger Bench | 828 |

| | | |

I. Quintessence of Advisory Jurisdiction

2. To begin, it is expedient to reproduce, for the ease of reference, Article 186 of the Constitution as under:

Advisory Jurisdiction

186, (1) If, at any time, the President considers that it is desirable to obtain the opinion of the Supreme Court on any question of law which he considers of public importance, he may refer the question to the Supreme Court for consideration.

(2) The Supreme Court shall consider a question so referred and report its opinion on the question to the President. [emphasis applied]

3. The spirit and fundamental nature of the advisory jurisdiction under Article 186 accentuates that the President may refer any question of law which is considered to be a matter of public importance to the Supreme Court for its consideration and opinion. This function plays a momentous role in advisory jurisdiction. The foremost wisdom of this jurisdiction lies in enabling the President to seek aid and assistance in the form of an opinion from the Supreme Court on any issue of law concerning public importance, which is the dominant feature of the "Presidential Reference" encapsulated in the Constitution. In my view, while the opinion rendered under advisory jurisdiction may not be binding, it carries significant credence and persuasive value. It is rendered after much deliberation, thoughtfulness, and appreciation of the questions forwarded by the President consistent with the constitutional obligations and judicial propriety. Such opinions ought to be respected with due weight and esteem by all organs of the State. However, concomitantly, questions transmitted for opinion in the reference should not be ambiguous, indeterminate, or inexplicable to avoid the possibility of the Supreme Court returning the reference unanswered.

4. In essence, the scope and existence of advisory jurisdiction represent is a fundamental correlation and relationship between the government and the judiciary. It is the sole pathway for seeking Supreme Court's opinion in certain instances. The Court must remain confined to the proposed questions without making any departure and must keep a tight rein on the reference itself. The Supreme Court may decline to articulate an opinion if the questions framed lack any constitutional significance or public importance. In Reference No. 2 of 2005 (PLD 2005 SC 873), a nine-member bench of this Court rendered an opinion on the draft Bill titled "HISBA BILL". The opinion referenced various local and foreign judicial precedents and the insights of eminent jurists on constitutional provisions, and concluded that the opinion on a Presidential Reference is not a decision between parties but entails an extensive judicial exercise, including evaluation and appreciation of arguments advanced by advocates appearing for summoned parties, and the Court then forms an opinion. It was further expounded that keeping in mind the language used in Articles 189 and 190 of the Constitution, the opinion expressed by the Supreme Court on a Presidential Reference under Article 186 is required to be esteemed by all organs of the State. Thus, it would not be fair to say that the opinion expressed by the Supreme Court on a Presidential Reference under Article 186 of the Constitution has no binding effect.

II. Opinion of Larger Bench

5. On 06.03.2024, the larger bench of this Court delivered its opinion on five questions raised in the Reference filed by the President of Pakistan. The larger bench, by and large, opined that the proceedings of the trial by the Lahore High Court and the appellate judgment rendered by the Supreme Court did not meet the requirements of the fundamental right to a fair trial and due process, enshrined in Articles 4 and 9 of the Constitution, and later guaranteed as a separate and independent fundamental right under Article 10A of the Constitution. It was further opined that the Constitution and the law do not provide a mechanism to set aside the judgment whereby Mr. Bhutto was convicted and sentenced. The said judgment had attained finality after the dismissal of the review petition by this Court, and thus, this Court cannot reappraise the evidence to undo the decision.

6. No doubt, the conviction attained finality after the dismissal of the review petition by this Court. However, in my unfeigned empathy and astuteness, I reckon it my utmost duty to draw attention to the quintessential blemishes and glitches in the murder trial, which blatantly suppressed, devastated, and compromised the doctrine of due process of law and the right to a fair trial.

III. Overview of Murder Trial

7. To articulate my opinion, a selection of indispensable facts about the "Murder Trial" is sine qua non to be jotted down for augmentation. To avoid veibosity, I aim to recapitulate the short and snappy minutiae of the murder trial, which forms the nucleus of my opinion. Considering the acute topographies, FIR No.402/74 was registered on 11.11.1974 at Police Station Ichara, Lahore, on the complaint of Mr. Kasuri. After lodging the FIR regarding the assassination of his father, the police carried out the investigation but traced no culprits. Consequently, the investigation was transferred by the Senior Superintendent of Police to the Crime Investigation Agency. Despite the transfer, no suspects of the alleged crime were identified or implicated, and recommendations were made for closure. The report was submitted to the concerned Magistrate and approved vide administrative order dated 03.05.1976. Neither the complainant nor any other legal heirs of the deceased challenged the closure of the investigation in the High Court or applied to the prosecution agency for the revival of the case or changes to the investigation officer or agency. Here, the matter could have ended without any further proceedings or investigation, effectively setting it to rest for all practical purposes. However, on one fine morning, the Government of Punjab, of its own accord, appointed a Tribunal to inquire into the incident mentioned in the same FIR without any lawful justification or application from any aggrieved person.

IV. Reinvestigation in a Closed Case.

8. The erstwhile Tribunal, in its report dated 22.02.1975, issued certain directions for further investigation without any logical justification. After the imposition of martial law in the country, the Director of the Federal Investigation Agency ("FIA") resurrected the case on 03.05.1976, which had been closed much earlier. Again, this was done without any lawful justification and appeared to be an attempt to revive the closed case by any means with mala fide intentions. The Director of the FIA, more loyal than the king, implicated seven persons, including Mr. Bhutto. A final report under Section 173 of the Code of Criminal Procedure Code, 1898 ("Cr.P.C.") was submitted, wherein two accused persons were cited as approvers. The concerned Magistrate sent the matter to the Sessions Judge for trial on 12.09.1977. All of a sudden, a transfer application was moved by the State to the Acting Chief Justice of the Lahore High Court, who instantaneously transferred the case to the High Court for trial by 'a five-member bench headed by him. To conclude, the aforesaid bench, vide judgment dated 18.03.1978, awarded the death penalty to Mr. Bhutto. His appeal was dismissed by this Court on 06.02.1979, and though a review petition was filed, it was also dismissed on 24.03.1979. To end the story everlastingly, the death sentence was executed on 04.04.1979.

9. In the safe administration of the criminal justice system in our country, relevant provisions are provided under Cr.P.C. for making arrests, conducting investigations, holding trials, issuing convictions, and executing sentences. Whenever, an Officer In-Charge of a Police Station receives information about an offence, he is required to determine whether the offence is cognizable or non-cognizable. The Investigating Officer plays a crucial role in the administration of the criminal justice system and the constituent of the investigation report and its worth holds plenteous value and has repercussions on the outcome of any criminal case. The Investigating Officer is obligated to investigate the matter from all possible angles, as required by Rule 25.2(3) of the Police Rules, 1934, to ascertain the truth and aim to arrest the real offender, not the innocents. The investigation typically begins with inspecting the crime scene, reconnoitering the circumstances connected to the offence, identifying and arresting the suspect, gathering of relevant evidence (including witness statements), making applications to the Court for recording confessions if any, conducting searches and seizures, carrying out recoveries and identification parades if required, and finally submitting the final report under Section 173, Cr.P.C., after fulfilling all legal requirements. The Investigating Officer must ensure that the provisions of the law are conscientiously followed without any breaches and the investigation is conducted impartially, with the sole aim of uncovering the truth rather than implicating innocents. This impartiality forms the foundational pathway for the prosecution's case. The mere registration of an FIR does not insinuate conviction or proof of guilt. Section 169, Cr.P.C., clearly provides that if, upon investigation, it appears to the Officer In-Charge of the police station, or to the Police Officer conducting the investigation that there is insufficient evidence or reasonable grounds for suspicion to justify forwarding the accused to a Magistrate, such officer shall, if such person is in custody, release the individual upon executing a bond, with or without sureties, as such officer may direct, to appear, if and when so required, before a Magistrate empowered to take cognizance of the offence on a police report and to try the accused or send him for trial. The case of Norwest Holst Ltd. v. Department of Trade and others [(1978) 3 All ER 280 at 290] held that "in every investigation, there are by and large three different phases. First of all, the administrative phase; next, the judicial phase; and, finally, the executive phase when the orders of the Court or the Tribunal are, if necessary, executed, or promulgated. Quite plainly fairness to the suspect demands that he should be given a chance of stating his case. Equally fairness demands that the suspect shall be given a chance of putting his side of the case before the judicial inquiry is over. Fairness to the inquirer demands that during the administrative period he should be able to investigate without having at every stage to inquire from the suspect what his side of the matter may be. Of course, it may be difficult to find out the particular point at which the administrative phase ends and the judicial phase begins". The judgment also quoted a passage from Lord Reid's speech in Wiseman v. Borneman [(1971) AC 297, at 308)], that every public officer deciding whether to prosecute or raise proceedings ought to first decide whether a prima facie case is made out or not.

10. Neither does it appear from the record that anyone, including the legal heirs of the deceased, was dissatisfied with the first investigation into the alleged crime, nor is there any indication that they approached the police, the FIA, or the High Court to request a fresh investigation. Additionally, nothing in the record justifies the decision to reinvestigate a closed case. No independent reasoning appears to have been applied to explain why reinvestigation was necessary. Moreover, there is no mention of significant errors or blunders made by the original Investigating Officer, nor any suggestion that evidence was intentionally omitted or manipulated to favour the accused. Similarly, there is no indication that overwhelming evidence was ignored or that reinvestigation was necessary to unearth the truth because the earlier investigation was so defective or contained such visible and seeming lapses on part of the Investigating Officer that it was rendered inadequate. Even the directions in the Tribunal's order to the investigating agency do not reflect any concrete or strong justification for reinvestigation. Instead, reinvestigation was ordered mechanically without identifying lapses on the part of the Investigating Officer. Neither was it asserted that the earlier investigation was botched, nor was any departmental action proposed against the Investigating Officer if the Tribunal believed that he failed to discharge his statutory duty of conducting a fair and impartial investigation.

11. The 'purpose of reinvestigation is not to appease influential individuals or to implicate the innocent. Its underlying principle is to unearth the truth where fairness, rectitude, and impartiality demand it. However, this does not mean that reinvestigation should routinely or customarily be ordered de novo, after submission of challan/report of closure, without any rational or well-articulated justification. Such orders must not cater to grudges or nefarious designs aimed at dragging the irreproachable or innocent individuals into .dire consequences. Reinvestigation cannot be wielded as a tool to favour any influential persons or punish the innocent so casually, callously, or arbitrarily, at the whims of influential and powerful individuals.

Manipulated or misused, the garb of reinvestigation is truly a dangerous idea that undermines the integrity of the criminal justice system and poses a serious danger to its administration.

V. Transfer of Case from Sessions Court to High Court

12. According to Section 28 of the Cr.P.C., an offence under the Pakistan Penal Code, 1860 (P.P.C.) may be tried by the High Court, or by the Court of Session or by any other Court by which such offence is shown in the eighth column of the Second Schedule to be triable. Section 31, P.P.C., however, is noteworthy, according to which the High Court may pass any sentences authorised by law. Similarly, a Sessions Judge or Additional Sessions Judge may pass any sentence authorised by law, with the rider that any sentence of death passed by any such Judge shall be subject to confirmation by the High Court. While Section 302 offences are triable by Sessions Court, as also mentioned in the Schedule-II (Explanatory Note) of the Cr.P.C., as the procedural framework outlined in Section 190, Cr.P.C., states that the Magistrate may take cognizance of any offence upon receiving a complaint of facts which constitute such offence; upon a report in writing of such facts made by any police officer; upon information received from any person other than a police officer, or upon his own knowledge or suspicion, that such offence has been committed which he may try or send to the Court of Session for trial. A Magistrate taking cognizance of an offence triable exclusively by a Court of Session shall, without recording any evidence, send the case to the Court of Session for trial under Section 193, Cr.P.C., wherein it is clearly provided that except as otherwise expressly provided by this Code or by any other law for the time being in force, no Court of Session shall take cognizance of any offence as a Court of original jurisdiction, unless the case has been sent to it under Section 190.

13. The factual matrix in the case decrypts that the case was sent for trial to the Sessions Judge, Lahore, on 12.09.1977. However, on the very next day, a transfer application was filed by the State, which was allowed on the same day by the Acting Chief Justice of the Lahore High Court, the late Justice Maulvi Mushtaq Hussain, who constituted the bench, and the charge was framed on 11.10.1977. Without a doubt, under Section 526 Cr.P.C., the High Court has jurisdiction to transfer a case or itself try it, but with certain conditionalities, for instance: (a) that a fair and impartial inquiry or trial cannot be had in any criminal court subordinate thereto; (b) that a question of law of unusual difficulty is likely to arise; (c) that a view of the place in or near which any offence has been committed may be required for a satisfactory inquiry into a trial of the same; (d) that an order under this section will tend to the general convenience of the parties or witnesses; or, (e) that such an order is expedient for the ends of justice, or is required by any provision of this Code. While exercising this jurisdiction,, the High Court may act either on the report of the lower court, or on the application of a party interested, or on its own initiative.

14. It appears beyond any doubt that J. Maulvi Mushtaq Hussain allowed the transfer application in a slipshod manner, even without notice to the accused persons. Neither did the Court consider the parameters and constituents of Section 526, Cr.P.C., which require consideration before passing an order of transfer of a case, nor did it record in the order how Mr. Bhutto, who was incarcerated and no longer in power, was in a position to influence or manipulate the outcome, or hinder a fair inquiry or trial. Moreover, it was not mentioned what serious question of law of unusual difficulty was likely to arise in the prosecution case, or how the transfer was required for the general convenience of the parties or witnesses, or expedient for the ends of justice. On the contrary, in my view, the order was tainted with malice, seemingly intended 'to gain control of the prosecution case to stifle or curb the ends of justice and the right to a fair trial which is an inherent and fundamental right of every accused. The Court should not have rubberstamped the State's request for a case transfer without notice to the accused or without judiciously, cautiously, and diligently addressing the grounds raised in the transfer application to determine whether it genuinely made out a case for transfer or if the purpose of the transfer was to cause serious prejudice to the defence. It is evident from the record that Mr. Bhutto not only challenged the transfer order but also objected to the five-member bench trying the case, particularly alleging bias against J. Maulvi Mushtaq Hussain, who was heading the bench. However, all such objections were in vain. Neither the bench members of the High Court ever acknowledged these concerns, nor did this Court give any importance or paid any heed to them. Despite serious objections, J. Maulvi Mushtaq Hussain did not recuse himself from the bench, but continued enthusiastically completing the murder trial.

VI. Allegations of Bias

15. Now, I would like to address the allegations of bias. Various instances are reflected in the record, including altercations and sarcastic remarks from the bench during the trial, which led Mr. Bhutto to believe he could not expect a fair trial or justice. Time and again, he raised allegations of bias and expressed lack of confidence, but the bench, seemingly overenthusiastic, overzealous, or under external pressure, continued the trial. They awarded the maximum sentence based solely on the testimony of an approver, without any other concrete incriminating or corroborative testament or circumstantial evidence. The bench's approach was unique and, even without considering any mitigating circumstances, appeared predetermined or prejudiced to impose the maximum punishment in a highly dubious case. In my considered view, the personal bias or preconceived notions of the judges unambiguously rendered them incapable of serving independently and fair-mindedly, which undermines the basic limb of the administration of justice and the sacred trust of the masses. When there is an actual probability of bias, the judge ought to recuse themselves, not because they are necessarily biased or incapable of dispensing justice impartially, but because the circumstances might engender a certain restlesness or fear of bias influencing the outcome of a case in the mind of others. In fact, reposing public confidence in the judiciary is the yardstick by which the justice delivery system and its integrity are appraised, including adherence to the doctrine of ex debito justitiae. A biased decision inevitably undermines credibility. However, mere apprehension or allegations of bias without any substantial whys and wherefores cannot alone justify recusal. Each judge, guided by his own conscience and sense of right and wrong, must decide whether to sit in a particular case or not. Lord Hewart's aphorism in Rex v. Sussex Justices ([1924] 1 KB 256) aptly applies here: "Justice must not only be done, but must also be seen to be done". Relevant local and foreign judicial precedents which are essentially concentrated on the question of alleging bias are as follows:-

1. Ms. Benazir Bhutto v. The President of Pakistan (1992 SCMR 140). Bias in a Judge is the paralysis, complete or partial, of judicial faculties and therefore the allegation of bias against a Judge would be wholly unfounded unless it be shown that the proceedings held by him were irregular and one-sided or the conclusions reached by him were wrong and reasons given in support thereof erroneous. Bias in judicial matters may be caused by the judgment, order or observations of a Superior Court or it may spring from personal, political, religious, communal, racial, commercial or economic considerations. Ref: Dimes v. The Grand Junction Canal (No.1) and others (1852) H.L.C. 759-794) and Rex v. Sussex Justices (1924) 1 K B 256) and Muhammad Ismail Chowdhury v. Abdul Khaleque Dowdagar and another (PLD 1960 SC (Pak.) 301.

2. Islamic Republic of Pakistan v. Abdul Wali Khan (PLD 1976 SC 57). Mere suspicion of bias, even if it is not unreasonable, is not sufficient to disqualify a Judge. The basis of the disqualification, therefore, is "personal bias or prejudice" of such a nature as would necessarily render a Judge unable to exercise his functions impartially in a particular case and this must be shown as a matter of fact and not merely as a matter of opinion.

3. President v. Shaukat Ali (PLD 1971 SC 585), The mere assertion of bias can never be sufficient to disqualify a Judge in hearing a cause or matter. In the absence of any pecuniary or proprietary interest in the subject-matter of the proceeding, it is essential that a real likelihood of bias must be shown.

4. Government of NWFP v. Dr. Hussain Ahmed Haroon (2003 SCMR 104). It is an age-old fundamental principle of law that justice should not only be done but manifestly and undoubtedly it should seen to have been done. To achieve this objective/ goal it is of prime importance that a Judge/person equipped with the authority of decision should not be having any sort of personal interest in the outcome of the matter under issue before him. The conduct of the proceedings should not generate any reasonable apprehension in the mind of a person that the deciding officer has harboured any grudge or bias against him.

5. Asif Ali Zardari v. The State (PLD 2001 SC 568). The foremost question is what is 'bias' has been described in Corpus Juris Secundum, Volume X pp. 354 and 355. BIAS. Primarily, a diagonal or slant, especially of a seam, cut, or line across a fabric; and so derivatively, a leaning of the mind; a mental predilection or prejudice; anything which turns a man to a particular course; a particular influential power which sways the judgment; a preconceived opinion; a sort of emotion constituting untrustworthy partiality; bent, inclination, prepossession, propension, or tendency, which sways the? mind toward one opinion rather than another; propensity toward an object, not leaving the mind? indifferent. "Bias" has been held synonymous with "partiality," and strictly to be distinguished from "prejudice". Garner on Administrative Law, 4th Edition at page 122 has also attempted to define bias as a disqualification and in such context observed as follows: "Not only is a person affected by an administrative decision entitled to have his case heard by the agency seized with its determination, but he may also insist on his case being heard by a fair Judge, one free from bias. Bias in this context has usually meant that the adjudicator must have no financial interest in the matter under dispute, but it is not necessarily so limited, and allegations of bias have been upheld in circumstances where there was no question of any financial interest."

6. State of Punjab v. Davinder Pal Singh Bhullar (AIR 2012 SC 364). In respect of judicial bias, the statement made by Frank J. of the United States is worth quoting: "If, however, bias' and partiality' be defined to mean the total absence of preconceptions in the mind of the Judge, then no one has ever had a fair trial and no one will. The human mind, even at infancy, is no blank piece of paper. We are born with predispositions…… Much harm is done by the myth that, merely by….. taking the oath of office as a judge, a man ceases to be human and strips himself of all predilections, becomes a passionless thinking machine." The principle in these cases is derived from the legal maxim nemo debet esse judex in causa propria sua. It applies only when the interest attributed is such as to render the case his own cause. This principle is required to be observed by all judicial and quasi-judicial authorities as non-observance thereof, is treated as a violation of the principles of natural justice. (Vide: Rameshwar Bhartia v. The State of Assam, AIR 1952 SC 405; Mineral Development Ltd. v. The State of Bihar and another AIR 1960 SC 468; Meenglas Tea Estate v. The Workmen, AIR 1963 SC 1719; and The Secretary to the Government, Transport Department, Madras v. Munuswamy Mudaliar and others AIR 1988 SC 2232).

7. Gullavalli Negeswararao etc. v. The State of Andhra Pradesh and others (AIR 1959 SC 1376). It is one of the fundamental principles of judicial procedure that the person or persons who are entrusted with the duty of hearing a case judicially should be those who have no personal bias in the matter. In Ranger v. Great Western Ry. Co.(1) Lord Cranworth, L.C., says: 'A judge ought to be, and is supposed to be, indifferent between the parties. He has, or is supposed to have, no bias inducing him to lean to the one side rather than to the other In ordinary cases it is just ground of exception to a judge that he is not indifferent, and the fact that he is himself a party, or interested as a party, affords the strongest proof that he cannot be indifferent."

8. Ranjit Thakur v. Union of India and others (AIR 1987 SC 2386). The test of real likelihood of bias is whether a reasonable person, in possession of relevant information, would have thought that bias was likely and is whether respondent was likely to be disposed to decide the matter only in a particular way. It is the essence of a judgment that it is made after due observance of the judicial process; that the Court or Tribunal passing it observes, at least the minimal requirements of natural justice, is composed of impartial persons acting fairly and without bias and in good faith. A judgment which is the result of bias or want of impartiality is a nullity and the trial "coram non-judice.

9. Bhajan Lal, Chief Minister, Haryana v. Messrs Jindal Strips Ltd. and others (1994) 6 SCC 19. Bias is the second limb of natural justice. Prima facie no one should be a judge in what is to be regarded as 'sua causa', whether or not he is named as a party. The decision-maker should have no interest by way of gain or detriment in the outcome of a proceeding. Interest may take many forms. It may be direct, it may be indirect, it may arise from a personal relationship or from a relationship with the subject-matter, from a close relationship or from a tenuous one.

10. Justice P.D. Dinakaran v. Hon'ble Judges Inquiry Committee (2011) 8 SCC 380. Nemo debet esse judex in propria causa. This principle consists of the rule against bias or interest and is based on three maxims: (i) No man shall be a judge in his own cause; (ii) Justice should not only be done, but manifestly and undoubtedly be seen to be done; and (iii) Judges, like Caesar's wife should be above suspicion. The first requirement of natural justice is that the Judge should be impartial and neutral and must be free from bias... He must be in a position to act judicially and to decide the matter objectively. A Judge must be of sterner stuff. His mental equipoise must always remain firm and undetected. He should not allow his personal prejudice to go into the decision-making.

11. A.K. Kraipak v. Union of India (AIR 1970 SC 150). The real question is not whether he was biased. It is difficult to prove the state of mind of a person. Therefore what we have to see is whether there is reasonable ground for believing that he was likely to have been biased. We agree with the learned Attorney General that a mere suspicion of bias is not sufficient. There must be a reasonable likelihood of bias. In deciding the question of bias we have to take into consideration human probabilities and ordinary course of human conduct.

12. Davidson v. Scottish Ministers [2004] UKHL 34 [House of Lords]. In Porter v Magill [2001] UKHL 67, [2002] 2 AC 357, 494, paragraph 103, my noble and learned friend Lord Hope of Craighead expressed the test in terms accepted by the Second Division and by both parties to this appeal- "The question is whether the fair-minded and informed observer, having considered the facts, would conclude that there was a real possibility that the tribunal was biased."

13. Webb & Hay v. R [1993] HCA 30 [High Court of Australia]. When it is alleged that a judge has been or might be actuated by bias, this Court has held that the proper test is whether the fair-minded people might reasonably apprehend or suspect that the judge has prejudged or might prejudge the case. In considering the merits of the test to be applied in a case where a juror is alleged to be biased, it is important to keep in mind that the appearance as well as the fact of impartiality is necessary to retain confidence in the administration of justice. Both the parties to the case and the general public must be satisfied that justice has not only been done but that it has been seen to be done.

14. R v. Sussex Justices, ex parte McCarthy [1923] All ER 233 [House of Lords]. It was of fundamental importance that justice should not only be done, but that it should also be manifestly seen to be done; the question was not whether the acting clerk, when with the justices, made any observation or offered any criticism which he could not properly make or offer, but whether he was so related to the case by reason of the civil action as to be unfit to act for the justices in the criminal proceedings, and the answer to that question depended, not on what was actually done, but on what might appear to be done; what be did might have created a suspicion that there had been an improper interference with the course of justice; and, therefore, the conviction of the applicant must be quashed.

15. R v. Bow Street Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, ex parte Pinochet Ugarte (No. 2) [1999] 1 All ER 577 [House of Lords]. The contention is that there was a real danger or reasonable apprehension or suspicion that Lord Hoffmann might have been biased, that is to say it is alleged that there is an appearance of bias not actual bias. The fundamental principle is that a man may not be a judge in his own cause. This principle, as developed by the courts, has two very similar but not identical implications. First it may be applied literally: if a judge is in fact a party to the litigation or has a financial or proprietary interest in its outcome then he is indeed sitting as a judge in his own cause. In that case, the mere fact that he is a party to the action or has a financial or proprietary interest in its outcome is sufficient to cause his automatic disqualification. The second application of the principle is where a judge is not a party to the suit and does not have a financial interest in its outcome, but in some other way his conduct or behaviour may give rise to a suspicion that he is not impartial, for example because of his friendship with a party. This second type of case is not strictly speaking an application of the principle that a man must not be judge in his own cause, since the judge will not normally be himself benefiting, but providing a benefit for another by failing to be impartial.

16. Taylor and another v. Lawrence and another [2002] EWCA Civ 90 [Court of Appeal, Civil Division]. For the purpose of applying the test for apparent bias, namely whether in the all the circumstances a fair-minded and informed observer would be led to conclude that there was a real possibility that the tribunal was biased, the informed observer could be expected to be aware of the legal traditions and culture of the English jurisdiction, and accordingly he would be aware that in the ordinary way contacts between the judiciary and the legal profession should not be regarded as giving rise to a possibility of bias.

VII. Doctrine of Natural Justice and Due Process of Law

16. In our history, it was not rare but rather the first murder trial conducted by the High Court, which was unique in that it was decided by a bench of five likeminded judges, including the then Acting Chief Justice, who unanimously agreed to award the death penalty. I am also mindful of the turn of phrase, "the accused is the favourite child of law". The substratum of this concept is based on the farsightedness and prudence that it is better to let a hundred guilty persons be acquitted than to convict one innocent or that it is better to run the risk of sparing the guilty than to condemn the innocent. Reliance is placed on the principles elucidated in my judgment, Muhammad Riaz v. Khurram Shehzad (2024 SCMR 51). The raison detre is to assess and scrutinize whether the police and prosecution have performed their tasks accurately and diligently in apprehending and exposing the actual culprits or whether they dragged innocent persons into the crime due to a defective or botched-up investigation, depriving the victim of justice. The philosophy of this phrase, though, does not imply that the Court should grant any unwarranted favours, indulgences, or preferential treatment to the accused. Rather, it ensures a fair-minded and unbiased sense of justice in all circumstances, as a safety gauge to maintain an evenhanded right of defence and a fair trial, thereby complying with the due process of law and reinforcing the renowned doctrine, "innocent until proven guilty". However, if the prosecution case's background or chronicle is analyzed, it strongly suggests that Mr. Bhutto was not treated as the "favorite child of law" but rather as an "unfavourite child of law".

17. The personal bias, prejudice mind or jaundiced eye of the judges tarnished and contaminated the framework of entire trial and the judgment, which tantamount to grave violation of the principle of natural justice and it also enfeebles the elementary foundation of the administration of justice which is sacrosanct for the faith and conviction of the masses. To enjoy the protection of law and to be treated in accordance with the law is the inalienable right of every citizen. The purpose of Article 4 of the Constitution, is to ascribe and integrate the doctrine of equality before the law or equal protection of the law. No action detrimental to the life and liberty of any person can be taken without due process of law. The principles of natural justice require that the delinquent be afforded a fair opportunity to converge, explain, and contest before being found guilty or condemned without any bias or prejudice of the Courts and judges. The principles of natural justice and the doctrine of due process are not new phenomena but have long been encapsulated as a sacred obligation of every court and tribunal to follow religiously in all matters, whether civil or criminal, to ensure a fair trial. The right to a fair trial has now been explicitly enshrined in our Constitution by virtue of the 18th Constitutional Amendment in the shape of Article 10-A and in case of apparent bias as done in this case, the accused could not expect right to fair trial. [Reference can be made to some judgments authored by me, such as Junaid Wazir v. Superintendent of Police (2024 SCMR 181), Federation of Pakistan v. Zahid Malik (2023 SCMR 603), Usman Ghani v. The Chief Post Master, GPO Karachi (2022 SCMR 745), Capital Development Authority v. Shabir Hussain (2022 SCMR 627), Raja Muhammad Shahid v. The Inspector General of Police (2023 SCMR 1135), Muhammad Yaseen v. Province of Sindh (2024 PLC(C.S.) 111), Government of Balochistan v. Ghulam Rasool (2024 SCMR 1155) and Inspector General of Police, Quetta v. Fida Muhammad (2022 SCMR 1583).

VIII. Evidence of the Approver

18. I cannot ignore another crucial aspect, which is an acid test for considering and appreciating the evidence of an approver: whether their testimony is trustworthy or not. To ensure the safe, effective, and efficient administration of the criminal justice system, certain norms and yardstick are to be followed. The Court must first be satisfied that the testimony of the approver has been adequately corroborated to avoid a conviction based on weak or tainted evidence. Each case has its own facts. No doubt, an approver may be a competent witness, but their evidence requires substantial corroboration regarding the crime, the identity of each accused, and corroboration through independent and reliable evidence. The settled rule of practice is not to convict any accused on the basis of any vicious or venomous investigation. Therefore, the evidence of an approver must be appreciated with great care and caution and not treated as gospel truth. It would not be incongruous to emphasize here that under Section 114 of the Evidence Act, 1872, which is analogous to Article 129 of the Qanun-e-Shahadat Order, 1984, the Court may presume the existence of any fact it considers likely to have happened, having regard to the common course of natural events, human conduct, and public and private business in their relation to the facts of the particular case. However, the illustration provided in clause (b) distinctly conveys "that an accomplice is unworthy of credit, unless he is corroborated in material particulars", an important factor that was also not considered when giving credence to the evidence of the approver.

IX. Confirmation of Death Sentence

19. If the death sentence is awarded to an accused by the Court of Session, the proceedings must be submitted to the High Court under Section 374, Cr.P.C., and the sentence cannot be executed unless confirmed by the High Court. Under Section 376, Cr.P.C., when a murder reference is submitted by the Court of Session under Section 374, the High Court may confirm the sentence, or pass any other sentence warranted by law, or may annul the conviction, and convict the accused of any offence of which the Sessions Court might have convicted him, or order a new trial on the same or an amended charge, or may acquit the accused person, provided that no order of confirmation shall be made until the period allowed for preferring an appeal has expired, or, if an appeal is presented within such period, until such appeal is disposed of. For all intent and purposes, one thing is clear beyond any shadow of doubt: confirmation of a death sentence by the High Court is only required if the punishment is awarded by the Court of Session and a murder reference is submitted to comply with the letter of law. However, in this case, the death penalty was awarded by a five-member bench of the High Court, so there was no need for confirmation by any lower, or similar, or even larger bench of the same High Court. According to the exactitudes of Section 374, Cr.P.C., a murder reference may be sent by the Court of Session for confirmation, and the role of the High Court as provided under Section 376 Cr.P.C. cannot be read in isolation. It is contingent upon the murder reference sent by the Court of Session for confirmation under Section 374, Cr.P.C. Since the murder trial was conducted by the High Court itself, which was undoubtedly a rare example, no further confirmation was required upon conviction by the High Court, in accordance with the provisions of Section 376, Cr.P.C.

X. Right of Appeal

20. Had the murder trial been conducted by the Court of Session and the death penalty awarded, Mr. Bhutto could have appealed before a divisional bench of the Lahore High Court. However, since the trial was conducted by the High Court itself, his right to appeal in the High Court was forfeited. To address such situations, the framers of the Constitution wisely provided for a direct appeal to the Supreme Court under sub-article (2) (b) of Article 185 of the Constitution in cases where the High Court withdraws a case for trial before itself from a subordinate court and convicts the accused. Likewise, the prerequisites of the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court are further delineated in the sub-article (3) of Article 185, which states that an appeal to the. Supreme Court from a judgment decree, order, or sentence of a High Court in a case to which clause (2) does not apply shall lie only if the Supreme Court grants leave to appeal. What normally happens? When the death penalty awarded by the Court of Session is confirmed by the High Court in a murder reference and the appeal of the convict is dismissed by the High Court while maintaining the judgment awarding the death penalty, the Supreme Court, in order to ensure the safe administration of justice, typically grants leave to appeal and provides ample opportunity for hearing in order to reevaluate and revisit whether the death penalty is rightly awarded or not. However, in the case of Mr. Bhutto, due to the direct appeal being preferred in the Supreme Court, at least one sure-shot expected right of appeal with the leave of this Court was lost, and the solitary remedy or opportunity that remained in the playing field was to move a review petition alone after dismissal of Appeal by this Court.

XI. Interviews in Print and Electronic Media

21. Last but not least, the reference sent by the President of Pakistan is also structured and unfolded in paragraph 9, where the late Justice Nasim Hasan Shah, former Chief Justice of Pakistan, in his interviews on print and electronic media, admitted that the decision regarding Mr. Bhutto's appeal was made under coercion. This admission leaves no doubt in the mind of a sane and prudent person that it was a judicial murder and such admission constitutes a violation of his oath. According to the chronicles, J. Nasim Hasan Shah was appointed as an Ad Hoc Judge of the Supreme Court on 18.05.1977. The Lahore High Court delivered its judgment against Mr. Bhutto on 18.03.1978; the Supreme Court decided his appeal on 06.02.1979; the review petition was dismissed on 24.03.1979; and to close the chapter, the death penalty was executed on 04.04.1979. J. Nasim Hasan Shah retired on 14.04.1994, but was first interviewed by journalist Mr. Suhail Warraich in 1996, which interview was published in Jang Magazine. Another journalist/ host, Mr. Iftikhar Ahmed, interviewed him on 03.12.2003 for his TV show, aired on Geo TV Network. After laying down the robes of his office, his conscience awakened and forced him to make disclosures through print and electronic media. In both interviews, J. Nasim Hasan Shah revealed his own views and some other relevant facts. Though he retired in April 1994, he made certain revelations years later that added fuel to the fire and were also incorporated in the Presidential Reference as eye-openers. The remorse, confession, or admission of wrongness in the decision came much after the die was cast. It is quite a common phenomenon that poetry or its verses have multiple meanings, interpretations, or even double entendres, but quite fitting for the belated disclosures made in the interview under discussion, I wish to dedicate the following rhymes of the famous poet Dagh Dehlvi, which seems to match the situation:

22. According to the manuscript and DVD produced in Court during the hearing of this Reference, J. Nasim Hasan Shah expressed regret over the decision and admitted that Mr. Bhutto's punishment could have been reduced. He also revealed that some of the judges were under external pressure. J. Nasim Hasan Shah confessed in an interview with Iftikhar Ahmed, televised on Geo TV's programme "Jawab De". According to the gist of the interview, J. Nasim Hasan Shah stated that it was J. Maulvi Mushtaq Hussain's unjustness (zyaadati), as he was a very strong person and an enemy of Mr. Bhutto. He said that it would have been better if he had not been on the case. When the host asked if he still could have written a dissenting note, J. Nasim Hasan Shah replied in the affirmative, but explained that there was some weakness on his part as well as on the part of Mr. Bhutto's chief defense attorney, Mr. Yahya Bakhtiar, as the latter had somewhat annoyed the judges. The host further pointed out that while Mr. Yahya Bakhtiar might have annoyed the judges, J. Nasim Hasan Shah himself admitted that Mr. Bhutto should have received the benefit of doubt. J. Nasim Hasan Shah again responded in the affirmative. The host then asked if Pakistan's history would have been different today had he written a dissenting note, to which J. Nasim Hasan Shah responded that he does not know if it would have been different, but at least Mr. Bhutto's life might have been spared. He expressed regret about the situation, noting that Mr. Yahya Bakhtiar seemed unwilling to argue against the sentence or mitigating circumstances. Mr. Nasim Hasan Shah said that, as a human, a certain level of detachment occurs, but the role of the lawyer is to win the judge's favor, and in this case, the counsel had annoyed the judges. The disclosures made in the interview, though belated, not only blew the whistle on the biases involved but also pierced the veil of the entire trial and conviction, exposing blatant violations of fair trial principles with the complicity of the judges conducting the trial.

XII. Mitigating Circumstances

23. A judge is not supposed to be influenced by appeasement or flattery, nor should they harbor malice or venom against any party while discharging their sacred duty of imparting o justice in accordance with the law. The conversion of a death penalty into life imprisonment does not equate to a clean chit for the convict; the punishment remains intact, albeit with a modified quantum. It is astonishing that, according to aforementioned interview excerpt, the judges of this Court, while hearing the appeal of Mr. Bhutto, were anxiously waiting for arguments on the quantum of sentence but felt annoyed by the counsel for the appellant. The tolerance and forbearance of judges must not be so fragile or touchy as to make them easily annoyed during the hearing of a case, which is a sacred duty and trust. If a judge becomes annoyed with a litigant or their advocate in an unruly manner and loses their patience, control, or peace of mind, it becomes difficult for them to impart justice in accordance with the law. Therefore, judges should remain calm, be good listeners, and instead of arguing themselves, which is the core function of lawyers, they must allow lawyers the opportunity to present their cases and arguments. According to the details of the interview, the judges hearing the appeal were annoyed, and if this was so, then of course, the possibility of an independent application of mind was remote. Decisions made in haste or anger are not only contrary to the basic norms of justice under the law of the land, but also violate the standards set forth in the injunctions of Islam for the administration of justice. Normally, in appeals filed before the Supreme Court in cases where the High Court has confirmed the death penalty, this Court, in order to ensure the safe administration of justice, not only grants leave but, at times, considers mitigating 'circumstances, altering the punishment without specific arguments. Sometimes, the Court even hints at this line of argument.

24. In the judgment of the Review Petition Zulfikar Ali Bhutto v. The State (PLD 1979 Supreme Court 741), this Court recorded submissions by Mr. Yahya Bakhtiar that, even if the petitioner's conviction were maintained, it was a fit case for the lesser penalty under Section 302 of the P.P.C., read with Sections 109 and 111, as the petitioner was guilty only of abetment and was not present at the scene of the murder. However, these arguments were conveniently set aside on the ground that they had not been raised during the hearing of the appeal. It was further articulated in the judgment of the review petition that during the hearing of the appeal the question of sentence was very much present before the Court, and it was the duty of the learned counsel for the petitioner to raise such points during that time, but the counsel was more focused on seeking acquittal than pleading for mitigation of the sentence.

25. In my opinion, almost in all cases where appeals are filed against confirmation of the death penalty, no advocate directly requests a conversion of the sentence to life imprisonment. Instead, they strive for a fair acquittal for their client, which is the professional duty of every lawyer. Simultaneously, the appellate Court, with its sense of right and wrong, always has inherent jurisdiction to affirm, set aside, or modify sentences. Even when dismissing an appeal and maintaining a conviction, the Court may alter or convert the sentence from death to life, or to a lesser punishment, to do complete justice, particularly when the punishment does not seem commensurate with the gravity of the charge, the role attributed to the convict, or in cases of doubt that a maximum punishment may not be justified. Despite the established bias and grave violations of natural justice and due process in the trial and conviction, the punishment in this case was maintained. The matter did not end here, but the Court also missed the train and failed to consider mitigating circumstances, despite overwhelming material on record which could have justified an acquittal or, at the very least, a conversion of the death penalty to life imprisonment. This omission was quite tragic, atrocious, and reprehensible.

26. Though this Court rendered its opinion on 06.03.2024, almost after 13 years, it may be said, better late than never. In my view, there was no plausible justification to delay the opinion on the Presidential Reference. I am at a loss as to why it was preserved in cold storage, left hanging, and why the hearing was not commenced immediately when the questions were framed by the respected bench of this Court. Anyhow, . It is an essential limb of civil and criminal administration of justice that "justice delayed is justice denied," which virtually means that cases, whatever they may be, should not be delayed or protracted indefinitely. Courts should decide matters within a reasonable period of time, as unjustified delays can emasculate fairness and render justice inconsequential or of little worth to the parties involved. On the other hand, another maxim, "justice hurried is justice buried," also has far-reaching implications, accentuating that undue haste or a compromise on natural justice and .due process may also prejudice the rights of the parties. In such situations, the possibility of injustice cannot be ruled out. The best course to avoid the adverse consequences of both the aforesaid legal aphorisms is to maintain a proper balance in the court docket, with a measured pace. More importantly, cases should not be delayed purposefully due to their profile or significance, as happened with this Reference, which awaited its long-pending turn for an opinion.

XIII. Doctrine of repentance

27. Another important factor that cannot be overlooked is that Question No. 4 of the Presidential Reference framed by this Court had a direct nexus with the doctrine of repentance. For ease of reference, it is reproduced as under: -

"Whether the decision in the case of murder trial against Shaheed Zulfiqar Ali Bhutto fulfills the requirements of Islamic laws as codified in the Holy Quran and the Sunnah of the Holy Prophet (SAW)? If so, whether present case is covered by doctrine of repentance specifically mentioned in the following Suras of Holy Quran:

(a) Sura Al-Nisa: verses 17 and 18 Sura Al-Baqara: verses 159, 160 and 222 Sura Al-Maida: verse 39 Sura Al-Aaraaf: verse 153 Sura Al-Nehal verse 119 Sura Al-Taha: verse 82 as well as (b) Sunan Ibn-e-Maaja, Chapter 171, Hadith No. 395.

What are effects and consequences of doctrine Re: Repentance"

28. No opinion was rendered by this Court on Question No. 4, which was left unanswered for the valid reason that no assistance was provided on this question. Since this question on the doctrine of repentance was framed with reference to various verses of. the Holy Quran, forming a substantial segment of the Presidential Reference, I feel it should not remain untouched or unanswered. Repentance is expressed in Arabic as "taubah," which is a fundamental precept of the teachings of Islam. It involves the confession of sins, remorse for past wrongdoings, and a pledge to refrain from them in the future. Islam prescribes that repentance entails giving up the sin immediately, regretting what happened in the past, resolving not to go back to sinning, restoring others' rights or property, and fepenting before the agony of death [Ref: https://islamaa.infoien/answers/14289/how-to-repent-in-islam#:]. One of the wisdoms of repentance is that the believer experiences real regret and turns to Allah without wasting any time and strives not to repeat that mistake. Therefore, he repents in a true and sincere manner. He repents and keeps his word that he will remain on the right path until the end of his life [Ref: https://www.arabnews.pk/islam-perspectiveinews/841561]. Allama Ibn al-Shami, a renowned jurist, stated that Muslims should emulate the Prophet's example by following his teachings, and should not try hard to find wrongdoings. We must also strive to protect the excellent reputation of the Last Messenger of Almighty Allah and abide by what he did, accepting the repentance of one who repents. As he emphasized, "it is not for us to impose punishments and other means of deterrence on the basis of our personal inclinations. Rather, we are bound to act on what appears to be the law of our Prophet (peace and blessings of Allah be upon him)" [Ref: Zubair Saeed Sabri v. The State (PLD 2024 SC 681)].

29. The unresolved question in my introspection is why the question regarding the doctrine of repentance was framed by this Court? Who had to or has to repent for the unfair and biased trial? Was it the departed souls who tried the case in the High Court? Those who heard the appeal and review? The bench that entertained and framed the question? Or the bench members who rendered their opinion years after the Reference was instituted? This Court unanimously noted various lapses and biases in the High Court's murder trial, ultimately concluding that the proceedings of the trial by the Lahore High Court and the appeal by the Supreme Court failed to meet the constitutional requirements of a fair trial and due process enshrined in Articles 4, 9, and later guaranteed as a separate and independent fundamental right under Article 10A of the Constitution. In my view, not only it demonstrates some sought of remorse though not explicitly articulated but it also implies a recognition of repentance for the failure to ensure a fair trial and due process, even as Question No. 4 of the Presidential Reference remains unanswered or undecided.

30. I wrap up this opinion with the poignant verses of Mirza Ghalib (Mirza Asadullah Baig khan):

31. The office is directed to report this opinion through proper channel to the worthy President of Pakistan in terms of Article 186 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan.

ORDER

Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J.– We note that the instant petition is barred by a delay of 204 days. The accompanying application for condonation of delay fails to disclose any sufficient cause that justifies condoning such an inordinate delay.

2. Moreover, we observe that the judgment of the Lahore High Court, Lahore dated 27.05.2021 challenged in the earlier round before this Court merely held that the intra-court appeal ("ICA") filed by the petitioner institution before the High Court was not maintainable in terms of Section 3(2) of the Law Reforms Ordinance, 1972, as an appeal was provided under the Federal Public Service Commission Ordinance, 1977 against the original order. In simple terms, if the law dealing with the original proceedings offers a remedy of appeal, revision, or review, then the right to file an ICA before the High Court is barred. It is immaterial whether the aggrieved person actually availed that remedy or not; what matters is the legal availability of such remedy under the law.[1] This conclusion was upheld by this Court through the impugned order, now under review, dated 19.09.2023.

3. In the above facts, we are of the considered view that the instant petition is not only hopelessly time barred but also frivolous and vexatious.

[1] Syed Asif Raza v. Pakistan International Airlines PLD 2001 SC 182.

> This Court has recently affirmed that, while the right of access to courts is a cornerstone of our constitutional framework, it is not an unqualified or limitless right.[2] Such access must be exercised with responsibility and in a manner that upholds the dignity and finality of judicial proceedings. When litigants, such as the petitioner institution before us, initiate repetitive and meritless petitions, they erode the integrity of the judicial process. Frivolous litigation not only clogs judicial dockets but also drains public resources and delays justice for genuine litigants. This becomes more concerning when such frivolous claims are filed by government or public statutory functionaries like the petitioner institution, who are expected to act with higher responsibility and to protect, rather than squander, public resources and judicial time.

4. When public bodies initiate litigation, they do so not as private litigants pursuing personal interests, but as custodians of the law and fiduciaries of the public interest. They are under an onerous obligation to act fairly, responsibly, and in accordance with the Constitution. The petitioner institution ought to have exercised greater legal discipline and internal scrutiny before invoking the jurisdiction of this Court. This case exemplifies a gross misuse of the judicial forum, initiated not to seek legitimate relief, but rather to harass and exhaust the opposing party through abuse of process. In these circumstances, not only is the petition dismissed, but costs are imposed to mark the Court's disapproval of such conduct and to deter the recurrence of similar misuse by public authorities.[3] The Court further directs that the concerned institution shall undertake an internal inquiry to identify and hold accountable the officials responsible for authorizing the filing of this petition. Only through such institutional self-correction can public bodies restore public confidence, reduce the burden of unnecessary litigation, conserve precious state resources, and fulfil their constitutional mandate with integrity.

5. This Court notes with grave concern that the present petition, filed by a statutory public institution, is not only legally untenable and devoid of merit, but also reflective of a deeper, disturbing culture of risk-averse governance. Increasingly, public officers, driven by a misplaced fear of personal liability, resort to filing petitions before the highest court of the land not on the strength of legal grounds but to insulate themselves from accountability. Such conduct reduces the judicial forum from a platform for genuine legal address to a tool of bureaucratic self-preservation and indecision. This mindset must be deprecated in the strongest terms. Litigation is not a substitute for responsible administrative decision-making. Public institutions must be strong and confident enough to make lawful decisions and stand by them. A culture built on fear and undue accountability only weakens the institutional spine of governance. It is imperative that public bodies cultivate the legal courage and internal discipline to act decisively. In institutional strength lies the strength of the nation. The present petition exemplifies not only a gross abuse of judicial process but also a troubling abdication of institutional responsibility. Courts are not to be approached mechanically or defensively, especially by those entrusted with public functions and legal stewardship. In these circumstances, the petition is dismissed with exemplary costs, to mark this Court's disapproval and to deter the continuation of such irresponsible and obstructive practices by public bodies.

6. Accordingly, the instant petition is dismissed with costs of Rs.100,000/- (Rupees One Hundred Thousand only), imposed under Order XXVIII, Rule 3 of the Supreme Court Rules, 1980, for not only being frivolous, vexatious and having squandered the valuable time of the Court but also reflective of institutional abdication and poor governance. The costs shall be deposited within fifteen (15) days with any charitable institution recognized under the Thirteenth Schedule to the Income Tax Ordinance, 2001. Proof of such deposit must be placed on the record of this case. In the event of non-compliance, the office shall place the matter before the appropriate Bench for further orders.

7. Let a copy of this order be sent to the Secretary, Ministry of Law and Justice as well as the Office of the Attorney-General for Pakistan who shall ensure its immediate circulation to all Ministries and their attached departments. The legal wings of these public bodies must take serious stock of the concerns expressed herein and initiate concrete measures to stem the tide of wasteful and meritless litigation. It is imperative that institutional litigation be guided by legal merit, not fear or self-preservation. This practice must be decisively brought to an end.

(Against the order dated 09.07.2019 passed by the Punjab Service Tribunal, Lahore in Appeal No.872/2019)

District & Sessions Judge (Authority), Jhang, etc.

Versus

Ghulam Shabbir

For the petitioner(s): Mr. Khalid Masood Ghani, ASC. For the respondent(s): Mr. Sher Aman, ASC.
Assisted by: Mr. Umer A. Ranjha, Judicial Law Clerk, Supreme Court of Pakistan.

Date of hearing: 07.05.2025.

JUDGMENT

Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J.– The current constitutional era has been termed as the age of proportionality.[1] Briefly stated, on allegations of misconduct and corruption, disciplinary proceedings were initiated against the respondent while he was serving as an Ahlmad (court record keeper) in the District Courts, Jhang under the Punjab Civil Servants (Efficiency and Discipline) Rules, 1999 ("Rules"). The Senior Civil Judge was appointed as an Inquiry Officer who served a charge-sheet upon the respondent alleging as follows:

> "That on 4.6.2018 you accused/respondent received Rs: 100.000/- (one lac) Bank Al-Barka Cheque No.20437925 dated 7.7.2018 and Rs. 150,000/- (one lac fifty thousand) vide cheque No.20437926 which were deposited in your account and withdrawn by you as bribe for getting recruited the relatives of the complainant and on 16.7.2018 you also received an amount Rs. 130,000/- as such bribe in front of Mr. Ahmad Ali Shahzad Bhatti and Rana Dilbar Hussain Khan advocates"

2. The Inquiry Officer in his report dated 06.10.2018 found the respondent guilty of the charges and recommended the imposition of a major penalty of dismissal from service. The competent authority, i.e., District & Sessions Judge, concurred with the findings of the Inquiry Officer and imposed the major penalty of dismissal from service upon the respondent vide order dated 17.10.2018. Aggrieved, the respondent filed a departmental appeal before the Lahore High Court, Lahore, on the administrative side, which was not decided within the statutory period and remained pending. Thereafter the respondent filed an appeal before the Punjab Service Tribunal, Lahore, ("Tribunal"), which was partially allowed vide order dated 09.07.2019 ("impugned order"). The Tribunal observed as follows:

1 See Vicki C Jackson, 'Constitutional Law in the Age of Proportionality' (2015) 124 Yale LJ 3094.

> "After going through the record, it has been noticed that the appellant was afforded opportunity of personal hearing by the inquiry officer and the Authority in a fair manner but the fact remains that the appellant failed to dislodge the charges leveled against him. It has also come on record that after receiving two cheques in the presence of Ahmad Ali Shahzad & Rana Dilbar Hussain, Advocates, appellant could not succeed in getting recruited his relatives and refused to return the bribe amount. Furthermore, during personal hearing before the Authority/D&SJ, Jhang appellant did not deny the allegations leveled against him and took the plea that he has not received the disputed amount as bribe rather he has borrowed the same from complainant and sought for a lenient view."
> (emphasis supplied)

The Tribunal, after holding that the charges stood proved against the respondent, further observed that the punishment of dismissal from service did not appear to be proportionate to the gravity of the misconduct. Without assigning any reasons, it proceeded to convert the major penalty of dismissal from service into the lesser penalty of forfeiture of two years of service. It is pertinent to note that the respondent has not assailed the said order before this Court.

3. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties at length and have carefully examined the impugned order, the applicable law, and the record of the case.

4. The question that arises for determination is whether the Tribunal was justified in converting the major penalty of dismissal from service of the respondent into a lesser penalty of forfeiture of two years of service, in the circumstances of the case, and after having found that the charges of misconduct and corruption against the respondent stood proved.

5. The Tribunal without explicitly mentioning it, has relied upon the principle of proportionality to reduce the penalty imposed on the respondent. At its core, the principle of proportionality requires that when an administrative authority exercises discretionary power, it must strike a fair balance between the adverse effects of its decision on the rights, liberties, or interests of individuals and the legitimate aim or purpose the decision seeks to achieve.[2] A more refined version of the principle of proportionality analysis adopts a structured[3], four-stage test[4], requiring courts to address the following questions to determine whether an impugned measure is constitutionally or legally justifiable. It includes: (i) Legitimacy: Does the action pursue a legitimate objective recognized by law? (ii) Suitability (Rational Connection): Is the measure capable of achieving that objective, i.e., is there a rational nexus between the means employed and the aim pursued? (iii) Necessity: Could the same objective have been achieved through a less restrictive or less onerous alternative? and (iv) Proportionality stricto sensu (Balancing): Does the measure maintain a fair balance between the severity of its impact on the individual and the importance of the public interest it serves?

6. The principle of proportionality also finds firm footing within our constitutional framework, particularly in Article 4 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973, which guarantees that to enjoy the protection of law and to be treated in accordance with law is the inalienable right of every citizen; Article 14, which affirms the inviolable dignity of person; and Article 25 which safeguards against discrimination. These provisions collectively impose a duty upon the courts to ensure that executive or disciplinary measures not only pursue lawful objectives but do so in a manner that is just, fair, and proportionate.

7. In disciplinary jurisprudence, proportionality maintains a delicate balance between public and private rights. While civil servants are entitled to procedural fairness and protection from arbitrary sanctions, these rights must be balanced against the compelling public interest in maintaining the integrity and accountability of public institutions.[5] In our view, the principle of proportionality at its most functional level ultimately hinges on a singular, decisive question: whether the interference with private rights is justified by a corresponding and weighty public interest. This balancing offers a structured framework for assessing the sustainability of disciplinary penalties. The penalty imposed must be evaluated not in isolation, but in relation to the degree of harm caused to the public interest and the severity of intrusion upon the private rights of the officer. A constitutionally and administratively sustainable penalty is one that serves a legitimate public objective without inflicting excessive or unnecessary harm upon individual rights. The test is not merely whether discipline is warranted, but whether the measure adopted strikes a fair and reasonable equilibrium between the legitimate aims of the institution and the human dignity of the individual. Accordingly, the principle of proportionality, in its clearest form may be said to rest on the following standard: The action taken achieves a necessary public goal without causing disproportionate harm to private interest.

8. The principle of proportionality, now widely recognized across constitutional systems, offers significant benefits by promoting structured, transparent, and reasoned decision-making in rights adjudication. This structured approach disciplines judicial discretion, enhances accountability, and fosters a culture of justification, where power must be exercised with reasons. However, the principle is not without risks. When applied without rigor or adequate explanation, it can become a mask for judicial subjectivity, enabling courts to substitute their personal preferences under the guise of balancing. If detached from clear normative anchors or applied inconsistently, proportionality may erode legal certainty and allow disguised arbitrariness. Thus, while proportionality strengthens constitutional adjudication when properly employed, its misuse can undermine the very values it seeks to uphold. A disproportionate decision may also violate the rule of law.[6]

9. In the present case, the charge of corruption against the respondent, serving as an Ahlmad (court record keeper), a role central to preserving the integrity and fairness of the judicial process, has been unequivocally proven. Significantly, the respondent has not challenged the findings of the Tribunal before this Court. The importance of an Ahlmad to the functioning of a fair and just judicial system cannot be overstated. When court officials engage in misconduct, whether by accepting bribes or abusing their position, they do not merely tarnish individual cases; they strike at the very foundation of public confidence in the administration of justice. Judicial service is not merely a profession, it is a public trust. [7] An Ahlmad proven to be involved in corruption can irreparably damage the administration of justice, undermining public confidence in the justice system and tainting the credibility of the decisions it delivers. In such a context, the imposition of the penalty of dismissal from service is not only legitimate but necessary to protect public trust and uphold the rule of law. However, the Tribunal has reduced the penalty of the respondent to forfeiture of two years of service describing the original penalty as "grave and harsh" without offering any cogent reasons or legal justification.

10. We note that the impugned order states:

> The charges leveled against the appellant stand proved but at the same time, I have come to the conclusion that awarding punishment of dismissal from service does not seem to be palatable to the gravity of guilt he deserves a second chance."[8]

While this conclusion may reflect a compassionate approach, the application of the principle of proportionality cannot rest on bare assertions or subjective impressions. Rather, it is a structured principle that demands cogent reasoning and a transparent, systematic evaluation of the nature, gravity, and context of the established misconduct, assessed against the penalty imposed.[9] In the absence of a clear, structured, and transparent justification, the Tribunal cannot simply conclude that a penalty is excessive based on personal belief or an undefined sense of fairness. Instead, the Tribunal was duty-bound to evaluate how the penalty served the public interest in safeguarding judicial integrity, and whether it maintained a proportionate balance with the individual's rights. In this case, where the respondent's misconduct involved accepting substantial sums through multiple cheques in exchange for illegal favours, a fact support by credible evidence and unconvincingly rebutted by the respondent, the public interest in accountability is overriding. The respondent's defense that the payments were merely loans is unsupported by evidence and contradicted by his own admissions during the personal hearing. When assessed through the lens of the structured proportionality framework, the Tribunal's order does not withstand scrutiny. We, therefore, find that the Tribunal's decision to substitute the major penalty of dismissal with forfeiture of two years of service fails the proportionality test.

11. Accordingly, we set aside the impugned order passed by the Tribunal. The major penalty of dismissal from service, imposed by the competent authority vide order dated 17.10.2018, is hereby restored. Resultantly, this petition is converted into an appeal and allowed.

JUDGMENT

Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J.- "Children are not the people of tomorrow; they are people today. They have a right to be taken seriously."[1]

Brief facts

The present review petition arises out of a custody dispute concerning two children, A and B[2], aged eight and seven years, respectively. The proceedings were initially instituted by respondent No. 1 (mother), who filed an application for custody before the Senior Civil Judge (Family Division), Layyah. The said application was dismissed vide order dated 14.07.2023; however, a visitation schedule was framed to facilitate meetings between respondent No. 1 and her children. Aggrieved, both parties[3] filed separate appeals before the learned Additional District Judge, Layyah. Vide judgment dated 25.04.2024, the appellate court allowed the appeal filed by respondent No.1 (mother) and granted her custody of the children, and maintained a visitation arrangement for the petitioner (father), while dismissing his appeal. The petitioner then filed a constitutional petition before the Lahore High Court, Multan, which was dismissed vide judgment dated 24.05.2024. A civil petition for leave to appeal under Article 185(3) of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution"), was preferred before this Court, which was dismissed vide order dated 18.07.2024 ("impugned order"). The present petition seeks review of the impugned order.

Review and Child Justice

2. While fully mindful of the limited scope of our review jurisdiction[4], we deemed it necessary to revisit the matter in light of two foundational principles enshrined in the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child[5] ("CRC"): Article 3, which mandates that the best interests of the child shall be a primary consideration in all actions concerning them; and Article 12, which guarantees every child the right to express their views freely in all matters affecting them, with due weight given in accordance with their age and maturity. The earlier proceedings regrettably failed to provide the children an opportunity to be heard, an omission that undermines both domestic constitutional protections and our international commitments. Given the central importance of a child's voice in

5 The United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child ("CRC") was adopted on 20 November 1989. In interpreting the Articles of CRC and in particular Articles 3 and 12 of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC) constitute foundational pillars of child-centered justice, requiring that in all actions concerning children, their best interests shall be a primary consideration and that children capable of forming their own views shall be heard and those views given due weight in accordance with age and maturity. These principles are not to be applied in isolation but are to be interpreted in the light of the broader international legal framework that operationalizes and reinforces them. General Comment No. 14 (2013) provides authoritative guidance on the application of Article 3, offering a structured approach to determining and balancing best interests in judicial proceedings, while General Comment No. 12 (2009) elaborates the procedural and substantive dimensions of Article 12, affirming that the right to be heard is not merely formal but must be meaningful, safe, and age-appropriate. These general comments are complemented by instruments such as the UN Guidelines on Justice in Matters involving Child Victims and Witnesses of Crime (2005), the Guidelines for the Alternative Care of Children (2009), and regional conventions including the European Convention on the Exercise of Children's Rights (1996) and the African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child (1990), all of which underscore the legal and moral imperative to integrate the child's voice and best interests in every decision affecting them. Courts, therefore, are under a binding obligation, both moral and legal to embed these interpretive tools in their reasoning, thereby transforming child justice from a paternalistic paradigm to one that upholds the agency, dignity, and evolving capacities of the child.

custody determinations, we found it imperative to re-examine the case to ensure that these rights are not only acknowledged but meaningfully upheld. To rectify this oversight and to ensure that the children's welfare and perspectives were given due consideration, this Court deemed it necessary to interact directly with both children involved. The interaction enabled the Bench to make an independent assessment of their emotional well-being, level of comfort, and expressed preferences.

The journey from the Guardian and Wards Act, 1890 to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, 1989

3. As a contextual background, we emphasize that Section 17[6] of the Guardians and Wards Act, 1890 ("Act") provides that, in appointing a guardian, the court shall be guided by what "appears in the circumstances to be for the welfare of the minor". While this provision rightly places "welfare" at the center of the determination[7], it operates within a framework that is broadly discretionary, adult- centric, and lacking in normative clarity. Rooted in colonial legislative thought, the concept of "welfare" under this Act has often been applied in an arbitrary and paternalistic manner, devoid of structured criteria or meaningful inclusion of the child's own perspective. The journey from the Act to the CRC represents a profound philosophical transformation in the domain of child justice, from a paternalistic, adult-driven notion of "welfare" to a rights-based, participatory understanding of the "best interests of the child." Under the colonial-era framework, the child was largely viewed as an object of adult protection, with minimal recognition of their evolving capacities, autonomy, or voice. While the child's welfare was nominally a guiding principle, it remained vague and was frequently interpreted through the subjective lens of what adults, typically courts or guardians assumed to be appropriate, without affording the child an opportunity to be heard. In stark contrast, the CRC revolutionized this paradigm by anchoring child justice in the principles of dignity, autonomy, and participation. Articles 3 and 12 of the CRC collectively reinforce the child's right to life, equality, protection, and most crucially participation. Article 3 requires that the best interests of the child be a primary consideration in all actions concerning them.[8] This is not a vague or aspirational goal; it is a structured legal standard demanding a comprehensive, child-centered assessment that incorporates the child's emotional, psychological, developmental, and relational needs, alongside considerations of safety and long-term well-being. Complementing this, Article 12 mandates that every child capable of forming their own views has the right to express those views freely in all matters affecting them, and that those views must be given due weight in accordance with their age and maturity.[9] This shift from "welfare" to "best interests" and from silence to participation marks a fundamental transformation in the philosophy of child justice, it reframes the child not as a passive recipient of adult decisions, but as an active rights-holder whose voice must be heard and respected. While the terms "welfare" and "best interests" may occasionally overlap in practice, they are not synonymous. The former often reflects subjective adult assumptions, whereas the latter is grounded in objective legal principles that prioritize the rights, agency, and holistic well-being of the child. The CRC thus replaces a discretionary and protective approach with a rights-based and participatory one mandating not only the protection of the child but also their meaningful inclusion in decisions that shape their lives.

4. In this light, Section 17 of the Act, must be interpreted through the lens of the CRC and the doctrine of updating construction of statutes. This interpretive approach empowers courts to move beyond archaic conceptions of "welfare" and adopt a rights-based framework that gives full effect to the dignity, agency, and voice of the child. To harmonize Section 17 with the CRC, the term "welfare" must not be understood in isolation. Instead, it must be interpreted within the CRC's normative framework, thereby transforming the concept into one that is inclusive, participatory, and rights-affirming. While "welfare" is a broader, more traditional term, and "best interests" it's more structured and contemporary legal counterpart, the two are not irreconcilable. Through a dynamic interpretation of "welfare" using the doctrine of updating construction, courts can incorporate the core elements of the best interest's standard, most notably, the child's right to participation. Such an interpretation not only aligns domestic law with Pakistan's international obligations but also with its constitutional values, notably the rights to life, dignity, equality, and the protection of childhood, as guaranteed under Articles 9, 14, 25, and 34 of the Constitution. Though Section 17 was enacted in a different era, it must now be read as a "living" provision. The principle that statutes extends to new circumstances has evolved into the modern doctrine of updating construction.[10] Given that continuous statutory revision is rarely feasible and societies often function under inherited laws, courts operate on the presumption that legislation is "always speaking", meant to apply in evolving social and legal contexts.[11] This interpretive approach ensures that statutes remain effective and aligned with contemporary values, including shifting constitutional and human rights norms. The phrase "welfare of the minor" can no longer be confined to its colonial-era meaning. Instead, it must be enriched by the modern, internationally recognized concept of the best interests of the child, as codified in Article 3 of the CRC, to which Pakistan is a State Party.[12] The "welfare" standard is thus not static, it is a living standard that encompasses a child's emotional, psychological, cultural, and developmental needs, extending far beyond material well-being or parental preference. Moreover, the right of the child to be heard, as guaranteed by Article 12 of the CRC, must also be read into the application of Section 17. Any genuine assessment of the child's welfare or best interests is incomplete without ensuring the child's meaningful participation in the proceedings, appropriate to their age and maturity.[13] By interpreting Section 17 in this harmonized manner, consistent with both international obligations and constitutional values, courts affirm that the provision requires not only an objective inquiry into what serves the child's welfare but also a procedural obligation to hear the child and give due consideration to their voice. This interpretive approach ensures that even a law as old as the Act remains a relevant and effective tool for delivering justice that is sensitive to the rights and realities of children today. To interpret it otherwise would be to render the statute obsolete, unfit for the constitutional and child-rights-informed present.

Voice of the Child

5. We underline that a child must be heard so that her best interests can be properly understood and protected. The participation of a child in legal prcoeedings is not a formality; it is fundamental to a justice system that respects the dignity and agency of the child. Listening to the voice of a child gives them a sense of worth, inclusion, and trust in the judicial process. As clarified in the UN General Comment No. 12, the views of the child must be seriously considered, not merely acknowledged.[14] Listening to a child does not mean obeying them, but rather understanding their perspective deeply enough to act in their best interests.[15]

Child Justice – Integrating CRC Principles and the Constitution

6. The principles enshrined in Articles 3 and 12 of the CRC, the primacy of the child's best interests and the right to be heard find clear constitutional resonance in Articles 9, 14, 25 and 34 of the Constitution. Article 9 guarantees the right to life, which includes the right to a healthy, secure, and meaningful life. Article 14 protects the inherent dignity of every person, including children. Article 25 enshrines equality before the law and non- discrimination, and Article 34 obligates the State to ensure the protection of motherhood and childhood. Collectively, these provisions establish a strong constitutional foundation for child justice and child-centered adjudication, aligning Pakistan's constitutional values with its international obligations under the CRC and other international instruments it has ratified[16]. The Constitution further reinforces these obligations. Article 25(3) empowers the State to enact special provisions for the protection of children, including measures that may favorably differentiate them from adults. Article 25A mandates free and compulsory education for children aged 5 to 16 years. Article 35 specifically ensures the protection of marriage, the family, the mother, and the child. Article 37(e) guarantees just and humane working conditions, explicitly prohibiting child labour in vocations unsuitable to their age or sex. These provisions collectively prioritize the well-being, rehabilitation, and integration of children into society, and provide a solid legal basis for rights-based adjudication in matters affecting them.

Judicial Obligation to apply a Child-Centered Framework

7. It must be underscored that courts are bound to approach all matters involving children through the lens of a dedicated child- centered and child justice framework, a judicial philosophy grounded in both legal and moral obligations to safeguard, nurture, and empower children within the justice system.[17] The concept of child justice is broad and inclusive. It encompasses not only children in conflict with the law, who require rehabilitative and restorative processes rather than punitive sanctions, but also children in contact with the law, including those involved in custody and guardianship disputes and other civil proceedings who must be treated with dignity, heard, protected, and empowered throughout judicial proceedings. As custodians of justice, courts bear a heightened responsibility to prioritize the best interests of the child in all decisions affecting them. This principle, central to international child rights jurisprudence, demands that the judiciary transcend procedural formalism and engage substantively with each child's unique vulnerabilities, developmental needs, and future potential.[18] Such an approach requires judicial sensitivity, active participation of children in proceedings (where appropriate), and the creation of child-sensitive courtroom environments that respect their dignity and ensure their voices are not only heard but meaningfully considered.

Hearing the Children: A Participatory Approach

8. Guided by this constitutional and international framework, the Court adopted a child-friendly, participatory approach in the present case. Both children were invited to approach the Bench, not from the rostrum, but in a relaxed and informal manner, reducing the psychological distance between them and the Court. The interaction was designed to be warm and non-intimidating: we greeted them, shook hands, and engaged in a gentle conversation to elicit their views and preferences. The elder child conveyed a heartfelt desire to be with both parents, reflecting a deep emotional need for unity. The younger child, facing developmental delays, was unable to express his views meaningfully. The Court gave due weight to their expressed preferences and developmental contexts, ensuring emotional and psychological well-being remained central to adjudication. Only after internalizing their perspectives did the Court proceed to hear submissions from counsel.

Examining "Best Interests" of the Children

9. Learned counsel for the petitioner (father) submitted that the petitioner has since remarried and has a one-year-old child from his second marriage. He is a qualified child specialist and operates a private hospital in District Layyah. It was emphasized that the petitioner had personally overseen various therapies for child B during the period the child was in his custody as he has significant developmental delays. He further submitted that his parents (the children's paternal grandparents) reside with him and maintain a close and affectionate bond with the children. On this basis, it was argued that the best interests of the children would be served by placing them in his custody.

10. Conversely, learned counsel for respondent No. 1 (mother) submitted that she is also a medical doctor employed in government service and has likewise remarried. However, she clarified that her husband's children are adults and do not reside with them. The children live with her and her husband alone. The elder child is currently enrolled in a renowned private school, where he is performing well, while the younger child is undergoing therapy at a recognized institution in Lahore. She asserted that she is the primary caregiver and has been diligently attending to both the educational and therapeutic needs of the children. Unlike the professional commiment of the petitioner-father, her government job allows her to attend to her children. In any case the mere fact that the mother, is a working mother, cannot be held against her in custodial determinations as her professional commitments do not diminish her role as a mother and the primary caregiver, unless established otherwise. Article 11 of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women ("CEDAW") recognizes the right of women to work and to be protected from discrimination in matters relating to marriage and family responsibilities[19], while Article 16 ensures equality in matters of marriage and family life, including the rights and responsibilities of parents, irrespective of marital or employment status.[20] General Recommendation No. 21 on equality in marriage and family relations under Article 16 specifically calls for states to ensure that custody and guardianship laws do not discriminate against women on the basis of their employment status and uphold shared responsibility of parents for child-rearing.[21] To penalize a mother for exercising her right to work would run afoul of these guarantees.

11. We have paid particular attention to the condition of child B, aged seven, who has signficant development delays and requires sustained therapeutic care. The petitioner-father, being a child specialist, emphasized his familiarity with the child's needs and past efforts to ensure regular therapy. Respondent No.1-mother, however, also demonstrated serious attentiveness to the child's condition and B is undergoing special intervention/theraphy in Lahore. Both parents appear committed to the children's welfare and capable of providing stable, loving environments. However, we note that the father has remarried, has a one-year-old child from his second marriage, and is employed full-time during the day while also maintaining a private practice in the evenings, leaving him largely unavailable at home. After considering the age, educational continuity, psychological health, children's emotional, medical, and educational continuity in light of their evolving needs, the stability of home environment, and the city of residence of the children and after assessing the current circumstances and capacities of the parents we conclude that the best interests of the children, particularly the child with special needs, are best served by remaining in the custody of their mother. No alternative caregiver can fully replicate the intuitive care, emotional constancy, and protective environment a mother is uniquely positioned to offer. The fact that she is a working professional does not detract from her suitability as a custodial parent. On the contrary, it reflects her resilience and her commitment to providing a secure, nurturing, and dignified upbringing for her children.

ADR and Child Justice: An Important Intersection

12. In matters involving children, such as custody, guardianship, and family disputes, the courts must recognize that a strictly adversarial approach often exacerbates conflict, delays resolution, and undermines the child's sense of stability and security. In contrast, Alternative Dispute Resolution ("ADR"), particularly mediation, offers a more collaborative, efficient, and child-sensitive mechanism for resolving such dispute. While the CRC does not explicitly reference the term ADR, its spirit and structure clearly support its use. Article 3 of the CRC demands that the best interests of the child be a primary consideration in all actions concerning children, while Article 12 guarantees the child's right to express views freely and to have those views given due weight. In General Comment No. 12 (2009), the UN Committee on the CRC explicitly encourages States to develop mechanisms that ensure meaningful child participation in family law proceedings, including through non-judicial and informal processes such as mediation.[22] Such processes must be voluntary, child-friendly, and facilitated by professionals trained to respect the evolving capacities of the child and prioritize their best interests. Properly designed ADR mechanisms reduce the psychological burden on children, promote parental cooperation, and lead to faster, more sustainable outcomes that support the child's long-term welfare. Accordingly, Family Courts and Guardianship Tribunals must prioritize mediation as a first recourse, particularly where parties demonstrate a willingness to engage in good faith. Adjudication should be pursued only when mediation fails or is deemed unsuitable due to concerns of safety, coercion, or imbalance of power. This approach not only aligns with Pakistan's international obligations under the CRC but also reinforces the constitutional commitment to protect the dignity, welfare, and future of every child.

Directive to Courts: Hear the Voice of the Child

13. Before parting with this judgment, we find it necessary to underscore that this decision must serve as a directive to all courts, particularly Family Courts and judges of the District Judiciary: the voice of the child must be heard and respected in every custody and guardianship matter. This is not an aspirational goal but a binding obligation under the CRC. We conclude this judgment with the words of James Baldwin, who said: "The children are always ours, every single one of them, all over the globe; I am beginning to suspect that whoever is incapable of recognizing this may be incapable of morality."[23] These words are a solemn reminder that courts, especially Family Courts have a moral and legal responsibility to see, hear, and protect every child not as a passive subject of proceedings, but as a rights-bearing individual whose dignity must be safeguarded at every stage of the judicial process.

14. In view of the foregoing, and as custody already stands vested with the mother, we are of the considered view that no case for review of the impugned order is made out. Accordingly, this petition is dismissed. The parties are directed to strictly adhere to the visitation schedule determined by the lower appellate court. Custody of the children shall continue with the mother unless and until the petitioner-father moves a fresh application for custody and the same

The allegations raised pertained to faulty investigation by the petitioner. In response, the petitioner submitted a written reply denying the charges, but his explanation was deemed unsatisfactory. Consequently, he was awarded the major penalty of dismissal from service via order dated 04.08.2014, issued by the RPO. On departmental appeal, the penalty was reduced to a two-stage reduction in pay, and the petitioner was reinstated into service by order dated 27.03.2015. Dissatisfied with this outcome, the petitioner approached the Punjab Service Tribunal, Lahore ("Tribunal"), seeking reinstatement with effect from the date of his original dismissal, along with all consequential benefits. The Tribunal partially allowed the appeal and modified the penalty from a two-stage to a one-stage reduction in pay through the impugned order dated 02.02.2016 ("impugned order"). Hence, the present petition for leave to appeal.

2. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties and carefully examined the impugned order, the applicable law, and the record of the case.

3. The Tribunal found that although an investigation had been conducted, the prosecution failed to produce even a shred of evidence to substantiate the allegations. It observed:

> "3. From the record it is evident that neither the punishing authority took into consideration this version of the appellant nor he gave any weight to his stance before imposing major penalty upon the appellant which was sheer violation of principle, of natural justice. There was no direct and confidence inspiring evidence available on record which could link the appellant with the alleged charges of receiving illegal gratification. The prosecution has badly failed to produce even an iota of evidence in order to substantiate the allegations leveled against the appellant. Neither tangible and cogent evidence (documentary or oral) has been brought on record in order to prove the veracity of the allegations which gives credence to the fact that the appellant's version was plausible and credible. Even regular inquiry was not conducted before imposition of major penalty…" (emphasis supplied)

Despite these categorical findings, the Tribunal opted merely to reduce the penalty, rather than exonerate the petitioner. It appears that the Tribunal relied, albeit implicitly, on the principle of proportionality, finding the original penalty disproportionate to the alleged misconduct. However, this application was both legally flawed and logically inconsistent with its own conclusion when no misconduct was established. The Tribunal failed to properly exercise its discretion under Section 5 of the Punjab Service Tribunals Act, 1974, which empowers it to confirm, set aside, vary, or modify impugned orders. While the Tribunal has authority to vary the punishment in appropriate cases, such discretion must be exercised judiciously grounded in the record, legal standards, and principles of fairness.[2] It is well established that judicial interference with disciplinary penalties is only justified where the penalty is arbitrary, perverse, or based on irrelevant considerations.[3] Once the Tribunal found that the allegations were wholly unsubstantiated, the only lawful outcome was to exonerate the petitioner.

4. The principle of proportionality provides a structured framework for judicial review of administrative actions.[4] Developed across various constitutional jurisdictions[5], it involves a four-step[6] test: (i) the measure must pursue a legitimate aim; (ii) be suitable to achieve that aim; (iii) be necessary, in that no less restrictive alternative exists; and (iv) strike a fair balance between the measure's impact on individual rights and the public interest. This Court has recently introduced and adopted this four-stage test to assess the legality and fairness of administrative and disciplinary decisions.[7] Such framework ensures that any interference with rights is justified, necessary, and lawful.

5. Proportionality promotes a stable and systematic method of constitutional adjudication.[8] Courts employing this approach are expected to articulate clearly the reasoning behind their decisions at each stage of the analysis thereby enhancing transparency, accountability, and legitimacy in judicial reasoning. Proportionality must, therefore, be applied with discipline, care, and sensitivity to context, particularly where fundamental rights and human dignity are at stake.

6. In the present case, the Tribunal's own findings confirm that there was no credible evidence, documentary or oral, linking the petitioner to the alleged misconduct. No regular inquiry was held, and the principles of natural justice were violated.[9] In such circumstances, the very first limb of the proportionality test i.e., legitimacy fails. Without proven misconduct, there can be no legitimate objective warranting disciplinary action. Any penalty, however minor, is thus disproportionate by default. The absence of evidence removes the legal basis for any sanction. Furthermore, Articles 4, 14, and 25 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973, which guarantee the right to be treated in accordance with law, human dignity, and equality before the law, require all forums, including tribunals, to ensure that disciplinary measures are not only lawful but also fair and just.

7. Once the Tribunal concluded that the disciplinary process was procedurally flawed and unsupported by evidence, it was legally and constitutionally bound to reinstate the petitioner with all consequential benefits. Its failure to do so reflects a fundamental error of law, a misapplication of the principle of proportionality, and a disregard for the constitutional principles of fairness and due process. Endeavouring to "balance" unproven misconduct with the imposition of a continuing penalty is both illogical and legally untenable. Given the manifestly unjust disciplinary proceedings, the petitioner is entitled to complete exoneration and full restitution. It is not the role of the Tribunal to engage in an exercise of mercy or compromise where the foundational basis of penal action is wholly unsubstantiated. Fairness demands rectification, not calibration, in the face of injustice.

8. For these reasons, we find that the impugned order is untenable in both law and fact. Once the Tribunal determined that the charges were unsubstantiated, the only legally viable course was to exonerate the petitioner. The imposition of any penalty, absent proven misconduct, constitutes a violation of natural justice and results in a manifest miscarriage of justice. The Tribunal's decision, being internally inconsistent and contrary to constitutional norms, is accordingly set aside. The petitioner stands exonerated and is directed to be reinstated in service from the date of his original dismissal, with all consequential benefits.

9. Accordingly, this petition is converted into an appeal and is hereby allowed.

ORDER

Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J.- At the very outset, learned counsel for the petitioners submitted that she is not an Advocate of this Court and has filed a separate application in each case (C.M.As. No. 4089 & 4090 of 2025) seeking special permission to appear in matter. She stated that she has previously handled the case before the Islamabad High Court and, owing to the urgency of the matter, the petitioner companies have not yet been able to engage an Advocate of the Supreme Court. In view of the reasons stated, limited special permission is granted to the learned counsel to appear before this Court at this stage only. The petitioners are directed to engage an Advocate of the Supreme Court to argue the cases in the next stage. The present counsel shall be at liberty to assist any such counsel subsequently engaged in the matter. The applications stand disposed of accordingly.

Main Case

2. Learned counsel for the petitioners submits that the dispute between the parties was referred for arbitration under the auspices of the International Chamber of Commerce (ICC), London. Upon conclusion of the proceedings, a partial foreign arbitral award was rendered on 12.12.2024, and subsequently, a separate award on costs was issued on 31.03.2025. The awards were filed before the Islamabad High Court for enforcement under the Recognition and Enforcement (Arbitration, Agreements and Foreign Arbitral Awards) Act, 2011 ("Act").

3. Learned counsel submits that while admitting the enforcement petition, the learned Single Judge of the High Court issued interim relief vide order dated 24.04.2025, restraining the respondents from assigning, transferring, or alienating their working interest in Badin Fields and from creating any charge, lien, or encumbrance thereon. This interim order was subsequently challenged before a Division Bench in an intra-court appeal ("ICA"), which vide impugned order dated 19.05.2025, suspended the interim relief granted by the learned Single Judge.

4. It is contended that the interim relief was granted in aid of enforcement under the Act and did not amount to final relief. Courts are empowered to pass interim measures to protect the integrity and efficacy of the enforcement process. Denial of such protection would defeat the very purpose of the Act and the New York Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards, 1958 ("Convention"). Reliance is placed on Taisei Corporation & another v. A.M. Construction Company (Pvt.) Ltd. (2024 SCMR 640), Orient Power Company (Pvt.) Ltd, Lahore v. Sui Northern Gas Pipelines Ltd. (2021 SCMR 1728), Government of India v. Vedanta Limited and Ors (AIR 2020 SC 4550), and Zeiler v. Deitsch (500 F.3d 157 (2007)) which affirm that courts must maintain a pro-enforcement bias while dealing with foreign arbitral awards. It was further argued that the Division Bench interfered at the interim stage without recording or satisfying any of the limited grounds of non- enforcement under Article V of the Convention, as incorporated into the Act. Such premature judicial interference sends an adverse signal to the international community, undermines arbitral sanctity, erodes investor confidence, and undermines Pakistan's international obligations. A stable and enforcement-friendly legal environment is vital for encouraging foreign direct investment.

5. It is further submitted with respect that the impugned order passed by the Division Bench, whereby the interim relief granted to the petitioners was suspended, has effectively obstructed the enforcement of the foreign arbitral award and is therefore inconsistent with the pro- enforcement mandate of the Act, the Convention, and the settled jurisprudence of this Court. Foreign arbitral awards are not to be treated as ordinary civil decrees; rather, they possess a binding character under international law, to which Pakistan has expressly committed itself.

6. It is also contended that the ICA before the Division Bench was not maintainable. Orders passed therein are not amenable to an ICA appeal under Section 3(2) of the Law Reforms Ordinance, 1972. It is well settled that ICAs do not lie from orders passed under special laws that contain a self-contained appellate mechanism and do not expressly provide for such appeals. See Karim Bibi and others v. Hussain Bakhsh and another (PLD 1984 SC 344), Muhammad Abdullah v. Deputy Settlement Commissioner Lahore (PLD 1985 SC 107) and International Islamic University, Islamabad v. Syed Naveed Altaf (2024 SCMR 472).

7. In view of the above, leave is granted to consider the questions raised. The appeals arising out of these petitions shall be heard on the basis of available record, however, parties are at liberty to file additional documents, if any. The said appeals shall be listed before a three-member bench after a fortnight.

C.M.As. No. 3673 & 3674/2025 (Stay Matter):

8. Notice to the respondents. Meanwhile, the operation of the impugned order dated 19.05.2025 passed by the Division Bench of the Islamabad High Court shall remain suspended until the next date of hearing in order to be consistent with the pro-enforcement bias maintained by this Court as well as the mandate of the Act, the Convention, and the settled jurisprudence of this Court. The interim restraining order passed by the learned Single Judge shall remain in field and continue to operate.

9. For completeness, it is clarified that a collective reading of Orders XI, XX, and XXXIII of the Supreme Court Rules, 1980 establishes that this Court, while entertaining a petition arising out of an order of a Division Bench of a High Court, is competent to grant leave and suspend the impugned order. JUDGMENT

Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J.– Briefly, Dr. Shumaila Naeem (the "respondent") then unmarried, joined government service as a Medical Officer on 07.09.2007[1], based on her domicile of origin in Khyber Pakhtunkhwa ("KPK"). Following her marriage on 31.05.2008 to a civil servant domiciled in Balochistan, she was transferred on deputation to the Pakistan Institute of Medical Sciences ("PIMS") under the Ministry of National Health Services Regulations and Coordination ("MNHS"), in accordance with the wedlock policy, vide order dated 08.09.2009. She was subsequently absorbed at PIMS through a notification dated 17.12.2013, and was later promoted to the post of Senior Registrar (BS- 18) on 14.12.2021 and also performed duties as Assistant Professor (BS- 19). It is prudent to note that the respondent did not change or alter her domicile throughout this time on the basis of her husband's domicile which is of Balochistan. Subsequently, during service, the respondent changed her domicile to that of her husband i.e, Province of Balochistan on 20.10.2018 and formally relinquished her Province of KPK domicile on 25.10.2018. On the basis of her new domicile, she applied for an advertised post of Associate Professor (Obstetrics & Gynaecology) (BS-19) at PIMS against the Balochistan seat. Controversy arose when the respondent, having obtained the requisite departmental no objection certificates ("NOCs") for applying to the post of Assistant Professor (Obstetrics & Gynaecology) (BS-19) on the basis of her Balochistan domicile, got rejected by Federal Public Service Commission ("FPSC"). Although the respondent successfully passed the written examination, her candidature was rejected by the FPSC vide memorandum dated 10.07.2024, on two grounds: first, that a change of domicile after entry into government service is impermissible; and second, that she lacked the requisite experience for the post. Dissatisfied with the FPSC's decision, the respondent preferred a departmental representation, which, along with her subsequent review petition, was dismissed through orders dated 12.09.2024 and 02.10.2024, respectively. However, her appeal under Section 7(3)(d) of the FPSC Ordinance, 1977 ("Ordinance") before the Islamabad High Court was allowed vide judgment dated 28.01.2025 ("impugned judgment"), whereby the impugned decisions rejecting her candidature were set aside. Aggrieved by the impugned judgment, the present petition for leave to appeal has been filed before this Court by the FPSC.

2. The learned Additional Attorney General, assisted by representatives of the FPSC and MNHS, contended that under the Establishment Division's Office Manual No. F.8/5/75-WC dated 12.08.1975 ("O.M. 1975")[2], a married female candidate may adopt her husband's domicile if applying for a post through "direct recruitment". However, it was argued that "direct recruitment" refers solely to first-time entry into service, after which the domicile declared at initial induction under Establishment Division Office Manual No. 1/14/71-TRV dated 20.09.1971 ("O.M. 1971") becomes final and binding for the duration of service. The High Court, it was submitted, erred in holding that O.M. 1975 overrides O.M. 1971; instead, both operate in distinct spheres: O.M. 1975 governs initial appointments, while O.M. 1971 applies post-entry. Permitting a change of domicile mid-service, it was argued, could lead to arbitrary advantage and disruption of seniority. On the respondent's experience, it was submitted that the certificates were issued by unauthorized officials and reflected service on an internal arrangement, not a substantive appointment or promotion to BS-18. Hence, her experience was non-countable. Additionally, the NOC was challenged as legally infirm, allegedly obtained through misrepresentation of domicile. Accordingly, the FPSC's rejection of both her Balochistan domicile and experience was defended as lawful.

[2] An Office Manual in Pakistan's service law framework is a departmental guide for internal procedures. It does not override statutory service rules but can be used to interpret or implement them unless it contradicts a statute or constitutional provision. This is issued under Section 25 of the Civil Servants Act, 1973.

3. Conversely, learned counsel for the respondent raised several objections to the FPSC's actions. As a preliminary matter, he contended that the FPSC lacks locus standi to file the petition and cannot be represented by the State, relying on this Court's settled jurisprudence. On merits, it was argued that the respondent, having secured the highest marks in the written examination, acquired a vested right to be fairly considered for appointment, one that could not be arbitrarily denied. He further submitted that the respondent does not fall within the definition of a "civil servant" under the Occupational Groups and Services (Probation, Training and Seniority) Rules, 1990, making O.M. 1971 inapplicable. Since the post was to be filled through "direct recruitment", her husband's domicile recognized under O.M. 1975 ought to be considered. "Direct recruitment", it was emphasized, entails fresh appointments distinct from existing service, seniority, or promotion structures, involving independent pay scales and selection procedures. The respondent was said to have met all experiential requirements, supported by a valid experience certificate issued under the Pakistan Medical and Dental Council Regulations, 2018 ("PMDC Regulations"). As this certificate had not been challenged through any legal forum, it had attained finality. Reference was also made to Rule 14 of the Civil Servants (Appointment, Promotion and Transfer) Rules, 1973, which allocates only six percent of seats for Balochistan. It was argued that had the respondent retained her KPK domicile, her selection prospects would have been stronger, undermining allegations of strategic domicile change. Accordingly, the FPSC's rejection of her domicile and experience was characterized as arbitrary, erroneous, and without legal basis.

4. The learned amicus curiae opined that Sections 15 and 16 of the Succession Act, 1925 ("1925 Act") are inapplicable to the present matter, as their provisions do not extend to Muslims. She further submitted that the respondent may avail the benefit of O.M. 1975 only if this Court concludes on the factual plane that the advertised post constitutes a new post and falls within the scope of "direct recruitment".

5. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties and amicus curiae at length and have carefully examined the impugned judgment, the applicable law, and the record of the case.

Preliminary Objections: Locus Standi, Representation and Status of the Respondent

6. Before addressing the substantive issues, we must first dispose of the preliminary objections raised by the respondent. Firstly, he contended that the FPSC lacks locus standi to file the petition relying on Rahim Foods[3]. We have examined the said judgement whereby this Court categorically held that the Competition Commission of Pakistan ("CCP"), under the Competition Act, 2010 ("2010 Act"), functions primarily as a regulatory body and also as a quasi-judicial forum. However, when CCP decides a matter between rival parties in exercise of its quasi-judicial powers, CCP cannot claim to be an aggrieved person for the purposes of challenging a decision before a superior forum.[4] No such quasi- adjudicatory framework exists under the Ordinance in question[5], which merely provides for an administrative review of the FPSC's own decisions. Therefore, the instant case is distinguishable. The impugned rejection of the respondent's candidature is not a determination made in a quasi- judicial capacity of FPSC between contesting parties but rather exercising an administrative power of review of its earlier order. Therefore, the precedent cited by the respondent is inapposite, as it pertains to quasi- judicial bodies seeking to defend their adjudicatory decisions, which is not the situation here. The objection to the locus standi of the FPSC to file the present appeal is misconceived.

7. The second objection challenging the competence of the learned Additional Attorney General to represent the FPSC is equally untenable. As an attached department of the Establishment Division[6], the FPSC is a Federal Government entity and, as a matter of settled law, must be represented by government counsel, not private advocates.[7] The respondent's claim of a vested right to appointment on the basis of her performance in the written test is similarly flawed. The FPSC retains the authority to determine eligibility, and mere success in the examination or a conditional recommendation does not confer a vested right to appointment.[8] Further, the argument that the respondent is not a civil servant lacks merit. It is settled by this Court that a civil servant is someone who holds a civil post in connection with the affairs of the Federation and who has been employed by the competent authority i.e., either by the FPSC or the Provincial Public Service Commission in the prescribed manner after following the due process of law and having gone through the process of competition.[9] Applying this to the instant case, the respondent was appointed through the KPK Public Service Commission i.e., competent authority through an open competition, Moreover, this Court has already held that doctors employed in PIMS and other federal institutions hold civil posts and are civil servants within the meaning of Section 2(1)(b) of the Civil Servants Act, 1973.[10] Accordingly, the respondent's reliance on the inapplicability of O.M. 1971 is misplaced and does not withstand scrutiny.

The Legal Doctrine of Domicile: Origins, Elements, and Contemporary Relevance

8. Before turning to the core controversy surrounding domicile and its bearing on "direct recruitment", it is instructive to examine the legal doctrine of domicile itself. Modern scholarship traces its origins to Roman law, with English Canon Law serving as the vehicle for its transmission into the common law tradition.[11] The term "domicile" is derived from the Latin domicilium (from domum colere - to inhabit or cultivate a home), and its Dutch counterpart woonplaats, both evoking the notion of a permanent legal home "this is where you are, because this is where you belong."[12] Across jurisdictions, legal dictionaries and judicial pronouncements consistently define domicile as a person's legal home to which they intend to return whenever absent.[13] Lord Chelmsford aptly described it as the "intention of a permanent home."[14] Thus, domicile has two essential components: (i) factum - the physical fact of residence; and (ii) animus manendi - the intention of remaining there permanently.[15] Importantly, domicile is not synonymous with residence. While one may have multiple residences, a person can have only one domicile at a time. Indeed, even a person with no physical home cannot be without a domicile in law. Domicile may be categorized as: (i) Domicile of origin: acquired by operation of law at birth; (ii) Domicile of choice: adopted voluntarily by a legally competent person intending to make a place their permanent home; and (iii) Domicile of dependence: determined by the domicile of another, such as a spouse, parent, or legal guardian.[16] It is a settled principle that any person, subject to legal capacity and in accordance with applicable law, may lawfully change their domicile.

9. Domicile, though often perceived as administrative, is a foundational legal concept that shapes an individual's access to rights, opportunities, and entitlements. It is not merely a declaration of permanent residence, but a legal construct that governs access to public services, education, employment, political participation, and regional entitlements. Domicile can influence taxation, voting rights, and eligibility for regional quotas in civil service recruitment.[17] In Lord Westbury's words, domicile is "a relation which the law creates between an individual and a particular locality or country."[18] Theories of domicile span several disciplines — law, human geography, and residential mobility, each highlighting how one's place of habitual residence affects jurisdiction, migration patterns, and settlement dynamics. Accordingly, domicile must always be interpreted in light of the underlying purpose it is meant to serve.

10. In Pakistan, the concept of domicile is recognized in Part II of the 1925 Act, Section 17 of the Citizenship Act, 1951 ("1951 Act"), and the Schedule to Rule 310-A of the Civil Service Regulations ("CSR") Volume I. These provisions acknowledge changes of domicile through dependence, voluntary relocation, choice, or marriage. The procedural framework for obtaining, modifying, renewing, or cancelling domicile is outlined in the Citizenship Rules, 1952.[19] This legal understanding of domicile is central to the present controversy, as the respondent claims eligibility for appointment under the province of Balochistan quota on the basis of a changed domicile acquired through marriage. Whether such a change is legally sustainable, for a civil servant, for the purpose of "direct recruitment", particularly after entry into civil service, lies at the heart of the dispute now before this Court.

Applicability of Sections 15 and 16 of the Succession Act, 1925 on Muslims

11. The respondent argued that, by virtue of Sections 15 and 16 of the 1925 Act that a wife's domicile automatically shifts to that of her husband upon marriage. However, this contention is legally untenable. These provisions fall under Part II of the 1925 Act, which, by virtue of Section 4, expressly excludes their application to Muslims, Hindus, Buddhists, Sikhs, and Jainas. The historical context reinforces this exclusion. Prior to the Succession Act, 1865, Muslims and Hindus were governed by their respective personal laws, while other communities were subject to a patchwork of colonial legal principles. The 1925 Act was a consolidating statute aimed at non-Muslim and non-Hindu communities, deliberately preserving the autonomy of personal laws in succession matters for the latter.[20] Accordingly, Sections 15 and 16 have no applicability to Muslims, and the respondent's reliance on them is misplaced.

12. For civil servants, the applicable domicile regime is set out in the Schedule to Rule 310-A of the CSR, Volume I. This Schedule explicitly recognizes the change of domicile through marriage and other modes, and affirms that the domicile of a married woman ordinarily follows that of her husband. As the respondent is a civil servant, it is this framework not the 1925 Act or 1951 Act that governs the determination and change of her domicile.

Domicile and Marriage: Autonomy, Dependency, and the Rights of Women in Civil Service

13. While CSR recognizes that a married woman may adopt her husband's domicile by virtue of Item No. 7 of the Schedule to Rule 310-A of the CSR. Having established that the respondent's status as a civil servant brings her within the ambit of Rule 310-A, the critical question that arises is whether such adoption is automatic or mandatory; or a matter of personal choice under the Item No. 7 of the Schedule and;

(i) Acquisition of the domicile of the husband is optional

14. To address the first question, it is necessary to examine whether the mere fact of marriage results in a compulsory shift of domicile. There exist interpretational inconsistencies among courts regarding whether a wife's acquisition of her husband's domicile is a matter of law or choice.[21] The traditional common law rule under which a wife's domicile followed that of her husband is rooted in the doctrine of dependency and aimed at preserving legal unity within the marital relationship. However, this dependency rule has come under strong criticism for subordinating a woman's agency. Lord Denning famously described it as "the last barbarous relic of a wife's servitude," calling for its abandonment in light of modern principles of equality and autonomy. This rule, born from the doctrine of coverture[22] which rendered a married woman "civilly dead" by merging her legal identity into that of her husband has been widely rejected across common law jurisdictions.[23] Legal reforms in the United Kingdom, New Zealand, Australia, and Singapore have abolished the automatic domicile rule, affirming a woman's right to independently determine her legal affiliation.[24] Even in jurisdictions like Malaysia, where no statute has been enacted, courts have recognized a woman's right to abandon her husband's domicile and assert her own.[25] From a constitutional standpoint, tethering a woman's legal identity and civic entitlements to her husband's domicile infringes upon her autonomy, dignity, and equality. The Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women ("CEDAW"), to which Pakistan is a signatory[26], affirms a woman's right to be free from such marital subordination and to choose her domicile irrespective of her marital status.[27] Accordingly, the proposition that a woman's domicile automatically changes upon marriage is neither supported by contemporary constitutional values nor binding in the absence of express legal compulsion. It is therefore held that a married woman retains the legal discretion, choice or agency to either adopt her husband's domicile or retain her own. In the present case, the respondent, by her own volition, opted to adopt her husband's domicile, which is legally permissible.

(ii) The domicile freezes on joining the civil service and cannot be changed during service in light of O.M. 1971

15. Unlike general domicile concepts rooted in personal identity and legal affiliation, the interpretation of domicile for government servants must be aligned with the objectives and practical necessities of recruitment policies and service conditions. Domicile must be understood in light of the purpose and object of the relevant legal context. In service law, it is interpreted with reference to recruitment policies and service terms.[28] The Establishment Division's O.M. 1971 addresses the issue of domicile change after entry into government service:

> Change of Domicile after entry into Government Service: A question has arisen whether a government servant who entered service based on the domicile of a particular province/region may subsequently change domicile during service. While a government servant, as a Pakistani citizen, may change domicile under law, it has been decided that the domicile declared and accepted at entry shall be final for the duration of service and no later change shall be recognized for service terms, including postings and transfers. (emphasis supplied)

The O.M. 1971 permits civil servants irrespective of gender to change their domicile for purposes related to citizenship rights and obligations. However, the domicile declared and accepted at entry into civil service shall be final for the duration of service and no later change shall be recognized for service terms, including postings and transfers.[29] This principle equally applies to female civil servants. The rationale behind this is that Pakistan, as a constitutional Federation, comprises several Provinces with distinct socio-economic profiles and varying levels of development. To ensure equitable representation and fair opportunities across the Federation, the civil service recruitment process allocates vacancies based on provincial quotas determined by the domicile of the candidates. Domicile, in this context, serves as a constitutional tool to promote inclusivity and national integration by safeguarding the interests of less-developed regions and underrepresented populations. Once a candidate enters the civil service against a post allocated to a particular province or region, their domicile is considered "frozen" to maintain the integrity of this federal balancing mechanism. It is also important to note that permitting the change of domicile may affect the mechanism of transfer and seniority as well. Disregarding seniority undermines bureaucratic impartiality, violates constitutional guarantees of due process and equality (Article 4 and 25 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution"))[30] and breeds cynicism within the service. The erosion of seniority norms weakens administrative stability.[31] Allowing post-induction changes in domicile would not only undermine the quota system but also open avenues for manipulation, enabling individuals to shift provincial affiliation for personal advantage, thereby diluting the constitutional promise of provincial parity. The freezing of domicile thus serves the larger constitutional purpose of federal harmony and administrative fairness within the civil service structure of Pakistan.

16. In this context, an unmarried female civil servant such as the respondent while legally entitled to adopt the domicile of her husband upon marriage, but for all service-related entitlements and obligations, her original domicile (in this case, KPK) continues to be the determining document. The question that now arises is whether the O.M. 1975 creates a specific exception that permits a female civil servant to change her domicile (or use her husband's domicile under the aforesaid O.M.) during service, only in limited cases where appointment to a higher post is through "direct recruitment"?

Direct Recruitment of in-service female candidates is an exception to general rule

17. Learned counsel for the respondent relied on O.M. 1975, arguing that because the advertised post was to be filled by "direct recruitment", the respondent's matrimonial domicile cannot be disregarded. O.M. 1975 states:

> Married Female Candidates – Determination of Domicile: According to Estt. Division's O.M. No. 2/2/67 dated August 26, 1968, a candidate's domicile is determined by their parents' domicile or, if the parents of a migrant candidate have not migrated to Pakistan, by the candidate's own residence and education in the province of domicile. The question whether a married female candidate can be deemed to share her husband's domicile has been considered, and it was decided that for direct recruitment, a married female candidate's domicile may be accepted as that of her husband. (emphasis supplied)

The above shows that a married candidate not yet in service may opt for either her own or her husband's domicile, and once chosen, that domicile is final for service terms. However, to assess O.M. 1975's applicability to a civil servant already in service, three objections raised by the learned Additional Attorney General must be addressed: (i) the advertised post was for initial recruitment not direct recruitment; (ii) direct recruitment implies first entry into service; and (iii) allowing an in-service female civil servant to change domicile risks disrupting seniority and service structure.

Direct Recruitment and Initial Recruitment are interchangeable terms

18. Having clarified the distinct applicability of O.M. 1975 to female civil servants, it is essential to address the terminology surrounding recruitment, particularly the distinction or lack thereof between "direct recruitment" and "initial recruitment," which forms a critical basis for the arguments advanced. Service rules in Pakistan recognize three modes of appointment[32]: (i) initial recruitment, (ii) promotion, and (iii) transfer. Initial recruitment is defined as an appointment made otherwise than by promotion or transfer, typically through examination, test, or interview conducted by the Commission.[33] Notably, the term "direct recruitment" is absent from any Pakistani law or regulation. However, Indian service jurisprudence[34] employs a parallel classification comprising (i) direct recruitment, (ii) promotion, and (iii) transfer, with direct recruitment statutorily defined identically to Pakistan's initial recruitment. This semantic and functional equivalence is reinforced by frequent interchangeable use of "direct recruitment" and "initial recruitment" in various Pakistani departmental manuals and service documents.[35] Hence, it is legally unsound to treat these terms as distinct; they are interchangeable in both meaning and application.

Scope of Direct Recruitment: Fresh Entrants vs In-Service Applicants

19. Initially, the Court was inclined to accept the learned Additional Attorney General's interpretation that "direct recruitment" signifies only first entry into service. However, a deeper review of government service structures reveals that in-service civil servants, with a NOC from their parent department, may apply for vacancies designated for "direct recruitment". Thus, "direct recruitment" encompasses two categories: (i) fresh entrants from outside the service, and (ii) in-service candidates seeking appointment to new posts. Hence, the terms "initial recruitment"/"direct recruitment" cannot be strictly confined to a fresh candidate entering service for the first time as the same could equally involve an in-service candidate through an open competition.[36] Therefore, "direct recruitment"/"initial recruitment" does not exclusively mean first entry into service.

One-Time Domicile Choice for Female Candidates: Purposive and Gender-Sensitive Interpretation of Domicile in Direct Recruitment

20. An exception to the general principle under O.M. 1971 whereby the domicile of a civil servat stands frozen upon entering the civil service, has been carved out in the case of female officers who marry during service. Recognizing the constitutional values of equality, dignity, and the realities of social mobility that accompany marital life, a limited concession is provided whereby a woman officer may, only once, adopt the domicile of her husband if she seeks appointment to a post through direct recruitment. This exception acknowledges that marriage often entails a change in residence and social identity, and aims to accommodate such transitions without violating the broader principle of domicile integrity. However, this option is strictly a one-time concession in the entire service tenure of the female officer. Once exercised, the new domicile (based on husband's domicile) stands frozen and remains immutable regardless of whether the officer is subsequently divorced, widowed, or remarries a person from another province. This safeguard ensures that the exception does not evolve into an instrument of circumvention or manipulation, and preserves the constitutional scheme of fair and equitable representation across the Federation.

21. The learned Additional Attorney General's contention that permitting the respondent's change of domicile would destabilize the civil service structure would have been correct if the respondent remained in the same service structure, however, the "direct recruitment" of in-service candidates involves new pay scales, distinct terms, and a separate seniority list. Such recruitment neither alters existing service conditions nor infringes on vested rights. We are conscious of the fact that the respondent would be accorded a benefit due to the change of her domicile as the advertised post was not for the KPK domicile holders, therefore her batchmates holding the KPK domicile were deprived to take part in the "direct recruitment" process but as the respondent has changed the domicile legally on the basis of her marriage and O.M. 1975 allows the domicile of the husband to be considered for "direct recruitment", no such discrimination exists as her case is distinguishable from that of her colleagues in the same cadre. It is well settled law that statutory provisions must be harmoniously interpreted, avoiding redundancy.[37] Where two interpretations exist, one favouring the rights of civil servants and the other favouring the State, the one beneficial to the civil servants prevails.[38] In interpreting the O.M. at hand, this Court has adopted a women-centric approach, consistent with Article 25(3) of the Constitution of Pakistan, which explicitly permits affirmative measures in favour of women. Such an interpretation advances substantive equality by recognizing historical and structural disadvantages faced by women, and ensures that the law is applied in a manner that promotes gender justice and inclusion. A purposive, gender-sensitive reading under Article 25(3), 34 and 35 of the Constitution supports allowing female candidates, whether fresh or in-service, a one-time, informed choice of domicile for "direct recruitment" under O.M. 1975. Once this choice is exercised the domicile is once again frozen for the purposes of the civil service. Any subsequent change in the marital status of a female civil servant (if any), would have no bearing on the domicile and her domicile of choice is frozen for the purpose of remaining service and for any posts arising out of "direct recruitment" in the future. Consequently, rejecting the respondent's matrimonial domicile was legally unsustainable. Applying this to the instant case, given that the respondent has exercised the option to choose her domicile, this would be treated as a one-time choice only in matters of direct rectuiment to a higher post during serivce.

[38] Mohsin Ali Hasani v. Government of Pakistan 1990 SCMR 1685.

Validity of Experience Certificate, NOC, and Domicile Documentation

22. The learned Additional Attorney General's objection to the respondent's experience certificate on the ground that it was issued without a substantive appointment or promotion is without merit. While earlier certificates were issued by the Executive Director, PIMS, and the Additional Secretary, MNHS, the competent authority under Section V(5), (6), and (9) of the PMDC Regulations is the Pakistan Medical and Dental Council ("PMDC").[39] The PMDC issued a certificate on 31.10.2023, confirming that the respondent possesses 6 years, 4 months, and 29 days of teaching experience.[40] This certification was issued after duly considering her performance of duties as a designated Assistant Professor under an "internal arrangement". It was argued that the term "internal arrangement" does not connote that the respondent was posted as an Assistant Professor, hence her experience as such is not countable. However, in light of the certificates issued by PIMS, MNHS, and PMDC, the term "internal arrangement" is at best an indoor policy of PIMS and has no bearing on the rights of the respondent. No justifiable explanation has been given by PIMS or MHNS regarding the term "internal arrangement". In this background, the PMDC certificate remains valid and unchallenged, and has achieved finality.[41] Hence, the FPSC cannot override or disregard the jurisdiction and findings of the duly designated certifying authority.

23. In view of the above reasons, and not for the reasons given in the impugned judgment, this petition is hereby dismissed. Consequently, the orders of the FPSC dated 02.10.2014 and 10.07.2024, whereby the respondent's candidature was rejected, are set aside. It is pointed out that a seat of Associate Professor is still vacant. The petitioner is, therefore, directed to consider the case of the respondent for appointment for the post of Associate Professor on her Balochistan domicile strictly in accordance with law and after complying with all codal formalities within a fortnight of the receipt of this judgment.

into the Constitution and bridges the distance between law and the lived realities of the people. It is the ultimate guardian of fundamental rights and the final sentinel against executive or legislative overreach. Judges of this Court are not passive interpreters of text, they are the custodians of liberty, equality, and institutional independence. The Court must remain alive to the evolving aspirations of society and innovate new remedies to advance justice.

25. Judges are to act with integrity and courage, to resist all encroachments, external or internal that threaten to erode the autonomy of the judiciary or subvert the rule of law. Judges must not fall prey to the lure of small, short-term benefits, whether of elevation, power, or personal comfort that may accrue if they speak the language of authority rather than that of the Constitution. Such benefits are illusory and transient. The true reward of a judge lies in preserving the dignity of the institution and the trust of the people. It is also the solemn duty of judges of this Court to call out, with moral clarity and institutional courage, those among their ranks who surrender to the power of the day at the cost of constitutional principles. Critique from within, when rooted in fidelity to the Constitution, is not disloyalty, it is the highest form of service to the judicial institution. History is a vigilant witness. It does not remember those who accommodated power, but those who stood resolute in defense of principle. The jurisprudential legacy of a judge is not built on appeasement but on principled defiance when the soul of justice is imperiled. Courts must never become tools of expediency. Rather, they must be lighthouses of constitutional morality and guardians of democratic integrity. History will not absolve judges who abandon their constitutional duty; it will remember them not as dispensers of justice, but as collaborators in injustice.

JUDGMENT

Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J.– These petitions raise a recurring question in service jurisprudence: whether a civil servant is entitled to back benefits upon reinstatement following the setting aside of a penalty of dismissal, removal, or compulsory retirement. We are also called upon to determine how the intervening period between removal and reinstatement ought to be treated.

C.P.L.A. No. 3453-L/2019 (Tahir Kazmi)

2. The petitioner, a Head Constable in the Punjab Police, was compulsorily retired from service by the SP, Madina Town, Faisalabad, on 29.04.2011, following a show-cause notice issued on 01.04.2011. His departmental appeal was rejected by the Capital Police Officer, Faisalabad, on 15.12.2017. A subsequent review before the Inspector General of Police led to a partial modification of the penalty as it was reduced to forfeiture of two years of approved service, and the intervening period was ordered to be treated as leave without pay. Aggrieved by this, the petitioner filed an appeal before the Punjab Service Tribunal, Lahore which, vide its judgment dated 03.09.2019 ("impugned judgment"), reinstated the petitioner but treated the intervening period as special casual leave without pay. Through this petition for leave to appeal, the petitioner challenges the denial of back benefits for the intervening period and the imposition of the modified penalty.

3. The petitioner in this case was removed from service on 25.06.2014 following departmental proceedings under the Punjab Employees Efficiency, Discipline and Accountability Act 2006, for 46 days of unauthorized absence. His departmental appeal was dismissed on 09.06.2015. He then approached the Punjab Service Tribunal, Lahore which partially allowed the appeal by modifying the penalty to forfeiture of three years of approved service and ordered reinstatement. However, the Tribunal, in its judgment dated 24.11.2021 ("impugned judgment"), directed that the intervening period be treated as leave without pay. The petitioner now seeks to challenge both the denial of back benefits and the imposition of the modified penalty.

Concept of Back Benefits

4. The core issue is the entitlement to back benefits. Grant of back benefits while not expressly defined in the service laws of Pakistan is a well-established remedy in Pakistan as well as other jurisdictions. As defined in Black's Law Dictionary, "back pay" refers to the salary an employee should have received but was denied due to unlawful employer action.[1] A "back pay award" restores the economic status quo ante, compensating for the loss incurred.[2] In our jurisdiction, the term "back benefits" typically includes arrears of salary and related service entitlements.[3] Although broader meanings may exist, this discussion confines "back benefits" to arrears of pay and other emoluments denied due to wrongful dismissal or removal.

5. This legal understanding of back benefits is closely tied to the effect of reinstatement, which in our jurisprudence, nullifies the dismissal or removal order, restoring the employee to their previous position as if the dismissal or removal had never occurred.[4] Reinstatement thus presumes the restoration of all financial entitlements, unless specific exceptions apply. The logical corollary is that the reinstated civil servant is entitled to all benefits lost during the period of wrongful removal, unless it is shown that the civil servant was gainfully employed elsewhere or that reinstatement was conditional.[5]

Doctrine of Constructive Continuity

6. This presumption of full legal restoration finds resonance in the common law doctrine of vanishing dismissal, recognized particularly in the United Kingdom, where a successful appeal against dismissal causes the dismissal to "vanish" as though it never existed.[6] Under this doctrine, when a civil servant's removal or dismissal is declared unlawful, either on procedural grounds, violation of due process, or on the merits of the disciplinary action, the law sets aside that punitive action. The restorative power of vanishing dismissal, therefore, is not merely a remedial choice but flows from a deeper legal commitment to the rule of law that acts done without lawful authority cannot be allowed to produce lawful effects. The doctrine reaffirms that state power must be exercised within legal limits, and when those limits are transgressed, the consequence must be a full return to the pre-violation status. What follows, however, has remained a matter of practical adjustment: the civil servant is reinstated, the period of absence is regularized, and in many cases, salary and other emoluments are awarded. This sequence of reliefs rests on a juridical fiction: that the civil servant is deemed never to have been lawfully removed in the first place.

7. What we now seek to formally recognize is that this fiction amounts to more than a technical adjustment, it is a constructive legal state that reconstructs the continuity of service and restores the civil servant to the position he or she would have occupied had the illegal order not been passed. We propose to refer to this idea as the doctrine of constructive continuity. Although no such doctrine under this name exists in the jurisprudence of Pakistan or comparative jurisdictions, its elements are implicit in the way courts grant relief after declaring a termination unlawful. Constructive continuity, as we conceive it, offers a principled and doctrinal framework for such relief. It rests on the notion that an unlawful act cannot be permitted to cause enduring disadvantage, and that the law must, to the extent possible, restore the person to the status quo ante. In this sense, the doctrine draws conceptual strength from the broader legal principle of restitution, which seeks to undo the unjust consequences of an unlawful act and re-establish the rightful position of the aggrieved party.

8. The doctrine of constructive continuity, therefore, proposes that once a dismissal or removal is declared unlawful, the civil servant shall be deemed to have remained in continuous service during the period of absence and shall be entitled, subject to lawful deductions or limitations, to all the salary, allowances, increments, and service-related benefits that would have accrued had the unlawful act not occurred. The purpose of this doctrine is not merely to provide compensation but to restore the legal and institutional integrity of the employment relationship.

9. We are conscious that this is the first time such a doctrine is being formally articulated in our jurisprudence. It is our considered view that adopting the language and structure of constructive continuity provides coherence, consistency, and clarity to future cases where civil servants are reinstated following wrongful termination. In the absence of a codified rule or settled precedent using this terminology, we believe this formulation will serve as a valuable guidepost for courts, tribunals, and administrative authorities, and will enhance the transparency and reasoning behind reliefs granted in reinstatement cases. It is a settled principle that when the foundational order is without lawful authority, the superstructure built upon it collapses.[7] The civil servant must be placed in the position they would have occupied had the unlawful action not occurred. The concept of constructive continuity, as articulated here, reinforces this consequence and gives expression to the broader principles of legal restoration and administrative fairness that underpin service jurisprudence.

10. This doctrine, while coined for the first time, is rooted in the constitutional promise of fairness, restitution, and institutional integrity. It ensures that a wrongfully removed public servant is treated, for all legal and financial purposes, as having continued in service, thereby entitling them to the salary, benefits, and emoluments that would have accrued but for the wrongful termination. Constructive continuity is, therefore, not only an administrative doctrine; it draws strength from constitutional protections. Article 9 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution") enshrines the right to life, which includes the right to livelihood[8], a right that is fundamentally impaired when a civil servant is deprived of his employment through an unlawful act. Article 10A secures the right to fair trial and due process[9], which would be hollow if reinstatement does not lead to full restitution. Article 14 protects the dignity of man[10], and Article 25 ensures equality before the law[11]. Denying back benefits to a reinstated civil servant who has suffered procedural or substantive injustice infringes upon these constitutional guarantees. It amounts to continued punishment despite legal vindication. We, therefore, hold that such imaginative reconstruction, grounded in equity and justice, constitutes a legitimate and necessary doctrinal development in service jurisprudence.

11. This constitutional foundation finds affirmation in judicial precedent, most notably in Tariq Mahmood[12] and Muhammad Sharif[13] where this Court reaffirmed that the grant of back benefits is the norm and denial of service benefits to such reinstated employee is an exception.[14] Any deviation from this must be justified by clear evidence that the employee was gainfully employed elsewhere during the intervening period. The logic is straightforward - when a court declares an official action unlawful, it must undo not only the decision but the resulting harm. Restitution is therefore integral to corrective justice, not an exercise of discretion.

12. The legal obligation to restore service benefits upon reinstatement also finds expression in the statutory framework, where the second proviso to Section 16 of the Punjab Civil Servants Act, 1974 empowers the competent authority to determine arrears of pay when a dismissal, removal, or reduction in rank is set aside.[15] However, this discretion is not absolute. It must be exercised in accordance with constitutional guarantees and judicial principles.[16] In particular, if the foundational order is declared without lawful authority, then its consequences, including the denial of salary, must also be set aside.

13. That said, the basis for reinstatement influences the grant of back benefits. When reinstatement is granted on merits, for instance, where charges are disproved or found legally unsustainable, then full back benefits must follow as a matter of right.[17] The civil servant, having been wrongfully excluded from service, is entitled to be made whole. However, where reinstatement is based on procedural infirmities such as denial of a hearing or non-compliance with mandatory inquiry procedures, the award of back benefits may be deferred, pending the outcome of a fresh disciplinary inquiry. The principle here is to balance legal restoration with procedural fairness to the employer. Where a dismissal is found disproportionate and a lesser penalty is substituted such as forfeiture of increments or censure, the substitution must be deemed to operate retrospectively, as if the lesser penalty had been imposed ab initio. The civil servant, in such cases, is entitled to the full range of service-related benefits (salary, allowances, increments, seniority, and pension rights) for the intervening period, subject only to such deductions or limitations as are consistent with the nature of the modified or substituted penalty. If the substituted or modified penalty has any bearing on the quantum of back benefits, then the financial entitlements shall be calibrated accordingly, in a manner that reflects the revised disciplinary outcome without undermining the continuity of service. To deny such back benefits, despite acknowledging that the original penalty was excessive, would perpetuate the very disproportionality the Court seeks to remedy. This would offend the principles of fairness, non-discrimination, and proportionality embedded in Articles 4 and 25 of the Constitution. The Court, therefore, holds that in all such cases, the doctrine of constructive continuity shall apply: the civil servant shall be deemed to have remained in service subject to the modified or substituted penalty, and shall accordingly be entitled to all back benefits that would have accrued under the corrected disciplinary outcome.

14. Regardless of the extent of financial benefits granted, the intervening period between a civil servant's removal and subsequent reinstatement must be regularized to maintain the continuity of service. This is, however, a separate theme from back benefits. The reason for grant of extraordinary leave without pay or "leave of the kind due" is to ensure that the service record of the civil servant remains unbroken[18], thereby safeguarding eligibility for pension, promotion, seniority, and other ancillary service benefits. As held by this Court, any failure to recognize such intervening periods results in an unlawful forfeiture of rights already earned.[19] It constitutes a constructive discontinuity in service and violates both constitutional guarantees and statutory protections.

15. In this respect, constructive continuity functions as a constitutional bridge. It ensures that reinstatement is not an empty gesture but a restorative act, fully aligned with Articles 9, 10A, 14, and 25 of the Constitution. It prevents wrongful state action from leaving lasting scars on an individual's career and livelihood. To reinstate a civil servant without restoring their status, entitlements, and dignity is to offer a remedy that fails to remedy and justice that falls short of being just.

16. Applying these principles to C.P.L.A. No. 3453-L/2019 (Tahir Kazmi), the petitioner, a Head Constable in the Punjab Police, was compulsorily retired on account of an omission in the discharge of official duties. In departmental review, fault was indeed established, though not of a degree warranting compulsory retirement. Accordingly, the penalty was modified to forfeiture of two years of approved service. The Tribunal reinstated the petitioner but directed that the intervening period be treated as special casual leave without pay, thereby depriving him of all back benefits. No material was placed on record to suggest that the petitioner was gainfully employed during this period, nor was his reinstatement made conditional on any pending inquiry. In such circumstances, the denial of back benefits is both legally and constitutionally unsustainable. Once reinstated, the petitioner was entitled to be treated as if he had never left service. The impugned judgment fails to give effect to the doctrine of constructive continuity and ignores the petitioner's entitlement to full restitution. Denial of back benefits violate Articles 4, 9, 14, and 25 of the Constitution. As to the reduction of penalty from compulsory retirement to forfeiture of two years of approved service, we see no ground to interfere, and the petition is dismissed to that extent. Accordingly, the impugned judgment is modified to the extent that the petitioner is granted full back benefits, including arrears of pay, increments, and pensionary entitlements, subject to the effect of the modified penalty, with effect from 29.04.2011, the date on which the original penalty of compulsory retirement was imposed.

17. In C.P.L.A. No. 23-L/2022 (Ali Asghar), the petitioner was removed from service on account of being absent without authorization for 46 days. The Tribunal, while acknowledging the disproportionality of the penalty, modified it to forfeiture of three years of approved service and reinstated the petitioner. However, it simultaneously directed that the intervening period be treated as leave without pay, thereby denying all back benefits. While the petitioner was not fully exonerated, and some fault was duly attributed, he remains entitled to back benefits calibrated in accordance with the modified penalty. Once reinstated with a lesser punishment, the petitioner is to be treated as having remained in service, subject only to the consequences that lawfully flow from the substituted penalty. Denying all back benefits, despite setting aside the original penalty as excessive, amounts to a disproportionate outcome that undermines the principles of fairness and constructive continuity. As to the reduction of penalty from removal from service to forfeiture of three years of approved service, we see no ground to interfere, and the petition is dismissed to that extent. Accordingly, the petition is partially allowed. The impugned judgment is modified to the extent that the petitioner is granted back benefits, including arrears of pay, increments, and pensionary entitlements subject to the effect of the substituted penalty, with effect from 25.06.2014, the date on which the original penalty of removal from service was imposed.

18. These petitions are converted into appeals and partially allowed in the above terms.

ORDER

Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J.- The present petition arises out of a challenge to the auction of an immovable property conducted by a bank in execution of a money decree dated 26.04.2010. The auction took place in 2011. The petitioner promptly raised objections the same year, which were dismissed. An appeal was preferred before the High Court and remained pending for an extraordinary period of ten (10) years, culminating in a decision in 2021. The matter then reached this Court in 2022 and is being taken up now, three years later, in 2025.

2. The question that engages the attention of this Court is not limited to the validity of the auction; rather it extends to whether any meaningful relief can now be granted after the passage of fourteen years. Even if the petitioner's claim had merit, the sands of time have all but eroded its potency. Justice delayed is not merely justice denied; it is often justice extinguished. In this case, the petitioner's claim stands virtually interred under the weight of protracted judicial indifference.

3. It is telling that, after fourteen years since the auction and due notice, neither the petitioner nor any authorized representative has appeared before this Court to pursue the petition. In these circumstances, granting any further adjournment is both unwarranted and inconceivable. We have, nevertheless, undertaken a careful examination of the petitioner's objections and the record of the case. The objections to the auction proceedings do not appear to be tenable, and we find no reason to deviate from the concurrent findings of the courts below. Accordingly, the petition stands dismissed on merits as well as for non-prosecution. Office shall dispatch a copy of this order to the parties for information and record.

4. Having examined the case, the Court cannot remain indifferent to the systemic malaise of delay in the adjudication of cases. In this case the appeal of the petitioner kept pending before the High Court for ten (10) years. It is beyond cavil that delay in adjudicating cases by the courts at any tier of the justice system corrodes public confidence in the judiciary, undermines the rule of law, and disproportionately harms the weak and vulnerable who cannot afford the cost of prolonged litigation. Delay in adjudication carries severe macroeconomic and societal consequences: it deters investment, renders contracts illusory, and weakens the institutional legitimacy of the judiciary. A justice system's credibility rests not only in the fairness of its decisions but also in the timeliness with which those decisions are rendered.

5. The issue is not merely administrative, it is constitutional. The right to access to justice is guaranteed by Articles 4, 9 and 10A of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973.[1] It encompasses within it the right to a fair and timely trial. Delay that renders a remedy ineffective or a right illusory amount to a denial of due process. Justice, to be real, must be both just and timely.

Azizullah Memon PLD 1993 SC 341 and Benazir Bhutto v. Federation of Pakistan PLD 1988 SC 416.

6. The statistics speak for themselves. It is pertinent to highlight that over 2.2 million cases are currently pending before courts across Pakistan, including approximately 55,941 cases before this Court alone,[2] inspite of enhancing the number of judges at the Court. These figures are not abstract; they represent disputes suspended in time.

7. Delay in adjudication is not merely a by-product of docket congestion or branch-level inefficiencies; it is a deeper, structural challenge of judicial governance. The Court, as a matter of institutional policy and constitutional responsibility, must urgently transition toward a modern, responsive, and intelligent case management framework. Such a system must, at a minimum, ensure: the early fixation of cases on a non-discriminatory basis; the elimination of "queue-jumping" and preferential scheduling; the prioritization of matters involving constitutional, economic, or national importance without compromising the timely resolution of individual claims; the implementation of age-tracking protocols to automatically identify dormant cases; and the judicious use of Artificial Intelligence ("AI") tools to assist in scheduling and triage while preserving the sanctity of judicial discretion.

8. Judicial systems across the world have recognized that delay is not an intractable inevitability but a solvable institutional challenge. Countries such as Singapore, the United Kingdom, Brazil, Estonia, Canada, China, Denmark, and Australia have undertaken comprehensive reforms combining technology, structural innovation, and procedural discipline to reduce backlog and enhance judicial efficiency. Through tools such as e-filing, real-time dashboards, automated scheduling, and transparent digital oversight, these jurisdictions have moved from being passive custodians of dockets to active managers of justice delivery. These international experiences underscore a basic truth: delays in justice are not inevitable; they are a product of institutional design, and can be remedied with vision, planning, and resolve. The judiciary of Pakistan must draw upon these

Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J.– This case raises two foundational questions at the intersection of Islamic law, constitutional rights, and lived social realities: When does a Muslim woman become entitled to maintenance within a marriage? And, under what circumstances, if any, may a husband be excused from his marital obligation to pay maintenance to his wife? At stake is not merely the contemporary interpretation of Islamic law, but the very meaning of marriage (nikah) and marital relationship, the scope of financial independence of a woman within marriage and our Constitution's[1] promise to uphold the dignity, privacy and equality of an individual, the protection of the family and participation of women in all spheres of life.

[1] Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan (1973).

2. Brief facts giving rise to these questions are that marriage between the petitioner (wife) and the respondent (husband) was solemnized through the contract of marriage ("nikahnama") dated 02.11.2012. Though rukhsati[2] was mutually scheduled for February 2013, the respondent delayed it for over a year. In October 2013, the petitioner claimed maintenance for the period since marriage by approaching the Family Court, Faisalabad[3]. Despite submitting a written statement, the respondent remained absent during reconciliation proceedings, prompting the court to proceed ex-parte awarding maintenance at Rs. 3,000/- per month from the date of the marriage till the subsistence of the marriage through judgment and decree dated 12.03.2014. Aggrieved, both parties filed appeals before the learned District Judge, Faisalabad. Meanwhile the respondent divorced the petitioner on 02.05.2014. The District Court partly allowed the petitioner's appeal on 27.10.2014, dismissed that of the respondent, and enhanced the maintenance allowance from Rs. 3,000/- to Rs. 5,000/- per month till the subsistence of marriage.[4] Subsequently, both parties approached the Lahore High Court, Lahore and vide judgment dated 28.04.2015 ("impugned judgment"), the High Court allowed the respondent's petition on the ground that as the marriage was never "consummated," the petitioner was not entitled to maintenance and dismissed the petition of the petitioner and set aside the judgments and decrees of the courts below. Hence, the instant petition for leave to appeal and connected civil appeal[5] by the petitioner before this Court.

3. Learned counsel for the petitioner argued that the impugned judgment is legally unsustainable and contrary to settled principles of family law. He submitted that the petitioner was lawfully entitled to maintenance from the date of marriage until the date of divorce, particularly in view of the respondent's persistent failure to perform rukhsati and take the petitioner to her marital home. Conversely, learned counsel for the respondent-husband, Mr. Umer Ijaz Gilani, ASC appointed by the Court in view of the respondent's plea that

2 The English word for "rukhsati" is "to depart" or "to take leave". It refers to the ceremony where the bride leaves her family home to join her husband's household after the wedding. It can also be translated as "farewell" or "seeing- off".

3 The petitioner claimed monthly maintenance of Rs. 25,000, along with arrears for the period from November 2012 to October 2013.

4 It is noted that the appellate court failed to consider that, during the pendency of the appeal, the respondent had already divorced the petitioner.

5 The connected civil appeal was filed against the petition dismissed that of the petitioner by the Lahore High Court.

he was unable to engage counsel submitted that the respondent contracted marriage under family pressure and never promised for rukhsati. Being dissatisfied with the marriage from the outset, he subsequently divorced the petitioner. Referring to The Hidayah[6], learned counsel argued that a wife's entitlement to maintenance arises only once she shifts to the husband's residence, which, according to him, did not occur in the present case. Therefore, according to the learned counsel, the judgments and decrees of the courts below were based on a misapplication of the law and facts, and the High Court rightly set them aside through the impugned judgment.

Submissions of the Amici Curiae

4. Professor Khaled Abou El Fadl, in his amicus brief submitted via email from the University of California Los Angeles (UCLA), United States, addressed the classical juristic foundations of maintenance (nafaqa) under Islamic law. He noted that the concept of maintenance is traditionally rooted in iḥtibās, commonly understood as the wife's availability for the marital relationship. He outlined two principal juristic approaches. The majority Ḥanafī and early Shāfiʿī position holds that maintenance becomes obligatory upon the conclusion of a valid marriage contract, irrespective of consummation, unless the wife is at fault. In contrast, the Mālikī, Ḥanbalī, and later Shāfiʿī view links iḥtibās more narrowly to consummation. Even under the latter view, Professor El Fadl explained, if the wife offers herself for cohabitation and the husband fails to consummate the marriage through no fault of hers, her entitlement to maintenance may still arise. Ultimately, he endorsed the Ḥanafī position, firmly rejecting the notion that maintenance is a quid pro quo for conjugal access. He described such a framing as "clearly patriarchal and disrespectful towards women," arguing instead that maintenance becomes due upon the formation of a valid marriage contract. Professor El Fadl emphasized that once a valid contract is concluded, the wife "relies to her detriment" on the marital bond and becomes unavailable to other suitors, thereby acquiring a legitimate right to maintenance, even in the absence of consummation, particularly where the husband has failed to provide a marital home. He concluded his submissions by stating: "...that at a minimum, the position that would entirely be consistent with Sharīʿah is that if there is a valid contract, and a woman does not unreasonably refuse to consummate the marriage before seeking a divorce, then she should be entitled to nafaqa."

5. Dr. Muhammad Zubair Abbasi, similarly, contended that under both Islamic and Pakistani law, a husband's duty to maintain his wife arises immediately upon a valid marriage, regardless of rukhsati or consummation. He critiqued colonial-era interpretations[7] for embedding patriarchal assumptions that wrongly condition a wife's entitlement to maintenance on physical obedience or cohabitation. Contrasting this with the classical Islamic view of marriage as a solemn civil contract ('aqd) not a transactional exchange, Dr. Abbasi underscored that maintenance flows directly from the contract. Relying on Islamic principles, classical jurisprudence, and statutory developments such as Section 9 of the Muslim Family Laws Ordinance, 1961 ("MFLO") and Section 17A of the Family Courts Act, 1964 ("Act"), he argued that courts have rightly affirmed that consummation is not a precondition to maintenance. He submitted that unjustly tying maintenance to consummation undermines women's constitutional rights to dignity and equality under Articles 14, 25, and 35 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution"). In conclusion, Dr. Abbasi urged the Court to reaffirm that maintenance is a legal and constitutional duty activated by the marriage itself.

6. Ms. Fatima Yasmin Bokhari, argued that a wife's right to maintenance flows directly from the solemnization of a valid marriage, and is neither conditioned on consummation nor on the socio-cultural practice of rukhsati. Citing constitutional provisions, Islamic principles, and case law, she contended that making maintenance contingent on consummation undermines women's constitutional rights, enables bad- faith avoidance by husbands, and imposes an unfair evidentiary burden on wives. Ms. Bokhari called on the Court to move beyond patriarchal constructs historically embedded in classical jurisprudence. She critiqued the "maintenance–obedience complex" that links a wife's right to financial support to her physical submission, arguing that such a notion is neither Qur'anic nor consistent with contemporary Islamic values. She emphasized that Islam envisions marriage as a contract of [7] Legal historians have noted how the flexible and context-sensitive nature of classical fiqh was transformed into a rigid, codified system known as Anglo-Muhammadan Law, later termed Muslim Personal Law during the colonial period in British India. mutual respect, compassion, and reciprocity not subordination.[8] Maintenance, she submitted, is not a reward for obedience but a legal entitlement grounded in dignity and mutual care inherent in the marital bond. Referencing reforms in countries like Tunisia, Morocco, and Turkey, where obedience is no longer tied to maintenance, and marriage is redefined based on equality,[9] she called on the Court to affirm maintenance as an unconditional right consistent with both Islamic teachings and Pakistan's constitutional promise of gender justice and equality.

7. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties and have hugely benefited from the wisdom of the amici curiae. We have carefully examined the impugned judgment, the applicable law, and the record of the case. We now proceed to address the questions framed above.

A. When does a Muslim woman become entitled to maintenance within a marriage?

8. Marriage under Islamic law is regarded both as an act of devotion (ibadat) and a social transaction (muamalat).[10] According to Baillie, marriage, like other contracts requires declaration and acceptance for its constitution and both, must be expressed in such a manner as to demonstrate the intention, without any sort of ambiguity.[11] According to Dr. Tanzil-ur-Rahman, marriage or nikah is a religious legal contract that regularizes the physical relationship between man and woman, establishes the lineage of their progeny and creates civil rights and obligations between them.[12] The essential requirements of a valid marriage include offer (ijab) and acceptance (qabul),[13] exchanged either directly or through representatives or guardians,[14] along with free and informed consent.[15] These elements align with the statutory requirements for a valid civil contract and marriage is now established under our jurisprudence to be a solemn civil contract ('aqd ).[16] In Pakistan, every marriage solemnized under Muslim law must be registered under the MFLO,[17] and the nikahnama serves as the principal documentary proof.

9. While marriage under Islamic law is indeed a civil contract, it is far more than a mere legal arrangement; it is the foundation of a deeply personal and moral relationship rooted in mutual respect, compassion, and shared responsibility. The Qur'an describes the marital relationship as one of love (mawaddah) and mercy (rahmah)[18], and enjoins equitable treatment, protection, and financial support as essential obligations within this framework underscoring the spiritual and emotional dimensions that animate the marital union. Upon entering marriage, the wife commits not simply to a legal contract but to a marital relationship, a bond of care, dignity, and cohabitation. This relational commitment, rather than any notion of physical submission or patriarchal obedience, is what gives rise to the right of maintenance.

10. Maintenance flows not from dominance, but from the mutual obligations and moral fabric that underpin the marital bond. Any interpretation that reduces this right to the wife's subordination negates the ethical core of the relationship as envisioned by both the Qur'an and constitutional values such as dignity, equality, and non- discrimination. The entitlement to maintenance thus must be understood as a recognition of the wife's role in nurturing the marital relationship, not as a reward for submission, but as a legal and moral consequence of her commitment to that relationship.

11. All major Islamic schools of thought recognize maintenance as a legal right of the wife, grounded in the husband's financial responsibility and the imperative to uphold her dignity.[19] According to The Hidayah, "when a woman surrenders into the custody of her husband, it is incumbent upon him thence to supply her with food, clothing, and lodging."[20] This notion of "surrender" lies at the heart of what jurists have historically termed the "maintenance-obedience complex".[21] This is the idea that a wife's entitlement to maintenance is conditional upon her obedience, most often defined in terms of physical availability for conjugal relations. In classical jurisprudence, particularly within the Ḥanafī and Ḥanbalī schools, this was expressed through the doctrine of iḥtibās, which refers to the wife's seclusion or retention in the marital home for the husband's access. However, this reductive formulation, which treats marriage as a transactional exchange of physical obedience for material support, is incompatible with the Qur'anic vision of marriage as a solemn covenant based on affection and compassion. Modern Islamic legal thought, especially as shaped by the doctrine of Maqāṣid al-Sharīʿah (objectives of Islamic law), compels a broader and more egalitarian interpretation. As al-Ghazālī outlines in al-Mustaṣfā, the Sharīʿah seeks to protect five essentials: religion, life, intellect, family, and property.[22] Later scholars such as al- Shāṭibī (in al-Muwāfaqāt), Ibn ʿĀshūr, and Jasser Auda have extended these to include dignity, justice, and social well-being.[23] Applying this purposive framework, the institution of marriage is not premised on the wife's "surrender" but on mutual commitment, emotional and physical companionship, cooperation, and shared responsibility. A commitment that actualizes dignity, justice and social well-being. It aims to establish a moral and familial order rooted in justice and compassion[24] and entails mutual moral control, and not one-sided authority.[25]

12. Prominent contemporary scholars have sharply criticized the maintenance-obedience framework as both patriarchal and doctrinally unsound. Professor Khaled Abou El Fadl, after a thorough examination of classical sources, contends that treating maintenance as "compensation for sexual enjoyment" degrades women and violates the ethical foundations of the Sharīʿah. Dr. Abbasi has similarly challenged the colonial legacy embedded in South Asian jurisprudence, arguing that British judges selectively invoked Islamic principles to reinforce Victorian norms of male authority, thereby curtailing women's rights under the guise of Muslim personal law.[26] Fatima Bokhari has drawn attention to reforms in several Muslim-majority jurisdictions that have moved away from traditional notions of qiwāmah, wilāyah, and the "obedience-maintenance complex", opting instead for legal models premised on mutual respect and support rather than female subordination.[27] Accordingly, maintenance should not be viewed as a quid pro quo for physical obedience, but as an inherent legal and ethical obligation arising from the marital contract. It is intended to protect the wife's dignity, autonomy, and financial security. Interpretations that condition this entitlement on physical submission not only distort Islamic legal principles but also enable coercive control. A just and contemporary approach guided by Maqāṣid al-Sharīʿah, constitutional norms, and feminist jurisprudence must displace obedience-based reasoning in favor of frameworks that center equality, welfare, and mutual respect.

13. Maintenance as an obligation arising directly from the marital contract has also been affirmed by the statutory framework of Pakistan, which treats maintenance as an absolute and enforceable right, rather than a conditional or discretionary entitlement. Section 9[28] of the MFLO empowers a wife to initiate proceedings before the Family Court for the recovery of maintenance upon the husband's failure or neglect to provide for her, without requiring proof of consummation, cohabitation, or obedience. The provision reflects a rights-based orientation, enabling women to assert financial claims independently of social customs or physical residence with the husband. Similarly, Section 17A[29] of the Act enhances the enforceability of such claims by introducing an expeditious, summary procedure for the recovery of arrears of maintenance.[30] The introduction of this provision is a testament to the legislature's recognition of the structural barriers faced by women in asserting marital rights, and its attempt to provide a gender-sensitive and accessible remedial mechanism. Together, these statutes form a beneficial and pro-women legal framework[31] that affirms maintenance as a substantive, unqualified right flowing from the existence of a valid marriage not from performance, obedience, or physical availability. The courts in Pakistan have consistently interpreted these provisions in line with constitutional guarantees and Islamic legal principles, holding that a wife's entitlement to maintenance accrues immediately upon the solemnization of a valid marriage.[32]

Consequences of Nikah: Cultural Practices and Patriarchal Notions

14. Rukhsati, in our social fabric, is a customary practice marking the bride's departure from her parental home to join her husband. The term rukhsati literally means "to depart" or "to take leave,"[33] and while culturally significant, it holds no independent legal status under Islamic or statutory law.[34] While the solemnization of marriage marks the formal commencement of the marital relationship, it also carries immediate legal consequences under Islamic law, our jurisprudence and the statutory framework of Pakistan.[35] A valid marriage is not a mere ritual or symbolic act; it is the point from which the spouses assume legal status and corresponding rights and obligations.[36] The expression of acceptance at the time of marriage is the ultimate evidence of a woman's willingness to enter into the marital relationship and to discharge her matrimonial obligations.[37] A wife's right to maintenance becomes absolute when she demonstrates such willingness, which is reinforced from her waiting for rukhsati to be effected. To condition a wife's entitlement to maintenance on rukhsati or consumption undermines legal certainty and enables husbands to evade their financial responsibilities by invoking social customs or delaying performance. Such an approach imposes an unconstitutional burden on women and reinforces patriarchal norms that make a woman's financial rights contingent upon her physical availability or subservience. This is incompatible with the dignity and equality promised under the Constitution.

Answer to Question No. 1

15. A holistic reading of the aforesaid contemporary Islamic principles, constitutional and statutory protections, and judicial precedents affirms that the right to maintenance flows unconditionally from the solemnization of a valid marriage and constitutes a binding legal duty.

B. Under what circumstances, if any, may a husband be excused from his marital obligation to pay maintenance to his wife?

16. While the general rule is that maintenance becomes payable upon the solemnization of a valid marriage, classical Islamic jurisprudence does recognize narrowly defined exceptions where the wife's conduct may temporarily affect her entitlement to maintenance. Such as, according to Hidayah, if a wife is disobedient or refractory and departs from the matrimonial home without her husband's consent, she forfeits her right to maintenance until she returns and submits, as the breach of matrimonial restraint is attributed to her.[38] Baillie, similarly, observes that if the wife's conduct amounts to nushūz (rebellion), the husband would be justified in suspending maintenance.[39] Dr. Tanzil- ur-Rahman identifies the 'control' of husband over his wife as a condition precedent for his duty of maintenance. However, he acknowledges that where the husband, due to his own fault such as impotence or unwillingness to cohabit is unable to keep his wife with him, her entitlement to maintenance remains unaffected.[40] Historically, all the above referred interpretations and that of the classical doctrine of nushūz, particularly in the Ḥanafī and Ḥanbalī schools, that calls for submissiveness, obedience or surrender of wife, while placing the husband in control or ownership of wife, were interpreted through a patriarchal lens. These have reduced marital obligations to the wife's physical availability (iḥtibās) for conjugal access. Such formulation construes marriage as a transactional contract rather than a covenant based on mutual respect, emotional companionship, and shared responsibilities. Such a reductive view is incompatible with the higher objectives (Maqāṣid al-Sharīʿah),[41] which prioritize dignity, justice and human welfare. Contemporary jurists like Mohammad Hashim Kamali and Jasser Auda urge a shift from rule-based formalism to purpose-driven reasoning, where Sharīʿah is read as a living, ethical system aligned with fundamental rights and evolving social realities.[42] Accordingly, the husband may be excused from paying maintenance only in very limited circumstances where he can prove, through clear and cogent evidence, that the wife has wholly and unjustifiably repudiated the marital relationship, including emotional, residential, and relational aspects. The burden of proof lies squarely on the husband. A refusal to cohabit arising from abuse, neglect, coercive control, behaviour or absence of appropriate living arrangements does not amount to nushūz or unjustifiable repudiation of the marital relationship by the wife. Where the husband fails to effect rukhsati, does not provide a residence, withholds the agreed dower,[43] or fails to facilitate travel documentation (e.g., a visa), the wife's non-cohabitation cannot be construed as voluntary withdrawal from marital relationship. In such cases, her entitlement to maintenance remains intact.

17. More troublingly, conditioning a wife's entitlement to maintenance on proof of consummation creates an untenable and constitutionally suspect standard. It forces women to disclose intimate and deeply private aspects of their married life in public judicial proceedings, contrary to their constitutional right to dignity and privacy under Article 14 of the Constitution. The burden to prove or disprove consummation, a fact often unverifiable and inherently private, places women in an impossible position and risks compounding their vulnerability within the justice system. To interpret nushūz in such contexts is not only doctrinally flawed but also facilitates coercive control and economic subjugation. Denying maintenance under these circumstances weaponizes patriarchal customs and undermines the ethical foundations of Islamic law. This exception, therefore, must be narrowly construed and reformulated through the lens of Maqāṣid al-Sharīʿah, constitutional guarantees of equality, dignity, and social justice under Articles 14, 25 and 35 of the Constitution, and progressive jurisprudence. The above lens provides that unreasonable and unjustified denial or withdrawal of the wife from a marital relationship is the only exception to grant of maintenance.

Answer to Question No. 2

18. A husband may only be excused from paying maintenance where he proves through clear, cogent, and compelling evidence that the wife has wholly and unjustifiably withdrawn from the marital relationship including its emotional, residential, and relational aspects. The burden of proof lies squarely on the husband. This exception in favour of the husband must be narrowly construed to support structural gender inequalities which demand a cautious and rights- oriented approach to interpreting such exceptions, ensuring that maintenance remains a shield against economic vulnerability, not a tool of coercion.

Conclusion

19. A holistic reading of contemporary Islamic jurisprudence, statutory enactments, constitutional protections, and judicial precedents affirm that a wife's right to maintenance is neither contingent upon consummation or rukhsati, nor subject to the discretion of the husband. It flows unconditionally from the solemnization of a valid marriage and constitutes a binding legal duty. In essence, the only legitimate ground for suspending this obligation arises where the husband discharges a high burden of proof to establish that the wife has wholly and without justification withdrawn from the marital relationship understood not merely as physical access but encompassing the full spectrum of emotional, residential, and relational life. Absent such proof, the obligation to provide maintenance persists. This understanding not only gives effect to the egalitarian spirit of Islamic law but also reinforces the constitutional commitment to dignity (Article 14), equality (Article 25), and protection of the family unit (Article 35). In a patriarchal society, where economic dependence often fuels systemic injustice, the right to maintenance must be safeguarded as an essential constitutional, legal, and ethical entitlement. Any attempt to curtail it must therefore be subjected to the strictest constitutional and jurisprudential scrutiny.

The present case

20. In the present case, there is no dispute that the parties entered into a valid marriage. Nor is there any allegation, much less evidence, that the petitioner refused consummation or cohabitation without reasonable cause. On the contrary, the record reveals that the respondent failed to provide a marital abode, made no arrangements for rukhsati, and did not take steps to fulfill his basic obligations under the marital contract. There is similarly no factual or legal basis in the record to invoke the narrow exception to the respondent's obligation of maintenance. No credible evidence has been led to suggest that the petitioner willfully withdrew from the marital relationship or refused cohabitation without valid cause. The wife's inability to cohabit due to the husband's own failure to facilitate rukhsati does not defeat her claim to maintenance.[44] She cannot be penalized for non-consummation that resulted from the respondent's own inaction. To suggest otherwise would allow men to weaponize the absence of consummation often caused by their own neglect as a mean to escape financial responsibility, thereby trapping women in marriages devoid of both rights and dignity. In view of these settled principles, the Court finds that the petitioner's right to maintenance accrued upon the solemnization of marriage and continued throughout the subsistence of the marital bond. Considering that the divorce took place during the pendency of the said litigation, the maintenance period will continue till the period of iddat. The denial of maintenance in the present case, in light of the respondent's default and the absence of any fault on part of the wife, was contrary to law and is accordingly set aside.

21. In view of the foregoing discussion, the impugned judgment is set aside. The wife's entitlement to maintenance from the date of valid marriage is affirmed in the sum for Rs 5000/- per month adjudicated upon by the District Court and shall also include maintenance for the period of iddat. The petition is accepted, converted into an appeal, and allowed. The connected civil appeal is also allowed.

22. The Court deems it important to acknowledge the valuable role of amici curiae in assisting on complex questions of constitutional law, Islamic jurisprudence, and gender justice. The Court records its appreciation for the invaluable assistance rendered by Professor Khaled Abou El Fadl, Dr. Muhammad Zubair Abbasi, and Ms. Fatima Yasmin Bokhari for their insightful submissions, which greatly aided the Court's deliberations. Their interventions anchored in international human rights, Islamic law and constitutional law brought comparative depth, sharpened normative clarity, and helped contextualize the matter within broader global frameworks.

23. The institution of the amicus is essential to ensuring that adjudication remains informed, inclusive, and principled. It is imperative that constitutional courts in Pakistan continue to institutionalize this practice, especially in matters of significant public consequence or global relevance. The amicus curiae serve as a vital bridge between law and justice, local realities and global perspectives, the bench and the academy. Embracing this inclusive model of judicial deliberation enhances not only the legitimacy and quality of judgments, but also affirms the judiciary's commitment to learning, openness, and constitutional dialogue.

24. Before parting, we find it imperative to offer guidance on a foundational aspect of judicial responsibility: the role of judicial language. In family law adjudication, the impact of a judge's words extends far beyond the courtroom. It is therefore essential to consider how judicial language can either uphold or undermine the values our Constitution enshrines.

Gender sensitive judicial language

25. We note with concern the language used in the impugned judgment, which states that "…maintenance allowance is the right of wife after consummation of marriage and after crossing the barrier, it becomes the responsibility of the husband to maintain his wife."[45] This formulation is deeply patriarchal. The language employed by courts in family law cases does more than resolve individual disputes; it actively shapes public understanding of rights and obligations within marriage and the broader family structure. Judicial language carries normative force. It influences how justice is perceived, internalized, and practiced. Terms such as "surrender," or "submit" are rooted in patriarchal frameworks and reinforce outdated notions of gender hierarchy and female subordination. These expressions cast women as passive recipients in marriage rather than equal partners, undermining their legal and constitutional status. It is therefore imperative that judicial reasoning and expression be firmly anchored in the constitutional values of dignity, equality, and non-discrimination, while also reflecting the lived realities of litigants and the prevailing social context. Judges, particularly in family law matters, are not merely arbiters of individual disputes; they are reformers and thought leaders capable of guiding society toward progressive and inclusive thinking. They bear a constitutional and ethical duty to adopt gender-sensitive, rights-based language that affirms the equal legal status of women as full and autonomous persons. Judicial decisions must avoid stereotypes, promote tolerance, and embody the principles of substantive justice.[46] In fulfilling this transformative role under the Constitution, the judiciary does more than interpret law; it reshapes societal attitudes and advances equality through every word it speaks. Language is never neutral. It either reinforces the status quo or propels society toward a more just and equal future.

JUDGMENT

Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J.- Brief facts of the case are that the petitioner joined the erstwhile Oil and Gas Development Corporation ("Corporation") established under the Oil and Gas Development Corporation Ordinance, 1961 ("Ordinance, 1961") as Accounts Assistant (BPS-14) 02.02.1995, after having earlier served with the Pakistan Military Accounts Department Office, Wah Cantt. During his service, the Oil and Gas Development Corporation (Reorganization) Ordinance, 2001 ("Ordinance, 2001") was promulgated, and the Corporation was converted into the Oil and Gas Development Company Limited ("Company"). The petitioner, by operation of law, became the employee of the Company and finally retired from service on attaining the age of superannuation as Senior Accountant (E-04) on 17.06.2021, after rendering a total service of 40 years and 10 months.[1]

[1] Counting his previous service with Pakistan Military Accounts Department Office of the Controller of Factories Accounts, Wah Cantt of 14 years 05 months and 15 days from 17.08.1980 to 01.02.1995. Reference is made to Office Memorandum of the Company, dated 23.06.2021.

2. The claim of the petitioner is that as per Regulation 15(1A) of the Oil and Gas Development Corporation Pension and Gratuity Regulations, 1985 ("Pension Regulations") framed by the erstwhile Corporation, with the prior approval of the Federal Government, he is entitled to 2% of the gross pension for each extra year of service rendered by him beyond 30 years of qualifying service subject to a maximum of 10% of his gross pension. This pension has been referred to in the documents, perhaps for convenience, as Additional Pension.

3. The claim of the petitioner was denied vide Office Memorandum dated 20.08.2021 by the Company. The petitioner challenged the said decision before the Islamabad High Court through a constitutional petition which was dismissed vide judgment dated 02.02.2022, hence, the instant petition.

4. Learned counsel for the petitioner argued that the petitioner is entitled to Additional Pension under Regulation 15 (1A) of the Pension Regulations and being a former employee of the Corporation, his terms and conditions of service are protected under Section 5 of the Ordinance, 2001. He added that Regulation 265 of the Oil and Gas Development Corporation Employees (Service) Regulations, 1994 ("Service Regulations"), which provides that the directives or instructions issued by the Federal Government shall be complied with and carried out by the Company, cannot override the statutory protection extended under Ordinance, 2001. Hence, the Office Memorandum dated 04.09.2001 ("OM") issued by the Finance Division, Government of Pakistan, discontinuing Additional Pension has no bearing on the petitioner, who is an erstwhile employee of the Corporation. He also referred to letters dated 01.02.2005 and 23.05.2010 issued by the Company declaring that employees of the Company are not civil servants but are employees of an autonomous body governed by its own Regulations.

5. Learned counsel for the respondent Company, while supporting the impugned judgment, submits that under Regulation 265 of the Service Regulations, the Board of Directors of the Company are bound by the directives and instructions issued by the Federal Government. He referred to the OM dated 04.09.2001 as the directive/instruction of the Federal Government and underlined Clause C of Part-III (Pension and Commutation) of the said OM to point out that Additional Pension has since been discontinued - this being binding on the Company - it could not grant Additional Pension to the petitioner. Alternatively, he submits that as per the decision of the Board of Directors taken in the 145th meeting of the Board on 17.01.2013, it has been resolved that the maximum scale of gross pension shall continue to be equal to 70% of the pensionable salary upon completion of 30 years or more service at the time of retirement. Hence even for this reason the petitioner cannot be given pension for extra years of service.

6. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties, examined the record of the case and have gone through the law on the subject. The legislative framework, forming the background of this case, provides that Ordinance, 1961 established the Corporation for the purpose of exploration and development of oil and gas resources. It further provided for the Board of Directors of the Corporation, the powers and functions of the Corporation, and the power of the Federal Government and the Corporation to make Rules and Regulations, respectively. It is an admitted position between the parties that no Rules were formulated by the Corporation. However, under Section 30 of the Ordinance, 1961, with the previous approval of the Central Government,[2] the Corporation made the Pension & the Service Regulations, referred to above. Subsequently, need was felt to convert the Corporation into the Company and therefore Ordinance, 2001 was promulgated on 5 July 2001 (w.e.f. 23 October 1997) whereby the Corporation was converted into a public limited company incorporated under the Companies Ordinance, 1984. Sections 4 and 5 of Ordinance, 2001 provide that the Company shall own all the assets, properties, etc of the Corporation, be entitled to the benefit of all the notifications (including the notified Regulations mentioned above) issued for the working of the Corporation, be liable to pay all liabilities and obligations of the Corporation and that the employees of the Corporation shall be deemed to be the employees of the Company on the same remuneration and other conditions of service, rights and privileges including pension, etc. It is an admitted position between the parties that the Pension and Service Regulations made under the erstwhile Ordinance continue to regulate the affairs of the Company. Even otherwise, this Court has already affirmed the continuing enforceability of these Regulations even after promulgation of Ordinance, 2001.[3] Besides, under Section 24 of the General Clauses Act 1897, the Regulations are deemed to have been issued under Ordinance, 2001 unless inconsistent with the said Ordinance.

7. Section 5 of the Ordinance 2001 provides that all employees of the Corporation shall on the date of incorporation of the Company be deemed to be the employees of the Company on the same remuneration and other conditions of service, rights and privileges including the pension, provident fund and gratuity as were applicable to them before the conversion of the Corporation into the Company. This provision saves and protects the terms and conditions of the employees of the erstwhile Corporation. Under Regulation 15(1A) of the Pension Regulations, the benefit of Additional Pension was extended to the employees of the Corporation on 19.04.1987.[4] As per the respondents, the benefit of Additional Pension has been withdrawn under the OM dated 04.09.2001 which being a directive/instruction of the Federal Government is binding on the Company under Regulation 265 of the Service Regulation.

8. We would first like to examine the OM to see if it is a directive /instruction issued by the Federal Government to the Board of Directors of the Company. The OM is titled: REVISION OF BASIC PAY SCALES AND FRINGE BENEFITS OF CIVIL EMPLOYEES (BPS-1-22) OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT (2001) and provides at the outset that the President has been pleased to sanction a scheme for the civil employees of the Federal Government. Under PART-III of the

[4] By amending the Pension Regulations through SRO No. 292(I)/87

OM dealing with PENSION AND COMMUTATION, it provides that the Government has made the following reforms in respect of all pensioners of the Federal Government. In the end, the OM has been copied to all the Ministries, Divisions and Departments of the Federal Government. Nowhere from the reading of the OM can it be shown that it is a directive / instruction issued to the Board of Directors of the Company. There is also nothing on the record to show that the said OM was separately dispatched to the Board of Directors of the Company as a directive/instruction. No receipt of any such directive/instruction has been placed on the record by the Company. The OM was issued by the Finance Division of the Federal Government for the regulation of its own employees. It is an admitted position that the employees of the Company are not civil servants, hence for the OM to be a directive or instruction addressed to the Board of Directors of the Company, special reference had to be made in this regard. In its absence the OM does not purport to operate as a directive or instruction under the law. The assumption in this case that the OM is a directive or instruction issued to the Board of Directors of the Company is seriously misconceived. This aspect of the matter went unnoticed and unexamined by the High Court even in the earlier litigation (Abdullah case referred hereunder). Further, the submission of the learned counsel for the respondent Company that twelve years later on 17.01.2013 the Board of Directors of the Company in the 145th meeting of the Board resolved to discontinue Additional Pension confirms that no directive/instruction in this regard was ever issued to the Company earlier, otherwise, there was no need for the Board to pass such a resolution a decade later. Hence, the OM dated 04.09.2001 cannot be constructed as a directive or instruction issued to the Company by the Federal Government under Regulation 265.

9. As an alternative, the learned counsel for the Company referred to the decision of the Board of Directors passed in the year 2013 (12 years after the said OM) on 17.01.2013 (reflected in the letter dated 25.02.2013) which without reference to the said OM states that the Board of Directors have resolved that the maximum scale of gross pension shall continue to be equal to 70% of the pensionable salary upon completion of 30 years or more service at the time of retirement. Any such Board decision is inconsequential as the same is in violation of Section 5 of Ordinance, 2001 read with Regulation 15 (1A) of the Pension Regulations. Other than the statutory protection enjoyed by the employees under Section 5 as discussed above, the said Regulations were framed in the year 1985 (and amended in 1987) after seeking prior approval of the Federal Government in terms of Section 30 of the erstwhile Ordinance, 1961. The said Regulations are still in the field and enjoy a higher statutory force than a Board Resolution of the Company and unless the said Regulations are amended by the Company with the prior approval of the Federal Government, the decision of the Board of Directors cannot override the said Regulations. Hence both the decision of the Board dated 17.1.2013 and its policy announcement through letter dated 25.02.2013 are not sustainable being in violation of Ordinance 2001 and the Pension Regulations.

10. As a last recourse, learned counsel for the petitioner has referred to a judgment passed by the Islamabad High Court dated 08.10.2020 in favour of the Company against which leave was declined by this Court vide order dated 07.04.2023 in Abdullah v. Managing Director CEO OGDCL[5] . Abdullah upholds the OM, assuming that the OM was a directive issued to the Board of Directors of the Company by the Federal Government – it does not examine the factual and legal status of the directive/instruction as done in this case. Abdullah is also silent regarding the scope of statutory protection extended to the employees under Section 5 of Ordinance, 2001 and under the Pension Regulations, hence it is distinguishable from the present case. Further, with respect, Abdullah does not decide any question of law or enunciate any principle of law and is a leave declining order, thus it does not pass as a binding precedent.[6]

11. We have also gone through the decision of the Company whereby claim of the petitioner was declined through an OM dated 20.08.2021. Perusal of this OM shows that the request of the petitioner was turned down on the ground that his claim was allegedly against the Rules and Policy of the Company. It is an admitted position between the parties that the Corporation or now the Company have not yet come up with any Rules and secondly, the Policy announcement dated 25.02.2013 by the Company has hereinabove been declared to be violative of Section 5 of the Ordinance, 2001 and the Pension Regulations. Hence, the OM dated 20.08.2021 was issued without keeping in view the statutory framework regulating the working of the Company and is therefore set aside.

12. Having decided that the OM dated 04.09.2001 does not constitute a directive or instruction under Regulation 265 of the Service Regulations and the decision of the Board of Directors dated 17.1.2013 does not hold, as discussed above, we now proceed to discuss the overall scheme of the law to underline that the Company enjoys autonomy in managing its internal governance.

13. The creation of the Corporation under the Ordinance, 1961 was not a mere bureaucratic arrangement but a deliberate legislative choice to insulate a vital sector of the economy from the day-to-day interference of ministerial control. The statute envisaged a Board of Directors empowered to conduct the affairs of the Corporation "on commercial considerations having regard to public interest" while federal directives were binding only insofar as they fell within the domain of policy. Significantly, it was the Board itself which was authorised to determine whether a matter constituted "policy"[7]. This governance architecture reflected the legislative intent: to endow the Corporation with institutional autonomy so that commercial decisions could be taken in the best interest of the enterprise and the country, free from fluctuating political currents.

[7] See Section 4 of the Ordinance, 1961

14. The transition of the Corporation into a public limited company in 2001 strengthened, rather than diluted, this autonomy. By registering it as a company limited by shares under the Companies Ordinance, 1984 subject to the fiduciary duties of its directors and the discipline of company law, the legislature shifted the governance model closer to that of the private sector, where independent Boards are entrusted with decision-making in the interests of the company and its stakeholders. This progression underscores a legislative trajectory toward greater independence, transparency, and accountability in the governance of state-owned enterprises. Accordingly, any statutory reference of adherence to government directives/instructions cannot be read as compelling the Board to mechanically implement instructions. Such a reading would negate both the original intent of the Ordinance, 1961 and the autonomy conferred under the Ordinance, 2001 corporate structure. Rather, it is incumbent upon the Board to assess whether a directive is commercially sound, consistent with the fiduciary duty of directors, in furtherance of the company's statutory purpose and in the general public interest. Only if these conditions are satisfied can a directive legitimately become part of the Company's internal governance. To hold otherwise would reduce the Board to a mere rubber stamp, defeating the very rationale for creating autonomous commercial entities under the law. Public corporations are designed not as extensions of government departments but as independent bodies entrusted with bringing efficiency, autonomy, and commercial discipline to vital sectors of economic activity.

15. Commercial autonomy is thus not only a legislative design but also a constitutional necessity for public sector companies engaged in strategic areas of the economy. Strong, independent public institutions are the bedrock of economic development, good governance, and the rule of law. When boards of statutory corporations or public companies are permitted to exercise independent judgment, they advance the twin objectives of commercial viability and public interest, thereby serving the larger purposes of the State. Conversely, when such bodies are reduced to administrative subordinates of the executive, both economic growth and democratic accountability suffer. In a constitutional democracy committed to the separation of powers and the strengthening of institutions, autonomy of state-owned enterprises is therefore indispensable.

16. We also wish to reiterate that pension is not a matter of bounty, charity, or benevolence - it is a right protected under Articles 9 and 14 of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution") and inseparably linked with the right to life, dignity and livelihood[8], for without sustenance in old age, these rights ring hollow. It should be taken more seriously for those public servants for whom it is a crystallized return on years of faithful service, a form of deferred wages earned through the sweat, labour, and loyalty of an employee. It embodies the principle that those who serve must not be cast aside in their twilight years. To deny or withhold pension is to strip a person of the security they have justly earned, leaving them exposed to indignity, vulnerability, and want. Therefore this right must be protected in the shape of the grant of pension that is not only adequate but also predictable.[9] Moreover, an element of respect and empathy is to be maintained while granting pension which would be in consonance with the values that our Constitution espouses with dignity as the highest constitutional value.[10] The law itself stands as a shield to protect the rights of such employees, ensuring that long- earned entitlements are not eroded by institutional caprice. Ordinance, 2001, therefore, not only recognizes but also protects pension by ensuring that the terms and conditions of service of the employees of the erstwhile Corporation, and now of the successor Company, cannot be altered to their disadvantage. To trifle with pension is, therefore, to trifle with constitutional justice itself.

17. In case the compliance report is not received till the first week of November 2025, the case will be put up on the judicial side for necessary orders. ORDER

Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J.- The case of the petitioners, who were then Sub-Inspectors, was that the promotion of the petitioners to the post of Inspector (BPS-16) should have been considered from August, 2015 when 25 vacancies to the post of Inspector occurred. It is an admitted position between the parties that in August, 2015, there were 25 vacancies for the post of Inspectors. However, due to pending litigation where stay orders were granted by the High Court and subsequently by the Federal Service Tribunal, Departmental Promotion Committee (DPC) could not be held till 10.10.2017. The reason behind the grant of stay orders was that Federal Service Tribunal through its decision dated 08.04.2015, decided that the seniority list of the Sub-Inspectors including women and men officers ought to be combined, which was finally resolved through the Anomaly Committee and the consolidated seniority list was issued on 03.04.2017 and the stay orders were finally vacated on 24.07.2017. As a result, the DPC was held immediately thereafter on 10.10.2017 and the petitioners were promoted to the post of Inspector.

2. The petitioners (in person) have argued that even if the DPC was to be held on 10.10.2017, which was delayed for almost two years, is for no fault of theirs and they should have been considered for promotion with effect from August, 2015 when admittedly 25 vacancies of inspectors were available. They relied on Asad[1], wherein this Court has held that seats have to be filled from the date of the vacancy. They have taken us through the minutes of the DPC held on 10.10.2017 and pointed out that 42 seats were to be filled in the said DPC. We have noticed that the 04 petitioners before us fell in the top 25 of the 42 seats to be filled in the DPC held on 10.10.2017 after disregarding the candidates deferred in the said meeting. Hence, it is argued that had the same DPC been held in 2015, the four petitioners would have been entitled to be considered for promotion against 25 posts. In this case, the vacancy admittedly occurred in August, 2015 and all of the petitioners qualified within the 25 slots available in August, 2015. Therefore, the petitioners should have been promoted with effect from August, 2015.

3. Learned Additional Attorney General has placed reliance on Asad Hussain vs. The Controller General of Accounts, Federal Co-operative Building Sector G-5, Islamabad and another (2025 SCMR 1515), Naseem Khan vs. The Government of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa through Chief Secretary KPK Peshawar and others (2024 SCMR 1341), Muhammad Amjad vs. The Director General Quetta Development Authority and another (2022 SCMR 797) and contends that in this particular case the delay in the DPC was for no fault of the Government, therefore, the benefit of granting promotion to the petitioners from the date when vacancies were available is not permissible.

4. We have heard the learned counsel for both the parties and have examined the record in detail.

[1] Asad Hussain vs. The Controller General of Accounts, Federal Co-operative Building Sector G-5, Islamabad and another (2025 SCMR 1515)

5. It is a well-settled principle, recognized in our jurisprudence and consistently affirmed in comparative public law, that a civil servant's claim to promotion crystallises the moment a vacancy within their quota arises, provided they meet the prescribed eligibility criteria. At that stage, a corresponding duty is cast upon the competent authority to consider the officer's case fairly and in good time. Administrative indecision, internal disputes, or managerial laxity cannot be pleaded as excuses to defer the process once a substantive vacancy exists. The failure to act amounts to arbitrariness and undermines the doctrine of legitimate expectation, which demands that civil servants be treated in accordance with established norms of fairness and predictability.

6. The settled principle of public administration is that every sanctioned post exists to serve a functional need of the State, and must be filled within a reasonable time after falling vacant. Unless a post has been lawfully abolished, frozen pursuant to a demonstrable policy of fiscal constraint, or withheld due to overriding and transparent public exigencies, the administration is bound to proceed with filling it. Vacancies left unaddressed foster ad-hocism, informal delegation, and opacity, which in turn open the door to nepotism and favouritism. Such practices not only corrode the principles of merit and transparency but also offend the guarantees of equality before law and equal protection of law under Articles 4 and 25, as well as the constitutional injunction of Article 27 that no citizen shall be discriminated against in appointments to the service of Pakistan. Nepotism and favouritism strike at the heart of constitutional morality: they transform public office from a position of trust into a tool of patronage, thereby weakening institutional integrity and eroding public confidence in the fairness of the system.

7. Public institutions are not the private preserves of those who manage them, but repositories of public trust. Their strength lies in the timely and transparent deployment of sanctioned human resources. Failure to fill vacancies without lawful justification not only diminishes institutional performance but also undermines the confidence of civil servants and the public alike. A vacancy is not an empty formality: it represents the people's need for service, which the State is constitutionally bound to meet. see Asad.

8. Petitioner has relied on the phrase "unjustified delays" in the afore-cited judgment to argue that the delay was due to the grant of stay orders by the Court, hence it was no fault of the department. It is a settled principle of service jurisprudence that when a vacancy arises it must be filled without unjustified delay, for timely consideration is an essential incident of service and an element of fair treatment under Articles 4 and 25 of the Constitution. The delay in the present case cannot be regarded as justified. It was occasioned by litigation arising out of irregularities in the seniority list prepared by the Department itself, which litigation was ultimately decided against the Department. The stay orders, therefore, were a direct consequence of the Department's own flawed exercise and not of any conduct attributable to the petitioners. To describe such delay as "justified" would, in effect, permit the administration to take advantage of its own wrong and visit innocent officers with the adverse consequences of disputes in which they had no role. This would be wholly inequitable and inconsistent with the doctrine of legitimate expectation, which entitles civil servants to be considered for promotion as soon as vacancies arise.

9. Delay must always be assessed through a civil servant-centric lens: Was the officer in any way responsible for the obstruction? If not, the protection of his rights cannot be made contingent upon protracted departmental disputes or collateral litigation. In this case, the petitioners were blameless, and the delay—spanning over two years—was excessive by any standard of reasonableness. To accept the Department's argument would mean that even if such litigation dragged on for a decade or more, eligible officers would be deprived of promotion until the very end of their careers, thereby reducing the constitutional guarantee of fair consideration to a mere formality. Such an outcome cannot be countenanced. The fair and lawful course, therefore, is to reckon the petitioners' promotion from the date the vacancies first arose in August 2015, notwithstanding the intervening delay.

10. For the above reasons, impugned judgment dated 26.01.2022 passed by the Tribunal is set aside and the instant petitions are converted into appeal and allowed.

For the Petitioners: Barrister Umer Aslam Khan, AAG Pak.

For the Respondent: Mr. Zubair Hussain, ASC

Date of Hearing: 13.10.2025

ORDER

Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J.- Brief facts of the case are that adverse remarks were recorded against the respondent in the year 2013. Subsequently, his case came before the Departmental Promotion Committee ("DPC") for promotion to the post of Sub-Engineer B&R Grade-I (BS-14) in 2015 but he was superseded on the ground of these adverse remarks. The respondent met the same fate in the DPCs held in 2016, 2017, 2018, and 2019. He separately challenged the adverse remarks, which were finally set aside by the Federal Service Tribunal on 26.09.2018, and that decision was upheld by this Court on 06.05.2019. Afterward, the DPC convened in March 2020 and promoted the respondent with effect from 22.07.2020.

2. The respondent contends that he ought to have been promoted from 27.07.2015 – the date when he first became entitled to promotion – but was wrongfully superseded on the basis of adverse remarks that no longer exist in the record. His departmental representation claiming ante-dated promotion was rejected on 09.12.2020. The subsequent representation also failed, leading him to file an appeal before the Tribunal, which through the impugned judgment dated 02.11.2022, allowed his claim and held that he was entitled to be promoted from 2015. The Government has assailed this judgment before us.

3. Learned Additional Attorney General for Pakistan submits that the respondent's departmental representation was barred by time, rendering the appeal before the Tribunal incompetent. On merits, he argues that the respondent never challenged the DPC decisions for 2015 to 2019, and as those orders of supersession still subsist, he cannot now claim ante-dated or pro-forma promotion. He relies upon Abdul Ghani Chaudhry v. Secretary Establishment, Islamabad and others (1998 SCMR 2544).

4. Conversely, learned counsel for the respondent refers to paragraph 7 of the impugned judgment, wherein the Tribunal found sufficient cause to condone the delay in filing the departmental representation. It held that the respondent received the relevant communication on 03.02.2021 and, given the security and access constraints of his posting, the delay was justified. He further submits that once the adverse remarks – the sole reason for all supersessions – were set aside by a competent forum and the decision attained finality up to this Court, the supersession orders automatically lost all legal efficacy.

5. We have heard learned counsel and examined the record. On limitation, we find no error in the Tribunal's reasoning. It duly considered the factual circumstances, recorded sufficient cause, and exercised its discretion judiciously in condoning the delay. No interference is warranted on that score.

6. On merits, the core issue is whether the respondent was required to challenge each supersession order separately when all such orders were founded exclusively on adverse remarks that were subsequently annulled. The answer must plainly be in the negative. Once the adverse remarks were expunged by the Tribunal and that finding was upheld by this Court, they ceased to exist in the service record ab initio. In the eye of law, they are deemed never to have been recorded. Consequently, any supersession resting entirely on those remarks collapses with them. It is a settled principle that when the foundation of an administrative order disappears, the superstructure built upon it cannot survive. The orders of supersession were derivative and consequential in nature; once their premise was extinguished, they stood denuded of all legal effect. Non-challenge to such supersession orders, therefore, carries no independent significance. One cannot be compelled to challenge a shadow of a decision whose substratum has been judicially erased. The insistence that the respondent should have separately impugned those orders amounts to requiring a meaningless formality – an exercise in futility that the law does not demand. The dictum in Abdul Ghani Chaudhry is distinguishable, as the case does not discuss the effect of the setting aside of the adverse remarks, which are the basis of supersessions in this case.

7. For these reasons, we find no error in the Tribunal's conclusion that the respondent's promotion should relate back to 2015, when he first became eligible and would have been promoted but for the unlawful adverse remarks. We accordingly decline leave to appeal. The petition is dismissed.

Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J.- The question before us is whether marriage can disqualify a daughter from appointment under the quota reserved for the children of civil servants who die or become incapacitated while in service.

The mother of Farakh Naz (petitioner) was an employee at the Education Department, Government of the KPK, who retired from service on medical grounds on 27 April 2022. As a consequence, the petitioner was appointed as a Primary School Teacher (Basic Pay Scale-12) at Government Girls Primary School, Tatar Khel No. 2, District Karak, Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, under the deceased or incapacitated employee's quota under Rule 10(4) of the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Civil Servants (Appointment, Promotion, and Transfer) Rules, 1989 ("Rules"), vide order dated 8 January 2023. The petitioner was performing her duties, when the District Education Officer (Female), District Karak suddenly withdrew petitioner's appointment order without issuing a show-cause notice, vide order dated 12 May 2023, on the basis that the petitioner got married. This termination was based on a clarification letter dated 21 February 2022[1], which stipulated that the benefit of appointment under the quota is not available to a female who has contracted marriage. Further, clarification dated 28 April 2023[2] provided that a married daughter may again be considered eligible for appointment if she has separated from her husband and is dependent on her parents. Aggrieved of her termination order, the petitioner filed a departmental appeal against the impugned order which was rejected vide order dated 29 August 2023. Consequently, the petitioner preferred an appeal before the Khyber Pakhtunkhwa Service Tribunal, Peshawar, ("Tribunal"), challenging the impugned order, which was dismissed vide judgment dated 14 February 2024 ("impugned judgment"). Hence, the instant petition for leave to appeal.

[1] The clarification provides: The facility of employment to one of the children of the deceased/invalidated government servant is given in view of their dependence on their parents. The

2. The learned counsel for the petitioner contended that in Zahida[3] a similar withdrawal order has already been set aside by this Court and prays for the same relief. He further argues that termination was affected without adhering to the due process of law, particularly in the absence of any show-cause notice or opportunity of hearing. Conversely, the learned counsel for the respondents supported the impugned judgment, asserting that the petitioner had suppressed her marital status, thereby disentitling her from any equitable relief. It was submitted that the Tribunal had rightly concluded that, in view of the clarifications dated 21 February 2020 and 28 April 2023, the petitioner's appointment was not sustainable, and hence no indulgence was warranted in her favour.

3. At the very outset, it is pertinent to observe that the facts of the present case are substantially on all fours with the earlier judgment of this Court in Zahida, wherein the services of the petitioner in that case had likewise been terminated based on the above clarifications. In the said judgment, while interpreting Rule 10(4) in a gender-neutral manner, this Court affirmed that a woman's legal identity, rights, and autonomy remain intact after marriage, and that any attempt by the executive to limit these rights through administrative instructions is devoid of lawful authority. It held that facility is equally available to male and female children. However, in case the female has contracted a marriage, she loses this right. Hence, a married daughter is not eligible for this facility.

[2] The clarification provides: It is to further clarify that a married daughter after separation from her husband and dependent on her parents is also entitled to appointment under Rule 10(4) of the Rules subject to the conditions that: (i) In case the married daughter is separated judicially, she has to produce a divorce certificate duly issued by NADRA and (ii) In case she has separated customarily she has to produce a certificate from the Deputy Commissioner concerned to the effect that she is separated and is fully dependent on her parents after separation.

[3] Zahida Parveen v. Government of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa PLD 2025 SC 529.

the exclusion of married daughters from the purview of Rule 10(4) offends the constitutional guarantees enshrined in Articles 14, 25, and 27 of the Constitution of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution"), and contravenes Pakistan's international commitments under the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women ("CEDAW")[4]. Ultimately both clarification letters were unequivocally struck down by this Court as being discriminatory, ultra vires the Rules, and issued without lawful authority.

Moving Beyond Zahida

Rule 10(4) Extends Continuity of Livelihood to The Family - Marital Status of The Child, Whether Male or Female, is Wholly Immaterial

4. We take the opportunity of the instant matter and consider it necessary to further build upon Zahida by clarifying that the benefit under Rule 10(4) is not a personal reward for the child or other members of the family, but a posthumous or continuing premium on the service rendered by the parent - the deceased or incapacitated civil servant. The quota is therefore a recognition of the parent's dedication to public service, and the appointment under it is the State's means of extending continuity of livelihood to the family. The children or other dependents are merely the conduits through whom the State expresses its recognition and support. The said benefit - appointment to a post - is to be realized through the family members of the deceased or incapacitated civil servant, including the children, the wife or widow, and, where applicable, the husband or widower. Hence, apart from the prescribed educational qualifications and age, the only qualification relevant to such appointment is the applicant's status as a family member of the deceased or incapacitated employee. The marital status of the child, whether male or female, is wholly immaterial. The rationale of the rule is compensatory and benevolent - it aims to provide financial continuity to the affected family, not to assess or penalize the marital status of the child. To deny this benefit to a married daughter on the ground of her marriage is to misread the object of the Rule. The benefit is a recognition of the services rendered by the parent; it matters little whether the beneficiary child is married or unmarried.

[4] Pakistan ratified the CEDAW on 3 December, 1996.

5. The Rule contemplates appointment of a child of a deceased or incapacitated civil servant to provide financial relief to the affected family in recognition of the parent's service to the State. Its purpose is not to assess the dependency or economic condition of individual children but to ensure that the benefit of employment reaches the family of the civil servant who has died or become incapacitated during service. In this context, a son and a daughter stand on an equal footing. Both can transmit the intended economic relief to the family, and the choice of either fulfils the object of the Rule. The assumption that a daughter, by reason of her marriage, ceases to be connected with or concerned for her parental family is misconceived and rests on outdated social stereotypes. If a son's marriage does not disqualify him or interrupt the flow of financial benefit to the family, there is no rational basis to hold that a daughter's marriage should have that effect. The relief contemplated by the Rule flows to the family through the appointed child – whether son or daughter – and the daughter's marital status bears no nexus to the object of the Rule. Any interpretation that denies her this opportunity offends the guarantees of equality and non-discrimination under Articles 25 and 27 of the Constitution and perpetuates a stereotype the Constitution itself rejects.

The Constitutional Framework

6. The Constitution of Pakistan is gender-neutral in its recognition of fundamental rights and does not draw a distinction between a man and a woman, or a son and a daughter, in the enjoyment of their entitlements (Article 25). Indeed, it goes further and consciously discriminates in favour of women by directing the State to take special measures for their protection and advancement (Articles 25, 27, and 34). This constitutional framework acknowledges that women have historically faced systemic disadvantage and therefore deserve additional support to ensure substantive equality. Yet, despite this constitutional protection, the petitioner has been denied her rightful claim to the quota reserved for the children of a deceased or incapacitated parent on the ground of her marriage - a denial that stands in stark contradiction to both the text and spirit of the Constitution.

Marriage does Not Strip a Woman of Her Personhood

7. Being married is not a disqualification that strips a woman of her personhood or her constitutional entitlements; marriage merely alters her legal status, not her fundamental rights. A woman like a man is a "person" under the Constitution – and this constitutional status of her personhood remains undisturbed through marriage or divorce. The view that a daughter (and not the son) is always dependent upon her father and thereafter as a wife is always dependent upon her husband is constitutionally unsustainable. Such a notion undermines her individuality and erodes her identity as a person in her own right. As Martha C. Nussbaum aptly observes, "A society that denies women equal opportunities for full human functioning denies itself justice."[5]

Woman's Choice – To Work or to Care – is Equally Dignified

8. A woman is a full and independent person, enjoying all her fundamental rights in her own capacity as a citizen of Pakistan. Even if she is being looked after by her husband, it remains her personal choice to seek employment, to serve the State, and to enjoy financial autonomy. Conversely, if she chooses to remain at home and devote herself to caregiving and managing the household, that too is a dignified and valuable choice. The contribution of a homemaker to the stability of the family and, by extension, to the strength of the nation, is immeasurable. The labour of care - raising children, nurturing the family, maintaining the household - is an onerous and vital task, too lightly acknowledged in law and society. Strong families and strong nations are built on the strength of mothers who devote themselves to this unseen work. To describe such a woman as "dependent" on her husband is therefore extremely demeaning. She is independent in her personhood and her choice, and whether she stays at home or joins the workforce, her contribution to the family and to society is no less valuable than that of a man. Economic independence, in whatever form it manifests - through employment or through the exercise of meaningful choice - is a crucial component of a woman's dignity, enabling her to live as an equal and self-reliant member of society. The law cannot compel her to remain dependent, nor can it penalize her for exercising her choice to pursue public employment. Any interpretation that does so perpetuates patriarchy and violates the constitutional guarantees of equality, liberty, and dignity.

A Woman Is Not a Liability: Rejecting the Language of Patriarchy

9. We must also strongly dispel, once again, the regressive notion reflected in the above referred clarifications issued by the Establishment Department of the Government of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, which state that a married woman is no longer "a liability"[6] of her father. Such a statement is deeply insensitive, for it unpersons a woman. The very use of the term "liability" to describe a woman reflects a patriarchal rigidity of thought that has no place under our Constitution. We are astonished that such a term could find its way into official correspondence in the 21st century, more so in a republic that constitutionally guarantees equality, dignity, and respect to all its citizens irrespective of gender.

Women's Inclusion Is a Constitutional Right, Not a Concession

10. Looking at from another angle, the participation of women in the public sphere is not a benevolent concession - it is the realization of a right long denied. At the heart of the matter lies not only the individual dignity of women but also the collective progress of society. When women contribute across education, administration, policy, health, and justice, institutions draw upon a broader spectrum of experience, enhancing the quality, legitimacy, and responsiveness of governance.[7] Women's equal participation in public life is thus not simply a means to personal financial independence; it is a structural driver of socio-economic development, good governance, and constitutional democracy. This has been recognized internationally through the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs)[8] and by comparative constitutional jurisprudence[9] that advocates affirmative measures to correct gender imbalance in public services.

[6] According to the Merriam-Webster Dictionary, the term "liability" connotes "the quality or state of being liable" or "one that acts as a disadvantage."

11. In addition to CEDAW, as discussed in Zahida, the exclusion of married women from public service also completely goes against the global agenda of equality for women as put forth in the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action, 1995 ("Beijing Declaration")[10]. The Beijing Declaration is the world's most comprehensive, visionary plan ever created to achieve the equal rights of all women and girls.[11]. Although the declaration is not a legally binding treaty it creates a foundational global commitment towards achieving gender equality carrying significant moral and political weight.[12] It recognizes in Article 13 that women's empowerment and their equal participation in decision-making processes are indispensable to achieving equality, development, and peace; Article 16 underscores that sustainable economic growth, social justice and poverty eradication require women's full involvement in economic and social development; and Article 26 directs states to promote women's economic independence including employment by reforming structural inequalities, expanding access to productive resources, and addressing the feminization of poverty. The accompanying Platform for Action further operationalizes these commitments. It places a direct responsibility on governments to design and implement inclusive policies with the equal participation of women, ensuring that gender equality becomes an integral component of national development and governance frameworks.

The Quranic Ethos of Equality: Women as Independent Moral and Civic Beings

12. The moral imperative to uphold women's substantive freedom and equality - in the social, familial, spiritual, and public spheres - finds its deepest grounding in Islamic teachings. The Holy Quran, through its timeless ethical vision, lifted women from being treated as property of men or tribes to independent, autonomous moral beings, fully participating in family and social life.[13] By placing women on an equal spiritual footing with men, Islam transformed pre- Islamic society and established a moral order where dignity and equality are indivisible. The Quran's divine message makes no distinction between men and women in their moral worth[14] or capacity for public service. There can, therefore, be no justification for treating women differently in matters of public employment, particularly on patriarchal interpretations of hardship or dependency that apply equally, if at all, to both men and women.

13. Within the framework of usul-al-fiqh, there is no textual or rational basis to exclude women from gainful employment - before, during, or after marriage. The foundational rule is one of permissibility unless expressly prohibited[15], and Islam contains no such prohibition. On the contrary, modern scholarship has rearticulated the Quran's gender-egalitarian ethos and reaffirmed the substantive equality embedded within Islamic tradition.[16] From an age that tolerated female infanticide, Islam advanced women to positions of moral and civic leadership.[17] Women in Islam were thus never confined to the domestic sphere alone. Performing valued public duties was recognized as a means of fulfilling their potential and serving the community. The Quran, the Sunnah, and the Hadith literature collectively affirm women's dignity, their right to public participation, and society's duty to honour their contributions in every sphere of life.

Rejecting Patriarchal Constructs

14. It is therefore imperative that legislators and policymakers recognize women as autonomous individuals and refrain from enacting or interpreting laws in a manner that subordinates their personhood

[14] The Quran at many places directly addresses both men and women and draws no distinction therein. See Quran (16:97); "*Whoever does good, whether male or female, and is a believer, We will surely bless them with a good life, and We will certainly reward them according to the best of their deed*s." See Amina Wadud, Qur'an and Woman: Rereading the Sacred Text from a Woman's Perspective (2nd edn, Oxford University Press 1999) and Asma Barlas, Believing Women in Islam: Unreading Patriarchal Interpretations of the Qur'ān (rev edn, University of Texas Press 2019).

to patriarchal or marital constructs. The exclusion or "othering"[18] of women - particularly on the ground of matrimony - constitutes a direct assault on their dignity and equality and denies them the fundamental rights that attach to their independent selves. Terminations such as that of the petitioner, resting upon patriarchal readings of the Rule or policy, not only violate the identity and rights of women but also impoverish society and future generations, who are thereby deprived of the intellect, values, and perspectives that women uniquely bring to public life.

15. In Zahida, this court already clarified that although Jalal[19] struck down Rule 10(4) as unconstitutional, that judgment operates prospectively, and does not affect appointments already made, such as this one. It is also worth emphasizing that when this Court declares a notification, circular, or rule as ultra vires, such declaration is not person-specific - it operates erga omnes (i.e., against all) rather than inter partes (i.e., between the parties). Zahida is not a judgment in personam but a judgement in rem, as it decided the question of law.[20] So its direction equally applies to all appealing and non-appealing parties.[21] The underlying principle is equal treatment of all persons similarly situated to avoid impartial justice that breeds discontent, resentment, and frustration within the social fabric.[22] Thus, the Government should give full effect to the Court's decision by extending its benefit to all persons to prevent the multiplicity of litigation arising from identical causes.

16. Consequently, in view of the above, the impugned judgment is set aside, and the respondent-department is also directed to restore the petitioner's appointment with all back-benefits in light of

Versus

District Police Officer, Gujrat and others

For the Petitioner: Ch. Munir Sadiq, ASC

For the Respondents: Mr. Sanaullah Zahid, AAG. Punjab Date of Hearing: 23.10.2025

ORDER

Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J. The brief facts of the case are that the Petitioner, serving as a Police Constable (BPS-07), was implicated in a criminal case bearing FIR No. 722/2021 dated 08.01.2021, registered under Sections 302, 311, 147 and 148 of the Pakistan Penal Code, 1860, at Police Station Civil Lines, Gujrat. Subsequently, independent departmental proceedings were initiated against the Petitioner in addition to the pending criminal case under Punjab Police (Efficiency & Discipline) Rules, 1975 ("Rules"). The allegations levelled against the Petitioner in the disciplinary proceedings were that:

> "He while posted at P.P Jatria Sadar Lalamusa, failed to perform his official duty in an appropriate manner. As per Special Report vide No. 1210-5A, dated 09.11.2021 submitted by SHO P.S Civil Lines, Gujrat, the delinquent official has been found involved in a case FIR No. 722/21, dated 08.11.2021 u/s 302/311/148/149 PPC P.S Civil lines, Gujrat. Being a public servant his involvement in a criminal case amounts to height of inefficiency and gross misconduct on his part and warrants strict departmental action against him under the provisions of the Punjab Police (E&D) Rules, 1975."

Without conducting a proper inquiry, the Inquiry Officer, through report dated 18.11.2021, merely referred to the Petitioner's involvement in the criminal case and recommended serious departmental action. Consequently, the Petitioner was dismissed from service vide order dated 13.12.2021. The Petitioner preferred an appeal against his dismissal, wherein he was provisionally reinstated with a direction to the department to conduct a de-novo inquiry vide order dated 25.04.2022. Meanwhile, the Petitioner was acquitted in the criminal case on 26.04.2022.

2. In the de novo inquiry, identical allegations were served on the Petitioner on 19.05.2022. He appeared before the Inquiry Officer and informed him of his acquittal in the criminal case. Nonetheless, while acknowledging the acquittal, the Inquiry Officer concluded that the Petitioner's mere involvement in a criminal case warranted departmental action. The report remained silent on the separate allegation of failure to perform duty in an appropriate manner. Relying on this report, the competent authority dismissed the Petitioner from service on 16.06.2022. His departmental appeal and revision were subsequently dismissed on 06.04.2023 and 21.08.2023, respectively. The Service Tribunal also dismissed his appeal on 16.05.2024, leading to the present Civil Petition for Leave to Appeal.

3. Learned counsel for the Petitioner contended that the allegation of involvement in the criminal case stood disproved, while the charge of improper performance of duty was neither discussed by the Inquiry Officer nor supported by any evidence. Hence, the imposition of a major penalty solely on the basis of the Petitioner's nomination in an FIR was unwarranted and without lawful justification. Conversely, the learned Additional Advocate General ("AAG") argued that criminal and departmental proceedings are distinct and independent, and the Petitioner's dismissal—based on a duly conducted inquiry and upheld by the appellate fora—was lawful and sustainable.

4. The charge sheet levelled two allegations against the Petitioner:
(i) failure to perform duty in an appropriate manner, and (ii) involvement in a criminal case. Two inquiries were held, yet both reports - dated 18.11.2021 and 26.05.2022 - neither addressed nor examined the alleged dereliction of duty. Instead, they focused solely on the Petitioner's implication in the criminal case and, on that basis alone, recommended departmental action. Thus, in effect, the only charge pursued against the Petitioner was his involvement in the criminal case - of which he had already been acquitted prior to the initiation of the de novo inquiry.

5. We have heard the learned counsel and examined the record of the case. It is an admitted position that the Petitioner stood acquitted in the criminal case vide judgment dated 26.04.2022. The order of acquittal shows that the Petitioner was extended the benefit of doubt and acquitted on merits.

6. We consider it necessary to reiterate the settled principle that departmental disciplinary proceedings and criminal proceedings, though sometimes arising out of the same set of facts, operate in distinct legal domains[1] and are governed by different standards of proof. The disciplinary inquiry is founded on the preponderance of probability, aimed at preserving the integrity and efficiency of public service, whereas a criminal trial proceeds on the stricter standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt, intended to determine penal liability. Consequently, the pendency or outcome of one does not automatically affect the other, and both may lawfully proceed concurrently.[2]

7. However, this general rule admits of an important exception. Where the sole allegation in the departmental proceedings is that the civil servant has been involved in, or is facing, a criminal case - and no independent and probeable act of misconduct is alleged - the acquittal of the civil servant in the criminal case removes the very substratum of the departmental charge.[3] The disciplinary machinery cannot stand on its own in such circumstances because there exists no stand-alone allegation that the department can independently inquire into or establish through departmental evidence. The charge of "involvement in a criminal case" is, by its very nature, incapable of departmental proof - it belongs exclusively to the criminal forum. Once the criminal court has adjudged the civil servant not guilty on the same accusation, the departmental authority is left with nothing to determine; the entire charge falls to the ground.

8. Any further attempt to proceed would not only be redundant but would also transgress the boundaries of fairness and legality. It would offend the broader constitutional guarantee of due process and fair trial under Article 10A, which requires that no one be condemned without credible evidence, impartial inquiry, and a meaningful opportunity of defence. A departmental action that, despite acquittal, persists in holding the civil servant liable for mere involvement in a criminal case is founded not on evidence but on conjecture and subjective notions of ideal conduct. Such proceedings violate the constitutional matrix of rights that shield every citizen from arbitrary and oppressive state action. The denial of due process under Article 10A necessarily infringes the right to dignity under Article 14 and the right to livelihood - an inseparable facet of the right to life under Article 9. These inter-locking guarantees collectively ensure that public employment, though subject to discipline, remains protected by constitutional fairness and human dignity. To sum up, the jurisprudence, therefore, draws a clear and categorical distinction:

(a) Where departmental proceedings rest on independent and probeable evidence of misconduct, an acquittal in the criminal case does not absolve the employee, and both proceedings may lawfully run concurrently.

(b) However, where the departmental action is founded solely on the registration or pendency of an FIR, without any distinct charge of misconduct, the employee's subsequent acquittal extinguishes that foundation, rendering any ensuing penalty legally untenable and constitutionally infirm.

9. Learned AAG has also submitted that the service appeal of Petitioner was barred by time, however, this aspect was never raised by the department before the Tribunal. Keeping in view the circumstances of the case, we are not inclined to take up this matter at this stage.

10. We, therefore, set aside the impugned judgment and the order of dismissal of the Petitioner and re-instate the Petitioner into service. This petition is converted into appeal and allowed.

Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J.- Brief facts of the case are that the Petitioner who was working as Project Incharge in Pakistan Agricultural Storage and Services Corporation Ltd (PASSCO), Lahore was departmentally proceeded on the charges mentioned in Show Cause Notice dated 18.04.2009. Without holding regular inquiry, major penalty of dismissal from service was imposed on the Petitioner, which was subsequently, set aside by the Lahore High Court and converted into compulsory retirement through the impugned order dated 11.04.2017. 2. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties at some length and gone through the impugned judgment of the High Court and the record of the case.

3. Before embarking upon the merits of the case, it is imperative to recall that the inquiry is not a mere procedural ritual; it is the constitutional heartbeat of fairness within the disciplinary framework of public service. The right to be heard, to confront evidence, and to defend oneself against allegations is not a privilege granted by departmental grace but a facet of the fundamental rights guaranteed under Articles 9, 10A, and 14 of the Constitution — the right to life and livelihood, the right to a fair trial, and the right to dignity. To disregard an inquiry is, therefore, to erode these guarantees at their very core.

4. Regrettably, a recurring tendency has emerged within certain administrative hierarchies – a dismissive refrain that "let them go to the courts." Such indifference trivializes the hardship of those public servants who lack the means, resources, or social capital to pursue costly and protracted litigation. Many are left to endure unjust penalties in silence, their professional lives and personal dignity scarred by the absence of due process. When disciplinary power is exercised without the discipline of inquiry, it ceases to be lawful authority and degenerates into arbitrariness.

5. Bypassing or conducting a sham inquiry does not merely harm the individual; it corrodes institutional morale, breeds cynicism, and burdens the judicial system with avoidable litigation – diverting the energies of both the public servant and the State from constructive service. It is, therefore, incumbent upon this Court to restate, in clear terms, that an inquiry is the cornerstone of the rule of law in service discipline – a constitutional shield against administrative excess and a guarantee that justice within the bureaucracy is not reduced to the whim of authority.

6. The erstwhile Removal from Service (Special Powers) Ordinance, 2000 ("2000 Ordinance")[1], under which the petitioner was proceeded against, prescribes a comprehensive inquiry mechanism. It mandates the appointment of an Inquiry Officer or Inquiry Committee to conduct a regular inquiry, which entails framing and communicating specific charges and a statement of allegations to the accused, securing a written reply, and examining both oral and documentary evidence while ensuring the accused's right to cross- examine witnesses. For this purpose, the Inquiry Officer is vested with the powers of a civil court under the Civil Procedure Code, 1908 ("CPC"). Upon completion of the inquiry within the prescribed timeframe, the Inquiry Officer or Committee submits a report with findings and recommendations to the competent authority. Based on this report, and after affording the accused a reasonable opportunity to show cause, the competent authority may impose an appropriate penalty where guilt is established. This procedural framework is similarly reflected in other efficiency and disciplinary rules governing civil servants.[2]

7. It is, however, recognized that a regular inquiry may be dispensed with, though only in exceptional circumstances. Section 5(4) of the erstwhile 2000 Ordinance expressly provides:

> "The competent authority may dispense with the inquiry under sub-section (1) if it is in possession of sufficient documentary evidence against the accused, or for reasons to be recorded in writing, it is satisfied that there is no need of holding an inquiry."

This statutory power is to be exercised sparingly and with circumspection. The courts have consistently interpreted it narrowly, emphasizing that dispensation of inquiry is an exception, not the rule. Only in rare and exceptional cases – where the available documentary evidence conclusively establishes misconduct, or where the facts are undisputed and borne out from the record or for any cogent and recorded reasons – can the department resort to a summary procedure.

8. The courts have time and again held that the power to dispense with a regular inquiry must be exercised with extreme caution and only in the rarest of cases. It cannot be invoked where the charge is of such a nature that it cannot be established without recording evidence or cross-examining witnesses.[3] The very object of an inquiry is to test the credibility of allegations through evidence, confrontation, and defence; dispensing with it in contested matters amounts to short-circuiting due process. Accordingly, the dispensation of a regular inquiry is justified only in extraordinary circumstances, particularly where facts are admitted, undisputed, or self-proving from the record. Where the facts are contested, or where credibility and evidentiary weight must be tested by cross-examination, a summary procedure cannot be adopted. Even in cases where a summary route is permissible, it must be exercised "with extra care so that no prejudice is caused".[4] To proceed otherwise would offend the guarantee of fair trial and due process under Article 10A of the Constitution, which forbids condemning a person without proper proof and the opportunity to defend. The competent authority may therefore dispense with an inquiry only where the charge rests on incontrovertible documentary material – leaving no disputed question of fact – and only after recording detailed reasons reflecting independent application of mind. It is well settled that reliance on evidence which is not self- authenticating defeats the very rationale of dispensation. This Court has held, for instance, that unverified closed-circuit television (CCTV) footage cannot be treated as conclusive evidence unless subjected to forensic examination and authentication.[5] The same principle applies to disputed or untested documentary material, the veracity of which can only be established through cross-examination.[6]

9. Conversely, where the incriminating fact is admitted and self-proving – such as absence from duty duly reflected in official records – the competent authority may, for recorded reasons, proceed without a regular inquiry.[7] In every case, however, the safeguard remains that the authority must demonstrate, through cogent reasoning and written justification, that the evidence relied upon is unimpeachable, self-contained, and that no prejudice has been caused to the accused officer. A holistic view of the settled legal principles establishes that a civil servant must be clearly informed of the specific charges and allegations against them, afforded an opportunity to submit a written defence, granted the right to cross-examine witnesses, and provided a fair opportunity of personal hearing. The purpose is to determine whether the allegations of misconduct are substantiated and, if so, to confront the delinquent officer as to why disciplinary action should not be taken.[8]

10. The principles governing inquiry apply with equal force whether the penalty contemplated is major or minor. The distinction between the two relates only to the degree of severity, not to the existence of procedural safeguards. A minor penalty is still a penalty, carrying legal, professional, and reputational consequences for the civil servant. To treat it as exempt from the discipline of inquiry is to trivialize the constitutional guarantees of fairness and due process.

11. No penalty – howsoever described – may lawfully be imposed without confronting the accused with the allegations, affording a reasonable opportunity to explain, and adjudging that explanation through reasoned consideration.[9] These safeguards are not ornamental; they are the very instruments by which justice is administered within the civil service. The logic of distinguishing between major and minor penalties presupposes that the authority will first ascertain, through a fair inquiry, the true nature and gravity of the misconduct so that the proportionality of the punishment can be justly determined. Without such inquiry, there is no factual foundation on which discretion can rest.

12. A regular inquiry, therefore, cannot be dispensed with merely because the department intends to impose a so-called minor penalty. The absence of inquiry deprives the authority of an informed basis to calibrate punishment and exposes the order to arbitrariness. Procedural fairness is indivisible; it cannot be diluted by the label of "minor." Where any punitive action affects a civil servant's dignity, reputation, or prospects of advancement, it must pass through the crucible of inquiry – so that discipline does not become disguised injustice.

13. The centrality of due process and fair trial in disciplinary proceedings is not only a constitutional imperative but also a binding international obligation. Pakistan, as a signatory to core international

As a result, federal employees can have a property right in their continued federal employment, which means that due process must be provided before an agency interferes with or terminates their employment or imposes any penalty including suspension. This was reinforced in the case of Cleveland Bd. of Education v. Loudermill, 470 U.S. 532, 546 (1985); Also see Gilbert v. Homar, 520 U.S. 924, 935-36 (1997) (regarding the due process clause in cases of suspension), Ward v. U.S. Postal Service, 634 F.3d 1274, 1280 (Fed. Cir. 2011) and *Stone v. human rights instruments, has undertaken to uphold these guarantees. Article 10 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights affirms that "everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal in the determination of his rights and obligations." This foundational guarantee presupposes a meaningful inquiry as the mechanism through which facts are established, and rights are adjudicated.

14. Article 14 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights further crystallizes the fair-trial standard.[10] It guarantees equality before courts and tribunals and a fair and public hearing by a competent, independent, and impartial authority in all proceedings determining rights and obligations, whether civil, criminal, or disciplinary. The provision embraces all adjudicatory forums – ordinary or specialized – and requires that procedural safeguards be respected throughout the process.[11] A proper inquiry is the procedural instrument through which fairness is operationalized. It enables the accused to know the case against them, respond to evidence, and test the credibility of witnesses and documents. Penalties – whether classified as minor or major – imposed without adherence to this process amount to arbitrary deprivation of rights, contravene the guarantees of fair trial and due process, and fall foul of Pakistan's constitutional framework and its international commitments. International law does not countenance punitive outcomes founded on untested allegations; nor can the Constitution.

15. In the instant case, it is an admitted position that major penalty was imposed without any regular inquiry. When asked, learned counsel for the respondent could not refer to any document that justifies as to why the regular inquiry was dispensed with. The allegation against the petitioner is his involvement in a scam regarding the preparation and encashment of forged and fictitious bills. The Managing Director, PASSCO raised the allegations vide final show cause notice dated 18.04.2009 of abetment to fraud and also dispensed away with the inquiry on the basis of "sufficient documentary evidence and incriminating record" without showing what evidence was actually on record. From the allegations, this is a case where the facts are necessarily in dispute; a position also borne out of the petitioner's reply denying the allegations. Furthermore, the handwriting expert also reported that the signatures on the purchase bill did not tally with the admitted signatures of the petitioner. As such, there was no reasonable ground to dispense with the inquiry and more so there was no ground to award a major penalty without any regular inquiry, which was imposed upon the petitioner vide office order dated 30.05.2009. The High Court though observed the handwriting expert report and noted the aforementioned discrepancy of signatures, yet the writ petition was partially accepted and the penalty of dismissal from service was converted into compulsory retirement in contravention of established principles of law and procedure discussed above.

16. In view of the above, since the guilt of the petitioner was never established by a regular inquiry, no penalty – minor or major (in this case major penalty) could have been imposed upon him. As such the impugned order of conversion of penalty into compulsory retirement is set-aside and the petitioner is re-instated into service. As to the back benefits, the same shall be determined by the department in the light of Muhammad Sharif[12] This petition is converted into appeal and allowed.

ORDER

Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J.- Brief facts of the case are that the respondent, serving as Accounts Officer in the Audit Department of Pakistan Railways, enhanced his qualification by obtaining an LLB degree in the year 1992. Consequently, he applied for two advance increments under two schemes: (i) THE INCENTIVE SCHEME FOR RAILWAYS OFFICERS AND SUBORDINATES dated 22.01.1966 ("Scheme, 1966") issued by the Railway Department, Government of West Pakistan; and (ii) GRANT OF ADVANCE INCREMENTS TO THE EMPLOYEES DRAWING PAY IN BPS-16—Office Memorandum dated 08.07.1996 ("General Scheme, 1996"). The respondent approached the department through a representation, which was referred to the Finance Department and subsequently rejected vide order dated 26.09.2019 on the ground that the Scheme, 1966 stood abolished on 01.12.2001. The respondent challenged the said decision before the Tribunal, which, vide impugned judgment dated 26.10.2022, granted him relief under the Scheme, 1966.

2. Learned Additional Attorney General for Pakistan, representing Pakistan Railways and the Federal Government, assisted by Mr. Jawad Mahmood Pasha, ASC, and Ms. Huma Noureen, Legal Consultant, Pakistan Railways, submits that the respondent, being an Accounts Officer in the Audit Department, was not entitled to any incentive under the Scheme, 1966. Learned Law Officer referred to the scheme to show that while it extends benefits to various departments of Pakistan Railways, the Audit Department is not one of them. With regard to the General Scheme, 1996, it was submitted that the said scheme requires a person to possess an M.A. or M.Sc. degree to qualify for two advance increments. As the respondent's qualification is LLB, he does not fall within its ambit.

3. Conversely, learned counsel for the respondent vehemently argued that several judgments of the Tribunal, as well as letters issued by Pakistan Railways and the Finance Division, have extended similar benefits to officers who obtained an LLB degree. Some of these references, however, relate to departments already covered under the Scheme, 1966, and none pertains to an Accounts Officer of the Audit Department.

4. We have heard the learned counsel for the parties and examined the record. Upon careful perusal of both schemes, we find that no benefit under the Scheme, 1966 has been extended to officers of the Audit Department, and that an LLB qualification is not recognized under the General Scheme, 1996. Therefore, the respondent's case does not fall within the scope of either scheme. The benefit extended by the Tribunal under the Scheme, 1966 is thus unsustainable and stands set aside.

5. As to the respondent's alternate plea under the General Scheme, 1996, the Tribunal did not address it. We considered the option of remanding the matter to the Tribunal for this purpose. However, since the record before us is complete and enables us to finally determine the issue, there is no occasion to remand the case.

6. We wish to highlight that "Remand" is not an automatic judicial reflex. It is a judicial instrument to be employed only when justice so demands, not as a matter of routine. A case may properly be remanded to a lower forum where material facts remain undetermined, procedural fairness has been compromised, or essential evidence has not been duly examined—situations in which the appellate court cannot itself do complete justice. The purpose of remand is corrective, not dilatory; it serves to secure a just adjudication, not to prolong litigation.

7. Yet, the power to remand must be exercised with circumspection and restraint. Where the factual matrix is complete, the issues are purely legal, or the appellate record permits a final determination, the appellate court ought to decide the matter itself. To remand in such circumstances is to sacrifice substance at the altar of form and to delay justice in the name of process. The restraint against unnecessary remand finds its rationale in the principle of judicial economy—a foundational tenet of modern adjudication that obliges courts to avoid duplication of proceedings, promote finality, and conserve judicial time. It embodies the constitutional command for expeditious justice under Article 37(d) of the Constitution, ensuring that litigation does not get trapped in repetitive procedural rounds. Judicial economy thus demands that appellate courts decide, not defer, where the record enables them to do so, for justice delayed is justice denied.

8. It was next argued by learned counsel for the respondent that an LLB degree is equivalent to an M.A. degree, hence the respondent is entitled to benefit under the General Scheme, 1996. No such facility for treating equivalent degrees is provided in the scheme, nor can such a condition be judicially read into it. Institutional autonomy is a vital facet of constitutional governance. It reflects the recognition that each organ or department of the State possesses its own sphere of competence, expertise, and discretion within which it must be permitted to function freely. Courts, while the ultimate interpreters of legality, must exercise judicial restraint in matters where the law vests policy discretion or administrative choice in an executive or institutional authority.

9. When a scheme or departmental policy—such as one framed by Pakistan Railways or the Finance Division—does not expressly provide for a particular benefit, it is not the function of the Court to read that benefit into the scheme. Doing so would amount to judicial legislation and would erode the institutional autonomy that underpins administrative efficacy. Courts are to interpret the scheme as framed, not to re-engineer it according to perceived notions of equity or convenience.

10. The judiciary must therefore respect the institutional boundaries drawn by law. Unless the omission complained of violates a constitutional or statutory command, the Court cannot compel an institution to adopt a policy or grant a concession not contemplated by its own governing framework. The principle of institutional autonomy thus guards against judicial overreach, ensuring that policy formation remains the prerogative of the executive, and that courts confine themselves to ensuring legality, rationality, and procedural fairness within the limits set by law.

11. Furthermore, this Court has already held that an LLB degree is not equivalent to a Master's degree. Reference may be made to order dated 17.02.2022 passed in CPLA No. 262 of 2018 titled Government through Secretary Finance, Finance Division (Regulation Wing), Islamabad v. Manzoor Qadir, Assistant Director (Mails) and others, and order dated 13.03.2018 passed in CPLA No. 65 of 2017 titled The Secretary Finance Division, Government of Pakistan, Islamabad v. Hakim Ali Soomro and others.

12. Accordingly, we see no reason to remand the matter to the Tribunal and hold that the respondent is not entitled to advance increments under either of the Schemes. We note that, following the impugned judgment of the Federal Service Tribunal, the respondent has already received advance increments amounting to Rs. 75,000/-. The Additional Secretary, Pakistan Railways, submits that, in the facts and circumstances of this case, the Department does not intend to recover the said amount from the respondent. The Department has shown grace and magnanimity in foregoing this amount; however, this arrangement shall not be treated or cited as a precedent in any other case. The instant petitions are converted into appeals and allowed.

Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J.-

The question before us is whether the status of an absconder or fugitive in a criminal case, by itself, bars a person from pursuing civil or service remedies ?

Brief facts are that the petitioners were initially appointed as Junior Venacular Teachers (JVTs) by the Education Officer, Dera Bugti, and continued to serve for nearly twenty-five years until their appointment, alongwith those of twenty-two other teachers, was declared fake/bogus by the Director Education (S) through letter dated 11-02-2015. This was reaffirmed through the subsequent letter dated 09-11-2015 alleging that the petitioners had entered the Education Department through forged appointment orders, leading to the stoppage of salaries. The petitioner's first appeal was disposed of with consent for initiation of proper inquiry. Till date no removal order has been passed; yet their respective salaries remain withheld. Their subsequent appeal seeking release of salaries was dismissed as non-maintainable solely on the ground that the petitioners are fugitives from law/absconder in a criminal case. Hence this petition for leave to appeal.

2. Learned counsel for the petitioners submits that the concept of being a fugitive from law or being an absconder is a concept under the criminal law and cannot be applied on the civil side. Therefore, service appeal of the petitioners ought to have been heard on merits and the case decided accordingly. While the learned AAG argued that in the absence of lawful induction, no vested right to pay or continuation in service arises, and that his fugitive/absconder status disentitles him to seek discretionary relief until he submits to the lawful process.

3. The principle that a fugitive or absconder cannot invoke the court's appellate jurisdiction in a criminal matter traces its origin to the Fugitive Disentitlement Doctrine developed in the United States. Evolving in the late nineteenth century as an equitable rule of criminal appellate procedure[1]. The doctrine rests on the premise that one who deliberately evades the authority of the court disentitles himself to its relief. It treats flight from justice as a constructive waiver of appellate rights, justified on three inter-locking rationales: first, that a court should not pronounce judgments it cannot enforce; second, that flight directly frustrates the appellate process by placing the appellant beyond judicial control; and third, that denial of hearing deters evasion of justice.

4. In the United Kingdom, the same consequence follows in criminal appeals not by way of doctrine but through procedural rule and practical necessity. Under the Criminal Appeal Act 1968, an appellant who has not surrendered to custody may have his appeal dismissed, since enforcement of any judgment—whether affirming or overturning conviction—would be impossible while he remains at large. Pakistan law has followed the same procedural course: appellate courts have repeatedly declined to hear the criminal appeals of fugitives until they surrender or are apprehended, treating submission to jurisdiction as a precondition for hearing.

[1] See Roberto Iraola, 'The Fugitive Disentitlement Doctrine' WASH. L. REV 427 (1950) 430 & Smith v. United States, 94 U.S. 97 (1876); Molinaro v. New Jersey, 396 U.S. 365 (1970)

5. The rationale, shared across these jurisdictions, is one of enforceability and procedural discipline, not punitive forfeiture of rights. This principle, however, is strictly confined to criminal proceedings. Its extension into civil, family, or service-law contexts finds no support in either doctrine or policy. Civil and service adjudications determine rights over property, employment, or entitlements that are enforceable irrespective of the claimant's physical custody, and the litigant's absence seldom frustrates the process or its execution[2]. In the United Kingdom and other common- law jurisdictions, blanket disentitlement of fugitives from civil justice is unknown, being incompatible with the right to a fair hearing under Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights. Within our own constitutional framework, founded upon Articles 4, 9, 10A and 25 of the Constitution of Pakistan, the right of access to justice cannot be curtailed merely because a person stands accused, or has absconded, in another domain of law. Unless a statute expressly provides otherwise or the fugitivity demonstrably obstructs adjudication, abscondence in a criminal matter cannot extinguish or suspend independent civil or service rights.

6. This Court has already affirmed that any disadvantage arising from the status of a proclaimed offender ordinarily attaches only to the very case in which the proclamation is issued and does not extend to other matters lacking nexus to that proceeding.[3] Accordingly, a proclaimed offender is not, merely by virtue of that status, barred from instituting or defending a civil suit or prosecuting an appeal concerning his civil rights and obligations.[4] Moreover, declaring a person proclaimed offender carries certain statutory consequences within that criminal sphere unless a specific statute governing civil employment expressly stipulates that such criminal status disables pursuit of civil remedies, the disqualification cannot be read into the service jurisprudence by implication. It would be impermissible to import a penal consequence into service jurisprudence in the absence of a clear legislative mandate.

[2] Even in the United States, attempts to transplant the doctrine into civil contexts have been rejected as disproportionate and inconsistent with due process.

[3] Tahir Sadiq v. Faisal Ali and others 2024 SCMR 775.

[4] Malik Ahmad Usman Nawaz v. The Appellate Tribunal (Elections Act, 2017) 2024 SCMR 1202; Umar Farooq v. Sajjad Ahmad Qamar and others PLD 2024 Supreme Court 688*; Tahir Sadiq v. Faisal Ali and others* 2024 SCMR 775.

7. Application of the disentitlement doctrine within the domain of civil adjudication is fundamentally inconsistent with the constitutional architecture. Articles 4 and 10-A enshrine the right to fair treatment, due process, and equality before law, ensuring that every person is afforded a meaningful opportunity to vindicate civil, service, and proprietary rights. The continuation of criminal liability or the status of a proclaimed offender, howsoever serious, does not operate to forfeit these indispensable civil entitlements unless the legislature has expressly imposed such a disability. To read a bar by implication would undermine the integrity of the justice system and would, in effect, operate as a double-edged weapon. One edge to deprive a citizen of the right of appeal or statutory remedy in matters affecting livelihood, service tenure, pension, contractual obligations or financial liabilities amounts to a denial of access to justice, a core constitutional guarantee woven into Articles 4, 9, 10-A and 25. Such exclusion would not only subvert the principle that no person shall be dealt with except in accordance with law, but would also distort the court's function from an instrument of justice into a mechanism of oppression. It would erode the very safeguards that protect citizens against arbitrary action, weaken public confidence in judicial institutions, and compromise the constitutional promise that justice shall be administered fairly, transparently, and without discrimination. The second edge would invite deliberate exploitation by shrewd and unscrupulous litigants. Such persons could weaponized a separate criminal label as a tactical device to preclude judicial review, insulating their conduct from scrutiny and avoiding accountability for contested actions. The practical effect would be to vest opportunistic litigants with a license to oppress; by invoking disentitlement they could extinguish an aggrieved person's access to remedies affecting livelihood, service, property or contractual rights, and thereby deny them the procedural protections of notice, hearing and appeal. Misapplied in this manner, the doctrine would cease to serve equity or orderly procedure and instead become a cloak for bad-faith litigation tactics that subvert the rule of law and strip citizens of constitutionally guaranteed due process.

8. The present matter is a service dispute, raising factual and legal issues that fall squarely within the ambit of departmental and administrative law. These include whether the appointments were in fact irregular or fabricated; whether the disciplinary proceedings conformed to mandatory procedural requirements; and whether salaries may lawfully be withheld while the employee's service has not yet been formally terminated. None of these questions bear any nexus to the criminal proceedings or the status of the petitioner in that separate sphere. Criminal liability carries its own evidentiary thresholds and procedural safeguards, which are neither applicable to nor are determinative of service matters. To dismiss the petitioners solely based on their alleged abscondence is, therefore, a clear misapplication of law, as it conflates two distinct jurisdictions and deprives the petitioners of adjudication on issues squarely within their civil and service rights.

9. In this view of the matter, the impugned judgment is set aside with the direction that the appeal of the petitioners would be deemed to be pending before the Tribunal who will decide the matter on merits in accordance with law. Considering that the matter is pending since 2015, we are sanguine that the Tribunal will decide the matter within three months from the receipt of this order. These petitions are converted into appeal and allowed.

JUDGMENT

Syed Mansoor Ali Shah, J.- Brief facts of the case are that the Petitioner while working as Patrolling Officer (SI), was departmentally proceeded on the allegation that he ended up having a quarrel with the Senior Admin Officer. Consequently, regular inquiry was conducted in the matter under the National Highways and Motorway Police (Efficiency and Discipline) Rules, 2016 ("Rules") and the Petitioner was dismissed from service. Thereafter, the Petitioner preferred departmental appeal which was also dismissed and so was his service appeal through the impugned judgment dated 03.03.2025.

2. Learned Counsel for the Petitioner submits that the order of dismissal from service was passed by an Acting Sector Commander when the competent authority under the law was the Sector Commander and as the Acting Sector Commander being DSP could not have assumed the role of a Superintendent Police (SP). He further contends that the Petitioner was not granted an opportunity of cross- examining the four prosecution witnesses who deposed against the Petitioner. Thirdly, he submits that the four prosecution witnesses were subordinates of the complainant and therefore, cannot be independent witnesses. Fourthly, he submits that the imposition of major penalty of dismissal from service is disproportionate to the gravity of the offence. On the other hand, learned Additional Attorney General ("AAG") along with Mr. Muhammad Asad, DSP (Legal) NH&MP submitted that NH&MP is a disciplined force and due process was fully followed and the imposition of major penalty in the present facts and circumstances of the case is correct and further submits that the Acting Sector Commander was lawfully authorized to deal with such matter.

3. Admittedly, proceedings against the Petitioner were initiated under the relevant Rules. It is, therefore, essential to examine whether the prescribed procedural framework was duly observed. Rule 8(2) particularly provides for right of cross-examination.

> "The inquiry officer or inquiry committee shall inquire into the charge and may examine such oral or documentary evidence in support of the charge or in defence of the accused as may be considered necessary and the accused shall be entitled to cross- examine the witnesses against him."

We asked the learned AAG to refer to the inquiry report and show to the Court, whether an opportunity of cross-examination was granted to the Petitioner. No such reference could be made by the learned AAG. He, however, contends that as the Petitioner never raised this question in the reply to the Show Cause Notice, he cannot agitate this matter now. In response to which the learned counsel for the Petitioner submits that this ground was specifically taken in the service appeal filed before the Service Tribunal. We find it important to examine the ground regarding failure to allow the petitioner to cross examine the witnesses as it goes to the core of the case.

4. This Court has unequivocally recognised cross-examination as an essential safeguard in disciplinary proceedings. Any testimony that is not subjected to that scrutiny lacks comparable probative weight. This Court has further underscored that an Inquiry Officer or Committee is duty-bound to ensure a fair, comprehensive, and even- handed inquiry, grounded in the principles of natural justice. A departure from these safeguards imperils the integrity of the process and creates a real risk of injustice.[1] The court has evidently laid the burden upon the Inquiry Officer to ensure that the requirements of proper, free and fair trial are fulfilled. It cannot be the case that where an accused does not specifically refer to his right to cross-examination in a reply to a show-cause notice, that right is somehow waived. The right remains and it is upon the Inquiry Officer to ensure that such right is told to the accused, properly afforded and if the accused does not wish to proceed with cross-examination, record the reasons and put that into writing. It is incumbent upon the inquiry officer to ensure that the right is not treated so casually and dispensed away with especially without any reasons recorded in writing. The right remains intact, guaranteed under Article 10-A of the Constitution of Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973 ("Constitution") even where the accused does not make a request to cross examine any witness at any point during the investigation process.[2]

5. Article 10-A of the Constitution enshrines the right to a fair trial as a fundamental right. Where the petitioner is denied the opportunity to cross-examine prosecution witnesses, the proceedings cannot meet the constitutional standard of fairness. The right to a fair trial is not a singular act but a composite guarantee — a bouquet of procedural safeguards that include the framing of a clear charge, adequate opportunity to defend, the right to lead evidence, and the right to cross-examine witnesses. Each of these components is indispensable. Their observance ensures adherence to the principles of natural justice and due process, which form the bedrock of any adjudicatory process — particularly disciplinary proceedings where adverse consequences or penalties may follow.[3] It is well settled that the right to a proper defence—and, by necessary implication, the right to cross-examine—is a vested and inalienable right of the accused. Article 10-A of the Constitution casts a constitutional canopy over all proceedings, shielding the accused from being left exposed to the harsh glare of arbitrary or one-sided departmental action. It ensures that no person is condemned unheard and that fairness permeates every stage of the disciplinary process.

[2]The right of fair trial encompassing the natural justice requirements of procedural fairness is recognized in jurisdictions across the world. This particularly controversy of whether the accused has to make a formal request for cross-examination came up in a matter before the Irish High Court in the case of Lyons v. Longford and Westmeath Education and Training Board [2017] IEHC 272. The High Court ruled that cross-examination and the requirements of free trial are to be fulfilled, no matter whether the accused makes a request of cross-examination.

5. Based on the foregoing discussion, and particularly on the ground that the petitioner was not afforded an opportunity to cross- examine the witnesses — a safeguard integral to the constitutional guarantee of a fair trial under Article 10-A — we set aside the impugned order of dismissal from service. The competent authority is directed to conduct a de novo inquiry strictly in accordance with the requirements of Article 10-A of the Constitution and to complete the same within a period of two months from today. Pending the conclusion of such inquiry, the petitioner shall stand reinstated into service. The question of back benefits shall also be determined in the course of the de novo proceedings. Consequently, the impugned judgment of the Tribunal is set aside. This petition is converted into an appeal and allowed in the above terms.
